THE TRANSLATOR TO THE READER.

GOOD READER, here is now offered unto you the fifth time, printed in Engliſh, Mr. Calvin's book of the Inſtitution of the Chriſtian Religion; a book of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the church of God. Mr. Calvin firſt wrote it when he was a young man, a book of a ſmall volume, and ſince that ſeaſon he hath at ſundry times publiſhed it with new additions, ſtill proteſting at every edition, himſelf to be one of thoſe "qui ſcribendo proficiunt, et proficiendo ſcribunt," who with their writing do grow in profiting, and with their profiting do proceed in writing. At length, having in many of his other works laboured in the expoſition of ſundry books of the ſcriptures, and in the ſame finding occaſion to diſcourſe of ſundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occaſion of the texts that were offered him, and not in any other method, were not ſo ready for the reader's uſe, he therefore entered into this purpoſe to enlarge this book of Inſtitutions, and therein to treat of all thoſe articles and common places largely, with this intent, that whenſoever any occaſion occured in his other books to treat of any ſuch cauſe, he would not newly amplify his books of commentaries and expoſitions therewith, but refer his reader wholly to this ſtore-houſe and treaſury of that ſort of divine learning. As age and weakneſs grew upon him, ſo he haſtened his labour; and according to his petition to God, he in a manner ended his life with his work; for he lived not long after. So great a jewel was meet to be made moſt beneficial, that is to ſay, applied to moſt common uſe. Therefore in the very beginning of the late Queen's moſt bleſſed reign I tranſlated it out of Latin to Engliſh, for the benefit of the church of Chriſt, at the ſpecial requeſt of my dear friends of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitchurch; the one her Majeſty's printer for the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues, the other her Highneſs's printer of the book of Common Prayer. I performed my work in the houſe of my ſaid friend Edward Whitchurch, a man well known to be of upright heart and dealing, an ancient zealous goſpeller, as plain and true a friend as ever I knew living, and as deſirous to do any thing for the common good, eſpecially by the advancement of true religion. At my ſaid firſt edition of this book I conſidered how the author thereof had of a long time purpoſely laboured to write the ſame moſt exactly, and to crowd a great quantity of matter in ſmall room of words, yea, and thoſe ſo circumſpectly and preciſely ordered, as to avoid the cavils of ſuch, as out of enmity to the truth therein contained, would gladly ſeek and uſe all advantages which might be found in any overſight in penning of it, that the ſentences were thereby become ſo full as that nothing might well be added without idle ſuperfluity, and again ſo nicely compendized, that nothing could be left out without taking away ſome neceſſary ſubſtance of matter therein expreſſed. This manner of writing, beſides the peculiar terms of arts and figures, and the difficulties of the matters themſelves, being throughout interſperſed with the ſchoolmens controverſies, made a great hardneſs in the author's own book, in that tongue wherein otherwiſe he is both plentiful and eaſy, inſomuch that it ſufficeth not to read him once, unleſs you can be content to read in vain. This conſideration encumbered with great doubtfulneſs for the whole order and frame of my tranſlation. If I ſhould follow the words, I ſaw that of neceſſity the harſhneſs in the tranſlation muſt needs be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I ſhould leave the order of words, and grant myſelf liberty after the natural conſtruction of mine own tongue, to ſay that in Engliſh which I conceived to be his meaning in Latin, I plainly perceived how hardly I might eſcape error, and on the other ſide, in this matter of faith and religion, how perillous it was to err. For I durſt not preſume to truſt myſelf that I would retain his meaning without his words. And they who underſtand what it is to tranſlate well and faithfully, eſpecially in matters of religion, do know that not only the grammatical conſtruction of words ſufficeth, but the very fabric and order, to obſerve all advantages of vehemence or grace, by the placing or accent of words, maketh much to the true ſetting forth of a writer's mind. In the end I reſted upon this determination, to follow the words as near as the phraſe of the Engliſh tongue would permit me. Which purpoſe I ſo performed, that if the Engliſh book were printed on ſuch paper and letter as the Latin is, it ſhould not exceed the Latin in quantity. Whereby, beſide all other advantages that a faithful tranſlation of ſo good a work may bring, this one benefit is moreover provided for ſuch as are deſireous to attain ſome knowlege of the Latin tongue (which is at this time to be wiſhed in many of thoſe men for whoſe profeſſion this book moſt fitly ſerveth) that they ſhall not find any more Engliſh than ſhall ſuffice to conſtrue the Latin withal, except in ſuch few places, where the great difference of the phraſes of the languages conſtrained me: ſo that comparing the one with the other, they ſhall both profit in good matter, and furniſh themſelves with underſtanding of that ſpeech, wherein the greateſt treaſures of knowlege are diſcloſed. In the doing hereof, I did not truſt to my own judgment or ability only, but examined my whole performance from ſentence to ſentence throughout the whole book with the conferrence and reviſing of ſuch learned men, as my tranſlation being allowed by their judgment, I did both ſatisfy mine own conſcience that I had done truly, and their approving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing ſhould herein be delivered him but ſound, unmingled, and uncorrupted doctrine, even in ſuch ſort as the author himſelf had firſt framed it. All that I wrote, the grave learned, and virtuous man Mr. David Whitehead (whom I name with honourable remembrance) did, among others, compare with the Latin every ſentence throughout the whole book. Beſide all this, I privately required many, and generally all men with whom I ever had any talk of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly tranſlated, or not plainly Engliſhed, they would inform me thereof, promiſing either to ſatisfy them or to amend it. Since which time I have not been advertiſed by any man of any thing which they require to be altered. Neither had I myſelf, by reaſon of my profeſſion, being otherwiſe occupied, any leiſure to peruſe it. And this is the cauſe, why not only at the ſecond and third time, but alſo at this impreſſion, you have no change at all in the work, but altogether as it was before. Indeed I perceived many men well minded and ſtudious of this book, to require a table for their eaſe and furtherance. Their honeſt deſire I have fulfilled in the ſecond edition, and have added thereto a plentiful table, which is alſo here inſerted, which I have tranſlated out of the Latin, wherein the principal matters diſcourſed of in this book are named by their proper titles in an alphabetical order, and under every title is ſet forth forth a brief ſum of the whole doctrine taught in this book concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the book, chapter, and ſection or diviſion of the chapter, where the ſame doctrine is more largely expreſſed and proved. And for the readier finding thereof, I have cauſed the number of the chapters to be ſet on every leaf in the book, and quoted the ſections alſo by their due number with the uſual figures of algoriſm. And now at this laſt publiſhing, my friends at whoſe charge it is now newly printed in a Roman letter and ſmaller volume, with divers other tables, which ſince my ſecond edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be tranſlated and here added for your benefit. Moreover, whereas in the firſt edition the ill manner of my ſcribling hand, the interlining of my copy, and ſome other cauſes well known among workmen of that faculty, made very many faults to paſs the printer, I have in the ſecond impreſſion cauſed the book to be compoſed by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it muſt needs be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I myſelf do know above three hundred faults amended. And now at this laſt printing, the compoſing after a printed copy bringeth ſome eaſe, and the diligence uſed about the correction, having been right faithfully looked unto, it cannot be but much more truly ſet forth. This alſo is performed, that the volume being ſmaller with a letter fair and legible, it is of more eaſy price, that it may be of more common uſe, and ſo a more extenſive communicating of ſo great a treaſure to thoſe that deſire chriſtian knowlege for inſtruction of their faith, and direction of their duties.

Thus on the printer's behalf and mine, your eaſe and advantage (good readers) is provided for. Now reſteth your own diligence for your own profit in ſtudying it.

To ſpend many words in commending the work itſelf: yet thus much I think I may both not untruly and not vainly ſay, that though many great learned men have written books of common places of our religion, as Melancton, Sarcerius, and others, whoſe works are very profitable to the church of God: yet by the conſenting judgment of thoſe that underſtand the ſame, there is none to be compared to this work of Calvin, both for his ſubſtantial ſufficiency of doctrine, the ſound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the ſame, and the moſt deep and ſtrong confutation of all old and new hereſies: ſo that (the holy ſcriptures excepted) this is one of the moſt profitable books for all ſtudents of Chriſtian divinity. Wherein (good readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefit, that you may have this profit of my labour; ſo I beſeech you let me have this uſe of your gentleneſs, that my doings may be conſtrued to ſuch good end as I have meant them: and if any thing diſguſt you by reaſon of hardneſs, or any other cauſe that may ſeem to be my default, you will not forthwith condemn the work, but read it oftener: in which doing you will find (as many have confeſſed to me that they have found by experience) that thoſe things which at the firſt reading ſhall diſpleaſe you for hardneſs, ſhall be found ſo eaſy as ſo hard matter would ſuffer, and for the moſt part more eaſy than ſome other phraſe which ſhould with greater looſeneſs and ſmoother ſliding away deceive your underſtanding. I confeſs indeed it is not finely and pleaſantly written, nor carrieth with it ſuch delightful grace of ſpeech as ſome great wiſe men have beſtowed upon ſome fooliſher things; yet it containeth ſound truth ſet forth with faithful plainneſs without wrong done to the author's meaning: and ſo if you accept and uſe it, you ſhall not fail to have great profit thereby, and I ſhall think my labour very well employed.

THOMAS NORTON.

To the Moſt Mighty and Noble PRINCE, FRANCIS, the Moſt Chriſtian KING the French KING, his Sovereign Lord, JOHN CALVIN wiſheth Peace and Salvation in CHRIST.

WHEN I did firſt ſet my hand to this work, I thought nothing leſs (moſt noble king) than to write any thing that afterward ſhould be preſented to your majeſty. Only my mind was to teach certain introductions, whereby they that are touched with ſome zeal of religion might be inſtructed to true godlineſs. This I undertook principally for my countrymen the French, of whom I underſtood many to hunger and thirſt for Chriſt, but I ſaw very few that had rightly received any little knowlege of him. But when I perceived that the furious rage of ſome wicked men hath ſo far prevailed in your realm, that in it there is no room for ſound doctrine; I thought it worth my labour, all in one work both to give an inſtruction for them, and to declare a confeſſion to you; whereby ye may learn what manner of doctrine that is, againſt which theſe furious men burn in ſo great rage, who at this day trouble your realm with ſword and fire. I know indeed with what hainous informations they have filled your mind and ears, to make our cauſe moſt hateful unto you: yo u yourſelf can bear witneſs (moſt noble king) with what ſlanders it is daily accuſed unto you; as, that it tendeth to writh from kings their ſcepters, to throw down all judges ſeats and judgments, to ſubvert all order and civil government, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to undo all properties and poſſeſſions, finally, to turn all things upſide down; in all which they have your ear. They call our doctrine new, and lately forged; they cavil that it is doubtful and uncertain; they demand by what miracles it is confirmed; and whether it be meet it ſhould prevail againſt the conſent of ſo many holy fathers, and ancient cuſtom: they urge us to confeſs it to be ſchiſmatical which moveth war againſt the church, or that the church hath lien dead in many ages in which no ſuch thing hath been heard of. Laſt of all, they ſay, that inſtead of all arguments its fruits declare of what ſort it is, namely, its having bred ſo many ſeditions, and ſo great licentiouſneſs. Wherefore I do not unjuſtly require (moſt victorious king) that it may pleaſe you to take into your hands the whole hearing of the cauſe, and not turn away your ears nor your mind from our juſt defence; eſpecially when ſo important a thing is in queſtion, namely, how the glory of God may be maintained ſafe in the earth, how the truth of God may keep her honour, how Chriſt may have his kingdom preſerved whole among us. This is matter worthy for your ears, worthy for your judgment, worthy for your royal throne

If our doctrine be examined by the analogy of faith, the victory is already in our hands: for what is more agreeable to this apoſtolic rule, than to acknowlege ourſelves naked of all virtue, that of God we may be clothed? empty of all good, that of him we may be filled? to take from ourſelves all matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious, and that in him only we may glory? By ſuch doctrine, they cry out, we overthrow I wot not what blind light of nature, feigned preparations, free-will, works meritorious of eternal ſalvation, together with ſupererogations: becauſe they cannot abide that the whole praiſe and glory of all goodneſs, virtue, righteouſneſs, and wiſdom ſhould be aſcribed to God.

Firſt, whereas they charge our doctrine with novelty, they greatly wrong God, whoſe holy word deſerves not ſuch treatment. To them indeed I nothing doubt that it is new, to whom Chriſt and his goſpel is new: But they who know that preaching of Paul to be old, that Jeſus Chriſt died for our ſins, and roſe again for our juſtification, Rom. iv. 25. ſhall find nothing new among us; however long it hath lien hidden and buried by the ungodlineſs of men.

From

From the ſame fountain of ignorance ſpringeth this, that they take it for doubtful and uncertain. This verily is what the Lord by his prophet complaineth, Iſa. i. 13. But however they mock at the uncertainty of it, if they were driven to ſeal their own doctrine with their blood, men might ſee how much they ſet by it. But far otherwiſe is our affiance, which dreadeth neither the terrors of death, nor yet the very judgment ſeat of God.

Whereas they require miracles of us, they deal unreaſonably: for we coin no new goſpel, but hold faſt the ancient goſpel, for confirming of the truth whereof all the miracles do ſerve that ever Chriſt and his apoſtles have wrought. In this they have the advantage of us, that they can to this very day confirm their doctrine with pretended miracles. But we ſhould remember that ſatan hath his miracles, which though they be but juggling deceits, yet are ſuch as may deceive the ignorant and unſkilful. And Paul hath given us warning, that the kingdom of Antichriſt ſhall be with all power, and ſigns and lying wonders, 2 Theſſ. ii. 11. That their miracles are ſuch, is evident, foraſmuch as they lead away the people from the true worſhipping of their God to vanity.

Moreover they ſet the ancient fathers againſt us. But whereas many excellent things have been well and wiſely written by thoſe fathers, and in ſome things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men; theſe good natural children forſooth, do worſhip only their errors. and thoſe things which are well ſpoken, they either notice not, or pretend ignorance, or vitiate; ſo that their care was altogether to gather dung in the gold of the fathers. If it were the matter of my preſent purpoſe, I could eaſily prove by the conſenting voices of the fathers, the moſt of what we maintain at this day. But we ſo read them, that we always remember, that all things are ours to ſerve us, and that none have dominion over us but Chriſt.

But now whereas they call us to cuſtom, they nothing prevail. We ſhould be moſt unjuſtly dealt with, if we ſhould be driven to yield to cuſtom. That which is ſeen to be done of many, by and by obtaineth the right of a cuſtom: but the ſtate of men hath ſcarcely at any time been in ſo good caſe, that the better things pleaſed the greater number. Therefore for the moſt part of the private vices of many ſome error hath been invented, or rather a common conſent of vices, which theſe good men would have to ſtand for a law.

As for their dilemma, That either the church hath lien dead a certain time, or that we have controverſy againſt the church. We affirm, both that the church may have no viſible form, and that the form itſelf conſiſts not in that outward pomp which they fooliſhly admire, but in the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right adminiſtration of ſacraments. They are in a rage unleſs the church may be always pointed out with the finger. But how often was it otherwiſe among the Jews? What form think we appeared when Elias bewailed that he alone was left? 1 Kings xix. 12. How long ſince the coming of Chriſt hath it lien hidden without form, by wars, ſeditions and hereſies? If they had lived at that time, would they have believed there was any church? but God ſaid to Elias, that he had reſerved ſeven thouſand men, who had not bowed their knee before Baal. So likewiſe hath Chriſt always had his people on earth ſince his aſcenſion, though not always viſible in church form. But if they will ſtick faſt to the outward appearance, they will make Chriſt and all the prophets of God ſchiſmatics; and the miniſters of ſatan, the inſtruments of the Holy Ghoſt.

Finally, the troubles, uproars and contentions, occaſioned by the preaching of our doctrine, and the fruits it now beareth in many, ought to be imputed to ſatan and not to it. For this is a natural effect of the word of God, that wherever it riſeth up ſatan is never idle. This is the moſt ſure and truſty mark, whereby it is diſcerned from falſe doctrines, which diſcover themſelves by their obtaining popular approbation, and being heard of the world rejoicing at them,

1 John iv. 5. So in certain ages paſt, when all things were drowned in deep darkneſs, the god of this world lay idle and took his pleaſure, being in peaceable poſſeſſion of his kingdom: but when light from above diſpelled his darkneſs, he then beſtirred himſelf, with all his inſtruments, in all the ways complained of. But how great maliciouſneſs is it to charge upon the word of God, the hatred either of the ſeditions, which naughty and rebellious men do ſtir up, or of the ſects which deceivers do raiſe againſt it? Yet it is no new charge, Elias was aſked, if it was he that troubled Iſrael. Chriſt was eſteemed of the Jews a ſeditious man. The apoſtles were accuſed of making a commotion among the people. What other thing do they who at this day father upon us all the troubles, uproars and contentions that boil up againſt us? And as for the licentious uſe made of our doctrine by ſome, the apoſtles experienced the ſame in their time. There were unlearned and unſtedfaſt men who wreſted the things that Paul had written by the inſpiration of God, Pet. iii. 16. Some when they heard that ſin abounded, to the end that grace might more abound, by and by objected, We will then abide in ſin, that grace may abound. When they heard that believers are not under the law, they by and by anſwered, We will then ſin, becauſe we are not under the law but under grace. Rom. vi. 1. and 15. Some accuſed him as an exhorter to evil. There entered privily many falſe apoſtles to deſtroy the churches which he had builded. Some of envy and contention preached the goſpel, to add affliction to his bonds. Some went backward, as dogs to their vomit, and ſwine to their wallowing in the mire. Others drew the liberty of the ſpirit to the licentiouſneſs of the fleſh. Many crept in by whom there came afterwards great danger to the godly. And even among the brethren themſelves were many ſtrifes raiſed up. But did the apoſtles forſake the goſpel which proved the ſeed-plot of ſo many contentions, and the occaſion of ſo many dangers and offences? No. They were ſupported by this recurring to their mind, that Chriſt is the ſtone of ſtumbling and rock of offence, ſet for the fall and riſing again of many, and for a ſign that ſhall be ſpoken againſt, Luke ii. 34. Being armed with this, they went forward boldly thro' all dangers, uproars and offences. With the ſame thought we alſo ought to be upholden, ſince Paul affirmeth, that this is the inſeparable property of the goſpel to be the ſavour of death unto death to them that periſh, although it be ordained to be the ſavour of life unto life, and the power of God unto the ſalvation of the faithful. 2 Cor. ii. 16.

Thus have you (O king) the venomous injuſtice of the ſlanders large enough declared, that you may not too credulouſly liſten to their reports. By this preface I intended not to make a defence indeed, but only to molify your mind beforehand to give audience to the diſcloſing of our cauſe; which your mind, though it be now turned away and eſtranged from us, yea and inflamed againſt us, yet we truſt that we ſhall be able to recover the favour thereof, if you ſhall once have without diſpleaſure and troublous affection read over this our confeſſion, which we will to be inſtead of a defence for us to your majeſty. But if the whiſperings of the malicious do ſo poſſeſs your ears, that there is no place for accuſed men to ſpeak for themſelves: and if thoſe outragious furies do ſtill with your winking at them, exerciſe cruelty with priſoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we ſhall indeed, as ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter, be brought to all extremities, yet ſo that in our patience we ſhall poſſeſs our ſouls, and wait for the ſtrong hand of the Lord, which ſhall without doubt be preſent in time, and ſtretch forth itſelf armed, both to deliver the poor out of affliction, and take vengeance on the deſpiſers, who now triumph with ſo great aſſuredneſs.

The Lord the King of kings ſtabliſh your throne with righteouſneſs, and your ſeat with equity, moſt noble king.

THE LIFE OF Mr. JOHN CALVIN.

MR. JOHN CALVIN was born at Noviodune, a famous city of France, June 6th, anno 1509. His father's name was Gerard Calvin, his mother's Joan Franca; both of good repute, of a competent eſtate. Gerard was a very prudent man, and therefore well eſteemed of both by the nobility, and others of the country: he gave his ſon John very liberal education from his childhood. From the grammer-ſchool, he ſent him to Paris, and placed him with Maturinus Corderius, a man well eſteemed both for his probity and learning; of chiefeſt account amongſt all the ſchool-maſters in France for his training up of youth. From thence John Calvin was tranſlated to the ſchool at Montacute, where he had Hiſpanus for his maſter, under whom, by reaſon of his ſharp wit, he profited ſo much, that, from the grammar, he proceeded to the ſtudy of logic, and other arts. His father from the beginning deſigned him to the ſtudy of divinity, which he judged him to be very much inclined to; being religiouſly addicted from his childhood, and a ſevere reprover of his ſchool-fellows faults. And being thus reſolved, he procured a benefice of the biſhop for him, in the cathederal church of Noviodune, as alſo a cure in a neighbour village, called Biſhop's-Bridge, where himſelf was born, though afterwards he removed to the city of Noviodune, in which place our John, before his ordination, preached divers ſermons to the people. But this purpoſe of his (both their minds changing) was afterwards altered: for his father ſeeing that the ſtudy of the law was a certainer ſtep to riches and honour, altered his mind upon that account; and his ſon growing into acquaintance with a certain kinſman of his, called Peter Robert Olevitane, was by him inſtructed in the true reformed religion; whereupon he addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures, and began to abominate and withdraw himſelf from the ſuperſtitious ſervices in the popiſh church.

Upon this occaſion he went to Orleans, where Peter Stella, the moſt famous lawyer in France, read his lectures, whoſe auditor John Calvin was, and in a ſhort ſpace wonderfully profited in that ſtudy: ſo that many times, occaſionally ſupplying his maſter's room, he rather ſeemed a doctor, than a learner of the law: and when he was about to depart, all the profeſſors of that univerſity, proffered freely to beſtow the degree of a doctor upon him, as having ſo well deſerved of the univerſity. But all this while he neglected not the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures, and divinity; inſomuch as few in that city, that were addicted to the reformed religion, but they came to him to be ſatisfied in their doubts, and went away admiring his learning and zeal. And ſome that were intimately acquainted with him at that time, teſtified that his manner was conſtantly to continue his ſtudies till midnight, and in the morning, ſo ſoon as he wakened, to ruminate what he had read over night, whereby he fixed it in his memory; neither would he ſuffer himſelf to be diſturbed during the time of his meditation: and the better to fit him for his ſtudies, he always ſupped very ſparingly. By which practice he attained to excellent learning, and a very good memory: yet withal, hereby he contracted ſuch weakneſs of ſtomach, as brought upon him many diſeaſes, and at laſt an immature death.

About this time the univerſity of Biturg grew famous, for that they had procured out of Italy the eminenteſt lawyer of his time, Andrew Alciat, whom our John would needs alſo be a hearer of: thither therefore he went, and during his abode there, he grew into familiar acquaintance with Melchior Wolmarus, a German, the public profeſſor of Greek in that univerſity, a man famous for religion and learning. Under him he ſtudied the Greek tongue, for which benefit he ſo much prized him, that afterwards he dedicated to him his Comment upon the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians.

Whilſt he was employed in theſe ſtudies, he neglected not that of divinity; ſo that he preached divers ſermons in a neighbour town called Liveria. But whilſt he was thus buſied, news came to him of his father's death, which called him back into his own country: and have ſettled his affairs there, he went back to Paris, being now about four and twenty years old; at which time he wrote that excellent Commentary upon Seneca de Clementia, being much affected with that author, whom he uſed to ſay, agreed very well with his genius. After a few months ſtay at Paris, he grew acquainted with all that profeſſed the reformed religion; and among the reſt, with Stephen Forgeus, a famous merchant, who afterwards ſealed the truth with his blood.

From hence forward, at the earneſt requeſt of the godly that held their private meetings at Paris, he laid aſide all other ſtudies, and wholly applied himſelf to that of divinity, wherein alſo he found the ſpecial aſſiſtance of God. At this time Nicholas Cope was rector of the univerſity at Paris, who being to make an oration upon the Kalends of November, at which time the pontificians uſed to celebrate their All-Saints day, at the inſtigation of John Calvin, he ſpake of religion more purely and clearly than they uſed to do. This the Sorboniſts could not bear, and the parliament of Paris was angry at it, inſomuch as they cited him to appear before them, which accordingly he was about to ſubmit to; but as he went, ſome of his friends adviſed him to take heed of his adverſaries; whereupon he returned home, and immediately after left France, and went to Baſil, where his father was a profeſſor of phyſic.

The officers ſent by the parliament, ſearching for Cope, went into Mr. Calvin's houſe, who by chance not being at home, they ranſacked his ſtudy, and amongſt his papers found many of his friends letters, which had like to have endangered the lives of many. So bitterly were the enemies of the church at that time enraged againſt the people of God, eſpecially one John Morinus, whoſe abominable cruelty is infamous till this day. But it pleaſed God to divert that ſtorm by the prudent, and pious diligence of the queen of Navar, the only ſiſter of king Francis, a woman of an admirable wit, and exceeding tender of the welfare of the profeſſors of the reformed religion. She alſo ſent for Mr. Calvin into her court, uſed him very honourably, and heard him gladly. But Mr. Calvin finding Paris too hot for his abode, went to Xantone, where ſojourning with a friend, at his requeſt he drew up ſhort chriſtian admonitions, which were diſperſed amongſt certain Prieſts to be taught to their people, that ſo their people might by little and little be drawn to ſearching out of the truth. Shortly after he went to Nerac, a city of Aquitane, where he viſited that good old man James Faber Stapulenſis, who being formerly a profeſſor of the mathematics, and philoſophy in Paris, was perſecuted for the truth by the Sorboniſts; but by the friendly help of the queen of Navar was delivered and ſent to this town of her juriſdiction: this good old man received young Mr. Calvin with very fatherly affections, propheſying that in time to come he would prove a famous inſtrument for the building of the French church.

From thence Mr. Calvin went again to Paris, being called thereto by the ſpecial providence of God: for at this time that wicked Servetus was come thither, diſperſing his poiſon againſt the ſacred Trinity; who hearing of Calvin, pretended that he was deſirous to confer with him; and a time and place was appointed for their meeting, whither Calvin went, not without peril of his life, who was fain to hide himſelf from the rage of his enemies; but when he had waited long for him, Servetus came not, being indeed afraid of the very ſight of Mr. Calvin: this was Anno Chriſti 1534. Infamous for the abominable cruelty exerciſed againſt the poor ſaints of God, eſpecially againſt Gerard Ruffus, a maſter of art of Sorbon, and Caroldus an Auguſtinian monk, who under the protection of the queen of Navar, had for a year or two very much propagated the truth, which the devil envying, now ſtirred up his inſtruments to pull them out of the pulpit, and to caſt them into priſon: yea, king Francis himſelf was ſo irritated, by reaſon of certain papers againſt the maſs, ſcattered about the city, and fixed to his chamber door, that he preſently commanded a public proceſſion, wherein himſelf and his three children aſſiſted with a bare head, carrying a torch in his hand to expiate that wickedneſs, and commanded eight of the ſaints of God to be burned alive, in four principal parts of the city; ſwearing publicly, that he would not ſpare his own children if he knew them to be infected with thoſe damnable hereſies. Calvin beholding theſe ſad ſpectacles, went preſently after to Orleans, where he publiſhed his famous book which he caled Pſychopannychia, againſt that error long before broached, and now again revived, of them which held The ſouls ſleeping after they were ſevered from the bodies: and ſo purpoſing to bid adieu to France, he aſſociated to him his old friend with whom he had ſojourn'd at Xantone, and travelling through Lorrain, went towards Baſil: but being not far from the city of Meton, they fell into great ſtraits, for one of their ſervants who had gotten all their money, being mounted upon a luſty horſe, ran away from them, and could by no means be overtaken; ſo they were fain to ſend their other ſervant to borrow ten crowns, which with much adoe carried him to Strasborough, and from thence to Baſil. There Mr. Calvin quickly became an intimate friend to thoſe famous men Simon Gryneus, and Wolfgang Capito: he ſtudied alſo the Hebrew tongue, and though he endeavoured by all means to conceal himſelf, yet was he forced to publiſh his Inſtitutions, which he called but the foundation of a far greater work.

The proteſtant princes in Germany hearing of this bloody act of king Francis, were much provoked by it, yet did the king at this ſame time ſeek their friendſhip, and to excuſe his cruelty, by the advice of William Bellaius Langæus, he ſent them word that he had only puniſhed certain Anabaptiſts, who ſet up their fanatic ſpirits inſtead of ſcripture, and ſhewed themſelves contemners of all magiſtrates. Which diſgrace put upon the true religion, Mr. Calvin not enduring, took occaſion from thence to publiſh that his incomparable book, prefixing a preface to king Francis, which ſurely he never read, or elſe it would have provoked him to have given a great wound to the Babyloniſh whore: for that king (therein not like his ſucceſſors) was a great weigher of matters, had a good judgment to diſcern the truth, was a favourer of learned men, and not altogether eſtranged from the profeſſors of the goſpel. But neither he, nor the people of France either ſaw, or heard thoſe things, the ſins of the king and people haſtning God's wrath againſt them.

Mr. Calvin having publiſhed this book and performed that office of duty to his country, had a great deſire to viſit the dutcheſs of Ferrara, the daughter of Lewis the twelfth of France, a woman famous for her piety, and thereby alſo to have a ſight of Italy. To her therefore he went, and endeavoured to confirm her in the truth, ſo that ſhe loved him dearly all his life after, yea, even after his death honoured his memory.

Returning out of Italy (into whoſe borders he uſed to ſay, that he went that he might return again) he came into France, where ſettling his affairs, and taking along with him his only brother Anthony Calvin, he intended to return to Baſil or Strasborough; but all other ways being ſtopped by reaſon of wars, he went to Geneva, without any purpoſe of ſtaying there. Yet preſently after it appeared, that it was ſo ordered by divine providence: for a little before, the goſpel of Chriſt was almoſt miraculouſly brought into that city by the labour and induſtry of two excellent men, William Farell of the Delphinate, ſometimes a ſcholar of Faber Stapulenſis, and Peter Viret, a Bernate, whoſe labours God afterwards wonderfully bleſſed and proſpered. Calvin hearing of theſe worthy men (as the manner is amongſt the godly) went to viſit them, to whom Mr. Farell (being a man endued with an heroical ſpirit) ſpake much to perſuade him rather to ſtay with them at Geneva, then to go any further. But when he ſaw that perſuaſions would not prevail, he ſaid thus unto him; "I proteſt unto thee "in the name of the Omnipotent God, that if thou thus proceedeſt to frame excuſes, and "wilt not join with us in this work of the Lord, that the Lord will curſe thee, as ſeeking thy "own, rather then the things of Jeſus Chriſt." Calvin being terrified with this terrible threatning, ſubmitted to the judgment of the presbytery, and of the magiſtrates, by whoſe ſuffrages, together with the conſent of the people, he was choſen not only their preacher, but alſo profeſſor of divinity: the firſt he refuſed, the ſecond he accepted of, anno Chriſti 1536, in the month of Auguſt. This year became famous by a ſtricter league between the Bernates, and the city of Geneva, as alſo by the entertainment of the goſpel at Lauſanna, where a free diſputation was held between the pontificians and the proteſtants, at which Mr. Calvin was preſent.

Then did Mr. Calvin publiſh a certain form of chriſtian doctrine, fitted for the church of Geneva, as yet ſcarce crept out of the pollutions of popery. He added alſo a catechiſm, not that which we have by way of queſtion and anſwer, but one much ſhorter, containing the chief heads of religion. Then did he, together with Mr. Farell and Caroldus (moſt of their colleagues through fear forſaking them) attempt to form a church amongſt the citizens: for which end he propoſed, that all the people being gathered together, ſhould publicly forſwear Popery, and withal ſhould ſwear to obſerve the chriſtian religion, and diſcipline contained in a few heads; which thing (through God's mercy) was affected anno Chriſti 1537, though many of the citizens refuſed, the city being yet ſcarce free from the ſnares of the duke of Savoy, and the dregs of popery, and many being much inclined to factions: Yet a public ſcribe reading them, the ſenate and people of Geneva ſwore together to thoſe heads of chriſtian religion and diſcipline. The devil being much enraged at this excellent work, having tried a thouſand ways by open enemies to overthrow it, and not prevailing by thoſe ways, he ſought under the pretence of piety to deſtroy it: ſtirring up firſt the Anabaptiſts, and then Peter Caroli, not only to disgrace it, but as much as in them lay, utterly to have subverted it. But the Lord was wiser, and stronger then Satan, as the event shewed: for Calvin with his colleagues, in a public and free disputation did, with that gravity out of the word of God, confute the Anabaptists, March the 18, 1537, that (which is seldom seen) from that time forwards there never appeared any of them in that church. But the other disturber of their church's peace, Peter Caroli, caused greater, and longer troubles, whereof this is a brief account. This impudent sophister was bred in the college of Sorbon, from whence at last he was cast out for an heretic, whereupon he went first to Geneva, then to Lausanna, and from thence to Neocom, but so infected, and inflamed by the devil, that whersoever he came, he left an impression of his foul spirit: and when he saw himself opposed by the protestants, he went to the papists, and from them to the protestants again: and at last broke forth into open railing against Mr. Farell, Viret, and Calvin, as if they held some corrupt opinions about the sacred Trinity. Hereupon there was a full synod assembled at Berne, in which Peter Caroli was condemned for his calumny, and thereupon removed. But shortly after he went to Mediomatrice, that he might hinder the work of the Lord happily there begun by Mr. Farell: from thence writing an epistle, he railed upon the godly, giving hope to the papists that he would return to them again: yet was he sent to Rome, that he might give satisfaction to the pope himself. There he was received with scorn, and being oppressed with poverty, and infected with the French-pox, at last with much adoe he gat into an hospital, where shortly after he died miserably; and this truly was his unhappy end.

About the same time Mr. Calvin observing that there were many in France that knew, and were convinced of the truth, and yet indulged themselves, as if it were enough that they reserved their hearts for Christ, though they were present at the popish services, published two elegant epistles: one to exhort the flying of idolatry, directed to Gerard Ruffus, whom we mentioned before: the other of the popish priesthood, directed to the same man, who was now made a bishop, and was fallen from his former zeal. But whilst Mr. Calvin was thus employed, he met with grievous seditions at home. The gospel indeed was entertained, and popery abjured in Geneva; but many were not reformed of the prophane and scandalous courses in which they had been indulged, and which they had learned of the impure popish clergy: and those ancient feuds which had sprung up by reason of the Savoyan wars amongst the chiefest families, were not yet laid aside. These at first were gently admonished, and when that prevailed not, more sharply reprehended; and when yet they continued to be stubborn, and refractory, and that the city by the factions of certain private persons was devided into parties, so that by no means they would endure to be brought into that order to which they had been sworn Mr. Farell, Calvin, and Caroldus, inspired with an heroical spirit, did openly profess that they could by no means administer the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper to persons who were at such bitter enmity amongst themselves, and so utterly averse to all ecclesiastical discipline.

Another evil that fell out was this; a difference there was in some ecclesiastical rites between the Bernates and the Genevians; the Genevians using common bread at the sacrament, and a different sort of fonts; they also abolished all holy days but the Lord's day; whereupon the Bernates assembling a synod at Lausanna, decreed, that wafers should be used in the sacrament, and required that in Geneva the same practice should be observed: but the college of ministers at Geneva, desired that first they might be heard; and for this end appointed a synod at Zurick. Upon this occasion the Syndics which were chosen for that year at Geneva (who for the time are the chiefest magistrates) assembling the captains of the seditious persons, so far prevailed vailed (though Mr. Calvin and his colleagues enterpoſed, and deſired firſt to be heard) the greater part overcoming the better, that theſe three worthy ſervants of Chriſt were commanded within two days to depart the city, becauſe (as was alledged) they refuſed to adminiſter the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper. When this decree was brought to Mr. Calvin, he ſaid, "Truly "if I had ſerved men, I ſhould have had but an ill reward; but its well that I have ſerved "him who doth always perform to his ſervants what he hath once promiſed."

Who would not now have thought, that this buſineſs muſt needs have brought deſtruction upon the church of Geneva? but the event ſhewed the wonderful wiſdom of God in turning it to good; partly by employing the labours of theſe his ſervants elſewhere, by variety of experiences to fit them for greater employments: partly that the ſeditious perſons in Geneva overthrowing themſelves by their own violence, that church might be purged from many pollutions. So wonderful doth God ſhew himſelf in all his ways, eſpecially in the admirable government of his church.

At the time appointed, theſe three worthy fathers (to the great grief of all good men) left Geneva, and went to Zurick, where gathering a ſynod of the Helvetian churches, the ſynod decreed, and by the interceſſion of the Bernates, tried the minds of the Genevians for their re-admiſſion; but when that prevailed not, Calvin went to Baſil, and from thence to Strasborough; where by the deſire of the ſenate, and the importunity of thoſe bright ſtars which at that time ſhined in that church, Bucer, Hedio, Capito, Niger, and their colleagues, he was diſigned to be the profeſſor of divinity, with a competent ſalary allowed; which place he diſcharged with the great applauſe of learned men; and by the conſent of the ſenate he planted the French church there, and ſettled diſcipline in it. Thus was the expectation of ſatan fruſtrated, Calvin ſettled in another place, and a new church erected for the former ſubverted. Yet in the mean time did not the devil ceaſe to endeavour wholly to eradicate the church of Geneva; for which end he ſtirred up ſome wicked men, yet under the pretence of piety, to bring in that decree of changing common bread into wafers; indeed only to ſtir up new controverſies: wherein alſo ſatan failed not of his purpoſe, many godly men upon this occaſion abſtaining from the ſacrament, till Mr. Calvin by his holy letters had perſuaded them not to contend for a thing ſo indifferent in itſelf. By this means unleavened bread was again brought into uſe in the Genevian church; concerning which, Calvin being afterwards reſtored, would never contend, and yet withal did not diſſemble his judgment about the ſame.

But behold! preſently after fell out a far greater evil, anno Chriſti 1539, which yet by the prudent diligence of Mr. Calvin was quickly extinguiſhed, which was this; There was the biſhop of Carpentoratum, called James Sodolet, a man of great eloquence, which yet he abuſed to the ſubverſion of the truth, for which cauſe he was made a cardinal. This man ſeeing the flock deprived of ſuch able and vilgilant ſhepherds; thought it a fit time to enſnare them; for which end he wrote letters under the pretence of his neighbourhood, directed to his dear friends (as he called them) the ſenate, council, and people of Geneva, in which he omitted no arguments whereby he might perſuade them to return into the boſom of the Romiſh church. And at this time there was no man in Geneva that would undertake to anſwer the ſame; ſo that probably they would have done much miſchief, but that they were written in a foreign language. But when Mr. Calvin at Strasborough had read them, forgetting all the wrongs which had been done him, he returned an anſwer ſo ſpeedily, truly, and eloquently, that the cardinal diſpairing of accompliſhing his end, wholly gave over his deſign. Neither indeed did Mr. Calvin defer till this time the manifeſting of his paſtoral bowels, which he yet retained to the Genevians, eſpecially to thoſe that ſuffered with him in the ſame cauſe, as may appear by

thoſe excellent epiſtles which he wrote to them the ſame year wherein he was baniſhed. Wherein his principal ſcope was to exhort them to repentance, to bear with the wicked, to maintain peace with their paſtors, and to be frequent in calling upon God; as alſo to ſtir them up to expect light after thoſe deadly miſts of darkneſs, which he told them would follow, as alſo the event ere long made to appear. About the ſame time alſo he publiſhed his Inſtitutions much enlarged, and his Commentary upon the Romans, dedicated to Simon Grynæus his dear friend, and that golden book of his concerning the Lord's ſupper, which he made for the uſe of his French church, which Galaſius afterwards turned in Latin. In which he handled the doctrine of the ſacrament ſo dextrouſly, and learnedly, that it ſerved to determine the unhappy controverſy about it, to the ſatisfaction of all good and learned men. Neither was his happineſs leſs in reclaiming many Anabaptiſts from their errors, amongſt whom were theſe two principal men, Paul Volſius, who afterwards was a paſtor in the church of Strasborough: the other was John Storder, who afterwards dying of a plague, Mr. Calvin by the advice of Bucer married his widow, called Idellita, a very grave and honeſt matron.

In theſe ſtudies and labours did Mr. Calvin continue at Strasborough to the year 1541. In the which year the emperor, Charles the fifth, aſſembled two diets, the one at Worms, the other at Ratisbone, for compounding the differences about religion: at both which, by the deſire of the divines at Strasborough, Mr. Calvin was preſent, to the great advantage of the churches, eſpecially of his own French congregation, and where he was moſt lovingly entertained, and highly prized by Philip Melancthon, and Gaſper Cruciger, ſo that Philip called him His Divine. He alſo had much private conference with them about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and they could not but very well approve of his opinion therein.

But now the time was come wherein the Lord purpoſed to ſhew mercy to his poor church at Geneva: for one of the Syndics, who had promoted the decree for their baniſhment, did ſo miſdemean himſelf in his office, that being found guilty of ſedition, whilſt he thought to eſcape out at a window, being a fat man, he fell down, ſo bruiſed himſelf, that within a few days after he died. Another of them had his head cut off for a murder; the other two having done the common wealth much diſſervice in an embaſſy wherein they were employed, were fain to fly their country, and were condemned in their abſence.

Theſe evil inſtruments being thus removed, the city of Geneva began to call for their Farell and Calvin; but when by no means they could recover Farell from Neocom, where he was now ſettled, they uſed all their endeavours to procure Calvin; and for that end they ſent ambaſſadors to Strasborough, uſing alſo the interceſſion of thoſe of Zurick, to requeſt that Mr. Calvin might be ſent back to them. The ſenate of Strasborough were exceeding unwilling to hearken to it. Calvin himſelf, although he had not changed his mind towards the Genevians for the miſcarriages of ſome wicked men, yet abhoring to enter into new troubles, but eſpecially becauſe he found the Lord bleſſing his miniſtry at Strasborough, did abſolutely refuſe to return. Beſides Bucer, and the other paſtors, did profeſs their great unwillingneſs to part with him. But the Genevians ſtill preſſing hard for him, Bucer at laſt thought that their requeſts ſhould be condeſcended to, at leaſt for a time; which yet was not granted by Mr. Calvin himſelf, till they had urged him with the judgment of God in caſe he refuſed, and with the example of Jonah. But this falling out juſt at the time when Calvin, with Bucer was going to viſit the diet at Ratisbone, his return was delayed for a time; and in the mean time the Genevians obtained of the Bernates that Peter Viret ſhould go from Lauſanna to Geneva; and indeed this made

Mr. Calvin far more willing to return to Geneva, when he ſaw that he was to have ſuch a colleague, by whoſe labours and counſels he might be much furthered in reforming that church. So after ſome months Mr. Calvin went to Geneva, Sept. 13, anno Chriſti 1541, being ſingularly welcomed by the people, and eſpecially by the ſenate, who acknowledged the wonderful mercy and goodneſs of God towards them, in reſtoring him to them again. And whereas the ſenate of Strasborough had decreed that after a time he ſhould return to them again, they of Geneva would never give over till they had reverſed that decree, which at laſt was yielded to by them of Strasborough, yet with this proviſo, that that penſion which they had ſettled upon him ſhould ſtill be continued to him; but Mr. Calvin could never be perſuaded to receive it, caring for nothing leſs than for riches. Mr. Calvin being thus reſtored to his church, and perceiving that the city needed ſuch bridles, he profeſſed that he could not comfortably exerciſe his miniſtry amongſt them, except together with the doctrine of the goſpel, they would embrace the presbyterian government, for the well regulating of the church. Hereupon elders were choſen, and a model of the presbyterial government was drawn up conſonant to the word of God, and grateful to the citizens, which the devil afterwards ſought by all his artifices to deſtroy, but all in vain. He wrote alſo a catechiſm in French and Latin, not much different from the former, but much larger, divided into queſtions and anſwers, which indeed was an admirable piece, and found ſuch approbation and entertainment abroad, that it was turned into High-Dutch, Engliſh, Scottiſh, Low-Dutch, Spaniſh, yea, and Immanuel Tremelius turned it into Hebrew, and Henry Stevens turned it into Greek alſo. His ordinary labours were theſe. Every other Sabbath he preached twice, Munday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday, he read his divinity lectures. Every Thurſday he aſſiſted in the conſiſtory for the exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. On Fridays he read a lecture for the clearing of ſome hard places of ſcripture. Beſides which he wrote many commentaries upon the ſcriptures: anſwered many adverſaries to the truth; wrote many letters to ſundry places, of advice, and direction, in weighty buſineſſes. So that we have cauſe to wonder how it was poſſible for one man to undergo ſo many buſineſſes. He made very much uſe of Farell and Viret, and yet himſelf contributed much more to them. And truly their familiarity as it was much envied by the wicked, ſo it was very grateful to all good men. And it was a very pleaſant ſight to behold theſe three men, ſo famous in the church, and all agreeing in the work of the Lord, and yet ſo excelling in ſeveral gifts of the Spirit. Farell exceeded in a certain greatneſs of mind whoſe thundering ſermons could not be heard without trembling, and whoſe ardent prayers would lift a man up into heaven. Viret did ſo excel in ſweet eloquence, that he chained his hearers to his lips. Calvin, look how many words he ſpake, with ſo many grave and pithy ſentences, he filled the minds of his hearers: ſo that (ſaith Mr. Beza) "I often thought that the gifts of theſe three men meeting in one, would make a "complte paſtor."

Beſides the forementioned labours of Mr. Calvin, he had alſo the charge and buſineſs of a family to look after; beſides many foreign buſineſſes; for God ſo bleſſed his miniſtry, that from all parts of the chriſtian world he was ſought to, partly for advice in matters of religion and partly for to hear him preach: ſo that at the ſame time there was an Italian church,' an Engliſh church, and a Spaniſh church, beſides the church of Geneva, that that city ſeemed too little to entertain all that came to it for his ſake, Thus, though he was loved of the good, and feared of the wicked; and things were excellently ſettled; yet he did meet with many oppoſitions for the excerciſe of his graces: for as ſoon as he returned to Geneva, being mindful of that saying of our Saviour, "Seek first the kingdom of God, "and his righteousness, and all other things shall be added unto you:" his first, and chiefest care was, by the consent of the senate, to settle such an ecclesiastical polity as was most consonant to the word of God: from which afterwards it should not be lawful, either for the ministers or people, to recede. But before proof was made of it, not only some of the common people, but even of the chief men that had cast off popery, and given their names only to Christ, shewed their hatred against it. Yea, some of those ministers which continued there when these three good men were cast out (though the chiefest of them afterwards left their stations, being found guilty of sundry wickednesses) although (being convinced in their consciences, they durst not oppose it, yet) underhand they manifested their dislike of it, and would by no means be brought into order: and that pretending the example of other churches, wherein no excommunication was used. Yea, some of them cryed out, that it would introduce the popish tyranny again. But Mr. Calvin overcame these difficulties by his constancy, joined with singular moderation; shewing that not only the true doctrine, but ecclesiastical discipline was also to be fetched out of the word of God, and that his had the approbation of the most learned men of that age, as Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, Zuichius, Melancthon, Bucer, Capito, and Myconius, which he proved out of their writings: withal telling them, that other christian churches were not to be condemned which had not proceeded, so far, nor those pastors which found that their people needed not such a bridle: and lastly, shewing what a vast difference there was between the popish tyranny, and the easy yoke of the Lord: so that he at last obtained that his discipline was written, read, and confirmed by the suffrages of the people, and generally received, November the twentieth, 1541.

But though these things were so happily carried on, yet Mr. Calvin, considering that he was like to meet with some difficulties in the exercise of it, did his utmost endeavour that Viret, who was only lent them by the Bernates for at time, and Farell, who was now settled at Neocome, might be joined with him as his perpetual fellow-pastors; but he could not possible effect it: Viret presently after returning, he went to Lausanna, and Farell remaining, at Neocome, so that the whole praise of settling the Genevian church is due to Mr. Calvin alone.

The year following, viz. 1542, Mr. Calvin met with many afflictions, some at home, but especially by the enflamed fury of the adversaries of the truth abroad, in France and Italy, whence they drave away many professors of the gospel; for the comforting of whom, he layed out himself exceedingly, writing many encouraging letters every way, both to those that were escaped, and to those also that yet remained within the reach of the lions jaws.

The same year also there fell out two other great evils, famine and pestilence its usual companion; and at this time the custom of Geneva was, that such as were infected with the pestilence, should be removed into an hospital out of the city, where, being in need of a constant and sedulous pastor, when, by reason of the danger most men refused it, there were three that offered themselves, viz. Calvin, Sebastian Castalio, and Blanchet; and lots being cast between these three, it fell upon Castalio, who, notwithstanding his former forwardness, now shamefully drew back, and refused it; and when Calvin would have cast lots again, the senate and Blanchet (who now took this work upon him) would not suffer it. About this time also other mischiefs fell out; for Peter Tossanus, the pastor of Montbelgard, was much troubled about the controversy of the Lord's supper, and at Basil, were the foundation of church government was scarce laid (do Myconius what he could to the contrary) it was by ſome evil affected perſons ſubverted; and both theſe men had recourſe to Mr. Calvin for his counſel. And at Neocome, though Mr. Farell laboured with good ſucceſs, yet the work of the Lord was moſt obſtructed, partly by open force, and partly by that apoſtate Peter Caroli, of whom we ſpake before; about which buſineſs we may diſcern Mr. Calvin's labours, partly by his printed letters, and partly by the teſtimony of ſuch as were eye-witneſſes of it. But there was a far more audacious act of the Sorboniſts at this time, who neither having authority from God nor man, yet dared to impoſe ſundry articles of chriſtian religion, as they called them, but ſuch indeed as were ſtuffed with ſo many errors, and fooleries, wherein that ſociety of men did abound, as that it is a wonder how any man that had the uſe of reaſon ſhould aſſent thereunto; yet many, partly through fear, and partly through ignorance, ſubſcribed them. Wherefore Mr. Calvin anſwered them, learnedly confuting their errors by ſolid arguments, and ſo ſet forth their fooleries, that every man which was not wilfully blind might eaſily diſcern the ſame.

Thus ended this year, to which the next ſucceeded, no whit milder, either in regard of the famine or peſtilence, which infeſted all Savoy; and Mr. Calvin proceeding according to his accuſtomed manner, confirmed his own at home, and ſtrongly oppoſed the adverſaries abroad; publiſhing his four books about free-will, which he dedicated to Phil. Melanchthon, againſt Albert Phighius, the greateſt ſophiſter of his age, and who had ſingled out Calvin for his antagoniſt, being promiſed a cardinal's hat if he could carry away the victory from him: But being fruſtrated of his labour, he gat that which the enemies of the truth only deſerve, viz. That he ſtank amongſt learned and good men, himſelf being deceived by the devil. How much Melanchthon eſteemed of thoſe books of Mr. Calvin, himſelf teſtifies in his epiſtles which are in print. Mr. Calvin alſo the ſame year wrote to the church at Montbelgard, whereby the mouths of caluminators may be ſtopped, who accuſe him of too much rigidneſs in the exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline.

The year following, which was anno Chriſti, 1544. Mr. Calvin declared his opinion about the purpoſe of the church of Neocome in eccleſiaſtical cenſures; and at home Sebaſtian Caſtalio, whom we mentioned before, being a light man, and very ambitious, having tranſlated the New Teſtament into French, was exceedingly diſpleaſed that Mr. Calvin did not approve of it; yea, he grew ſo angry, that he vented divers errors, and not content therewith, he publicly preached that the Canticles of Solomon was an impure and obſcene ſong, and therefore would needs have it expunged out of the ſacred canon; and becauſe the miniſters oppoſed him, he railed exceedingly againſt them; which they judging unfit for them to bear, called him before the ſenate, where being heard with much patience, he was at laſt condemned of ſlanders, and commanded to depart out of the city. From thence he went to Baſil, where being at laſt admitted. What his carriage was there, is beſides my purpoſe. The year before the emperor Charles the fifth being to war againſt the king of France, had promiſed the Germans that they ſhould not be moleſted for their religion, till a general council ſhould be called, which, as he told them, he would take care to be effected. This the pope, Paul the third, was much incenſed at, and publiſhed an harſh expoſtulation againſt the emperor, becauſe he had equalized the heritics with the catholics, and had thruſt his ſicle into another man's harveſt: the emperor anſwered, that which he thought to be reaſon: but Mr. Calvin, becauſe he ſaw in the pope's letters, that the truth of the goſpel did ſuffer together with the innocency of good men, took him up very roundly, and repreſſed his impudence. At this time a diet was aſſembled at Spires, upon which occaſion Calvin publiſhed the book Of the neceſſity of reforming the Church, than which that age produced not a book of that ſubject, that was more weighty and nervous. The ſame year alſo Mr. Calvin in two books did ſo confute the Anabaptiſts and Libertines (who had revived the monſtrous hereſies of former ages) that whoſoever read them, except he was willing to it, could not be deceived by them, and they which had been formerly deceived could not but be reclaimed to the truth. Yet the queen of Navar was offended with his book againſt the Libertnes, being ſo bewitched with two of the chief patrons of that hereſy; Quintinus and Pocquetus, whom Calvin had noted by name, that though ſhe was not otherwiſe tainted with their errors, yet ſhe had a great opinion that they were good men, and therefore took her ſelf to be wounded through their ſides: which when Mr. Calvin underſtood, he wrote to her with admirable moderation, as not unmindful of her dignity, nor of all the good ſhe had done for the church of God, and yet withal, as became a faithful ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, he reprehended her imprudence for admitting ſuch men, and aſſerted the authority of his miniſtry, and he ſo far prevailed, that the men of that abominable ſect of Libertines, which began apace to flock into France, afterwards kept themſelves in Holland and the countries adjacent.

The labours of this year being finiſhed, the ſucceeding year being 1545, brought new and greater labours with it: for the plague increaſing in the city, and neighbour villages, ſeemed as if it would devour all before it, and covetouſneſs ſo prevailed with the poor people, who were imployed to attend the rich in their ſickneſs, and to cleanſe their houſes, that by an horrible conſpiracy amongſt themſelves, with a peſtilentious ointment, they anointed the poſts, threſholds and doors of many houſes, whereby a more grievous peſtilence enfued; and theſe wicked inſtruments of the devil had bound themſelves to ſatan by an oath, that by no torments they ſhould confeſs their wickedneſs: yet many of them being taken in the city and villages, were puniſhed according to their deſerts.

'Tis almoſt incredible what envy and reproach this act brought upon Geneva, and eſpecially upon Mr. Calvin, as if the devil ſhould rule there altogether, where he was moſt oppoſed. This year was alſo infamous by that abominable and cruel edict which the parliament of Aquitane ſet forth againſt the poor Waldenſes of Merindol, Cabriers, and thoſe parts, whereby moſt unheard-of cruelties were exerciſed, not againſt ſome few, but againſt all of them, without any diſtinction of ages or ſex, yea to the very burning of their towns. Some of theſe that eſcaped flying to Geneva, Mr. Calvin was the more afflicted for them, and careful of them, becauſe a little before he had written conſolatory letters to them and ſent them faithful paſtors for the inſtructing of them purely out of the goſpel, and had alſo (where they were in danger before preſerved them by his interceſſion to the German princes, and Helvetians. The unhappy controverſy, alſo of the Lord's ſupper ſprang up again; Oſiander, a man of a proud and monſterous wit, revivingi t out of the aſhes: for the quenching of which flame, Mr. Calvin did what poſſibly he could, as may appear by his letters which he wrote to Melanchthon about the ſame. But the intemperancy of Oſiander was ſuch, that he would by no means hearken to the wholſome counſel that was given him by thoſe two men. In the mean while the plague ſtill raging in the city, took away many good men: whereupon Mr. Calvin out of the pulpit thundered againſt many wickedneſſes, eſpecially againſt whoredom, which was not laid aſide, notwithſtanding that judgment of God amongſt them. Good men aſſented to this which Mr. Calvin ſpake, but ſome there were of the great men of the city, which hindered the reformation hereof, till at laſt they ruined themſelves thereby: and to all theſe evils this was added to compleat them, that now (though very unſeaſonable) the controverſy about the privileges of the city ſprang up, neither could the faithful paſtors be ſuffered to diſpoſe of the eccleſiaſtical goods taken from the pontificians, as they ought to be. About this buſineſs were many clamours, many complaints, and much pains taken by writting, and conference, but they proved all in vain; whereupon Mr. Calvin did publicly profeſs, that he could not endure ſo many ſacrileges, which he knew would at the length be ſeverely puniſhed by God, yet withal, he acknowledged the juſtice of God, in that the goods which were formerly ſo unjuſtly gotten by the maſs-prieſts, God would not ſuffer them to be brought into the church's treaſury.

Mr. Calvin yet met with two more things which did afflict him this year. A wicked fellow was returned to Geneva, his own country, who for a time had lived as an hermit in France. This man pretending to the reformed religion, Mr. Calvin (who was very acute in prying into mens minds, and manners) taking notice of him, admoniſhed him firſt gently, and afterwards more freely, and at laſt reproved him for carrying himſelf more proudly in the congregation than beſeemed him. The man not bearing this, eaſily found out ſuch as had been reproved for their wickedneſs by Mr. Calvin, by whoſe favour and help he might be aſſiſted; ſo that a paſtor being to be choſen in the room of one that was dead, this man, by the help of his companions, ſought the place, and ſo far prevailed, that the ſenate commanded that in the election regard ſhould be had of him. Mr. Calvin with his colleagues oppoſed it, ſhewing how far this ſeeking to intrude himſelf was diſſonant from the word of God, and at length obtained of the ſenate that they ſhould proceed in their election according to the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions formerly agreed on.

At this ſame time alſo there were many in France, who being fallen at firſt through fear of perſecution, began at laſt to pleaſe themſelves with this conceit, that it was no ſin to be preſent with their bodies at the popiſh ſervices, ſo they kept the true religion in their hearts. This pernicious error was long ſince condemned by the fathers: againſt theſe Mr. Calvin wrote, and confuted that error; and becauſe theſe perſons thought him too rigid, he adjoined to his own, the opinions of theſe learned and godly divines, Philip Melanchthon, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and the church of Zurick, ſo that the name of theſe Nicodemites ſtank amongſt all good men; for ſo were they called who cloaked their errors with his example.

The next year being 1546. proved nothing milder than the former. For frequent intelligence came of the preparations of the emperor, and the pope's frauds againſt the proteſtants: wherefore Mr. Calvin judged it neceſſary to confirm the minds of the citizens againſt the terror of theſe reports, eſpecially conſidering the impudency of many wicked men, who were ſo far from being curbed by all the bridles of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, that on the contrary they raged the more, and ſought to break them all in ſunder. Theſe men having gotten one Amedius Perrinus, a vain, bold, and ambitious man, for their captain; (for indeed he had long before procured to be choſen the captain general by the ſufferages of the people,) this man ſuppoſing (as the truth was) that neither he, nor ſuch like himſelf could ſtand whilſt the Eccleſiaſtical laws were in force, and eſpecially whilſt Mr. Calvin did ſo thunder againſt their laſciviouſneſs, began now to diſcover what he, and his aſſociates had been long contriving; which being taken notice of, and ſpeedily prevented by the authority of the ſenate, he indeed held his peace, but the contrived wickedneſs preſently brake out more openly.

For ſhortly after, one of the ſenators in a public aſſembly of the people blamed Mr. Calvin as one that taught falſe doctrine; ſuborned (as was ſuppoſed) hereunto privately by two of the college of paſtors, both of them being drunkards, and therefore no whit leſs fearing the ſeverity of the laws than the others forementioned. But Mr. Calvin made little account of this barking. Yet this man that thus accuſed him, was called before the ſenate, and his cauſe cauſe being heard, was condemned for ſlander, and thoſe two drunken miniſters which had ſet him on, were removed out of their places, being forbidden going into taverns: whereby we ſee, "that the wickedneſs of the wicked returns upon his own pate."

The troubles of this year being thus ended, the next year, which was 1547, proved far worſe, indeed that age ſaw not a more calamitous time than that was; the churches of Germany ſeeming to be utterly ſubverted, the proteſtant princes taken, and cities yielding up themſelves, after ſo great labour uſed, and ſo great difficulties paſſed through in planting the goſpel among them, with what great grief the godly ſoul of Mr. Calvin was afflicted for the deſolations of the churches, is not eaſy to expreſs, eſpecially if we conſider that great affection which he bore to them, though far remote from him, which indeed was no other than if he had bore them all upon his ſhoulders. And indeed he was wonderfully grieved when he heard of thoſe holy men, his worthy friends, Philip Melancthon, Bucer, Peter Martyr, &c. in ſo great danger, that they ſeemed nearer death than life,

But yet, that Mr. Calvin bore up with a valiant mind in this tempeſt, appears both by his writings and by his carriage; for being much vexed at home by ſundry wicked men, yet would he not ſtart at all from his fixed courſe. To ſpeak ſomewhat of his domeſtic troubles, Mr. Calvin wholly imploying himſelf to ſhew, that the life of chriſtianity did not ſo much conſiſt in vain ſpeculation as in practice, he neceſſarily met with thoſe enemies which did not only oppoſe all piety, and honeſty, but threatened war to their own country: The chief of theſe was that Perrinus, before mentioned, who with his companions had brought themſelves into this condition, that they muſt needs uſe extremity; for which end they appealed from the presbytery to the ſenate. The presbytery, on the contrary, pleaded their eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, agreeable to the word of God, and ſettled by authority; and therefore they deſired the ſenate that their privileges might not be infringed. The ſenate conluded that the eccleſiaſtical laws being eſtabliſhed, ought not to be violated. But when this audacious fellow would not otherwiſe be ruled, the ſenate decreed that he ſhould be depoſed from his captainſhip, and live a private life.

Though all theſe things were tranſacted before the ſenate, yet was Mr. Calvin wonderfully afflicted by them; for once upon a public hearing, there was ſuch a tumult raiſed, that they were very near imbruing their hands each in others blood; which ſedition Calvin with his colleagues hearing of, interpoſed themſelves, though it was with the peril of his life (the faction of the wicked being moſt againſt him) and ſtopped it. Yet theſe men proceeding in their wickedneſs, hated him the more for it. So that Mr. Calvin ſharply reproved them for it in his ſermons; and God's judgments threatened by him proved not in vain: for one of them writing an infamous libel, and affixing it to his pulpit, wherein were contained many railings againſt the ſacred miniſtry, and particularly againſt Mr. Calvin, that he deſerved to be thrown into the river of Rhodanus: this man being apprehended and convicted of theſe, and many other horrid blaſphemies, had his head cut off. And after his death there was another libel found written by his own hand, containing blaſphemies againſt Moſes, and Chriſt himſelf, with which impiety there was no doubt but that he had infected others.

At this very time, and in the midſt of theſe troubles, Mr. Calvin wrote his Antidote againſt the ſeven ſeſſions of the council of Trent. He alſo, ſending letters to the church of Chriſt in Roan, confirmed them againſt the fraud of a certain Franciſcan fryar, who had ſpread the poiſonous doctrines of the Libertines and Carpocratians amongſt them.

The year following, which was 1548, the evil of the aforenamed faction in Geneva brake forth again: the devil (which is almoſt incredible) abuſing thoſe perſons to be inſtruments thereof, who indeed were the greateſt enemies to it, viz. Farell, and Viret. Theſe men coming to Geneva made a grave oration in the ſenate about compoſing their differences, Mr. Calvin required nothing but that thoſe men ſhould mend their manners, and Perrinus with his aſſociates promiſing any thing, ſo he might be reſtored to his former place. But Perrinus being reſtored to his place, he, and his wicked companions grew ſo impudent, that they cut their cloaths croſs on their breaſts that they might know each other; others of them called their dogs by the name of Calvin; others inſtead of Calvin called him Cain: others out of an hatred to Mr. Calvin, profeſſed that they would not come to the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper.

All which Mr. Calvin and his colleagues did boldly, and faithfully reprove, and when they were called before the ſenate, the innocency of the good men eaſily carried away the victory. So that the Amneſtie (or forgetfulneſs of wrongs) was ſolemnly ſworn to, Decemb. 18. But it afterwards appeared that all this was done through diſſimulation, and that Perrin ſought nothing thereby, but to be choſen a Syndic, that he, and his might by that means have the more liberty to act all their wickedneſs, as the event declared.

Mr. Calvin in the midſt of theſe broils, was ſo far from giving over his accuſtomed labours, that (as if nothing had moleſted him) he wrote learned commentaries upon ſix of Paul's epiſtles: as alſo by weighty arguments confuted the Interim, which was publiſhed for the deſtruction of the German churches, ſhewing withal the right courſe for the reſtoring of thoſe churches. He diſcovered alſo in a book, the vanity and falſhood of Judicial Aſtrology, which many began now to give too much heed to; and being ſaluted by a letter from Brentius, now in exile, he wrote conſolatory letters to him, in which friendſhip it had been happy if Brentius had continued Bucer alſo being a baniſhed man in England at this time, Calvin wrote to him to declare and open his mind more fully about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and comforted him in a moſt friendly manner. He alſo wrote letters of advice to the duke of Sommerſet, now protector of England (who afterwards ſuffered an unworthy death) about ſuch matters, as if his counſel had been hearkened to, it had been happy for England, and perhaps the church there had happily avoided many of thoſe ſtorms which afterwards befel it.

In the midſt of theſe contentions the church of Geneva did wonderfully increaſe, which did exceedingly torment the devil and his inſtruments, and Mr. Calvin was very ſolicitous to entertain, and provide for ſuch as were baniſhed for the name of Chriſt: which care of his, it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs the year following, that the fury of thoſe wicked men though it was not quite extinct, yet for the preſent it was laid aſleep: and truly he had need of ſuch a truce, being grievouſly afflicted with a domeſtic accident: for at this time he loſt his dear wife, a very choice woman; yet did he bear this accident with ſuch conſtancy, that therein he gave an excellent example of fortitude to the whole church.

The ſame year there aroſe a great contention in the Saxon church about things indifferent: whereupon ſending to Mr. Calvin for his judgment, he freely declared his opinion to them. He alſo admoniſhed Melanchon of his duty, whom ſome accuſed for too much ſoftneſs in this point; but Mr. Calvin afterwards found it to be a falſe charge. For at this time, it was unknown with what mind and ſpirit the whole troop of Flaccians were carried, which afterwards raiſed ſuch great troubles to the church, and were acted with ſuch fury and impudence, as if they had been hired by the pope of Rome, to carry on his cauſe. But it pleaſed God to compenſate this wound inflicted upon the churches of Germany, by a great bleſſing upon the Helvetians: for Farell and Calvin going to Zurick, when many thought that Mr. Calvin did too much favour the doctrine of conſubſtantiation, in a ſynod of all the Helvetian and Rhetian churches, he ſhewed his agreement with them; and indeed there was no great difficulty to bring good men and lovers of the truth into an harmonious concord.

This agreement of the Helvetian and Rhetians churches was written, which did more and more unite Bullinger and Calvin, and the church of Zurick with that of Geneva. Mr. Calvin alſo about this time wrote two learned epiſtles to Laelius Socinus, the poiſon of whoſe opinions did not appear till after his death; for in his life time, going through the churches, he had deceived Melanchthon, Calvin, and Camerarius; but afterwards it appeared, that he had much favoured Servetus, Caſtalio, and Ochin, and their mad opinions: for his commentary upon the firſt chapter of John coming forth, ſhewed that he went beyond the impiety of all thoſe heretics, which had corrupted the moſt divine portion of ſcripture.

Anno Chriſti 1550, ſucceeding, the church of Chriſt enjoyed peace, and then it was decreed in Geneva, that the miniſters, not only in their ſermons, which many neglected, and others heard with ſmall profit; but from houſe to houſe, at many ſeaſons of the year ſhould divide the city amongſt them, and require of every family an account of their faith; by which means it is ſcarce credible what profit came to the people thereby. Another decree for the aboliſhing of Chriſtmas-day, and that no holy-day ſhould be obſerved but the Sabbath only; which did ſo offend ſome looſe perſons, that they reported abroad, that Mr. Calvin had aboliſhed the Sabbaths, to bring the greater odium upon him. This offence taken by ſome, occaſioned Calvin to write his book of Scandals, dedicated to Laurence Normendius, his intimate friend.

Anno Chriſti 1551, great contentions brake out in the church, and this year was begun with the death of Bucer, to the great grief of the whole church, and of Mr. Calvin eſpecially, who always highly prized him. About the ſame time dyed Joachim Vadian, a ſenator of Geneva, a man endued with ſingular learning and piety; whereupon the wickedneſs of the factious perſons brake forth again, which had ſlept a great while. Theſe men would by no means ſuffer the exiles which fled thither for religion, to enjoy the privileges of the city; and not content therewith, Mr. Calvin having been forth to preach beyond the Rhodanus, as he came home, they entertained him with ſcorns, and one Raymund his colleague, having occaſion one evening to paſs the bridge over the Rhodanus, they had almoſt caſt him into the river, and laſtly, they raiſed a great tumult in the church of St. Gervaſe, becauſe a child being brought to be baptized, the miniſter refuſed to give him the name of Balthazar (which name had been for ſome reaſon, forbidden by their law.) Neither could Mr. Calvin tell how to cure theſe evils, but by his invincible patience.

About the ſame time another miſchief invaded the church of Geneva, which was occaſioned by one Jerom Bolſec, a fryar Carmelite of Paris, who had indeed laid aſide his coul, but not his monkiſh mind. This man firſt fled to the dutcheſs of Ferrara, whom he deceived, till being found out, he was driven from thence. Then pretending to be a phyſician, he came to Geneva, but the learned phyſicians there, rejecting him; that he might manifeſt himſelf a divine, he vented ſome falſe and abſurd opinions about predeſtination, firſt in private, and then in the public congregation.

Him therefore did Mr. Calvin confute, firſt with a moderate reproof only, then ſending for him to him, he laboured to inſtruct him better; but he, either puffed up with his monkiſh pride, or provoked by the ſeditious perſons, ſeeking by him to provoke Mr. Calvin, took the boldneſs, upon the ſixteenth of October, to preach upon this text, "He that is of God, "heareth the words of God, and they which hear them not, are not of God;" whence he took occaſion to preach up free-will, and that predeſtination was out of works foreſeen; withal reproaching the true doctrine, and ſhewing himſelf ſeditiouſly proud; and he became the more bold, becauſe, ſeeing Mr. Calvin's ſeat empty, he judged him to be abſent: but indeed Mr. Calvin coming late, ſate behind ſome others; and when the fryar had done, Mr. Calvin ſuddenly ſtanding up, though he had thought of no ſuch thing before, then truly, if at any time, he ſhewed what a man he was; confuting the fryar with ſo many teſtimonies of ſcripture, with ſo many places out of St. Auguſtine, and laſtly, with ſo many weighty arguments, that all were aſhamed of what he had taught, but only the impudent fellow himſelf: inſomuch that one of the magiſtrates of the city apprehended him, and committed him to priſon for a ſeditious perſon, and after hearing and examining his cauſe, the judgment of the ſenate of the Helvetian churches being alſo requeſted, upon the twenty third day of December, he was publicly condemned for ſedition, and Pelagianiſm, and baniſhed the city, being threatened with ſevere puniſhment, if he were afterwards found either in the city, or territories belonging to it.

After this going into a neighbour town, he was the cauſe of many and great ſtirs there, till he was twice expelled the country of the Bernates. From thence going into France, he ſought to get into the miniſtry in the reformed churches, which he found in a peaceable condition; firſt in Paris, then in Orleans, pretending great penitency for his former miſcarriages, and of his own accord, ſeeking reconciliation with the church of Geneva: But preſently after, when he ſaw the churches under affliction, he fell back to his popery, loading the reformed churches with many reproaches.

At the ſame time, the college of miniſters at Geneva, in a public meeting aſſerted the true doctrine of predeſtination, which Calvin put into writing: ſo that all the devil gat by theſe contentions was, that that head of chriſtian religion which before was very obſcure, was now very clearly opened to the underſtanding of all that were not contentious.

The year following which was 1551, it further appeared what a flame this wicked varlet had kindled, though condemned by the common judgment of ſo many churches. For the difficulty of the queſtion having not been ſufficiently explicated by the ancients, did ſtir up, eſpecially ſome curious wits, to make inquiry into the ſame. By which means the factious perſons (ſuppoſing that they had gotten an excellent advantage againſt Mr. Calvin) thought that by removing him they might ſubvert all things: ſo that it cannot be imagined what ſtirs aroſe, not only in the city, but alſo in other places, as if the devil had ſet all his engines on work to raiſe contentions. For though there was a ſweet agreement amongſt the chief Paſtors of the churches, yet there were not ſome wanting in the country of the Bernates which accuſed Calvin, as if he had made God the author of ſin: being forgetful how far he had profeſſedly oppoſed that curſed tenet, when he had confuted the Libertines.

At Baſil, Caſtalio, a good and ſimple man, though he did all things eloſely, yet it was diſcerned that he defended Pelagianiſm, and Melanchon had ſo begun to write of theſe things, that though he had formerly ſubſcribed Calvin's book againſt Pighius, yet he ſeemed to brand the Genevians, as if they held the Fate of the Stoicks. The pontificians alſo, though they had been a thouſand times confuted, yet renewed their old ſlanders. Theſe things did much trouble Mr. Calvin's mind, and ſo much the rather, becauſe the efficacy of error was ſo great at this time, that the mouth of truth in ſome places ſeemed to be ſtopt by public authority. Neither was this a controverſy of a few years.

This ſame year that good hermit, whom we mentioned before, appeared publicly to to diſpute with Calvin, who had ſuffered a repulſe when ſome years before he had ſought to creep into the miniſtry; whereupon he turned lawyer, and the patron of the factious perſons. Their cauſe came to be heard before the ſenate, with a great contention on both ſides; the firſt fighting with impudency, and the favour of the wicked; but Mr. Calvin defending his doctrine only with the authority of truth. And the truth prevailed, Mr. Calvin's writings being judged pious and orthodox by his very adverſaries. But the repentance of this his adverſary is not to be paſſed over in ſilence; for a few years after, when he lay upon his death-bed, he profeſſed that he could have no peace of conſcience till Mr. Calvin had forgiven him, which he not only did ſpeedily, but comforted and confirmed him to his laſt hour.

Anno Chriſti 1553. The malice of the factious brake out ſo impetuouſly, that not only the church, but even the common-wealth, was brought into extreme hazard thereby; for they proceeded ſo far by their clamours and threats, and by their number oppreſſing the liberty of good men, that the antient edicts about conſtituting of ſenators was by them diſſolved; and pretending that they were afraid of the foreign exiles, they took from them all their weapons and ſwords (except when they travelled abroad) ſo that nothing ſeemed remaining, but when they had got all the power into their own hands, that they ſhould then effect what they had often aimed at. The devil alſo then miniſtered another occaſion of troubles, for the ancient enemy of the ſacred Trinity, and of the true God, Michael Servetus, a very monſter, compoſed of many ancient and prodigious hereſies, having gone about a long time as a phyſician, and ſpread his blaſphemies under the name of Michael Villanovanus, at laſt publiſhed a great book at Vienna, belonging to Geneva, the printer whereof was Arnolet of Lyons, the corrector to the preſs William Guerotius, long ago addicted to the factious Geneviſtes, but a few months before being like to be puniſhed for his whoredoms, and other wickedneſſes, was fled from Geneva to Lyons.

This Servetus having publiſhed his book ſtuffed with blaſphemies, was at Vienna caſt into priſon for the ſame, but making an eſcape, he came (by a ſecret providence) to Geneva, thinking to paſs further, but (as God would have it) being diſcovered, and Mr. Calvin acquainting the magiſtrates with it, they caſt him into priſon: much means was uſed to bring him to a ſight of his wickedneſs, and to repentance for the ſame; but when this deſparate wretch (encouraged by ſome of the chief of the factious perſons) would not be brought to a recantation of his abominable blaſphemies, by the common conſent of all the Helvetian churches, he was condemned to death, and upon the ſeven and twentieth of October, without any ſign of repentance was burned alived.

The ſame year Farell being very ſick, Mr. Calvin went to Neocome to viſit him; but his diſeaſe prevailing, he left him for dead; yet it pleaſed God wonderfully beyond expectation to raiſe him up again, to the great joy of the church.

Whilſt the buſineſſes of Servetus were in agitation, there roſe up amongſt the factious, one Bertelerius, a moſt impudent man, who for many wickedneſſes was ſuſpended from the ſacrament by the presbytery; whereupon he went to the ſenate, deſiring by them to be abſolved, which being effected, there was no doubt but the reins of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline being let looſe, all things would grow into confuſion; therefore Mr. Calvin in the name of the presbytery oppoſed it, ſhewing that the chriſtian magiſtrate ought to preſerve, not to deſtroy the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions; yet the falſe clamours of the adverſaries prevailed, who ſaid that the presbytery encroached upon the authority of the magiſtrate, ſo that in a meeting of the common-council it was decreed, that the laſt appeal ought to be to the ſenate, who might abſolve whom they thought fit. After which, the ſenate, not much minding the buſineſs, ſuffered this Bertelerius telerius ſurreptitiouſly to get letters of abſolution from them, confirmed by the ſeal of the common-wealth. But Perinus and his companions, hoped that one of theſe two things would follow, viz. that either Calvin would not obey this mandat of the ſenate, and ſo he would be oppreſſed by the people in a tumult; or elſe that he would obey it, and then it would be eaſy for them to diſſolve the decrees of the presbytery, and ſo open a door to all licentiouſneſs.

But Mr. Calvin (though he had notice of this but two days before the ſacrament was to be adminiſtered, in the month of September) in the time of his ſermon, lifting up his voice, and ſtretching forth his hand, ſpake much againſt the contemners and profaners of thoſe ſacred myſteries: "but I (ſaith he) following Chryſoſtome, will rather ſuffer my ſelf to be ſlain, "than this hand of mine ſhall reach the holy elements to thoſe that have been judged contem-"ners of God." This ſpeech (which is wonderful to obſerve) did ſo far prevail with them (who otherwiſe were head ſtrong enough) that Perinus ſent privately to Bertelerius, commanding him not to obtrude himſelf upon the ſacrament, and ſo (through God's mercy) the ſacrament was peaceably adminiſtered, and received with a certain trembling, as if God himſelf had been preſent in their ſight.

In the afternoon Mr. Calvin preached upon that text in the Acts, wherein Paul took his leave of the church of Epheſus, wherein he profeſſed that he was not the man that would himſelf oppoſe or teach others to oppoſe the decree of the magiſtrate, exhorting the congregation to preſevere in that doctrine wherein they had been taught, as if he had taken his farewel of Geneva. "And ſeeing (ſaith he) things are come to this paſs, give me leave (brethren) to "uſe the words of the apoſtle to you, 'I commend you to God, and the words of his grace;" which words as they wonderfully daunted the wicked, ſo they prevailed much more with the godly party, to put them in mind of their duty.

The day after Mr. Calvin with his colleagues, and the whole presbytery intreated the ſenate, and the common-council that they might be heard before the people, whilſt they ſhould give in reaſons for the abrogating of that fore-named law. This was eaſily aſſented to, their minds being wonderfully changed; and it was decreed, that that law ſhould be ſuſpended, and that the judgment of the four Helvetian cities ſhould be deſired therein; and that nothing in the mean time ſhould be acted that was prejudical to the laws formerly eſtabliſhed.

Thus this tempeſt was rather diſperſed then wholly quieted, which beyond hope, being diverted from Mr. Calvin, the factious ſought to bring it upon the head of Mr. Farell: for Mr. Farell, as ſoon as he was recovered of his great ſickneſs, came to Geneva, and there in a ſermon ſharply reproved the factious, partly relying upon the juſtneſs of the cauſe, and partly upon his age, and that ancient authority which he had amongſt them. But they, complaining that he had done them much wrong, when he was returned to Neocome, appointed him a day to anſwer it before the ſenate, and withal ſent to the ſenate at Neocome that he might appear at the day appointed. He came therefore again to Geneva, yet not without danger, whilſt the factious cryed out, that he deſerved to be thrown into the river of Rhodanus: but an honeſt young man of the citizens adviſed Perinus, that Mr. Farell, the common father of the city, might be no way wronged; joining alſo with himſelf another honeſt young man, they gave notice to the well affected citizens, that they ſhould ſtand by Mr. Farell at the day of hearing, which alſo they did; ſo that his adverſaries being aſtoniſhed and deterred hereat, of their own accord craved pardon, and Mr. Farell was diſmiſſed.

About this time a grievous calamity befel the church of England by the immature death of that godly prince, king Edward the VI, which was a grievous wound to all the reformed churches. Yet at this ſame time Mr. Calvin wrote his learned commentaries upon the goſpel of St. John.

Geneva

Geneva (as we heard before) having inflicted deserved punishment upon Servetus, not as upon a sectary, but as a monster for his horrible impieties and blasphemies, by which for thirty years space he had infected the christian world both by his teaching and writings: it cannot be imagined how this stirred up the rage of satan, such a flame arising from hence as set Poland first, then Transylvania and Hungary all on fire, which himself seemed to foretel by the spirit of satan, when in the beginning of this book he set this sentence out of the Revelation, "There was a great battle in heaven, Michael, and his angels fighting with the Dragon:" for his ashes being yet scarce cold, a great controversy sprung up about the punishing of heritics: some holding that they ought to be restrained, but not to be punished with death. Others thinking that it could not be clearly stated out of God's word, what was herisy; thereupon said, that it was lawful to hold either part in all the heads of religion, and that all men (though holding a wrong opinion) were to be left to the judgment of God. This latter opinion some good men inclined to, fearing that the contrary tenet might kindle the cruelty of tyrants against the godly. The principal of these were Sebastian Castalio, and Lælius Socinus, therein pleading their own cause: the former indeed more closely, and the latter more openly, as one that studied to vindicate the clear authority of the scripture, in a certain preface, to the perverting of the holy Bible; and in his annotations upon the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, had endeavoured to draw men from the written word of God, as an imperfect rule, as if Paul had taught to some of his disciples that were more perfect then the rest, a certain more hidden divinity than that which he had committed to writing. Hereupon Mr. Calvin anno Christi 1554, set forth a copious confutation of all the doctrine of Servetus, which was subscribed by all his colleagues: adding many reasons why, and how far a magistrate might proceed in punishing such an one as was lawfully convicted of heresy. The adversaries on the contrary published a rapsody, collected partly out of the writings of the ancient fathers, which they perverted to their own ends, and partly out of the writings of certain fanatics, and under the name of Martin Bellius, which indeed was Castalio tho' afterwards unknown he foreswore it, and falsifying also the name of the city, in which they falsly pretended that it was published. To this book, swarming with many other errors and blasphemies, Mr. Beza answered, to free Mr. Calvin from that labour, who was now busy in writing his learned commentaries upon Genesis, and in diverting other dangers from the church: for the factious went on to innovate things in the city, and though the Amnestie was again renewed before the senate upon the second of February, yet they daily grew worse and worse, so that Mr. Calvin was much busied both in blaming and reproving them for their wickedness, and endeavouring to strengthen the godly against the poison of their impiety; for they had proceeded to such a height of wickedness, that they turned part of the sacred scriptures into obscene songs, and used to beat strangers whom they met in the night, and sometimes also to rob them. They also privately used the books of Bolsecus, Castalio, and other corrupt men, that they might renew the controversy about predestination; yea, they proceeded to scatter abroad a false and scandalous libel, wherein they grievously aspersed that worthy servant of Christ, Mr. Calvin. Castalio also sent another Latin book to be privately printed at Paris, to which Mr. Beza answered, and Mr. Calvin also confuted some of the fooleries of the same kind. About this time the care of the English exiles lay heavy upon him, some of which were come to Vesalia others to Embden, and others to Franckford, all sending to Mr. Calvin for advice and counsel: neither was he a little troubled for the audaciousness of some of the pastors (encouraged by the secret favour of others) of the French church, long since planted by him at Strasborough: and in short how great pains he took this year for several churches may appear by the multitude of epiſtles wrote by him, by which he ſtirred up many noble men to imbrace the goſpel, and ſtrengthened many of the brethren, ſome of which were in extreme danger, and others already caſt into bonds.

We ſpake before of the ſweet harmony that was between the Helvetian and Rhetian churches about the doctrine of the ſacrament. This concord did exceedingly diſpleaſe the ſpirit of error; therefore he eaſily found out one that might eaſily reinkindle the fire which before was extinguiſhed, viz. Joachim Weſtphalus, who was ſeconded by Heshuſius, then a miniſter of the word, but afterwards a biſhop, of whom we ſhall ſpeak more afterwards: hereupon Mr. Calvin publiſhed an explication of that agreement, which, by how much it imbittered their ſpirits, by ſo much the more it ſatisfied all good men that were lovers of the truth.

The year following, viz. 1555, by the ſpecial mercy of God, brought peace along with it to the church of Geneva, which was now quiet from its domeſtic ſtirs; for the factious ruined themſelves: God diſcovering their horrible treaſon to the ſtate, by the means of one of the conſpirators, who in his drunken fit diſcovered it whereupon ſome of them were beheaded, others of them were baniſhed, who though a while after they vexed the city, yet periſhed ſhamefully in the end, leaving an example of the juſt judgment of God upon ſuch perſons, though it may be deferred for a time. Thus the common-wealth was freed from theſe peſts. To which another mercy was added by the anſwer of the four Helvetian cities, to whom the queſtion about the diſcipline (which we ſpake of before) had been propoſed, who unanimouſly confirmed the eccleſiaſtical polity as it had been before ſettled, contrary to the expectation of the factious. Yet ſomething was not wanting whereby Mr. Calvin might be further exerciſed: for he took great pains in conſtituting the church in Polonia by the will of the king: in comforting the afflicted in England, who were much troubled by reaſon of the cruel burning of thoſe three biſhops and martyrs, incomparable for piety, viz. Nicholas Ridley John Hooper, and Hugh Latimer, who ſuffered amongſt many other worthy men, and ſhortly after that great Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury: as alſo in comforting the impriſoned brethren in France, eſpecially thoſe five valiant martyrs who this year were burned at Camerac.

But at home the errors of Servetus began to ſpring up again, whoſe blaſphemies Mattheus Gribaldus was obſerved to favour, a lawyer of ſome note, and the lord of a town, not far from Geneva: this man coming to Geneva, was brought to Mr. Calvin by ſome Italians, who had been his ſcholars when he taught at Padoa, but Mr. Calvin refuſed to give him his hand, till they could agree about ſome of the chief heads of divinity, viz. about the ſacred Trinity, and divinity of Chriſt, till when he would by no means be perſuaded to do it; and becauſe he refuſed, Mr. Calvin told him that an heavy judgment of God hung over his head for his pertinacious impiety, which ſhortly after came to paſs: being firſt forced to fly to Tubing, where he was entertained by the favour of Vergerius, and being afterwards taken at Berne, upon a feigned ſubmiſſion was diſmiſſed: but returning to his old courſe, and entertaining and favouring Gentilis (of whom we ſhall ſpeak anon) God found him out, and prevented his puniſhment by man, by ſtriking him with the plague whereof he died. About this time alſo Mr. Calvin met with another tryal: for certain neighbour miniſters, who were underhand encouraged by Bolſecus, thinking to get themſelves a name by oppoſing ſo great a man, and indeed they lay under many other ſcandals, railed exceedingly againſt Mr. Calvin as if he made God the author of ſin, becauſe he would exclude nothing from the eternal foreſight and ordination of God. Mr. Calvin being little moved with theſe calumnies, was yet at laſt provoked by their importunities, ſo that he obtained of the ſenate leave to go with their ambaſſadours to Berne, there to defend himſelf and the truth before the Bernates, which accord-accordingly he did, and ſo prevailed, that one Sebaſtian was branded with infamy, and baniſhed: Bolſecus alſo was commanded to depart out of their coaſts: ſo all theſe calumnies ended in ſmoak: and one Andreas Zebedæus, who had been his moſt bitter accuſer, after Mr. Calvin's death, himſelf alſo lying upon his death-bed at Nevidune, a town four miles diſtant from Geneva, ſending for ſome of the chief citizens, did of his own accord confeſs the truth, which before he had oppoſed, and deteſting his former actions, cauſed all his papers to be burnt before his and their faces.

The next year, viz. 1556, a tertian ague ſeized upon Mr. Calvin as he was preaching, which handled him ſo roughly, that it made him come down from the pulpit: hereupon many falſe rumours were ſpread abroad, which were ſo grateful, eſpecially to the papiſts, that at Noviodune, his own country, the prieſt had returned public and ſolemn thanks for the death of Calvin: but the prayers of good men prevailed for his health, and he was ſo far from dying of that diſeaſe, that rather being increaſed in his ſtrength, he undertook a longer journey than he was uſed to do, viz. To Franckford, being invited thither to pacify ſome controverſies which were ſprung up in the French church there. At length returning home, though ſomething impaired in his health, yet remitted he nothing of his daily labours, publiſhing the next year his very learned Commentaries upon the Pſalms, to which he prefixed a very precious preface. The reſt of the year being very full of tumults by reaſon of ſome factious miniſters, and God ſending a famine alſo, yet Mr. Calvin ſpent it in defending the truth againſt Joachim Weſtphalus; and when notwithſtanding Weſtphalus continued his prattle, Mr. Beza anſwered him, and ſtopped his mouth. Then alſo Mr. Calvin and Beza both confuted the calumnies of Caſtalio againſt the eternal predeſtination of God, which he had ſpread abroad, yet concealing his name. At this time a grievous perſecution riſing at Paris againſt the godly, it was a great affliction to Mr. Calvin; many being taken when they were aſſembled in St. James's ſtreet for the celebration of the Lord's ſupper, being about eighty in number (the reſt eſcaping by the benefit of the dark night) who the next morning were led to priſon, loaden with ſcorns and reproaches, though ſome of them were noble-women of good account. Againſt theſe ſheep of Chriſt the king's anger was enflamed, not only by thoſe about him, but by the very occaſion of the times: for this fell out at the ſame time when the king's army had received ſuch a notable defeat at St. Quintan: beſides, theſe godly perſons were forced to meet in the night, becauſe they could not do it in the day, which further irritated him: hereupon alſo theſe old lying ſcandals were raiſed againſt them, eſpecially by one Democarus, a doctor of Sorbon, who charged the chriſtians as the cauſe of all the evils which befel the kingdom.

There were alſo ſome falſe witneſſes ſuborned againſt them, which the credulous multitude was too apt to believe; there were therefore ſeven of them brought forth to be burned, amongſt whom there was a noble-woman, who with ſix others ſhewed admirable patience: and whereas they were accuſed of promiſcuous whoredoms at their meetings, eſpecially by the Sorboniſts, who thought the more to incenſe the king thereby, a godly and learned man, who had lately been their paſtor, eaſily confuted thoſe lies, and the German princes interceeding in their behalf (which Mr. Calvin procured with admirable celerity) the tempeſt was in a good meaſure blown over.

The next year being 1558, proved very happy to the common-wealth of Geneva, by reaſon of that ſtrict league made betwixt them and the Bernates. But a grievous perſecution brake out againſt the church of Chriſt in France again; and at home the hereſies of Servetus were revived by Valentine Gentilis, mentioned before. To ſtop the former, Mr. Calvin ſent letters to the German princes, which opened to them the great calamities which the churches groaned under, requeſting them to intercede for them, and in the mean time himſelf endeavoured by his daily letters to ſupport them under their afflictions. And for Gentilis, who was a man of an unhappy, but ſagacious and ſubtil wit, preſently after the burning of Servetus, he gat his book, and Calvin's confutation of it, and not weighing the truth in the balance of the ſanctuary, but of carnal wiſdom and reaſon, he concludes, that the Father was the only one God of himſelf, who propagated eſſence to the other two perſons, ſo that he began to profeſs that there were three Gods, three eternal, omnipotent and immenſe Gods: and to prove it, he wreſted not only the ſacred ſcriptures, but the council of Nice alſo, and rejected Athanaſius's Creed, as alſo the teſtimonies of all the antients, viz, of Ignatius, Tertullian, Iræneus, and Lactantius, by a certain unheard of impudence; yea, he did not only reject all the orthodox writers which followed upon the Nicene council, but reproached them as wicked men. Other blaſphemies alſo followed this about the hypoſtatical union.

He firſt vented theſe things in private (as he pretended, for diſputation's ſake) to ſome of the Italian congregation; whereupon an aſſembly being called on purpoſe, Mr. Calvin, before ſome choice ſenators, and all the miniſters and elders, having patiently heard them, confuted them ſo fully out of the word of God, that all the Italians preſently ſubſcribed to the orthodox faith, except only ſix, who afterwards being called one by one, ſubſcribed with their hands, but not with their hearts, as time made to appear. Gentilis therefore returning to his old courſe, and going on to ſpread his former blaſphemies, is apprehended, diſſembles not his opinion, being heard as much, and as long as he would. At length, ſeeming to be convinced by Mr. Calvin, he feigned incredible repentance, and gave in a recantation ſigned under his own hand. Hereupon he was diſmiſſed, firſt taking an oath that he would not go forth of the gates of the city; but preſently contrary to the ſame, he flees into Savoy to Matthew Gribaldus, and preſently after two of his diſciples, Alciat and Blandatra followed him, who afterwards proved the infectors of Tranſilvania, and the countries adjacent.

But God's judgment hanging over the head of Gentilis, he ſtayed with Gribaldus (both of them caſting off the other two as illiterate fellows) and there wrote a book againſt Athanaſius and Calvin, and ſo going to Lyons, he there printed it, dedicating it to Gaienſis a præfect, who was altogether ignorant of the blaſphemies contained in it. Whilſt he was at Lyons, he was apprehended by the papiſts, but when he ſhewed them that he had written a book againſt Calvin, he was diſmiſſed, as one that had deſerved well of their church.

From thence he went to Tranſilvania to Blandatra, Alciat, and their companions; but they, having now ſucked in the hereſies of Samoſatenus, and he not well agreeing with them therein, (Chriſt indeed drawing him forth to condign puniſhment) he returned into Savoy to his friend Gribaldus; but God's plague had now ſwept away that peſt, and Mr. Calvin alſo was dead at Geneva. Hereupon Gentilis, either infatuated by God, or thinking that there was none left at Geneva that could anſwer him, went ſtrait to Gaienſis, who was juſtly offended with him; who therefore preſently apprehending him, by the juſt judgment of God, ſent him to Berne, there to be tried; where being convicted both of perjury, and many manifeſt impieties, after many ways were uſed to bring him to repentance, but in vain, he had his head cut off, thereby ſuffering a juſt reward for all his impieties.

Towards the latter end of this year, in October, Mr. Calvin was taken with a quartane ague, which phyſicians ſay, is deadly to old perſons, which though it held him but eight months, yet it ſo debilitated his lean and over-worn body with his inceſſant labours, that he never thoroughly recovered his health again: yet all this time, though his phyſicians warned him, him, and his friends diſſuaded him from his preaching and lectures, yet did he continually buſy himſelf night and day in dictating, and writing letters every way, often ſaying, That nothing was more troubleſome to him than an idle life. At this time alſo he publiſhed the laſt edition of his Inſtitutions in French and Latin, and his learned Commentary upon Iſaiah.

The year following, viz. 1559, was famous for the league entered into between the two moſt potent kings of Spain and France, which was ſtrengthened by affinity betwixt them, which was likely to prove fatal to Geneva, but that the counſel of the pontificians who abuſed the ſimplicity of king Henry of France, hindered it. For king Henry publiſhed moſt ſevere decrees, and caſt ſome of his ſenators into priſon, who had declared their judgments freely, that he ought to proceed gently in matters of religion, till a general council could be called; having this in his eye principally, to reſtore the duke of Savoy to his country, that by his help he might utterly deſtroy Geneva.

In the mean time, Mr. Calvin (though ſickly) laboured hard at Geneva, comforting and confirming the afflicted churches and brethren; as alſo by his frequent and fervent prayers, craving help of God. And behold the wonderful work of God! whilſt all things were full of terror, the king of France in the great marriage-ſolemnity which was made for the confirmation of the peace, in his running at tilt, received his death's wound, and that by the hand of the captain of his guard, by whom, a little before, he had apprehended and impriſoned the aforeſaid ſenators. This death of the king has expiated (as he thought) by the cardinal of Lorraine, who upon the 21ſt of December, cauſed that learned lawyer, faithful counſellor, and holy martyr of Chriſt, Annas du Bourg, to be unjuſtly and cruelly burned. But by the ſingular bleſſing of God, in the midſt of theſe calamitous times, the hearts of the Genevians were ſo raiſed up, and confirmed, that in the very ſame year, and almoſt moment of time, in which two ſuch potent kings, had contrived their deſtruction, by the encouragement of Mr. Calvin, they laid the foundation of, and built a famous ſchool, adorning it with eight maſters for boys, as alſo with Hebrew, Greek, philoſophy and divinity profeſſors; which being finiſhed to the honour of God Omnipotent, Mr. Calvin in a great aſſembly, in the chiefeſt church, read and declared thoſe things which conduced to the perpetual eſtabliſhment of ſo holy and profitable a foundation, whereby he did as it were ſolemnly conſecrate it.

The year after, which was 1560, Mr. Calvin was by ſome loaden with much envy, as if he had ſtirred up an aſſembly againſt Francis the II, the heir of his father's kingdom; which aſſembly was called the tumult of Amboiſe; whereas indeed Mr. Calvin never underſtood what it was, as alſo both by word of mouth, and by his letters to friends, he diſliked it.

This year one Sancarus of Mantua (Italy being fatal to the Polonians) began to teach, that Chriſt was mediator only according to his human nature; accuſing all of Arianiſm, that ſhould ſay that he was mediator alſo according to his Deity, as if thereby they made the Son leſs than the Father. This calumny, and all his other doctrine was notably confuted, as by Philip Melancthon, and Peter Martyr, ſo alſo Mr. Calvin, at the requeſt of the Polonians, did briefly, but ſtrongly confute the ſame; and foreſeeing what ſhortly after came to paſs, that whilſt ſome more unſkilful perſons would take upon them to confute Sancarus, if they took not heed, would fall into the error of them which held three Gods: he eloquently admoniſhed them, that taking heed of Blandatra, and his followers, they ſhould ſo aſſert Chriſt to be our mediator, according to both his natures, ſo that in the mean time they ſhould not multiply Dieties: but this labour of his was vain towards them that were to periſh them alſo that they would enter into a nearer conjunction with other reformed churches. At the ſame time alſo queen Mary being dead, and queen Elizabeth ſucceeding, many of the godly French relying upon her piety, and humanity, fled for refuge into England, with the conſent of that reverend man Edmund Grindal, biſhop of London; and they craved leave of her that one might be ſent from Geneva to plant a French church there: whereupon Galacius was ſent.

About this time the Bohemian Waldenſes ſent two of their brethren to Mr. Calvin to deſire his judgment about ſome matters of religion, whom he lovingly ſatisfied. Exhorting them

Towards the latter end of this year, king Francis of France died ſuddenly and that in ſuch a juncture of time, when all things ſeemed ſo deſperate, that they could not be cured but by God himſelf; and king Charles the IX, a child, was ſcarce entered into his kingdom, when by a herald letters ſubſcribed with his name, were brought to Geneva, wherein he complained that many were ſent out from thence, that infected his kingdom, deſiring that they might be preſently called back, threatening, that otherwiſe he would not let paſs the revenging of that injury.

Mr. Calvin being hereupon ſent for by the ſenate, anſwered in his own, and in his colleagues names, that at the requeſt of the churches of France,, they had exhorted certain men that were ſound in the faith, and of an holy life, whom they judged fit for the work, that they ſhould not be wanting to lend their help to their country in ſo holy a cauſe, eſpecially the churches craving aſſiſtance from them for their further edification: and that this they had done, not to diſturb the kingdom, but that the people might be taught the goſpel of peace; and if they were accuſed for any thing further than this, that they were ready to anſwer their accuſers before the king: ſo this buſineſs went no further.

The ſame year Mr. Calvin and Mr. Beza anſwered the impudent book of Tileman Huſhuſius. Mr. Calvin alſo confuted thoſe blaſphemies which Gentilis had publiſhed at Lyons againſt him and Athanaſius: he publiſhed alſo his lectures upon Daniel, which he dedicated to the French churches; and as he interpreted that prophet, ſo in his preface himſelf he was a prophet foretelling the tempeſt that hung over them. At which time alſo Francis Balduinus, afterwards called Ecebolius, becauſe he had changed his religion three or four times; being ſuborned by the cardinal of Lorrain, by evil means reconciled to the king of Navar, diſperſed a certain book up and down the courts, written either by himſelf, or (as ſome rather thought) by Caſſander, wherein he ſtiled himſelf a pious and moderate man, which book was worſe than the emperor's Interim, for that under the ſpecious pretence of reſtoring moderation, he ſought to bring in all the popiſh corruptions. Mr. Calvin being informed hereof, publiſhed an anſwer to this book, to which ſome other anſwers were ſhortly after added, which made a full diſcovery of, the wit and purpoſe of Balduinus; which this railer could by no means digeſt, whereupon he never gave over to brand Calvin and Beza, with his impudent reproaches; till the year after being grown odious both to God and men, of both religions whom he had ſo often deceived by his turning, whilſt he was following a ſuit of law at Paris, he wore away, and ended his wretched life.

In the year 1562, God gave peace and liberty to the French churches, by a public edict of the king's: but not long after, the king of Navar being ſuborned by popiſh ſubtilty, preſently after the duke of Guiſe had committed that abominable maſſacre at Vaſſy, began that civil war which continued many years after, to the miſerable devaſtation of France; and it cannot be ſpoken how much Mr. Calvin was affected and afflicted therewith, which ſo far increaſed his diſeaſe, that it was eaſy to divine, that it would not be long before he was tranſlated to a better life; yet did he not deſiſt from exhorting and comforting every one, no nor from preaching and reading his ordinary lectures. and the ſame year he publiſhed that excellent lent Confeſſion of Faith, which was ſent to the ſtates of the empire, met together at Franckford, in the name of the prince of Conde, and of all the godly in France, who beſides the injuries which they ſuſtained by an unjuſt war, were unworthily traduced to the Germans, as if they held many falſe and monſterous opinions.

One thing, is not to be pretermitted that on the nineteenth of December alſo Mr. Calvin lying in bed ſick of the gout, being the Sabbath day, and the north-wind having blown two days ſtrongly, ſaid to many that were preſent, "Truly I know not what is the matter, but I thought "this night I heard warlic drums beating very loud, and I could not perſuade myſelf but it "was ſo: let us therefore go to prayers, for ſurely ſome great buſineſs is in hand." And this very day there was a great battle fought between the Guiſians and the proteſtants, not far from Paris, news whereof came unto Geneva within a few days after.

The year after, which was 1563, Mr. Calvin's diſeaſe did ſo far increaſe, that it was almoſt incredible that ſo weak a body, exhauſted with ſo many labours, and worn out with ſo many diſeaſes ſhould yet retain ſo valiant and generous a mind: ſo that even then he could not be perſuaded to favour himſelf, and if at any time he abſtained from his public labours (which yet he never did but when by neceſſity he was enforced thereto): yet he was buſy at home, either in giving counſel to thoſe that ſought it, or in dictating to his ſcribes; the witneſſes whereof are thoſe two ſerious admonitions to the Polonians, to take heed of thoſe blaſphemous perſons which denied the ſacred Trinity The anſwers which he turned to the brethrens meſſengers, who were now met in a ſynod at Lyons; his commentaries upon the four books of Moſes, which himſelf turned out of Latin into French. And laſtly, his commentary upon Joſhua, which he now began, and finiſhed a little before his death.

In the year 1564. February 6, Mr. Calvin being ſhort-winded by reaſon of a ſtopping in his lungs, preached his laſt ſermon, and from thence foreward he ſpake little, only now and then he would be carried to the congregation, the laſt time being March the laſt: his diſeaſes (being contracted by the incredible labours both of his mind and body) were very many: for (beſides that naturally he was but of a weak body, lean, and inclinable to a conſumption) he ſlept little, and ſpent a great part of the year in preaching, teaching and dictating. For at leaſt ten years together he abſtained from dinners, taking no food at all, till ſupper; ſo that it was a wonder how he could eſcape a ptiſic ſo long.

He was often troubled with the head-ach, which his abſtinence only could cure, whereupon he ſometimes faſted thirty-ſix hours together. But partly through ſtraining his voice, and partly through his too frequent uſe of aloes (which was taken notice of too late) he was firſt troubled with the hemorhoids, which yet at length proved ulcerous, and beſides for five years before his death he did many times ſpit blood; and when his quartan ague left him, the gout took him in his right leg, then the collic, and laſtly the ſtone, which yet he never diſcerned till a few months before his death.

The phyſicians applyed what remedies poſſibly they could; neither was there ever man that was more obſervant of their rules: but in reſpect of the labours of his mind, he was extreme negligent of his health, ſo that the violent pains of head-ach could never reſtrain him from preaching. And though he was tormented with ſo many and violent diſeaſes, yet did never any man hear him utter one word that did unbeſeem a valiant or chriſtian man. Only lifting up his eyes to heaven, he uſed to ſay, 'How long Lord?' for he often uſed this motto in his health, when he ſpake of the calamities of his brethren (which always more afflicted him than his own.) When as his colleagues admoniſhed andearneſtly intreated him, that in his ſickneſs he would abſtain from dictating, but eſpecially from writing himſelf:

he anſwered, "What? would you have me idle when my Lord comes?" March 10, when all the miniſters came to him, they found him clothed, and ſitting at his table, where he uſed to write and meditate; he beholding them (when he had rubbed his forehead, a while with his hand, as he uſed to do when he meditated) with a cheerful countenance, ſaid, "I give you "hearty thanks (my dear brethren) for the great care you have of me; and I hope within "theſe fifteen days (which was the time that they were to meet, about church cenſures) "I ſhall be preſent at your conſiſtory. For then I belive God will declare what he will de- "termine concerning me, and that he will receive me to himſelf:" Accordingly he was preſent that day, which was March 24, and when all their buſineſſes were quietly diſpatched, he told them that God had given him ſome further delay, and ſo taking a French Teſtament in his hand, he read ſome of the annotations upon it, and aſked the miniſters judgments about the ſame, becauſe he had a purpoſe to amend them. The day after he was ſomewhat worſe, as being tried with the former day's labour.

March 27, he cauſed himſelf to be carried in his chair to the ſenate door, and then leaning upon two, he walked into the court, and there he preſented to the ſenate a new rector for the ſchool, and with a bare head, he returned them thanks for all their former favours, and in particular for the great care they had of him in his ſickneſs: "for I perceive (ſaith he) that this "is the laſt time that I ſhall come into this place:" which words he could ſcarce utter, his voice failing him; and ſo with many tears on both ſides, he bade them farewel.

April 2d, which was Eaſter-day, tho' he was very weak, yet he cauſed himſelf to be carried to the church in his chair, where after ſermon he received the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper at Mr. Beza's hands, and with a chearful countenance, though weak voice, ſang the Pſalm with the reſt of the congregation, ſhewing, though in a dying countenance, ſigns of much inward joy.

April 25, he made his Will in this form: "In the name of God, Amen, anno Chriſti 1564, "April 25, I Peter Chenalat, citizen, and notary of Geneva, do witneſs, and profeſs, that "being ſent for by that reverend man John Calvin, miniſter of the word of God in the church "of Geneva, and a free denizon of the ſame city, who then truly was ſick in body, but ſound "in mind, told me, that his purpoſe was to make his Teſtament, and to declare his laſt Will, "deſiring me to write it down as he ſhould dictate unto me with his tongue, which I profeſs "I did preſently word by word, as he told me, neither did I add or diſminiſh any thing "from that which he ſpake, but have followed the very form ſuggeſted by him: which was "this; In the name of the Lord, Amen, I John Calvin, miniſter of the word of God in "the church of Geneva, oppreſſed and afflicted with divers diſeaſes, ſo that I eaſily think "that the Lord God hath appointed ſhortly to lead me out of this world, I therefore have de- "termined to make my Teſtament, and to commit to my writing, my laſt Will in this form "following,

"Firſt, I give thanks to God, that taking pity of me, whom he created and placed in this "world, hath delivered me out of the deep darkneſs of idolatry into which I was plung- "ed and that he brought me into the light of his goſpel, and made me a partaker of the "doctrine of ſalvation, whereof I was moſt unworthy: neither hath he only gently and "graciouſly born with my faults, and ſins, for which yet I deſerved to be rejected by him "and driven out; but hath uſed towards me ſo great meekneſs and mildneſs, that he hath "vouchſafed to uſe my labours in preaching and publiſhing the truth of his goſpel. And I "witneſs and profeſs, that I intend to paſs the remainder of my life in the ſame faith and "religion, which he hath delivered to me by his goſpel, and not to ſeek any other aid or

" refuge for ſalvation then his free adoption, in which alone ſalvation reſteth. And with all " my heart I embrace the mercy which he hath uſed towards me for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, " recompenſing my faults with the merit of his death and paſſion, that ſatisfaction may be " made by this means for all my ſins and crimes, and the rememberance of them may be " blotted out. I witneſs alſo, and profeſs that I humbly beg of him, that being waſhed " and cleanſed in the blood of that higheſt Redeemer ſhed for the ſins of mankind, I may " ſtand at his judgment ſeat under the image of my Redeemer.

" Alſo I profeſs, that I have diligently done my endeavour, according to the meaſure of " grace received, and bounty which God hath uſed towards me, that I might preach his " word holily and purely, both in ſermons, writings, and commentaries, and interpret " his holy ſcripture faithfully. I alſo witneſs and profeſs that I have uſed no juglings, no " evil and ſophiſtical arts in my controverſies and diſputations, which I have held with the e- " nemies of the goſpel, but I have been converſant candidly and ſincerely in maintaining " the truth.

" But (ah alaſs!) that ſtudy, and zeal of mine (if it be worthy ſo to be called) hath been " ſo remiſs, and languiſhing, that I confeſs innumerable things have been wanting to me, to " the well performing of my duty, and unleſs the immeaſurable bounty of God had been " preſent, my ſtudies had been vain, and vaniſhing away. Moreover I acknowledge that " unleſs the ſame bounty had been preſent unto me, the goods of the mind which God hath " given me, would have made me guilty of the greater ſin, and ſlothfulneſs before his " judgment ſeat. For which cauſe I witneſs, and profeſs that I hope for no other help for " ſalvation, but this only, that ſeeing God is a father of mercy, he ſhewed himſelf a father " unto me, who acknowledge myſelf a miſerable ſinner.

" As for other things; after my departure out of this life, I would have my body com- " mitted to the earth, in that order and manner which is uſual in this church and city, " till the bleſſed day of reſurrection cometh.

" As touching that ſlender patrimony which God hath given me, concerning which I have " determined thus to diſpoſe. Let Anthony Calvin my deareſt brother be mine heir; but, " only for honour ſake, let him take before hand, and have to himſelf the ſilver charger, " which was given me by Varannius for a gift, wherewith I deſire him to be contented: " for whatſoever things remain in mine inheritance, I requeſt, and commit them to his faith, " that he return them to his children when he ſhall die.

" I bequeath ten golden ſcutes to the ſchool of boys from the ſame my brother, and heir. " Alſo ſo much to poor ſtrangers. So much to Joan the daughter of Charles Coſtan, and of " my kinſwoman. But to Samuel and John, the ſons of my ſaid brother, I deſire to have given " to them forty golden ſcutes by mine heir when he dieth. To Ann, Suſan, and Dorothy, his " daughters, thirty ſcutes of gold: But to David their brother, becauſe of his lightneſs " and miſcarriges, but five and twenty ſcutes of gold. This is the ſum of the whole patri- " mony and goods which God hath given me, ſo near as I can eſtimate it, ſetting a price " upon my library, my moveables, and all my houſhold goods, with all other my faculties. " If there be found any thing above, I would have it to be diſtributed to all thoſe children, " the ſons and daughter of my brother: neither do I exclude that David if he prove a good " husband. If there ſhall be any ſurpluſage above that ſum, I believe there will be no " great matter eſpecially when my debts are paid, the care whereof I have committed to " my ſaid brother, npon whoſe love and fidelity I rely; for which cauſe I will and appoint " him to be the executor of my teſtament, and together him the worſhipful man Laurence

" Normendy, giving them power to take an inventory of my goods without any more ac" curate diligence of the court. I alſo permit them to ſell my moveables, that out of the " money made thereof, they may execute my Will above written. Dated this 25 of April,
" anno Chriſti 1554."

When this Will was made and confirmed, Mr. Calvin ſent to the four ſyndics, and all the aldermen, deſiring to ſpeak with them all yet once more in the court before his death, whither he hoped to be carried the next day. The ſenators anſwered, that they would rather come to him, deſiring him to have a regard to his health: and the day after when they came all to him from the court, after mutual ſalutations, and pardon craved for their coming to him, whereas he rather would have come to them, and profeſſing that he had long deſired to ſpeak with them, though he had deferred it till now, even till he found the approaching of his departure out of this world, he ſaid;

" Honoured maſters,

" I give you hearty thanks, that ye have honoured me thus far, having not deſerved it
" from you, and for that you have ſo often born with mine infirmities; which to me hath " always been an argument of your ſingular good-will towards me: and albeit in perfor" mance of mine office, it could not be but that I muſt undergo many bickerings, and divers
" aſſaults, becauſe every good man, muſt be exerciſed therewith; yet I know, and acknow" ledge that none of theſe things have faln out through your default; and I earneſtly beſeech
" you, that if I have not always done that which behoved me, you rather would have regard " of my will than of my ability. For I can truly teſtify, that I have been heartily ſtudious
" of the welfare of your common-wealth; and howſoever I have not fully performed mine
" office, yet ſurely I have ſtudied the public good according to mine ability, and except I
" ſhould acknowledge that the Lord hath uſed my ſervice ſometimes not unprofitably, I could " not avoid the crime of diſſembling. But this I requeſt of you again and again, that I may " be excuſed by you, for that the things are ſo little, that I have publicly and privately, " performed in compariſon of theſe things which it behoved me to have done. Certainly of " mine own accord. I acknowledge that I am much indebted to you for this cauſe alſo,
" that ye have patiently born with my too much vehemency ſometimes; which ſin alſo I truſt
" God that he hath forgiven me.

" But as touching the doctrine that you have heard from me, I take God to witneſs, that " I have not raſhly and uncertainly, but purely and ſincerely taught the word of God intruſted
" unto me, whoſe wrath I ſhould otherwiſe have felt now hanging over me, as I am certain" ly aſſured that my labours in teaching it hath not been diſpleaſing to him. And I teſtify
" this the more willingly, both before God and you, becauſe I doubt not but that the devil
" (according to his cuſtom) will raiſe wicked, light, and giddy-headed people to corrupt the
" ſincere doctrine which you have heard from me.

Then conſidering the umeaſurable benefits that God had conferred on that city, he ſaid;

" I am a very good witneſs out of how many great dangers the hand of the great and beſt
" God hath delivered you. Moreover you ſee in what eſtate you now are; therefore " whether your affairs be proſperous or adverſe, let that be always converſant before your " eyes, that God is he alone that eſtabliſheth kingdoms, and cities and therefore will be " worſhiped by mortal men. Remember what the great David doth teſtify, that when he " enjoyed a deep peace he fell ſouleſt and ſhould never have riſen again, if God of his ſingular
" goodneſs had not reached out his hand to him. What then ſhall become of ſuch punies, if

" he fell, being ſo ſtrong and powerful a man? Ye had need of great humility of mind, " that ye may walk circumſpectly, and with a great reverence before God, and truſt upon him " only, being ſure that it will always be, as ye have often found, that by his aid you may " ſtand ſure, although your ſafety and welfare may be hung, as it were, upon a very ſlender " thread. Wherefore if proſperity befal you, take heed, I pray you, that ye be not puffed " up with pride like prophane perſons, but rather give thanks to God with lowlineſs of mind. " But if adverſity ſhall happen unto you, and death ſhall ſtand before you on every ſide, " yet truſt in him that raiſeth up the dead; yea, then eſpecially think that you are ſtirred up " by God, that ye may more and more truſt in him alone. And if ye deſire that this your " common-wealth may be preſerved in a firm eſtate, ſee that you be not defiled with any " filthineſs. For he is only the higheſt God, King of kings, and Lord of lords, he will " honour thoſe that honour him, and caſt down thoſe that deſpiſe him. Honour him there- " fore according to his own precepts, and daily think of this, that we are far from doing that " which is required of us. I know the diſpoſitions and converſations of every one of you, " and I know that you have need of exhortation. There is none of thoſe that excel moſt, " unto whom many things are not wanting; therefore let every man look about him, and let " him aſk of the Lord thoſe things which he underſtands himſelf to ſtand in need of. We " ſee what vices reign in the greateſt councils in the world; ſome are ſtark cold, and neglect " the public, taking care only for their own private affairs: others are indulgent to their pri- " vate affections: other uſe not the excellent gifts God hath beſtowed upon them as they " ought: others proudly boaſt of their own parts, and upon a certain confidence therein, ex- " pect that every man ſhould ſubſcribe to their own opinions. I exhort old men that they " envy not the younger, whom they find adorned with excellent gifts from God: I ad- " moniſh the younger, that they carry themſelves modeſtly without arrogance; and let not " one moleſt another. Avoid contentions, and all that bitterneſs of ſpirit which diverts many " from the right way in the government of the common-wealth. And ye ſhall the better " avoid theſe things, if every man contain himſelf within his own ſphere, and all adminiſter " that part of the common-wealth faithfully which is committed to him. I pray you for " God's ſake, let there be no place for favour or hatred in the judgment of civil cauſes. Let " none pervert right by ſubtil and cunning tricks. Let no man hinder the laws from pre- " vailing. Let no man depart from that which is juſt and equal. If ſiniſter affections ſhall " begin to ariſe, let him reſiſt them conſtantly, looking upon him that hath placed him in his " throne, and beg of him his holy Spirit. To conclude, I beg of you again, that you pardon " mine infirmities, which I acknowledge and confeſs before God, angels, and your worſhip- " ful ſelves."

Having thus ſpoken, he prayed unto God to multiply his gifts and bleſſings upon them more and more, and to govern them by his holy Spirit, for the ſafety and good of the common-wealth. And giving his hand to every of them, he diſmiſſed them all, who departed full of ſorrow and heavineſs, as from their common father, with many tears.

April 28, the miniſters of Geneva being come to him, he ſpake thus unto them;

" Brethren, after my deceaſe ſtand faſt in this work of the Lord, and be not diſcouraged; " for the Lord will preſerve this church and common-wealth againſt th threatnings of the e- " nemies. I pray God keep you from diſſentions: embrace one another with mutual charity. " Think again and again what you owe to this church wherein the Lord hath placed you, " and let nothing divert you from your duty: otherwiſe it will be eaſy for ſuch as ſeek them " to finde out evaſions; but ſuch ſhall find that God cannot be deceived. As ſoon as I came " to this city, the gospel indeed was preached, but the affairs were very troublesome, many " conceiting that christianity was nothing else but to overthrow images: and there were not a " few wicked persons from whom I suffered many most unworthy things: but the Lord our " God so confirmed and strengthened me (though by nature I was not bold) that I gave not " place to any of their endeavours. Afterward, when I turned hither from Strasborough, I " followed this vocation with an unwilling mind, because it seemed to me that it would prove " unfruitful, for I knew not what the Lord had determined, and the matter was full of " many and great difficulties: but going on, at last I found that God had much blessed my " labours. Stand fast therefore in this your vocation: retain that order that is begun, and " do your uttermost endeavours, that the people may be kept in subjection to your wholsome " doctrine; for some are wicked and stubborn. Things, as you see, are through God's mercy " well settled, and therefore ye shall be left without excuse before God, if through your " slothfulness they be unsettled again. I profess, brethren, that I have lived with you con- " joined in true love, and sincere charity, and that I now so depart from you. If you have " found me any whit pettish in this my disease, I crave pardon of you, and give you very " great thanks, that ye have sustained the burthen imposed upon me, during the time of my " sickness."

Having thus spoken, he gave his hand to each of them, who departed from him with much sorrow, and weeping

A while after Mr. Calvin, understanding by lettets from Mr. Farell to Mr. Viret, who was now an old man of eighty years old and sickly, was yet determined to visit him, and was now onward of his journey; he wrote thus to him, to stay him:

" Farewel, my best and sincerest brother, and seeing God will have you to outlive me " in this world, live mindful of our friendship, which as it hath been profitable for the " church of God here, so the fruit thereof tarrieth for us in heaven. I would not have " you weary yourself for my sake. I hardly draw my breath, and I expect daily when it " will wholly fail me. It is enough that I live and die to Christ, who is gain to his, both in " life and death. Again farewel. May 11, anno Christi 1564."

Yet for all this letter, the good old man came to Geneva, and having fully conferred with Mr. Calvin, returned back to Neocome.

The rest of his days, even till his departure, Mr. Calvin spent almost in perpetual prayer, with his eyes fixed upon heaven, and his voice full of sighs, by reason of his short breath.

May 27th, being the day whereon he departed, he seemed to speak more strongly, and with less difficulty; but this was but a lightning before his death. In the evening about eight o'clock, on the sudden, certain signs of present death appeared; at which time Mr. Beza being newly departed from him, some ran to acquaint him therewith; whereupon he presently returned, but found him to have yielded up his spirit into the hands of God, without the least struggling, yea, not so much as sending forth one groan, having had this understanding, memory, and voice even to the last gasp, being much more like to one that was faln asleep than dead. So that that day at sun-setting, that great bright light was taken out of this world.

That night, and the day following, there was great weeping and wailing all over the city. Many citizens and strangers desired to see him after he was dead, and amongst the rest queen Elizabeth's ambassadors, who being sent into France, were then there. The next day after, being the sabbath, his body was coffined; and in the afternoon he was carried forth, the senators, pastors, and professors of the school, and almost the whole city following the coarse, not without abundance of tears: he was buried in the common church-yard, without much pomp, no tombſtone being added, as himſelf had commanded; whereupon Mr. Beza made theſe verſes,

Romæ ruentis terror ille maximus,
Quem mortuum lugent boni, horreſcunt mali,
Ipſa a quo potuit virtutem diſcere virtus;
Cur adeo exiguo, ignotoq; in ceſpite clauſus
Calvinus lateat rogas?
Calvinum aſſidue comitata modeſtia vivum.
Hoc tumulo manibus condidit ipſa ſuis.
Ote beatum ceſpitem tanto hoſpite!
O cui invidere poſſunt cuncta Marmora!

He was a man of an incredible and moſt ready memory, in the midſt of almoſt infinite diſtractions, and of a moſt exact judgment. He was very regardleſs of means and preferment, even when it was often offered: he eat little meat, took very little ſleep, was wholly compounded of ſweetneſs and gravity: diſcreet and mild he was in bearing with mens infirmities; yet would he ſeverely without diſſimulation reprove their vices, which freedom he always uſed from a child: ſuch a preacher he was, that like another Orpheus, he drew England, Spain and Italy to him, filling Geneva with ſtrangers.

Such a voluminous writer, that (as it was ſaid of St. Auguſtin) he wrote more than another can well read. His writings were ſo eagerly received, that as moſt rare and precious pieces, they were forthwith tranſlated into all languages. What ſhall I ſpeak of his indefatigable induſtry, even beyond the power of nature, which being paralelled with our loitring, I fear will exceed all credit? and may be a true object of admiration, how his lean, worn, ſpent, and wearyiſh body could poſſible hold out. He read every week in the year, three divinity lectures, and every other week over and above he preached every day, ſo that (as Eraſmus ſaith of Chryſoſtom) "I do not know whether more to admire the indefatigableneſs of the man, or his "hearers." Yea, ſome have reckoned up that his lectures were yearly one hundered eighty ſix, his ſermons two hundered eighty ſix, beſides every Thurſday he ſat in the presbytery. Every Friday, when the miniſters met in conference to expound hard texts, he made as good as a lecture. Yea, beſides there was ſcarce a day, wherein he ſpent not ſome part either by word or writing, in anſwering the queſtions and doubts of ſundry paſtors, and churches that ſought unto him for advice, and counſel: over and above, which there was no year paſſed wherein came not forth from him ſome great volume or other in folio, ſo that in a few years (beſides many golden tractats, and ſundry exquiſite anſwers, which upon ſhort warning he made to principal adverſaries) his huge explications upon the five books of Moſes, Joſhua, Job, Pſalms, all the prophets, and upon the whole New Teſtament, came forth into the world fuller of pithy ſententious matter than of paper. Theſe things conſidered, what breathing time could he find for idleneſs, or looſe thoughts?

In his laſt grievous ſickneſs, procured by his intolerable labours, he could ſcarce be compeled by his friends to pretermit his daily task of preaching, and reading his divinity lectures, and at home, when he could not go abroad, he rather wearied others with continual dictating to them, than himſelf. Nothing was more frequent in his mouth than this, "Of all things an "idleſome life is moſt irkſome to me;" and when his friends uſed all their endeavours to perſuade ſuade him to favour and reſpect himſelf: "Why (ſaith he) will ye have God to find me idle at "his coming?" Yea, ſuch conſcience did he make of miſpending a minute, that he was loath to detain the miniſters that came to viſit him from their public exerciſes. What wonder then is it, that he ſcarce attained to the age of 56. Yea, rather 'tis a wonder that he lived ſo long. Indeed he lived but 54 years, ten months and ſeventeen days; the half of which time he ſpent in the holy miniſtry of the goſpel. Many ſlanders were caſt upon him; as that he was ambitious. But how could that be, whereas he preferred his abode in the common-wealth, and church of Geneva, before all other places, which he called the ſhop of poverty. Others charge him that he ſtudied to heap up riches; whereas his laſt Teſtament ſhews, that he was a very poor man; for all his goods, yea, and his library being ſold very dear (ſaith Mr. Beza) ſcarcely amounted to three hundered crowns: and Calvin himſelf, in his life time, hearing of this impudent ſlander, anſwered: "If I cannot perſuade men whilſt I am alive, that I am no great "monied man, yet my death will ſhew it." And the ſenate at Geneva can teſtify, that his ſtipend being very ſmall, he was ſo far from being not contented therewith, that when they offered to enlarge his penſions, he utterly refuſed the ſame: and by the ſmall eſtate which he left at his death, it appears alſo, that either his gifts were not great, or elſe that he ſpent as God ſent. Some reproached him for his brother Anthony Calvin, becauſe he was divorced from his wife, who was proved an adultereſs: what would theſe men have ſaid, if he had kept an adultereſs in his houſe? May they not as well reproach Jacob, David, yea, and Chriſt himſelf, for that one of his diſciples was a devil, as himſelf told them? Some ſaid that he was given to delights and luxury: his many great books eaſily confute this ſlander. Some gave out impudently that he ruled in Geneva both in church and common-wealth, ſo that he ſometimes ſat upon the tribunal. But for theſe things, neither they which knew him, nor enſuing ages, who may collect his manners out of his writing, will give any credit to them. But 'tis far more eaſy to calumniate than to imitate him.

AT the first setting out of this work, because I did not look for that success, which the Lord of his unmeasurable goodness hath given, I had (as men use to do in small works) for the more part lightly passed it over. But when I understood that it was received with that favour of all the godly, which I never durst have desired, much less have hoped for: as I verily felt in my heart that much more was given to me than I had deserved, so I thought it should be a great unthankfulness if I should not at the least after my slender ability endeavour to answer so favourable affections toward me, and which of themselves provoked my diligence. And this I attempted not only in the second setting forth of it: but how oft since that time the work hath been printed, so oft hath it been enriched with some increase. But although I did not then repent me of the labour that I had employed: yet I never held myself contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I have given you that which may be allowed by all your judgments. Truly with how great endeavour I have applyed myself to the doing of this service to the church of God, I may bring forth for an evident witness, that this last winter, when I thought that the fever Quartane had summoned me to death, how much more the sickness enforced upon me, so much less I spared myself, till I might leave this book to survive me, which might make some part of thankful recompence to so gentle provoking of the godly. I had rather indeed it had been done sooner: but it is soon enough if well enough. And I shall then think that it is come abroad in good season, when I shall perceive that it hath brought yet more plentiful fruit than it hath done heretofore to the church of God. This is my only desire. And truly full ill it were with me, if I did not, holding myself contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the judgments of men, whether they be the fooliſh and froward judgments of the unskilful, or the wrongful and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath thoroughly settled my mind to the endeavour both of enlarging his kingdom and of helping the common good: and though I am clear in mine own conscience, and have himself and the angels to witness with me, that since I took upon me the office of a teacher in the church, I have tended to no other purpose but that I might profit the church in maintaining the pure doctrine of godliness: yet I think there is no man, that hath been snatched at, bitten and torn in sunder with more slanders than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly informed that at Augsburgh where the assembly of the states of the empire was holden, there was a rumour spread abroad of my revolting to the Papacy, and the same was more greedily received in the courts of princes than was meet. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignorant of many trials had of my stedfastness, which trials as they shake off so foul a slander, so they should with all indifferent and gentle judges have defended me from it. But the devil with his whole rout is deceived if in oppressing me with filthy lies, he think that by his unjust dealing I shall be either the more discouraged or made the less diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his unmeasurable goodness will grant me that I may with even sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I give to the godly readers a new proof in this setting forth of this book. Now in this work this was my purpose, so to prepare and furnish those who are studious of holy divinity to the reading of the word of God, that they may both have an easy entry into it, and go forward in it without stumbling: for I think that I have in all points so knit up together the sum of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well have it in mind, it shall not be hard for him to determine both what he ought chiefly to seek in scripture: and to what mark to apply whatsoever is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plain, if I shall hereafter set forth any expositions of scripture, because I shall not need to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places; I will always knit them up shortly. By this means the godly reader shall be eased of great pain and tediousness, so that he come furnished afore-hand with the knowlege of this present work as with a necessary instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clearly as in a mirror appear in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeed what it is, than to set it out in words. Farewel friendly reader, and if thou receive any fruit of my labours, help me with thy prayers to God our Father.

At Geneva the first day of

THE INSTITUTION OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION,

BOOK FIRST,

Which treateth of the KNOWLEGE of GOD the CREATOR.

CHAP. I.

That the knowlege of God and of ourſelves are things conjoined: and how they are connected the one with the other.

THE whole ſum, in a manner, of all our wiſdom, which only ought to be accounted true and perfect wiſdom, conſiſteth in two parts; that is to ſay, the knowlege of God, and of ourſelves. But though theſe two kind of knowlege are cloſely connected together: yet which of them goes before, or produceth the other, it is hard to diſcern. For, firſt, no man can look upon himſelf, but he muſt needs by and by turn all his ſenſes to the beholding of God, in whom he liveth and is moved: becauſe it is plain, that thoſe gifts wherewith we are endowed, do not proceed from ourſelves; but that theſe, together with our being itſelf, are all derived from the one God. Finally, by theſe good things that are drop by drop poured into us from heaven, we are led, as it were, by certain ſtreams to the ſpring head. And ſo by our own needineſs better appeareth that infinite plenty of good things that abideth in God. Eſpecially that miſerable ruin, whereinto the fall of the firſt man hath thrown us, compel us to lift up our eyes, not only being foodleſs and hungary, to crave from thence that which we lack; but alſo being awakened with fear, to learn humility. For as there is found in man a certain world of all miſeries; and ſince we have been ſpoiled of the divine apparel, our ſhameful nakedneſs diſcloſeth an infinite heap of filthy diſgracements; it muſt needs be, that every man be ſo touched with a ſenſe of his own unhappineſs, as to make him come at the leaſt unto ſome knowlege of God. Thus by the underſtanding of our ignorance, vanity, beggary, weakneſs, perverſeneſs, and corruption, we learn to recognize

Whether we conſider our being, the gifts wherewith we are endowed, or the evils that are found in us, we are thereby led to the knowlege of God.

nize or acknowledge, that no where elſe but in the Lord abideth the true light of wiſdom, ſound virtue, perfect abundance of all good things, and purity of righteouſneſs. And ſo by our own evils we are excited to conſider the good things of God: and we cannot earneſtly aſpire toward him, until we begin to diſlike ourſelves. For of all men, what one is there, that would not willingly reſt in himſelf? yea, who doth not reſt, ſo long as he knoweth not himſelf; that is to ſay, ſo long as he is contented with his own gifts, and ignorant or unmindful of his own miſery? Therefore every man is by the knowlege of himſelf, not only incited to ſeek after God, but alſo led as it were by the hand to find him.

Till we have conſidered the exact perfection of juſtice, wiſdom and all virtue, which is in God, we never know our own imperfection.

2. Again, it is certain, that man never cometh unto the knowlege of himſelf, unleſs he hath firſt beheld the face of God, and from beholding thereof, do deſcend to look into himſelf. For (ſuch is the pride that is naturally implanted in us) we always think ourſelves righteous, innocent, wiſe and holy, until that with manifeſt proofs we be convinced of our unrighteouſneſs, filthineſs, folly and impurity. But we are not convinced thereof, if we look upon ourſelves only, and not upon God alſo, who is the only rule whereby this judgment ought to be tried. For becauſe we are naturally inclined to hypocriſy, therefore a certain vain reſemblance of righteouſneſs doth abundantly content us inſtead of righteouſneſs indeed. And becauſe there appeareth nothing within us, nor about us, that is not defiled with much filthineſs, therefore that which is ſomewhat leſs filthy pleaſeth us as though it were moſt pure, ſo long as we hold ourſelves within the bounds of man's uncleanneſs. Like as the eye that is uſed to ſee nothing but black, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkiſh white, or brown. Yea, we may yet more plainly diſcern by our bodily ſenſe how much we are blinded in conſidering the powers of the ſoul. For if at mid-day we either look down upon the ground, or behold thoſe things that round about ly open before our eyes, then we think ourſelves to have very briſk and piercing force of ſight: but when we look up to the ſun, and behold it with fixed eyes, then that ſame ſharpneſs that was of great force upon the ground, is with ſo great brightneſs by and by dazled and confounded, that we are compelled to confeſs, that the ſame ſharp ſight which we had in conſidering earthly things, when it cometh to the ſun, is but mere dullneſs. Even ſo cometh it to paſs in weighing our ſpiritual good things. For while we look no further than the earth, ſo long being well contented with our own righteouſneſs, wiſdom and ſtrength, we do ſweetly flatter ourſelves, and think we are in a manner half gods. But if we once begin to raiſe up our thoughts unto God, and to conſider what an One he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteouſneſs, wiſdom and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did pleaſe us in ourſelves, with falſe pretence of righteouſneſs, ſhall become loathſome to us as the greateſt wickedneſs: then that which did marvelouſly deceive us under colour of wiſdom, ſhall diſguſt us as extreme folly: then that which did bear the face of ſtrength, ſhall be proved to be moſt miſerable weakneſs. So ſlenderly doth that which in us ſeemeth even moſt perfect, anſwer in proportion to the pureneſs of God.

The beholding of the majeſty of God maketh men to ſee their own baſeneſs.

3. Hence proceedeth that trembling and amazedneſs, wherewith the ſcripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were ſtricken and aſtoniſhed ſo oft as they perceived the preſence of God. For when we ſee, that they who in his abſence did ſtand aſſured and unmoved, ſo ſoon as he diſcloſeth his glory, begin ſo to quake, and are ſo diſmayed, that they fall down, yea, are ſwallowed up, and in a manner are deſtroyed with fear of death: it is to be gathered thereby, that man is never ſufficiently touched and inwardly moved with the knowlege of his own baſeneſs, until he have compared himſelf to the majeſty of God. But of ſuch diſmaying we have often examples both in the Judges and in the prophets: ſo that this was a common ſaying among the people of God, "We ſhall "die, becauſe the Lord hath appeared unto us." Judges xiii. 22. Iſa. vi. 5. Exek. ii. 1. And therefore the hiſtory of Job, to throw men down with the knowlege of their own folly, weakneſs, and impurity, bringeth always his principal proof from deſcribing God's wiſdom, power and holineſs. And that not without cauſe. For we ſee how Abraham, the nearer that he came to behold the glory of God, the better acknowleged himſelf to be earth and duſt, Gen. xviii. 17. We ſee how Elias could not abide to tarry his coming to him with uncovered face; ſo terrible is the beholding of him. 1 Kings xix. 13. And what may man do, that is but corruption and a worm, when even the cherubims for very fear muſt hide their faces? Even this is it that that the prophet Iſaiah ſpeaketh of, Iſa. xxiv. 23. "The ſun ſhall bluſh, and the moon ſhall be a-"ſhamed, when the Lord of hoſts ſhall reign:" That is to ſay, when he diſplayeth his brightneſs, and bringeth it nearer to ſight, than in compariſon thereof the brighteſt thing of all ſhall be darkened. But though the knowlege of God and of ourſelves, are inſeparably connected together; yet the order of right teaching requireth that firſt we treat of the knowlege of God, and then deſcend to ſpeak of the knowlege of ourſelves.

CHAP. II.

What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowlege of him.

The knowlege whereby we conceive that there is a God; that he is the creator and preſerver of all things that are, and the only giver of good things, begetteth godlineſs and obedience.

I Mean by the knowlege of God, not only that knowlege, whereby we conceive that there is ſome God; but alſo that, whereby we learn ſo much as behoveth us to know of him, and as is profitable for his glory: finally ſo much as is expedient. For, to ſpeak properly, we cannot ſay that God is known where there is no religion nor godlineſs. But here I do not yet touch that ſpecial kind of knowlege whereby thoſe men that are in themſelves reprobate and accurſed, do conceive God the Redeemer in Chriſt the Mediator: but I ſpeak only of that firſt and ſimple manner of knowlege, whereunto the very order of nature would have led us, if Adam had continued a in ſtate of innocency. For although no man, ſince mankind is in this ruin, can perceive God to be either a father, or author of ſalvation, or in any wiſe favourable, unleſs Chriſt come as a mean to pacify him towards us: yet is is one thing to feel that God our maker doth by his power ſuſtain us, by his providence govern us, by his goodneſs nouriſh us, and endow us with all kinds of bleſſings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered us in Chriſt. Whereas therefore the Lord firſt ſimply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the general doctrine of the ſcripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Chriſt to be the Redeemer; hereupon ariſe two ſorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be treated of, and then the other ſhall orderly follow in its proper place. For although our mind cannot conceive the knowlege of God, but that it muſt give to him ſome kind of worſhip, yet ſhall it not be ſufficient ſimply to know, that it is he only that ought to be honoured and worſhipped of all men, unleſs we be alſo perſuaded that he is the fountain of all good things, to the end that we ſhould ſeek for nothing elſewhere but in him. I mean hereby, not only for that as he hath once created this world, ſo by his infinite power he ſuſtaineth it, by his wiſdom he governeth it, by his goodneſs he preſerveth it; and ſpecially mankind he ruleth by his righteouſneſs and judgment, ſuffereth by his mercy, and rendereth ſafe by his defence: but alſo becauſe there can no where be found any one drop either of wiſdom, or of light, or of righteouſneſs, or of power, or of uprightneſs or of ſincere truth, which floweth not from him, or of which he is not the cauſe: to this end verily, that we ſhould learn to look for, and crave all theſe things at his hand, and with thankſgiving account them received of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to us a mere ſchoolmaſter of godlineſs, out of which ſpringeth religion. Godlineſs I call a reverence of God, joined with love of him, which is procured by knowlege of his benefits. For men will never with willing obedience ſubmit themſelves to God, until they perceive that they owe all things to him; that they are nouriſhed by his fatherly care; that he is to them the author of all good things, ſo that nothing is to be ſought elſe where than in him. Yea, they will never yield themſelves truly, and with all their heart wholly to him, unleſs they aſſuredly believe, that in him is perfect felicity laid up for them.

How the knowlege of divers properties of God brought forth divers virtues in us.

2. Therefore they do but triſle with vain ſpeculations, who in treating of this queſtion do make it their purpoſe to diſcuſs what thing God is; where it rather behoveth us to know what manner of one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what end ſerveth it to confeſs, as Epicurus doth, that there is a God which doth only delight himſelf with idleneſs, having no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know ſuch a God with whom we may have nothing to do? But rather the knowlege of him ought to ſerve to this end, firſt to frame us to fear and reverence: then that, by it guiding and teaching us, we may learn to crave all good things at his hand, and to account them received of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou muſt therewithal by and by think, that foraſmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right ſubject and bound to his authority, that thou oweſt him thy life, that whatſoever thou enterpriſeſt, whatſoever thou doeſt, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truly it followeth that thy life is perverſely corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, foraſmuch as his will ought to be our law to live by. Again, thou canſt not clearly ſee him, but that thou muſt needs know that he is the fountain and original of all good things, whereupon ſhould grow both a deſire to cleave unto him, and an aſſured truſt in him, if man's own corruptneſs did not draw his mind from the right ſearching of him. For firſt of all, the godly mind doth not as by a dream imagine to herſelf any God at adventure, but ſtedfaſtly beholdeth the only one and true God: and doth not falſly forge of him whatſoever herſelf liketh, but is content to believe him to be ſuch a one as he manifeſts himſelf, and doth alway with great diligence beware that with preſumptuous raſhneſs ſhe paſs not beyond his will, and ſo wander out of the way. And when ſhe ſo knoweth him, becauſe ſhe underſtandeth that he governeth all things, ſhe aſſuredly truſteth that he is her ſafe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth herſelf to his faith, becauſe ſhe underſtandeth that he is the author of all good things: therefore if any thing trouble her, or if ſhe want any thing, by and by ſhe fleeth to him for ſuccour, looking for help at his hand. Becauſe ſhe is perſuaded that he is good and merciful, therefore with aſſured confidence ſhe reſteth on him, and doubteth not in all her evils to find ready remedy in his merciful kindneſs. Becauſe ſhe knoweth him to be her Lord and Father, therefore ſhe determineth that he is worthy that ſhe ſhould in all things have regard to his authority, reverence his majeſty, procure the advancement of his glory, and obey his commandments. Becauſe ſhe ſeeth that he is a righteous judge, and armed with power to puniſh ſinners, therefore ſhe always ſetteth his judgment ſeat before her eyes, and with fear of him withdraweth and reſtraineth herſelf from provoking his wrath. Yet is ſhe not ſo afraid with the feeling of his judgment, that ſhe would convey herſelf from it, although there were a way open to eſcape it: but rather ſhe doth no leſs love him, while he extendeth veangence upon the wicked, than while he is beneficial to the godly, foraſmuch as ſhe underſtandeth that it doth no leſs belong to his glory that he hath in ſtore puniſhment for the wicked and evil doers, than that he hath reward of eternal life for the righteous. Moreover ſhe doth not for mere dread of puniſhment refrain herſelf from ſinning: but becauſe ſhe loveth and reverenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet ſhe dreadeth his only diſpleaſure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, even faith joined with an earneſt fear of God, ſo that fear may contain in it a willing reverence, and draw with it a right form of worſhipping ſuch as is appointed in the law. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, becauſe all men generally do worſhip God, but few do reverence him, while every where is great pompous ſhew in ceremonies, but the pureneſs of heart is rare to be found.

CHAP. III.

That the knowlege of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

Why God hath imprinted ſome knowlege of himſelf in all mens minds, as that all nations, even idolaters themſelves do prove.

WE hold it out of controverſy, that there is in the mind of man, even by natural inſtinct, a certain feeling of the Godhead. For to the end that no man ſhould flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himſelf hath planted in all men a certain underſtanding of his divine majeſty, the remembrance whereof, with pouring in now and then as it were new drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their own teſtimony, for that they have not both worſhipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where elſe be any example of it more than among the groſſeſt ſorts of peoples and fartheſt from civil order of humanity. But (as the heathen philoſopher ſaith) there is no nation ſo barbarous, no kind of people ſo ſavage, in whom reſteth not this perſuaſion that there is a God. Cicero de nat. Deorum. And even they who in other parts of their life ſeem very little to differ from brute beaſts, yet do continually retain a cer-certain impreſſion of religion. So thoroughly hath this common principle poſſeſſed all mens minds, and ſo deeply is it engraven in every man's breaſt. Since then from the beginning of the world there hath been no country, no city, yea no houſe, that could be without religion, in this is implied a certain ſecret confeſſion, that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of all men. Yea, and idolatry it ſelf is a ſubſtantial proof of this perſuaſion. For we know how unwillingly man abaſeth himſelf to honour other creatures above himſelf. Therefore when he had rather worſhip a block and a ſtone, than he would be thought to have no God, it appeareth that this imprinted perſuaſion of God is of moſt great force, which is impoſſible to be razed out of the mind of man, that it is much more eaſy to have the affection of nature broken, as indeed it is broken when man from his own natural ſwelling pride of his own will ſtoopeth down even to the baſeſt creatures to honour God.

Yea, they who do moſt deny it, ſhew moſt that it cannot reaſonably be denied.

2. Wherefore it is moſt vain which ſome do ſay, that religion was deviſed by the ſubtilty and craft of a few, by this policy, to keep the ſimple people in awe, whereas they themſelves that procured others to worſhip God, believed nothing leſs than that there was any God at all. I grant indeed that ſubtle men have invented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reverence, and caſt them in a fear, to make their minds the more pliable to obedience: but this they could never have brought to paſs, unleſs the minds of men had been already before-hand perſuaded that there was a God, out of which perſuaſion as out of ſeed ſpringeth that ready inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that even they who ſubtilly deceived the ſimple ſort with colour of religion were themſelves altogether without knowlege of God. For though in times paſt there have been ſome, and at this day there ariſe up many that deny that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feel that which they are deſirous not to know. We read of none that ever did break forth into more preſumptuous and unbridled deſpiſing of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miſerably trembled when any token of God's wrath appeared. And ſo againſt his will he quaked for fear of him whom of wilful purpoſe he endeavoured to deſpiſe. And the ſame may a man commonly ſee to happen to ſuch as he was. For the bolder deſpiſer of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the very noiſe of the falling of a leaf. And whence cometh that but from the revengement of God's majeſty, which doth ſo much the more vehemently ſtrike their conſciences as they more labour to fly away from it? They do indeed look about for all the ſtarting holes that may be, to hide themſelves from the preſence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are ſtill holden faſt tied. For howſoever ſometimes it ſeemeth to vaniſh away for a moment, yet it oft returneth again, and with new aſſault doth run upon them: ſo that the reſt which they have, if they have any at all, from torment of conſcience, is much like to the ſleep of drunkards or frantic men, which even while they ſleep do not quietly reſt, becauſe they are at every moment vexed with horrible and dreadful dreams. Therefore the very ungodly themſelves ſerve for an example to prove that there always liveth in all mens minds ſome knowlege of God.

It is in vain to know God, of whom the moſt ungodly have a kind of feeling, unleſs we know him ſo that we alſo worſhip him.

3. Truly, they that judge rightly, will alway hold this for certain, that there is graven in the minds of men a certain feeling of the Godhead, which never can be blotted out. Yea that this perſuaſion, that there is a God, is even from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the very obſtinacy of the wicked is a ſubſtantial witneſs, which with their furious ſtriving yet can never wind themſelves out of the fear of God. Although Diagoras and ſuch other do jeſt and laugh at all that hath in all ages been believed concerning religion: although Dionyſius do ſcoff at the heavenly judgment: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forward, becauſe inwardy the worm of conſcience gnaweth them much more ſharply than all hot ſearing irons. I allege not this that Cicero ſaith, that errors by continuance of time grow out of uſe, and religion daily more and more encreaſeth and waxeth better. For the world (as a little hereafter we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew) ſtrives to ſhake off all knowlege of God, and by all means to corrupt the worſhipping of him. But this only I ſay, that when the dull hardneſs, which the wicked do deſirouſly labour to get to deſpiſe God withal, doth ly piningly in their hearts, yet the ſame feeling of God, which they would moſt of all deſire to have utterly deſtroyed, liveth ſtill, and ſometimes doth utter itſelf: whereby we conclude that it is no ſuch doctrine as is firſt to be learned in ſchools, but ſuch a one whereof every man is a teacher to himſelf even from his mother's womb, and ſuch a one as nature ſuffereth none to forget, although many uſe their utmoſt efforts to ſhake it out of their mind. Now, if all men be born and do live to this end, to know God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and tranſient, unleſs it proceed thus far; it is evident that they all widely err from the law of their creation, who do not direct to this mark all the whole thoughts and actions of their life. Of which the philoſophers themſelves were not ignorant. For Plato meant nothing elſe, when he oftentimes taught, that the ſovereign good of the ſoul is the likeneſs of God, when the ſoul having thoroughly conceived the knowlege of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore very aptly doth Grillus reaſon in Plutarch, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not only nothing better than brute beaſts, but alſo many ways much more miſerable, for that being ſubject to ſo many ſorts of evils, they continually lead a troubleſome and unquiet life: and therefore the worſhipping of God is the only thing that maketh them better than brute beaſts, by which alone they aſpire to immortality. In Phedrone & theetero

CHAP. IV.

That the ſame knowlege is either marred, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

The erroneous notion which ſuperſtitious perſons have of God, cannot be excuſed, becauſe they are the cauſe of their own blindneſs.

BUT experience teacheth that God hath ſown the ſeed of religion in all men, ſo ſcarcely may be found the hundredth man, that having it conceived in his heart doth cheriſh it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, ſo far is it of that any fruit appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that ſome become vain in their own ſuperſtitions, or that ſome do of ſet purpoſe maliciouſly revolt from God; yet all do run out of kind from the true knowlege of him. So cometh it to paſs that there remaineth no true godlineſs in the world. But whereas I ſaid that ſome by error fall into ſuperſtition. I mean not thereby as though their ſimplicity might excuſe them from blame, becauſe the blindneſs that they have, is commonly always mingled both with proud vanity, and with ſtubbornneſs. Vanity and the ſame joined with pride appeareth in this, that they, miſerable men, both in the ſeeking of God do not climb above themſelves as they ought to have done, but meaſure him according to the proportion of their own fleſhly dulneſs, and alſo neglecting the ſound manner of ſearching for him, do curiouſly flee to vain ſpeculations. And ſo they conceive him not ſuch a one as he offereth himſelf, but do imagine him ſuch a one as of their own raſh preſumption they have forged him. Which gulf being once opened, what way ſoever they ſtirr their feet, they muſt needs always run headlong into deſtruction. For whatſoever afterwards they go about toward the worſhipping or ſervice of God, they cannot account it done to him, becauſe they worſhip not him, but rather the deceit of their own heart, and their own dream inſtead of him. This perverſeneſs doth Paul expreſsly touch, where he ſaith, that they were made fools when they coveted to be wiſe, Rom. i. 22. He had before ſaid, that they were made vain in their imaginations: but leſt any man ſhould thereby excuſe them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded becauſe not contented with ſobriety, but preſumptuouſly taking upon themſelves more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkneſs upon them, yea with vain and forward pride do make themſelves fools. Whereupon followeth, that their fooliſhneſs is not excuſable, whereof the cauſe is not only vain curioſity, but alſo a greedineſs to know more than is fit for them, joined with a falſe confidence.

Malicious ſinners are ſaid to think there is no God, not as if they did preciſely deny him to be, but becauſe they labour to put off from themſelves all feeling of his power, which notwithſtanding they cannot do.

2. As for this that David ſaith, that the wicked and mad men think in their hearts, that there is no God: Pſal. xiii. 1. Firſt, that is meant only of thoſe who putting out the light of nature, do of purpoſe make themſelves ſenſeleſs, as we ſhall ſee again a little hereafter. Even as we ſee that many after that they have been hardened with boldneſs and cuſtom of ſinning, do furiouſly put from them all the remembrance of God, which yet is but very feeling of nature inwardly miniſtred unto their minds. Now David, to make their madneſs the more deteſtable, bringeth them in as though they preciſely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but becauſe in taking from him his judgment and providence, they ſhut him up idle in heaven. For whereas whereas nothing less agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the government of the world, and leave it to fortune, to wink at the sins of men, so as they may live in licentious outrage unpunished: whosoever he be that quenching the fear of the heavenly judgment, doth carelesly follow his own affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the just vengeance of God, to draw a fatness over their hearts, so that the wicked when they have once closed their eyes, even in seeing may not see. And David in another place is the best expounder of his own meaning, where he saith: "That the fear of God is not before the eyes of "the wicked." Psal. xxxvi. 1. Again, that in their evil doings they proudly rejoice at themselves, because they persuade themselves that God doth not take any notice of them. Psal. x. 11. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowlege some God, yet they do rob him of his glory in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot deny himself, because he continually abideth like himself, 2 Tim. i. 13. so is it truly said, that these men in feigning God to be a dead and vain image, do deny God. Moreover it is to be observed that although they wrestle against their own natural feeling, and do desire not only to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heaven: yet their dull hardness can never so far prevail, but that God sometimes draweth them back to his judgment-seat. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any fear from runinng violently against God: therefore it is certain that there reigneth in them a brutish forgetfulness of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcibly carry them.

God alloweth no devotion but that which springeth from the true knowlege of his name.

3. So is that vain defence overthrown, which many are wont to pretend for excuse of their superstition. For they think, that any devotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it be, though it be never so much contrary to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetual rule: and that God himself abideth always like himself, and is no imagined apparition or fancy, that may be diversly fashioned after every man's liking. And truly we may plainly see with how lying deceits superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a manner only, which God hath testified that he careth not for, she either contemptuously useth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and declareth to be pleasant unto him. Therefore whosoever do set up new invented forms of worshipping God, they worship and honour their own foolish devices: because they durst not so trifle with God, unless they had first feigned a God, agreeing with the follies of their trifling toys. Wherefore the Apostle affirms, that that unstay'd and wandering opinion of the majesty of God, is in effect to disown God. "When (saith he) ye knew not God, ye serv-"ed them that by nature were no gods." Gal. iv. 8. And in another place he saith that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they departed from the right knowlege of the one God. Eph. ii. 13. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou believest one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from and forsakest the true God: whom when thou hast once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is joined with truth.

God accepteth not their service who seek him only by fear in cases of extremity, which nevertheless doth prove that there was a seed of the knowlege of God which lay suppressed in them.

4. There is also a second fault that they neither have at any time any consideration of God, but against their wills, nor do approach towards him, till for all their holding back they be forcibly drawn to him: and even then also they have not a willing fear that proceedeth from reverence of God's majesty, but only a servile and constrained fear, which the judgment of God extorteth from them: which judgment because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithal they abhor it. And so that saying of Statius, that fear first made gods in the world, may be fitly spoken of ungodliness, and of this kind of ungodlness only. They that have a mind abhoring from the justice of God, do heartily wish to have his throne of judgment overthrown, which they know to stand for punishment of offences against his justice by which affection they war against God, who cannot be without his judgment. But when they understand that his power impossible to be avoided, hangeth over them: because they can neither by force remove it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they fear it. So lest they should in all things seem to despise him, whose majesty still presseth upon them, they use a certain outward form of religion, such as it is: but in the mean time they cease not to defile themselves with all kinds of vices, to join outragious mischiefs to mischiefs, until they have in all points violate the holy law of the Lord, and deſtroyed his whole righteouſneſs, or at leaſt they are not ſo holden back with that feigned fear of God, but that they ſweetly reſt in their ſins, and flatter themſelves, and had rather to follow the intemperance of their fleſh than reſtrain it with the bridle of the holy Ghoſt. But foraſmuch as the ſame is but a void and lying ſhadow of religion, yea ſcarce worthy to be called a ſhadow: hereby again is eaſily gathered, how much the true godlineſs, which is poured only into the hearts of the faithful, I mean that out of which religion ſpringeth, doth differ from this confuſed knowlege of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtain by crooked compaſſes, to ſeem nigh unto God, whom they flee from. For whereasthere ought to have been one continual unbroken courſe of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their doings careleſly rebelling againſt him, labour with a few ſacrifices to appeaſe him. Whereas they ought to have ſerved him with holineſs of life and ſincerneſs of heart, they invent triflings and obſervances of no value, to procure his favour withal: yea they do the more licentiouſly ly dull in their own dregs, becauſe they truſt that they may be diſcharged againſt him with their own mockeries of propitiatory ſatisfactions. Finally, whereas their affiance ought to have been faſtened in him, they neglecting him do reſt in themſelves, or in creatures. At length they entangle themſelves with ſuch a heap of errors, that the dark miſt of malice doth choke, and at laſt utterly quench thoſe ſparks, that glimmeringly ſhined to make them ſee the glory of God. Yet that ſeed ſtill remaineth which can by no mean be plucked up by the root, to believe that there is a certain Godhead: but the ſame ſeed is ſo corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but very evil fruits. Yea, thereby is that which I labour to prove more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of Godhead naturally graven in the hearts of men, foraſmuch as the very reprobates themſelves are of neceſſity conſtrained to acknowlege it. In quiet proſperity they pleaſantly mock at God, yea they are full of talk and prating to diminiſh the greatneſs of his power: but if once any deſperation touch them, it ſtirreth them up to ſeek the ſame God, and miniſtereth them ſudden ſhort prayers: by which it may apear, that they were not utterly ignorant of God, but that the ſame which ought ſooner to have been uttered, was by obſtinacy ſuppreſſed.

CHAP. V.

That the knowlege of the Deity, doth eminently appear in the creation of the world, and in the continual government of it.

God's power and Godhead ſhineth ſo clearely in the world, that it may be ſeen by all, be they never ſo dull.

MOREOVER, becauſe the furtheſt end of a bleſſed life ſtandeth in the knowlege of God: that the way to felicity ſhould be ſtopped to none, therefore God hath not only planted in the minds of men that ſeed of religion which we have ſpoken of, but alſo hath ſo diſcloſed himſelf in the whole workmanſhip of the world, and daily ſo manifeſtly preſenteth himſelf, that men cannot open their eyes but they muſt needs behold him. His ſubſtance indeed is incomprehenſible, ſo that his divine majeſty far ſurmounteth all mens ſenſes: but he hath in all hisworks graven certain marks of his glory, and thoſe ſo plain and notably diſcernable, that the excuſe of ignorance is taken away from men, be they never ſo groſs and ſtupid. Therefore the prophet with juſtice crieth out, "that he is clothed with light "as with a garment:" Pſal. civ. 2. as if he ſhould have ſaid, that then he firſt began to come forth to be ſeen in viſible apparel, ſince the time that he firſt diſplayed his enſigns in the creation of the world, by which even now what way ſoever we turn our eyes, he appeareth glorious unto us. In the ſame place alſo the ſame prophet aptly compareth the heavens as they be diſplayed abroad, to his royal pavilion: he ſaith that he framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth upon the wings of the winds, that the winds and lightenings are his ſwift meſſengers; and becauſe the glory of his power and wiſdom doth more fully ſhine above, therefore commonly the heaven is called his palace. And firſt of all, what way ſoever thou turn thy eyes, there is no part, of the world how ſmall ſoever in which at leaſt ſome ſparkles of his glory are not ſeen to ſhine. But as for this moſt large and beautiful frame, thou canſt not with one view peruſe the wide compaſs of it, but that thou muſt needs be on every ſide overwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightneſs thereof. Wherefore the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews doth very well call the ages of the world the ſpectacle of inviſible things, Heb. ii. 3. for that the ſo orderly framing of the the world ſerveth us for a mirror wherein we my behold God, who otherwiſe is inviſible. For which cauſe the Prophet aſſigneth to the heavenly creatures a language that all nations underſtand, Pſal. xix. 1. for that in them there is a more evident teſtification of the Godhead, than that it ought to eſcape the conſideration of any nation be they never ſo dull. Which thing the Apoſtle declaring more plainly ſaith, that there is diſcloſed unto men ſo much as was behooveful to be known concerning God: becauſe all men without exception, do clearly perceive the inviſible things of God, even his eternal power and Godhead, which they underſtand by the creation of the world. Rom. i. 19.

His wiſdom, though the learned more nearly, yet the rudeſt may plainly enough perceive.

2. As to his marvellous wiſdom, there are innumerable proofs of that both in the heavens and earth. I mean not only that ſort of things which are more remote from our view, and for the diſcovery and cloſer inſpection of which, aſtrology, phyſic and all natural philoſophy ſerveth, but even thoſe things which expoſe themſelves to every one's obſervation, to the obſervation of men of the meaneſt capacity; inſomuch that whoſoever do but open their eyes muſt needs be witneſſes of them. But truly they that have digeſted, yea or but taſted the liberal arts, aſſiſted by the aid thereof, do proceed much farther to look into the ſecrets of God's wiſdom. Yet is there no man ſo hindered by want of knowlege of thoſe arts, but that he thoroughly ſeeth an abundance of ſkilful contrivance in God's works, ſufficient to excite in him an admiration of the author of them. As for example, to the ſearching out of the motions of the ſtars, appointing of their places, meaſuring of their diſtances, and noting of their porperties, there needeth art and an exacter diligence: by which being thoroughly perceived, as the providence of God is the more manifeſtly diſcloſed, ſo it is convenient, that the mind riſe ſomewhat the higher thereby to behold his glory. But foraſmuch as the unlearned people, yea, and the rudeſt ſort of them, ſuch as are furniſhed with the bare help of their eyes, cannot be ignorant of the exellency of God's ſkillful workmanſhip, which in this innumerable and yet ſo ſeverally well ordered and diſpoſed variety doth of it ſelf ſhew forth it ſelf: it is evident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely diſcover his wiſdom. Likewiſe it requireth a ſingular acuteneſs of underſtanding, to conſider with ſuch niceneſs as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportional agreement, the beauty, and uſe in the frame of man's body: but by all mens confeſſion, the body of man doth diſcover in very ſhew of itſelf ſo ſkilful a compacting together, that on the account thereof the maker of it may worthily be judged wonderful.

We need not ſeek far for the knowlege of God when in our own faces we may ſee his.

3. And therefore certain of the philoſophers in old time did not without cauſe call man a little world, becauſe he is a rare repreſentation of the power, goodneſs and wiſdom of God, and containeth in himſelf miracles enough to occupy our minds, if we will be content to mark them And for this reaſon Paul, after that he had ſaid that the very blind men may find out God by groping for him, by and by ſaith further, that he is not to be ſought far off; Acts xvii. 2. becauſe all men do feel undoubtedly within themſelves the heavenly grace wherewith they be quickned. But if we need to go no further than ourſelves, to find and take hold of God: what pardon ſhall his ſlothfulneſs deſerve, that will not vouchſafe to deſcend into himſelf to find God? And the ſame is the reaſon why David, when he had ſhortly ſpoken in the advancement of the wonderful name and honour of God, that do every where gloriouſly ſhine, by and by crieth out: "What is man that thou art mindful of him? again "Out of the mouth of infants and ſucking babes "thou haſt perfected ſtrength, Pſal. viii. 5." For ſo he pronounceth that not only the whole kind of man is a mirror of the works of God, but alſo that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breaſts, have tongues eloquent enough to preach his glory, ſo that there needeth no other orators. And therefore he doubteth not to ſet their mouths in the front, as being ſtrongly armed to ſubdue their madneſs that would according to their deviliſh pride covet to extinguiſh the name of God. And hereupon riſeth that which Paul allegeth out of Aratus, that we are the offſpring of God, Acts xvii. 28. becauſe he garniſhing us with ſuch excellency, hath teſtifyed that he is our father: juſt in the ſame manner as by common reaſon, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane poets called him the father of men. And truly no man will wittingly and willingly yield himſelf to ſerve God, but he that having taſted his fatherly love, is mutually allured to love and worſhip him.

Their unthankfulneſs is worthy of deteſtation who aſcribe the operations of their ho-

4. And here is diſcloſed the baſe ingratitude of men who while they have within themſelves a work-houſe, gloriouſly furniſhed with innumerable works of God, and dies and ſouls in ſuch wiſe to nature, that they hide the power of God which worketh in them.

and alſo a ſhop repleniſhed with ineſtimable plenty of riches, and when they ought to burſt forth into praiſing of him, are contrariwiſe puffed up and do ſwell with ſo much the greater pride. They feel how diverſly in marvellous wiſe God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it ſelf, how great variety of gifts they poſſeſs by his liberality: whether they will or no, they are inforced to know that theſe are the tokens of his Godhead: and yet they ſuppreſs it cloſe within them. Truly they need not to go out of themſelves, ſo that they would not in preſumptuouſly taking upon themſelves that which is given from heaven, bury within the ground that which brightly giveth light to their minds to ſee God. But even at this day the earth beareth many monſtrous ſpirits, which ſtick not to abuſe the whole ſeed of Godhead that is ſown in man's nature, and to imploy it to oppreſs, the name of God. How deteſtable, I pray you, is this madneſs, that man finding God a hundred times in his body and his ſoul, ſhould by the very ſame pretence of excellency deny that there is a God? They will not ſay, that they are by chance made different from brute beaſts. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and ſo do convey God away. They ſee that exquiſite workmanſhip in all their members, from their mouth and their eyes, even to the nails of their toes, and yet hear alſo they put nature in place of God. But eſpecially the ſo ſwift motions, the ſo excellent powers, the ſo rare gifts of the ſoul, do repreſent a divine nature that doth not eaſily ſuffer itſelf to be hid: unleſs the Epicureans like the giants Cyclopes would (bearing themſelves bold upon his high degree) outragiouſly make war againſt God. Do the whole treaſures of the heavenly wiſdom ſo meet together, to rule a worm of five feet long: and ſhall the whole univerſality of the world be without this prerogative? Firſt to agree that there is a certain inſtrumental thing that anſwereth to all the parts of man, doth ſo ſerve nothing at all to obſcure the honour of God, that it rather doth more glorioufly ſet it out. Let Epicurus anſwer me, what meeting of undiviſible bodies, boiling the meat and drink in man, doth diſpoſe part into excrements and part into blood, and bringeth to paſs that there is in all the members of man ſuch an endeavouring to do their office, even as if ſo many ſeveral ſouls did by common advice rule one body?

They obſcure the glory of God, who bind the ſoul in ſuch ſort unto the body that they take from it thoſe operations which depending not at all upon corporal inſtruments do both ſhew the divine nature of the ſoul, and the powerful providence of him that created it.

5. But I have not now to do with that ſty of ſwine. I rather ſpeak unto them, who being given to ſubtilties, would by crooked conveyance with that cold ſaying of Ariſtotle, both to deſtroy the immortality of the ſoul, and alſo to take from God his right. For becauſe there are inſtrumental powers of the ſoul, by pretence thereof they bind the ſoul to the body, that it cannot continue without the body, and with praiſes of nature they do as much as in them is, ſuppreſs the name of God. But the powers of the ſoul are far from being incloſed in thoſe exerciſes that ſerve the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to meaſure the ſky, to gather the number of the ſtars, to learn the greatneſs of one, to know what ſpace they be diſtant one from another, with what ſwiftneſs or ſlowneſs they go their courſes, how many degrees they decline this way or that way? I grant indeed that there is ſome uſe of aſtrology: but my meaning is only to ſhew that in this ſo deep ſearching out of heavenly things, it is not an inſtrumental meaſuring, but that the ſoul hath her offices by itſelf independent of the body. I have ſhewed one example, by which it ſhall be eaſy for the readers to gather the reſt. Truly the manifold nimbleneſs of the ſoul, by which it ſurveyeth both heaven and earth, joineth things paſt with things to come, keepeth in memory things heard long before, and expreſſeth each thing to itſelf by imagination, alſo the ingeniouſneſs by which it inventeth things incredible, and which is the parent of ſo many marvellous arts, are ſure tokens of divine nature in man. Beſide that, even in ſleeping it doth not only roll and turn itſelf, but alſo conceiveth many things profitable, reaſoneth of many things, and alſo propheſieth of things to come. What ſhall we in this caſe ſay, but that the ſigns of immortality that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reaſon may bear that man ſhall be of divine nature, and not acknowlege his creator? Shall we forſooth by judgment that is put into us diſcern between right and wrong, and ſhall there be no judge in heaven? Shall we even in our ſleep have abiding with us ſome remnant of underſtanding, and ſhall no God be waking in governing the world? Shall we be ſo counted the inventors of ſo many arts and profitable things, that God ſhall be defrauded of his praiſe, whereas yet experience ſufficiently teacheth, that from another and not from ourſelves, all that we have, is in divers ways diſtri-tributed among us? As for that, which ſome do babble of the ſecret inſpiration that giveth livlineſs to the world, it is not only weak, but alſo ungodly. They like well that famous ſaying of Virgil:

Firſt, heaven, and earth, and ocean's liquid plains,
The moon's bright globe, the ſun, and ſhining ſtars,
A ſoul within enlivens; and a mind,
Diffus'd thro' all its parts, the gen'ral maſs
Invigorates, and mingles with the whole.
Hence men and beaſts, and all the feather'd kind Proceed, and monſters of the boundleſs deep:
A fiery force, and origin divine
Theſe ſeeds inſpires; &c. ÆNEID VI.

Forſooth, that the world which was created for a ſpectacle of the glory of God, ſhould be the creator of itſelf. So in another place the ſame author, following the common opinion of the Greeks and Latins, ſaith:

Some think, by theſe appearances induc'd,
That to the bees an energy divine,
And part of the celeſtial mind, is given;
For that a God, diffus'd thro' all the maſs,
Pervades the earth, the ſea, and deep of air:
Hence men, and cattle, herds and ſavage beaſts,
All at their births, receive ethereal life;
Hither again, diſſolv'd, they back return;
Nor death takes place; but all, immortal, fly
To heav'n, and in their proper ſtars reſide.
GEO. IV.

Lo, what that ſilly notion of an univerſal mind that giveth ſoul and livelineſs to the world, availeth to engender and nouriſh godlineſs in the hearts of men. Which doth alſo better appear by the blaſphemous ſayings of the filthy dog Lucretius, which are derived from the ſame principle. What is this but to make a mere ſhadow of a Deity, in order to drive far away the true God whom we ought to fear and worſhip. I grant indeed that this may be piouſly ſaid, ſo that it proceed from a godly mind, that nature is God: but becauſe it is a hard and an unproper manner of ſpeech, foraſmuch as nature is rather an order preſcribed by God: therefore in things of ſo great weight and to which is due a ſingular religiouſneſs, it is hurtful to wrap up God confuſedly with the inferior courſe of his works. Let us therefore remember, ſo oft as any man conſidereth his own nature, that there is one God which ſo governeth all natures, that his will is to have us look unto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worſhipped and called upon by us: becauſe there is nothing more prepoſterous and irrational, than for us to enjoy thoſe excellent gifts that ſavour of divine nature in us, and to deſpiſe the author that freely doth give them unto us. Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forcibly draw us to conſider it, unleſs perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a ſtrength it is with his only word to uphold this infinite maſs of heaven and earth, with his only beck, ſometime to ſhake the heaven with noiſe of thunders, to burn up each thing with lightenings, to ſet the air on fire with lightening flames, ſometime to trouble it with divers ſorts of tempeſts, and by and by the ſame God when he liſts in one moment to make fair weather; to hold in the ſea as if it hanged in the air, which with its height ſeemeth to threaten continual deſtruction to the earth, ſometimes in horrible wiſe to raiſe it up with outragious violence of winds, and ſometimes to appeaſe the waves and make it calm again. For proof hereof do ſerve all the praiſes of God gathered of the teſtimonies of nature, ſpecially in the book of Job and in Iſaiah, which now I purpoſely paſs over, becauſe they ſhall elſe where have another place fitter for them, where I ſhall treat of the creation of the world according to the ſcriptures. Only my meaning was now to hint, that both ſtrangers and they of the houſhold of God have this way of ſeeking God common to them both, that is, to follow theſe firſt draughts which both above and beneath do as in a ſhadow ſet forth a lively image of him. And now the ſame power leadeth us to conſider his eternity. For it muſt needs be that he from whom all things have their beginning, is of eternal duration, and hath his beginning of himſelf. But now if any man enquire the cauſe whereby he both was once led to create all theſe things, and is now moved to preſerve them: we ſhall find that his alone goodneſs was that which moved him to it. Yea and although this alone be the cauſe, yet ought the ſame abundantly to ſuffice to allure us to the love of him, foraſmuch as there is no creature (as the prophet ſaith) upon which his mercy is not poured out.

The works of God in cheriſhing the good, puniſhing the wicked, and calling ſinners home unto himſelf, are proofs of his exceeding power and virtue.

6. Alſo in the ſecond ſort of his works, I mean thoſe that come to paſs beſide the ordinary courſe of nature, there doth appear no leſs evident proof of his powers. For in governing his man ſociety he ſo ordereth his providence, that whereas he is by innumerable means good and bountiful to all men, yet by manifeſt and daily tokens he declareth his favourable kindneſs to the godly, and his ſeverity to the wicked and evil doers. For not doubtful are the puniſhments that he layeth upon hainous offences: like as he doth openly ſhew himſelf a defender and revenger of innocency, while he proſpereth the life of good men with his bleſſing, helpeth their neceſſity, aſſwageth and comforteth their ſorrows, relieveth their calamities, and by all means provideth for their ſafety. Neither ought it in the leaſt to deface the perpetual rule of his juſtice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and evil doers for a time to triumph with impunity, and on the other ſide ſuffereth good and innocent men to be toſſed with mans adverſities, yea and to be oppreſſed with the malice and unjuſt dealings of the ungodly. But rather a much contrary conſideration ought to enter into our minds: that when by manifeſt ſhew of his wrath he puniſheth one ſin, we ſhould therefore think that he hateth all ſins: and when he ſuffereth many ſins to paſs unpuniſhed, we ſhould thereupon think that there ſhall be another judgment to which they are deferred to be then puniſhed. Likewiſe what great matter of ſurprize is it to conſider the power of his mercy, in that he oft ceaſes not to ſhew his unwearied bountifulneſs upon miſerable ſinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tenderneſs, until he have ſubdued their frowardneſs with doing them good.

The goodneſs of God is ſhewed by delivering men that are in miſery, his ſtrength by overthrowing them that are mighty, his wiſdom by diſpoſing all things in fitteſt opportunity.

7. To this end, where the prophet particularly rehearſeth, how God in caſes paſt hope, doth ſuddenly and wonderfully and beſide all hope ſuccour men that are in miſery and in a manner loſt, whether he defend them wandering in wilderneſs from the wild beaſts, and at length leadeth them into the way again, or miniſtreth food to the needy and hungry, or delivereth priſoners out of horrible dungeons and iron bands, or bringeth men in peril of ſhipwreck ſafe into the haven, or healeth the half dead of diſeaſes, or ſcorcheth the earth with heat and dryneſs, or maketh it fruitful with ſecret watering of his grace, or advanceth the loweſt of the mean people, or throweth down the noble peers from the high degree of dignity: by ſuch examples ſhewed forth, he gathereth that thoſe things which are judged chances happening by fortune, are ſo many teſtimonies of the heavenly providence and ſpecially of his fatherly kindneſs, and that thereby is given matter of rejoicing to the godly, and the wicked and reprobate have their mouths ſtopped. But becauſe the greater part infected with their errors are blind in ſo clear a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare and ſingular wiſdom, wiſely to weigh theſe works of God: by ſight whereof they nothing profit that otherways ſeem moſt clear ſighted. And truly how much ſoever the glory of God doth apparently ſhine before them, yet ſcarcely the hundredth man is a true beholder of it. Likeways his power and wiſdom are no more hid in darkneſs: whereof the one, his power, doth notably appear, when the fierce outragiouſneſs of the wicked being in all mens opinion unconquerable, is beaten flat in one moment, their arrogancy tamed, their ſtrongeſt holds raiſed, their weapons and armour broken in pieces, their ſtrength ſubdued, their devices overthrown, and themſelves fall with their own weight, the preſumptuous boldneſs, that lifted itſelf above the heavens is thrown down even to the depths of the earth again, the lowly are lifted up out of the duſt, and the needy raiſed from the dunghill, Pſal. cxiii. 7. the oppreſſed and afflicted are drawn out of extreme diſtreſs, men in deſpaired ſtate are reſtored to good hope, the unarmed bear away the victory from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the ſtrong. As for his wiſdom, itſelf ſheweth itſelf manifeſtly excellent, while it diſpoſeth every thing in fitteſt opportunity, confoundeth the wiſdom of the world be it never ſo piercing, findeth out the ſubtle in their ſubtilty, 1 Cor. iii. 19. finally governeth all things by moſt convenient order.

The true knowlege of God conſiſteth not in the curious ſearching of his nature, but in the inward feeling of his power.

8. We ſee that it needeth no long elaborate proof, to fetch out teſtimonies, to ſerve for the glorious declaration and proof of God's majeſty: for by theſe few that we have touched, it appeareth, that which way ſoever a man chance to look, they are ſo common and ready that they may be eaſily marked with the eye, and pointed out with the finger. And here again is to be noted, that we are called to the knowlege of God, not ſuch as contented with vain ſpeculation, doth but fly about in the brain, but ſuch as ſhall be ſound and fruitful, if it be rightly conceived and take root in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof becauſe we feel within us, and do enjoy the benefits of them, it muſt needs be that we be inwardly moved much more lively with ſuch a knowlege, than if we ſhould imagine God to be ſuch an one, of whom we ſhould have no feeling. Whereby we underſtand that this is the righteſt way and fitteſt order to ſeek God, not to attempt to enter deeply with preſumptuous curioſity thoroughly to discuss his substance, which is rather to be reverently worshipped than scrupulously searched: but rather to behold him in his works, by which he maketh himself near and familiar, and doth in a manner communicate himself unto us. And this the Apostle meant, when he said, that God is not to to be sought afar off, forasmuch as he with his most present power dwelleth within every one of us, Acts xvii. 27. Wherefore David having before confessed his unspeakable greatness, when he descendeth to the particular rehearsal of his works, protesteth that the same will shew forth itself. Psal. cxlv. Therefore we ought to give ourselves to such a searching out of God, as may so hold our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithal thoroughly move us with effectual feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in another place, because we are not able to conceive him, it behoveth us as it were fainting under the burden of his greatness, to look unto his works, that we may be refreshed with his goodness.

The knowlege of those things which God worketh upon man, doth give us a taste of that which shall be more fully accomplished in the life to come, especially if we consider his effectual working in ourselves.

9. Then such a knowlege ought not only to stir us up to the worshipping of God, but also to awake us, and raise us to the hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulness, and of his severity, are but begun and not half full: without doubt we must think, that herein he doth but make a shew aforehand of those things, whereof the open disclosing and full deliverance is deferred unto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by the ungodly grieved with afflictions, troubled with injuries, oppressed with slanders, and vexed with despiteful dealings and reproaches: contrariwise that wicked doers do flourish, prosper and obtain quiet with honour, yea, and that unpunished: we must by and by gather that there shall be another life, wherein is laid up in store both due revenge for wickedness, and reward for righteousness. Moreover, when we observe that the faithful are often chastised with the rods of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much less the ungodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine, "If every sin should now be "punished with open pain, it would be thought "that nothing were reserved to the last judgment. "Again, if God should now openly punish no sin, "it would be believed, that there were no providence of God." De civit. dei, c. 8. Therefore we must confess, that in every particular work of God, but principally in the universal generality of them, the powers of God are set forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankind are provoked and allured to the knowlege of him, and from knowlege to full and perfect felicity. But whereas these his powers do in his works most brightly appear, yet what they principally tend unto, of what efficacy they be, and to what end we ought to weigh them: this we then only attain to understand when we descend into ourselves, and do consider by what means God doth shew forth in us his life, wisdom, and power, and doth use towards us his righteousness, goodness, and merciful kindness. For though David justly complaineth, that the unbelieving do dote in folly because they consider not the deep counsels of God in his government of mankind: Psal. xcii. 7. yet that is also most true, which he saith in another place, that the wonderful wisdom of God in that behalf exceedeth the hairs of our head; Psal. xl. 13. But because this point shall hereafter in place convenient be more largely handled, therefore I do at this time pass it over.

God manifesting himself, men profit not by it, because they behold things done without regarding the doer, or they ascribe that to fortune which he doth, or if they have some feeling of God, they deprave it with doting fancies, which fault is common unto all, even the sharpest witted.

10 But with how great brightness soever God doth in the mirror of his works shew by representation, both himself and his immortal kingdom: yet such is our gross stupidity, that we stand dully amazed at so plain testimonies, so that they pass away from us without profit. For, as touching the frame and most beautiful placing of the world, how many a one is there of us, that when he either lifteth up his eyes to heaven, or casteth them about on the divers countries of the earth, doth direct his mind to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest beholding the works without having regard of the workman? But as touching those things that daily happen beside the order of natural course, how many a one is there, that doth not more think that men are rather whirled about and rowled by blind unadvisedness of fortune, than governed by providence of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding and direction of these things, driven to the consideration of God, (as all men must needs be) yet so soon as we have without advisement conceived a feeling of some Deity, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous intentions of our flesh, and with our vanity we corrupt the pure verity of God. So herein indeed we differ one from another, that every man privately by himself procureth to himself some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, do part from the one true God, to monstrous trifles. To which disease not only common and gross wits are subject, but also the most excellent, and those that otherwise are indowed with singlar sharpness of understanding, are intangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of philosophers betrayed their own dulness and beastly ignorance in this behalf? For to pass over all the rest, which are much more unreasonably fooliſh, Plato himself, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainly erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the chief of them, whose part was to give light to the rest, do themselves so err and stumble? Likewise where God's governing of human affairs doth so plainly prove his providence, that it cannot be denied, yet this doth no more prevail with men, than if they believed that all things are tossed up and down with the rash will of fortune: so great is our inclination to vanity and error. I speak now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madness hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

Men when they trust to their own wits, become in their opinions concerning God, either vain, as the stoics, and the Egyptians, or irreligious as the Epicures or irresolute as Symonides.

11. Hence proceedeth that unmeasurable sink of errors, wherewith the whole world hath been filled and overfloweth. For each man's wit is to himself as a maze, so that it is no wonder that every different nation was diversly drawn into several devices, and not that only, but also that each several man had his several gods by himself. For since that rash presumption and wantonness was joined to ignorance and darkness, there hath been scarcely at any time, any one man found, who did not devise to himself an idol or fancy instead of God. Truly, even as out of a wide and large spring do issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while every man over licentiously straying, erroniously deviseth this or that concerning God himself. And yet I need not here make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath been intangled: because both in so doing I should never have end, and also though I speak not one word of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth how horrible is the blindness of man's mind. I pass over the rude and unlearned people. But among the philosophers, who enterprised with reason and learning to pierce into heaven, how shameful is the disagreement? With the higher knowlege that any of them was endowed and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly look upon, he shall find them to be but vanishing false colours. The stoics seemed in their own conceit to speak very wisely, that out of all the parts of nature may be gathered diverse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torn asunder. As though we were not already more than enough inclined to vanity, unless a manifold plenty of gods set before us, should further and more violently draw us into error. Also the Egyptians mystical science of divinity sheweth, that they all diligently endeavoured to this end, not to seem to err without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceive the simple and ignorant: but no mortal man ever invented any thing, whereby religion hath not been fouly corrupted. And this so confused diversity emboldened the Epicures and other gross despisers of godliness, by little and little to cast off all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of all to strive in contrary opinions, they sticked not out of their disagreements, and out of the fooliſh or apparently erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men do in vain and fondly procure torments to themselves while they search for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without punishment, because it was better briefly to deny utterly, that there is any God, than to feign uncertain gods, and so to raise up contentions that never should have an end. And too much fondly do they reason, or rather cast a mist, to hide their ungodliness by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing should be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all do confess, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and unlearned do so much disagree, thereupon is gathered that the wits of men are more than dull and blind in heavenly mysteries, that do so err in seeking out of God. Some other do praise that answer of Symonides who being demanded of king Hieron, what God was, desired to have a day's respite granted him to study upon it. And when the next day following, the king demanded the same question, he required two days respite, and so oftentimes doubling the number of days at length he answered: "How much the more I consider it, so

"much the harder the matter seemeth unto me." But granting that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so dark a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be only taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, and plainly concerning God, but only are tied to confused principles to worship an unknown God.

It cannot be true worshipping of God which is grounded only upon common reason, custom, or consent of men, being not taught by the law what God they ought to worship.

12. Now we must also hold that all they who corrupt the pure religion (as all they must needs do that are given to their own opinion) do depart from the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they mean, or what they persuade themselves, maketh no much to the matter, since the holy Ghost pronounceth, that all they are apostates, who according to the darkness of their own mind do thrust devils in the place of God. For this reason, Paul pronounceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they had learned by the gospel, what it was to worship the true God, Eph. ii. 12. And we must not think this to be spoken of one nation only, forasmuch as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vain in their imaginations, since that by the creation of the world the majesty of the Creator was disclosed unto them, Rom. i. 21. And therefore the scripture, to make place for the true and one only God, condemneth of falshood and lying, whatsoever godhead in old time was celebrated among the Gentiles, and leaveth no God at all, but in the mount Sion, where flourished the peculiar knowlege of God. Truly, among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Christ's time seemed to approach nighest to true godliness: and yet we hear it spoken by Christ's own mouth, that they knew not what they worshipped, John iv. 22. Whence it followeth, that they were deceived with vain error. Finally, although they were not all infected with gross faults or fell into open idolatry, yet was there no true and approved religion that was grounded only upon common reason. For although there were a few that were not so mad as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world know not the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. ii. 8. Now if the most excellent have wandered in darkness, what is to be said of the very dregs of the people? Wherefore it is no wonder if the holy Ghost do refuse, as not being genuine all forms of worship, which are merely of human invention. Because in heavenly mysteries opinion conceived by wit of men, although it do not always breed a heap of errors, yet it is always the mother of error. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no small fault, at adventure, to worship an unknown God, John iv. 22. of which fault, all they by Christ's own mouth are pronounced guilty, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best law-makers that ever were, proceeded no further than to say that religion was grounded upon common consent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherein he commanded that every man should worship gods after the manner of the country, and the custom of his own city. But how came mortal men by this power, of their own authority, to determine that, which far surmounteth the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of ancestors, or common ordinances of people, as to receive without doubting a God delivered by man's device? Every man rather will stand to his own judgment, than yield himself to the will of another. Since therefore it is too weak and feeble a bond of godliness, in worshipping of God to follow either a custom of a city or the consent of antiquity, it remaineth that God himself must testify of himself from heaven.

By the creatures of the world we cannot aspire to the true knowlege of God, except our hearts be also enlightened by him through faith.

13. In vain therefore so many lamps lightened do shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glory of the Creator, which do so every way display their beams upon us, that yet of themselves they cannot bring us into the right way. Indeed they raise up certain sparkles, but such as be choked up before that they can spread abroad any full brightness. Therefore the apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world images of things invisible, saith further, that by faith is perceived, that they were framed by the word of God, Heb. xi. 3. meaning thereby that the invisible Godhead is indeed represented by such shews, but that we have no eyes to see the same thoroughly, unless they be enlightened by the revelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed, Rom. i. 19. that which was to be known concerning God, doth not mean such a disclosing as may be perceived by the understanding of man how quick soever: but rather sheweth that the same proceedeth no further than to make them inexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he saith, that God is not to be sought afar of, as one that dwelleth within us, Acts xvii. 27: yet in another place teacheth to what end that nearness availeth, Acts xiv, 16. In the times past (saith he) God suffered the nations to walk in their own ways: nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling the hearts of men with food and gladness. Howsoever therefore the Lord be not without witness, while with his great and manifold goodness he sweetly alloreth men to the knowlege of himself: yet for all that, they cease not to follow their own ways, that is to say, their damnable errors.

Our ignorance nevertheless becauſe it cometh by our own fault is without excuſe.

14. But although we want natural power, whereby we cannot climb up unto the pure and clear knowlege of God, yet becauſe the fault of our dulneſs is in ourselves, therefore all colour of excuſe is cut off from us. For we cannot so pretend ignorance, but that even our conſcience doth ſtill condemn us of ſlothfulneſs and unthankfulneſs. It is a defence forſooth right worthy to be received, if man will allege that he wanted ears to hear the truth, for the publiſhing whereof the very dumb creatures have loud voices: if man ſhall ſay that he cannot ſee thoſe things with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes do ſhew him: if man ſhall lay for his excuſe the feebleneſs of his wit, where all creatures without reaſon do inſtruct him. Wherefore ſince all things do ſhew us the right way, we have no manner of excuſe to make for ourſelves, when we wander and ſtray out of the way. But howſoever, it is to be imputed to the fault of men, that they do by and by corrupt the ſeed of the knowlege of God ſown in their minds by marvelous workmanſhip of nature, ſo that it groweth not to good and clean fruit: yet it is moſt true, that we are not ſufficiently inſtructed by that bare and ſimple teſtimony, that the creatures do honourably declare of God's glory. For ſo ſoon as we have taken by the beholding of the world a ſmall taſte of the Godhead, we, leaving the true God, do inſtead of him raiſe up dreams and fancies of our own brain, and do convey hither and thither from the true fountain the praiſe of righteouſneſs, wiſdom, goodneſs and power. Moreover we do ſo either obſcure, or by ill eſteeming them, deprave his daily doings, that we take away both from them their glory, and from the author his due praiſe.

CHAP. VI.

That to attain to God the Creator, it is needful to have the ſcripture to be our guide and miſtreſs.

The true Creator and governor of the world cannot perfectly be known without the word, which mean God hath uſed from the beginning, to inſtruct his people by.

THEREFORE, although that ſame brightneſs, which both in heaven and earth ſhineth in the eyes of all men, doth ſufficiently take away all defence from the wickedneſs of men, even ſo as God to wrap all mankind in one guiltineſs, doth ſhew his divine majeſty to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it neceſſary that we have alſo another and a better help that may rightly direct us to the very creator of the world. Therefore not in vain he hath added the light of his word, that thereby he might be known to ſalvation. And this prerogative he hath vouchſafed to give us, whom it pleaſed him more nearly and more familiarly to draw together to himſelf. For becauſe he ſaw the minds of all men to be carried about with wandering and unſtedfaſt motion, after he had choſen the Jews to his peculiar flock, he compaſſed them in as it were with bars, that they ſhould not wander out in vanity as others did. And not without cauſe he holdeth us with the ſame mean in the true knowlege of himſelf. For otherwiſe even they ſhould quickly ſwerve away that ſeem to ſtand ſtedfaſt in compariſon of other. For as men who are old or ſand-blind, or whoſe eyes are dim ſighted, if you lay a fair book before them, though they perceive that there is ſomewhat written therein, yet can they not read two words together: but being helped with ſpectacles ſet between them and it, they begin to read diſtinctly: ſo the ſcripture gathering up together in our minds the knowlege of God, which otherwiſe is but confuſed, doth remove the miſt and plainly ſhew us the true God. This therefore is a ſingular gift, that to the inſtruction of his church God uſeth not only dumb teachers, but alſo openeth his own holy mouth: not only publiſheth that there is ſome God to be worſhipped, but alſo therewithal pronounceth that he himſelf is the ſame God whom we ought to worſhip: and doth not only teach the elect to look upon God, but alſo preſenteth himſelf unto them to be looked upon. This order hath he kept from the beginning towards his church, beſide theſe common inſtructions to give them alſo his word. Which is the righter and certainer mark to know know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noah, Abraham, and the reſt of the patriarchs by this help attained to that familiar knowlege, which made them to be peculiarly diſtinguiſhed from the unbelievers. I ſpeak not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened to the hope of eternal life. For, in order to have ſure hopes of paſſing from death to life, it was needful for them to know God not only as their creator, but alſo as their redeemer, both which they doubtleſs learned from God's word. For that kind of knowlege which taught them that it was God that made the world, and governs it, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowlege adjoined, which alone quickneth dead ſouls, by which God is known not only to be the maker of the world and the only author and judge of all things that are done, but alſo to be the redeemer in the perſon of the mediator. But becauſe I am not yet come to the fall of the world and the corruption of human nature, I will omit alſo to treat of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet ſpeak of the covenant whereby God hath adopted to himſelf the children of Abraham, and of that eſpecial part of doctrine whereby the faithful have always been peculiarly ſeparated from the heathen nations: becauſe that doctrine was founded upon Chriſt: but I ſpeak how we ought to learn by the ſcripture, that God who is the creator of the world, is by certain marks clearly diſtinguiſhed from the counterfeit multitude of falſe gods. And then the order itſelf ſhall conveniently bring us to the redeemer. But although we ſhall allege many teſtimonies out of the New Teſtament, and ſome alſo out of the law and the prophets, in which expreſs mention is made of Chriſt: yet they ſhall all tend to this end, to prove that in the ſcripture is diſcloſed unto us God the creator of the world, and in the ſcripture is ſet forth what we ought to think of him, to the end that we ſhould not ſeek about the buſh for an uncertain Godhead.

The patriarchs who knew God by the word, knew alſo the word to be from God, who hath publiſhed the ſame in writing, that all ages might be taught by it.

2. But whether God were known to the patriarchs by oracles and viſions, or whether by the means and miniſtration of men, he informed them of that which they ſhould from hand to hand deliver down to their poſterity: yet it is undoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engraven a ſtedfaſt certainty of doctrine, ſo as they might be perſuaded and underſtand that what they had learned came from God. For God always made undoubted aſſurance for credit of his word, which far exceeded all uncertain opinion. At length, that by continual proceeding of doctrine, the truth ſurviving in all ages might ſtill remain in the world, the ſame oracles which he had left with the patriarchs, his pleaſure was to have as it were enrolled in public tables. For this intent was the law publiſhed, to which afterwards were added the prophets, who were to be interpreters of it. For though there were divers uſes of the law, as hereafter ſhall better appear in place convenient: and ſpecially the principal purpoſe of Moſes and all the prophets was to teach the manner of reconciliation between God and men; for which cauſe alſo Paul calleth Chriſt the end of the law: Rom. x. 4. yet, as I ſay once again, beſide the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which ſheweth forth Chriſt the mediator, the ſcripture doth by certain marks and tokens paint out the only and true God, in that he hath created and doth govern the world, to the end he ſhould be clearly diſtinguiſhed from, and not reckoned in the falſe number of feigned gods. Therefore although it behoveth man earneſtly to bend his eyes to conſider the works of God, foraſmuch as he is ſet as it were in this glorious ſtage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bend his ears to the word, that he may better profit by it. And therefore it is no wonder that they who are born in darkneſs do more and more wax hard in their amazed dulneſs, becauſe very few of them do ſubmit them to be taught by the word of God, in order that by it they might keep within their bounds, but they rather rejoice in their own vanity. Thus then ought we to maintain, that to the end true religion may ſhine among us, we muſt take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine: and that no man can have any taſte be it never ſo little of true and ſound doctrine, unleſs he hath been ſcholar to the ſcripture. And from hence flows the original of true underſtanding, that we reverently embrace whatſoever it pleaſeth God from his word to teſtify of himſelf. For not only the perfect and in all points abſolute faith, but alſo all right knowlege of God ſpringeth from obedience. And truly in this behalf God of his ſingular providence hath provided for men in and for all ages.

On many accounts it was neceſſary the word of God ſhould be committed to writing, and that mankind ſhould

3. For if we conſider how ſlippery an inclination man's mind hath to ſlide into forgetfulneſs of God, how great a readineſs to fall into all kind of errors, how ſtrong deſire to invent frequently new and falſe religions, we may from hence diſcern discern how necessary it was to have a divine revelation committed to writing, so that it shall not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vain by error, or be corrupted by boldness of men. Since therefore it is manifest that God hath always made use of his word, as the mean of conveying solid and sufficient instruction to those whom he inclined to have taught because he foresaw that his image imprinted in the most beautiful form of the world was not sufficiently effectual: therefore it behoveth us to travel this straight way [of the scriptures] if we pant after, and desire to arrive at the true knowlege of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is well and lively set out by his works, when his works are weighed not after the perverseness of our own judgment, but according to the rule of the eternal truth. If we swerve from that word, as I said even now, although we run never so fast; yet we shall never attain to the mark, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must think, that the brightness of the face of God, which the apostle calleth such as cannot be attained unto, 1 Tim. vi. 16. is unto us like a maze, out of which we cannot unwrap ourselves, unless we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for us to halt in this way, than to run never so fast in another. And therefore David oftentimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: Psal. ix. and xcvi. xcvii. xcix. &c. meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himself a lawful government: because errors can never be rooted out of the hearts of men, till the knowlege of God be planted.

It is in vain to seek God by contemplation of his creatures without the study of his word.

4. Therefore the same prophet, after that he hath recited that the heavens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the works of his hands, that the orderly succeeding course of days and nights preacheth his majesty; then descendeth to make mention of his word. "The law "of the Lord (saith he) is undefiled, converting "souls: the witness of the Lord is faithful, giving "wisdom to little ones: the righteousnesses of the "Lord are upright, making hearts chearful; the "commandment of the Lord is bright, giving light "to the eyes." Psal. xix. For although he comprehendeth also the other uses of the law, yet in generality he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vain call unto him all nations by the beholding of the heaven and earth, therefore this is the peculiar school of the children of God. The same meaning hath the xxix Psalm, where the prophet having preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, winds, showers, whirlwinds and storms, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountains to tremble, and breaketh the cedar trees: in the end at last he goeth further and saith, that his praises are sung in the sanctuary, because the unbelievers are deaf and hear not all the voices of God that resound in the air. And in like manner in another psalm, after that he had described the terrible waves of the sea, he thus concludeth; "Thy testimonies are verified, "the beauty of thy temple is holiness for ever." Psal. xciii. 5. Hence it was that Christ said to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did worship they knew not what, and that only the Jews did worship the true God, John iv. 22. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feebleness thereof can by no means attain unto God, but being helped and lifted up by his holy word, it followed of necessity, that all men, except the Jews, did wander in vanity and error, because they sought God without his word.

CHAP. VII.

By what testimony the scripture ought to be established, that is by the witness of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remain certain. And that it is a wicked invention to say that the credit thereof doth depend on the judgment of the church.

The credit of the scripture doth not depend upon the church's receiving and authorising of it.

BUT before I go any further, it is needful to say somewhat of the authority of the scripture, not only to prepare mens minds to reverence it, but also to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set forth, there is no man of so desperate boldness, unless he be void of all common sense and natural part of man, that dare derogate from the credit of him that speaketh it. But because there are not daily oracles given from heaven, and the only scriptures

tures remain wherein it hath pleaſed him to preſerve his truth to perpetual memory, the ſame ſcripture by none other means is full of credit among the faithful, but in that they do believe that it is as really come down from heaven, as if they heard the lively voice of God to ſpeak therein. This matter indeed juſtly deſerves both to be largely treated of and diligently conſidered. But the readers ſhall pardon me if herein I rather regard what the proportion of the work which I have begun may bear, then what the largeneſs of the matter requireth. There is grown up among the moſt part of men a moſt pernicious error, that the ſcripture hath only ſo much authority as by common conſent of the church is given unto it: as if the eternal and inviolable truth of God did reſt upon the pleaſure of men. For ſo, to the great ſcorn of the holy Ghoſt, they aſk of us who can aſſure us that theſe ſcriptures came from God: or who can aſcertain us that they have continued unto our age ſafe and uncorrupted: who can perſuade us, that this one book ought to be reverently received, and that other to be ſtruck out of the number of ſcripture, unleſs the the church did appoint a certain rule of all theſe things? It depends therefore (ſay they) upon the determination of the church, both what reverence is due to the ſcripture, and what books are to be reckoned in the canon thereof. So theſe robbers of God's honour, while they ſeek under colour of the church to bring in an unbridled tyranny, care nothing with what abſurdities they ſnare both themſelves and others ſo that they may enforce this one thing to be believed among the ſimple, that the church can do all things. But if it be ſo: what ſhall become of the poor conſciences that ſeek ſtedfaſt aſſurance of eternal life, if all the promiſes that remain thereof ſtand and be ſtayed only upon the judgment of men? When they receive ſuch anſwer, ſhall they ceaſe to waver and tremble? Again, to what ſcorns of the ungodly is our faith made ſubject? into how great ſuſpicion with all men is it brought, if this be believed, that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the favour of men.

The church depending upon the ſcripture, doth not by her teſtimony give it credit, but becauſe it hath an evidence of certainty with it ſelf, doth therefore of duty acknowlege it to be the truth of God.

2. But ſuch bablers are well confuted even with one word of the apoſtle. He teſtifieth that the church is built upon the foundation of the prophets and apoſtles, Eph. ii. 20. If the doctrine of the prophets and apoſtles be the foundation of the church: then muſt it needs be, that the ſame doctrine ſtood in ſtedfaſt certainty, before that the church began to be. Neither can they well cavil, that although the church take her firſt beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtful what is to be ſaid of the writings of the prophets and apoſtles, unleſs the judgment of the church did declare it. For if the chriſtian church were at the beginning built upon the writings of the prophets and preaching of the apoſtles: whereſoever that doctrine ſhall be found, the allowed credit thereof was ſurely before the church, without which the church itſelf had never been. Therefore it is a vain forged device, that the church hath power to judge the ſcripture, ſo as the certainty of the ſcripture ſhould be thought to depend upon the will of the church. Wherefore, when the church doth receive the ſcripture and ſealeth it with her conſenting teſtimony, ſhe doth not of a thing doubtful, and that otherwiſe ſhould be in controverſy, make it authentic and of credit: but becauſe ſhe acknowlegeth it to be the truth of her God, according to her duty of godlineſs without delay ſhe doth honour it. Whereas they demand, How ſhall we be perſuaded that it came from God, unleſs we have recourſe to the decree of the church? This is all one as if a man ſhould aſk, How ſhall we learn to know light from darkneſs, white from black, or ſweet from ſowre? For the ſcripture ſheweth in itſelf no leſs apparant ſenſe of its truth, than white and black things do of their colour, or ſweet and ſowre things of taſte.

The authority of the church, as St. Auguſtine confeſſeth, is of force to win unbelievers to their firſt liking of the ſcripture, whereof, when once they do believe they ſee then a ſounder foundation whereupon they reſt their faith.

3. I know that they commonly allege the ſaying of Auguſtine, Contra epiſt. fundamentalem ca. 5. where he ſaith, that he would not believe the goſpel, ſave that the authority of the church moved him thereto. But how falſely and captiouſly it is alleged, for ſuch a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is eaſy to perceive. He had to do with the Manichees, who required to be believed without gainſaying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their ſide, but proved it not. And to make their Manicheus to be believed, they pretended the goſpel. Now Auguſtine aſketh them what they would do, if they did light upon a man that would not believe the goſpel itſelf, with what manner of perſuaſion they would draw him to their own opinion. Afterward he ſaith: I my ſelf would not believe the goſpel, &c. ſave that the authority of the church moved me thereto. Meaning that he himself, when he was a stranger from the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the gospel for the assured truth of God, but by this, that he was overcome with the authority of the church. And what marvel is it, if a man not yet knowing Christ, have regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded upon the authority of the church, nor meaneth that the certainty of the gospel doth depend upon it: but simply and only, that there should be no assuredness of the gospel to the infidels, whereby they might be won to Christ, unless the consent of the church did drive them unto it, Contra epist. fundamentalem ca. 4. And the same meaning a little before he doth plainly confirm in this saying. When I shall praise that which I believe, and scorn that which thou believest what thinkest thou meet for us to judge or do? but that we forsake such men as first call us to come and know certain truths, and after command us to believe things uncertain: and that we follow them that require us first to believe that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strong by believing, we may attain to understand the thing that we believe: not men now, but God himself inwardly strengthning and giving light to our mind. These are the very words of Augustine: from which every man may easily see that it was never this good man's intention to make the credit we give to the scriptures to depend on the authority and judgment of the church, &c. but only to shew this, (which we ourselves also do confess to be true) that they who are not yet enlightened by the Spirit of God, are brought, by the reverence of the church, unto a willingness to be taught, so as they can find in their hearts to learn the faith of Christ by the gospel: and that thus by this means the authority of the church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to believe the gospel. For, as we see, his mind is that the assurance of the godly be stayed upon a far other foundation. Otherwise I do not deny but that he often presseth the Manichees with the consent of the whole church, when he seeketh to prove the same scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproached Faustus for that he did not yield himself to the truth of the gospel so grounded, so established, so gloriously renowned, and from the very time of the apostles by certain successions perpetually commended, Contra Faustum lib. 32. But he never labours, to teach that the authority which we acknowlege to be in the scripture, depends upon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter that he disputed of, he produces the universal judgment of the church, wherein he had the advantage of his adversaries. If any desire a fuller proof of this matter, let him read his book concerning the advantage of Faith: where he shall find that there is no other readiness of belief commended unto us by him, than that which only giveth us an entry, and is unto us a convenient beginning to inquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest upon bare opinion, but to lean to the certain and sound truth, Aug. de utilitate cred.

4. We ought to maintain, as before I said, that the credit of this doctrine, is not established in us, until such time as we be undoubtedly persuaded that God is the author thereof. Therefore the principal proof of the scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The prophets and apostles boast not of their own penetration, or of any such things as procure credit to men that speak: neither stand they upon proofs by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, thereby to compel the whole world to obedience. Now we have to see how not only by probable opinion, but by apparant truth it is evident, that in this behalf the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we will provide well for consciences, that they be not continually carried about with unstedfast doubting, nor may waver, nor stay at every small stop, this manner of persuasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, judgments or the conjectures of men, even from the secret testimony of the holy Ghost. True indeed it is, that if we had a mind to work by way of arguments, many things might be alleged that may easily prove, if there be any God in heaven, that the law, the prophecies and the gospel came from him. Yea, although men learned and of deep judgment would stand up to the contrary, and would employ and shew forth the whole force of their wits in this disputation: yet if they be not so hardened as to become desperately shameless, they would be compelled to confess, that there are seen in the scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appear that the doctrine thereof is from heaven. And shortly hereafter we shall see, that all the

Although there be reason enough to prove the divine authority of the scripture against the cavils of prophane men: yet cannot it hereby find that credit in the hearts of men which the assurance of godliness doth require except it be inwardly sealed by the testimony of the holy Ghost, the same being the witness who was the author of it.

the books of the holy ſcripture do far excel all other writings whatſoever they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eyes and uncorrupted ſenſes, we ſhall forthwith find there the majeſty of God, which ſhall ſubdue all hardneſs of gainſaying, and enforce us to obey him. But yet they act properſterouſly who labour to eſtabliſh the perfect credit of the ſcripture And truly although I am not furniſhed with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the moſt ſubtle deſpiſers of God, that have a deſire to ſhew themſelves witty and pleaſant in weakning the authority of ſcripture, I truſt it ſhould not be hard for me to put to ſilence their bablings. And if it were worth while to ſpend labours in confuting their cavils, I perſuade myſelf I ſhould find it no difficult matter to put forever to ſilence the boaſting words which they mutter in corners. But though a man do deliver the ſound word of God from the reproaches of men, yet that ſufficeth not forthwith to faſten in their hearts that aſſuredneſs that godlineſs requireth. Prophane men becauſe they think religion ſtandeth only in opinion, to the end they would believe nothing fondly or lightly, do deſire and require to have it proved to them by reaſon, that Moſes and the prophets ſpake from God. But I anſwer, that the teſtimony of the holy Ghoſt is better than all reaſon. For as only God is a proper witneſs of himſelf in his own word, ſo ſhall the ſame word never find credit in the hearts of men, until it be ſealed up with the inward witneſs of the holy Ghoſt. It behoveth therefore of neceſſity that the ſame holy Ghoſt which ſpake by the mouth of the prophets, do enter into our hearts to perſuade us, that they faithfully uttered that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly ſet forth by Iſaiah in theſe words: "My ſpirit which is in thee, and the words that I "have put in thy mouth, and in the mouth of thy "ſeed, ſhall not fail forever, Iſa. ii. 16." It grieveth ſome good men, that they have not ready at hand ſome clear proof to allege, when the wicked do with impunity murmur againſt the word of God: as though the holy Ghoſt were not for this cauſe called both a ſeal and pledge, becauſe until he do enlighten mens minds, they do always, waver among many doubtings.

The ſcripture for its own ſake is worthy of credit, which notwithſtanding it doth not obtain in us, till our hearts be ſo enlightned that we therein perceive as it were the very breathing of the divine majeſty.

5. Let this therefore ſtand as an undoubted maxim, or truth, that they whom the holy Ghoſt hath inwardly taught, do wholly reſt upon the ſcripture, and that the ſame ſcripture is to be credited for its own ſake, and ought not to be made ſubject to demonſtration and reaſons: but yet the certainty which it getteth among us, it attaineth by the witneſs of the holy Ghoſt. For though by the only majeſty of itſelf it procureth reverence to be given to it: yet then only it thoroughly pierceth our affections, when it is ſealed in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt. So being enlightened by his powerful influence, we do then believe, not by our own judgment, or other mens, that the ſcripture is from God: but above all man's judgment we hold it moſt certainly determined, even as if we beheld the majeſty of God himſelf there preſent, that by the miniſtry of men it came to us from the very mouth of God. We ſeek not for arguments and probabilities to reſt our judgment upon: but as to a thing without all compaſs of conſideration, we ſubmit our judgment and underſtanding unto it. And that not in ſuch ſort as ſome are wont ſometimes haſtily to take hold of a thing unknown, which after being thoroughly perceived diſpleaſeth them: but becauſe we are in our conſciences well aſſured that we maintain an invincible truth. Neither in ſuch ſort, as ſilly men are wont to yield their mind in thraldom to ſuperſtitions, but becauſe we undoubtedly perceive therein the ſtrength and breathing of the divine majeſty, wherewith we are drawn and ſtirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more lively and effectually than man's will or underſtanding can attain. And therefore, for good cauſe doth God cry out by Iſaiah, that the prophets with the whole people do bear him witneſs, becauſe being taught by prophecies they did undoubtedly believe without guile or uncertainty that God himſelf had ſpoken, Iſa. xliii. 10. Such therefore is our perſuaſion, as requireth no reaſons: ſuch is our knowlege, as hath a right good reaſon to maintain it, even ſuch a one, wherein the mind more aſſuredly and ſtedfaſtly reſteth than upon any reaſons: ſuch is our feeling, as cannot proceed but by revelation from heaven. I ſpeak now of none other thing but that which every one of the faithful doth by experience find in himſelf, ſaving that my words do much want of a full declaration of it. I leave here many things unſpoken, becauſe there will be elſewhere again a proper place to treat of this matter. Only now let us know, that only that is the true faith which the ſpirit of God doth ſeal in our hearts. Yea, with this only reaſon will the ſober reader, and he who is willing to learn be contented. Iſaiah promiſeth, that all the children of the renewed church ſhall be the diſciples of God, Iſa. liv. 13. A ſingular privilege therein doth God condeſcended to grant to his elect only, whom he ſeparates from all the reſt of mankind. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready chearfulneſs to hear the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moſes as it is written: "Say not in thy heart, Who ſhall aſcend into heaven, "or who ſhall deſcend into the deep? the word is "even in thine own mouth, Deut. xxx. 12." If it be the pleaſure of God that this treaſure of underſtanding be laid up in ſtore for his children, it is no wonder nor unlikely, that in the common multitude of men is ſeen ſuch ignorance and dulneſs. The common multitude I call even the moſt excellent of them, until ſuch time as they be graffed into the body of the church. Moreover Iſaiah giving warning that the prophets doctrine ſhould ſeem incredible, not only to ſtrangers but alſo to the Jews that would be accounted of the houſhold of God, addeth this reaſon: Becauſe the arm of God ſhall not be revealed to all men, Iſa. liii. 1. So oft therefore as the ſmallneſs of the number of the believers doth trouble us, on the other ſide let us call to mind, that none can comprehend the myſteries of God but they to whom it is given.

CHAP. VIII.

That ſo far as man's reaſons may bear, there are ſufficient proofs to eſtabliſh the credit of ſcripture.

The ſcripture being once devoutly embraced, we are afterwards the more eſtabliſhed by conſidering the divine diſpoſition, majeſty and agreement which is in it, and the force which it hath in our minds thro' dignity of matter, not grace of words.

UNLESS we have this aſſurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any judgment of man, in vain ſhall the authority of ſcripture either be ſtrengthened with arguments, or ſtabliſhed with conſent of the church, or confirmed with any other means of defence. For unleſs this foundation be laid it ſtill remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other ſide when exempting it from the common ſtate of things, we have embraced it devoutly, and according to the worthineſs of it: then theſe things become very fit helps, which before were but of ſmall force to graff and faſten the aſſurance thereof in our minds. For it is marvelous, how great eſtabliſhment ariſes from hence, when with earneſt ſtudy we conſider how orderly and well framed a diſpoſition of the divine wiſdom appeareth therein, how heavenly a doctrine in every place of it, and nothing ſavouring of earthlineſs, how beautiful an agreement of all the parts among themſelves, and ſuch other things as avail to procure a majeſty to writings. But more perfectly are our hearts confirmed when we conſider, how we are even violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignity of matter, than with grace of words. For this alſo was not done without the ſingular providence of God, that the high myſteries of the heavenly kingdom ſhould for the moſt part be uttered under a contemptible baſeneſs of words, leaſt if it had been beautified with more glorious ſpeech, the wicked ſhould cavil that the only force of eloquence doth reign therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude ſimplicity doth raiſe up a greater reverence of itſelf than any rhetorician's eloquence, what may we judge, but that there is a more mighty ſtrength of truth in the holy ſcripture, than that it needeth any art of words? Not without cauſe therefore the apoſtle maketh his argument, to prove that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded upon the power of God, and not upon man's wiſdom, becauſe his preaching among them was ſet forth not with enticing words of man's wiſdom, but in plain evidence of the ſpirit with power, 1. Cor. ii. 4. For the truth is then ſet free from all doubting, when not upholden by foreign aids itſelf alone ſufficeth to ſuſtain itſelf. But that this power doth properly belong to the ſcriptures alone, appears from this, that of all the writings of men, however finely embelliſhed they may be, not one is capable of making our affections in the manner that the ſcriptures do. Read Demoſthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Ariſtotle, or any other of all that ſort: I grant they ſhould wonderfully allure, charm, move, and raviſh you. But if from them you deſcend to the reading of the holy ſcriptures, you ſhall find that theſe, whether you will or not, ſhall ſo pierce your heart, and your affections in ſo lively a manner, ſhall ſo ſettle within your bones, that in compariſon of the efficacy of this feeling, all that force of rhetoricians and philoſophers ſhall in a manner vaniſh away: ſo that it is eaſy to perceive that the ſcriptures, which do far excel all gifts and graces of man's induſtry, do indeed breathe out a certain divinity.

All divine writers are not rude, neither be all which

2. I grant indeed, that ſome of the prophets have an elegant, clear, yea, and a beautiful phraſe of ſpeech, ſo as their eloquence giveth are rude divine: but ſcripture, whether it ſpeak roughly or ſmoothly, ſtill it hath ſomthing above the excellency of human ſpeech.

eth not place to the prophane writers: and by ſuch examples it pleaſed the holy Ghoſt to ſhew that he wanted not eloquence, though in the reſt he uſed a rude and groſs ſtyle. But whether a man read David, Iſaiah, and ſuch like, who have a ſweet and pleaſant flowing ſpeech, or Amos, the herdman, Jeremiah and Zechariah, whoſe rougher talk ſavoureth of country rudeneſs: in every one of them ſhall appear that majeſty of the holy Ghoſt that I ſpeak of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfeiter of God, that with deceitful reſemblance he might the better creep into ſimple mens minds: ſo hath he craftily ſpread abroad with rude and in manner barbarous ſpeech thoſe wicked errors wherewith he deceived ſilly men, and hath oft-times uſed diſcontinued phraſes, that under ſuch viſor he might hide his deceits. But how vain and uncleanly is that curious counterfeiting, all men that have but mean underſtanding do plainly ſee. As for the holy ſcripture, although froward men labour to quarrel at many things, yet is it full of ſuch ſentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the prophets be looked upon, there ſhall not one be found among them, but he hath far excelled all man's capacity, in ſuch ſort that thoſe are to be thought, to have no judgment of taſte to whom their doctrine is unſavoury.

The ſcripture antienter than all other writings.

3. Other men have largely treated of this argument, wherefore at this time it ſufficeth to touch but a few things, that chiefly make for the principal ſum of the whole matter. Beſide theſe points that I have already touched, the very antiquity of the ſcripture is of great weight. For howſoever the Greek writers tell many fables of the Egyptian divinity: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is far inferior to the age of Moſes. And Moſes deviſeth not a new God, but ſetteth forth the ſame thing which the Iſraelites had received in long proceſs of time, conveyed to them by their fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the everlaſting God. For what doth he elſe but labour to call them back to the covenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing never heard of before, he had had no entry to begin. But it muſt needs be that the deliverance from bondage, wherein they were detained, was a thing well and commonly known among them, ſo that the hearing of the mention thereof did forthwith raiſe up all their minds. It is alſo likely that they were informed of the number of the four hundred years. Now it is to be conſidered, if Moſes who himſelf by ſo long diſtance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning ſo long before himſelf fetch the original deliverance of his doctrine: how much is the holy ſcripture then beyond all other writings in antiquity?

Moſes, in that he publiſheth things tending to the diſhonour of his own ſtock, ſheweth himſelf to have followed no ſuch humour as common writers amongſt men.

4. Unleſs perhaps ſome incline to believe the Egyptians, who date their original ſix thouſand years before the creation of the world. But ſince their vain babling hath been alway ſcorned even by all the prophane writers themſelves, there is no cauſe why I ſhould ſpend labour in confuting of it. But Joſephus againſt Appion, allegeth teſtimonies worthy to be remembred out of antient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by conſent of all nations the doctrine that is in the law hath been famous even from the firſt ages, although it were neither read nor truly known. Now, that neither there ſhould remain to the malicious any cauſe of ſuſpicion, nor to the wicked any occaſion to cavil, God hath for both theſe dangers provided good remedies. When Moſes rehearſeth what Jacob almoſt three hundred years before had by heavenly inſpiration pronounced upon his own poſterity, how doth he ſet forth his own tribe? yea, in the perſon of Levi he brands it with eternal infamy. "Simeon (ſaith he) and "Levi the inſtruments of wickedneſs. O my ſoul "come not thou into their counſel, nor my tongue in- "to their ſecret." Truly, he might have paſſed over that blot with ſilence, in ſo doing not only to pleaſe his father, but alſo not to brand himſelf and his whole family with part of the ſame ſhame. How can that writer be ſuſpected, which unconſtrainedly publiſhing by the oracle of the holy Ghoſt, that the principal anceſtor of the family whereof himſelf deſcended was an abominable tranſgreſſor, neither privately provided for his own honour, nor refuſed to undergo the diſpleaſure of all his own kinſmen, whom undoubtedly this matter grieved? When alſo he rehearſeth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his own brother, and Miriam his ſiſter: Num. xii. 1. ſhall we ſay that he ſpake after the meaning of the fleſh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandment of the holy Ghoſt? Moreover, ſince himſelf was higheſt in authority, why did he not leave at leaſt the office of the high prieſthood to his own ſons, but appointeth them to the baſeſt place? I touch here only a few things of many. But in the law itſelf a man ſhall every where meet with many arguments that are able to bring full proof to make men believe that Moſes without all queſtion cometh from heaven as an angel of God.

The authority of Moſes confirmed by miracles.

5. Now theſe ſo many and ſo notable miracles that he recounteth, are even as many eſtabliſhments of the law that he delivered, and the doctrine that he publiſhed. For, this that he was carried in a cloud up into the mountain: Exod. xxiv. 18. that there even to the fortieth day he continued without company of men: that in the very publiſhing of the law his face did ſhine as it were beſet with ſun beams: that lightenings flaſhed round about: that thunders and noiſes were heard every where in the air: that a trumpet ſounded being not blown with any mouth of man: that the entry of the tabernacle by a cloud ſet between, was kept from the ſight of the people: that his authority was ſo miraculouſly revenged with the horrible deſtruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and all that wicked faction: that the rock ſtruck with a rod did immediately pour forth a river: that at his prayer it rained manna from heaven: Exod. xxxiv. 29. xix. 16. and xl. 34. Num. xvi. 24. xx. 10. and xi. 9. Did not God herein commend him from heaven as an undoubted prophet? If any man object againſt me, that I take theſe things as confeſſed, which are not out of controverſy, it is eaſy to anſwer this objection. For ſeeing that Moſes in open aſſembly publiſhed all theſe things, what place was there to deſire before thoſe witneſſes that had themſelves ſeen the things done? It is likely forſooth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelity, ſtubbornneſs, unthankfulneſs, and other ſins, would have boaſted that his doctrine was eſtabliſhed in their own ſight with ſuch miracles, which indeed they never ſaw.

His miracles not done by magical arts and ſorceries.

6. For this alſo deſerves to be remarked, that as oft as he makes mention of any miracles, he therewithal joineth ſuch things as might ſtir the whole people to cry out againſt him, if there had been never ſo little occaſion. From whence it appeareth, that they were by no other means brought to agree unto him, but becauſe they were ever more than ſufficiently convinced by their own experience. But becauſe the matter was plainlier known, than that the prophane could deny that miracles were wrought by Moſes, the father of lies hath ſuggeſted to them another objection, ſaying, that they were wrought by magical arts and ſorcery. But what probable proof have they to accuſe him for a ſorcerer, who ſo much deteſted ſuch ſuperſtition, that he commandeth to ſtone him to death, that doth but aſk counſel of ſorcerers and ſoothſayers? Truly no ſuch deceiver uſeth his juggling caſts, but that he ſtudieth to amaze the people to get himſelf a fame. But what doth Moſes? by this that he crieth out, that himſelf and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth only execute thoſe things that God hath appointed, he doth ſufficiently wipe away all blots of thinking evil of him. Now if the things themſelves be conſidered, what enchantment could bring to paſs that manna daily raining from heaven, ſhould ſuffice to feed the people? And if any man kept in ſtore more than his juſt meaſure, by the very rotting thereof he ſhould be taught, that did puniſh his want of belief? Beſide that with many great proofs God ſuffered his ſervant to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing prevail with prating againſt him. For how oft did ſometimes the people proudly and impudently make inſurrections, ſometime divers of them conſpiring among themſelves went about to overthrow the holy ſervant of God: how could he have beguiled their rage with illuſions? And the event plainly ſheweth, that by this means his doctrine was eſtabliſhed ſo as to continue to the end of all ages.

Moſes by foretelling things which came to paſs long after his deceaſe, declareth that he ſpake by the inſpiration of God.

7. Moreover where he aſſigneth the chief government to the tribe of Judah in the perſon of the patriarch Jacob, Gen. xlix. who can deny that this was done by ſpirit of prophecy, ſpecially if we take into conſideration the thing itſelf, how in coming to paſs it proved true? Imagine Moſes to have been the firſt author of this prophecy: yet from the time that he did firſt put it in writing, there paſſed four hundred years wherein there was no mention of the ſceptre in the tribe of Judah. After Saul was conſecrated king, it ſeemed that the kingdom ſhould reſt in the tribe of Benjamin. 1 Sam. xi. 15. When David was anointed by Samuel, chap. xvi. what reaſon appeared there why the courſe of inheritance of the kingdom ſhould be changed? who would have expected that there ſhould have proceeded a king out of the mean houſe of a ſhepherd? And when there were in the ſame houſe ſeven brethren, who would have ſaid that the honour ſhould light upon the youngeſt? By what means came he to hope to be a king a king? who can say that this anointing was governed by any art, industry, or policy of man, and not rather that it was an accomplishment of the divine prediction? Likewise those things that Moses speaks of before, though darkly, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the covenant of God, seeing they came to pass almost two thousand years after, do they not make it plain, that he spake by the inspiration of God? I pass over his other predictions of things, which do so evidently savour of the revelation of God, that all men that have their sound wit may plainly perceive that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a clear looking glass wherein God evidently appeareth. Deut. xxxii.

The like proof appears in the writings of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and other prophets, to shew that they spake by divine inspiration.

8. But in the other prophets the same is yet also much more plainly seen. I will chuse out only a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Isaiah the kingdom of Judah was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Caldees were to them some prop and defence, then did Isaiah prophesy of the destruction of the city and of the exile of the people. But admit that, yet this was no token plain enough of the inspiration of God, to foretel, long before hand such things as at that time seemed false, and afterwards proved true: yet those prophecies that he uttereth concerning their deliverance, whence shall we say that they proceed but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Caldees should be subdued, and the people restored to liberty. There passed more than a hundred years from the time that Isaiah so propheſied before that Cyrus was born: for Cyrus was born in the hundred year or thereabouts after the death of Isaiah. No man could then guess that there should be any such Cyrus, that should have war with the Babylonians, that should subject so mighty a monarchy under his dominion, and put an end to the exile of the people of Israel. Doth not this bare prediction whithout any ornament of words evidently shew, that the things that Isaiah speaketh, are the undoubted oracles of God, and not the conjectures of men? Again when Jeremiah a little before that the people were carried away, did determine the end of the captivity within threescore and ten years, and promised return and liberty, Jer. xxv. 11, 12. must it not needs be that his tongue was governed by the Spirit of God? What a bare-faced thing shall it be to deny, that the credit of the prophets was established by such proofs, and that the same thing was fulfilled in deed, which they themselves do report to make their sayings to be believed? "Behold, the former things are come to "pass, and new things do I declare: before they "come forth, I tell you of them, Isa. xlii. 9." I omit to speak how Jeremiah and Ezekiel being so far asunder, yet propheſying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endited the words for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing propheſies of things to come for the space of six hundred years after, in such sort as if he had compiled an history of things already done and commonly known? These things if godly men have well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to put to silence the ill-natured objections of the wicked. For the plain proof hereof is too clear to be subject to any disputes at all.

They are absurd men who ask how do we know that any book was written by Moses and who make it a question, whether ever there were any such person as Moses.

9. I know what some learned men do prat in corners, to shew the quickness of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they ask who hath assured us that these things that are read under title of their names, were ever written by Moses and the prophets? Yea, they are so bold as to move this question, whether ever there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether ever there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero, who would not say, that such madness were worthy to be corrected with strokes and stripes? The law of Moses hath been marvelously preserved, rather by heavenly providence than by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the priests it lay buried a little while: yet since the time that the godly king Josias found it, it hath still by continual succession from age to age been used in the hands of men. Neither did Josias bring it forth as an unknown or new thing, but such a thing as had been ever commonly published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The original book itself was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copy written out thereof, to remain with the keepers of the king's records. Only this had happened, that the priests had ceased to publish the law according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselves had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in manner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had David in their hands, knew they not of Moſes? But to ſpeak of them all at once, it is moſt certain that their writings came to poſterity no otherwiſe but from hand to hand (as I may term it) by continual orderly courſe of years delivered from their fathers, which had partly heard them ſpeak, and partly while the remembrance was freſh of it, did learn of them which heard them that had ſo ſpoken.

The miraculous preſervation of the law, a token of the divine excellency thereof

10. As for that which they object out of the hiſtory of the Maccabees, to leſſen the credit of the ſcripture, it is ſuch a thing as nothing can be deviſed more fit to ſtabliſh the ſame. But firſt let us wipe away the colour that they lay upon it, and then let us turn upon themſelves the engine that they raiſe up againſt us. When Antiochus (ſay they) commanded all the books to be burned, whence are come theſe copies that we now have? On the other ſide I aſk them, in what ſhop they could ſo ſoon be made? It is evident, that after the cruelty appeaſed they were immediately abroad again, and were without controverſy known to be the ſame of all godly men, that having been brought up in the doctrine of them, did familiarly know them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conſpired together did inſolently triumph with reproaches upon the Jews, yet never was there any that durſt lay to their charge falſe changing of their books. For whatſoever they think the Jews religion to be, yet ſtill they think, Moſes to be the author of it. What then do theſe praters elſe, but bewray their own more than brutiſh frowardneſs, while they falſely ſay, that theſe books are changed, and new ones put in their places, whoſe ſacred antiquity is approved by conſent of all hiſtories? But to ſpend no more labour vainly in confuting ſuch fooliſh cavillations: let us rather hereby conſider how great a care God had for the preſervation of his word, when beyond the hope of all men he ſaved it from the outrage of the moſt cruel tyrant, as out of a preſent fire: that he endowed the godly prieſts and others with ſo great conſtancy, that they ſticked not to redeem this book even with loſs of their life if need were, and ſo to convey it over to poſterity: that he diſappointed the narrow ſearch of ſo many governors and ſouldiers. Who can but acknowlege the remarkable and miraculous work of God, that theſe ſacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to have been utterly deſtroyed, by and by came abroad again as fully reſtored, and that with a great deal more honour? For immediately followed the tranſlating of them into Greek, to publiſh them throughout the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous working, that God preſerved the tables of his covenant from the bloody proclamations of Antiochus: but alſo that amongſt ſo manifold miſerable afflictions of the Jews, wherewith the whole nation was ſometime worn to a few and waſted, and laſt of all, brought in manner to utter deſtruction, yet they remained ſtill ſafe and extant. The Hebrew tongue, ſay not only unesteemed, but almoſt unknown. And ſurely had it not been God's pleaſure to have his religion provided for, it had periſhed altogether. For how much the Jews, that lived after the return from Babylon, had departed from the natural uſe of their mother tongue, appeareth by the prophets that lived in that age, which is therefore worthy to be noted, becauſe by this compariſon the antiquity of the law and the prophets is the more plainly perceived. And by whom hath God preſerved for us the doctrine of ſalvation contained in the law and the prophets, to the end that Chriſt might in his appointed time be openly ſhewed? even by the moſt cruelly bent enemies of Chriſt, the Jews whom St. Auguſtine doth therefore worthily call the keepers of the library of the Chriſtian church, becauſe they have miniſtred unto us that thing, to read whereof, themſelves have no uſe.

The myſteries which the three Evangeliſts deliver in ſimple language, the thundering majeſty of John, the rude education of the apoſtles before they became teachers, Paul's cruelty againſt chriſtians before he taught chriſtianity, delivereth the doctrine of the New Teſtament from the contempt of prophane men.

11. Now if we come to the New Teſtament, with how firm pillars is the truth thereof upheld! The three Evangeliſts write the hiſtory in plain and ſimple language. Many proud men do loath that ſimplicity, becauſe they take no heed to the chief points of doctrine therein, whereby it were eaſy to gather, that they treat of heavenly myſteries above man's capacity. Surely whoſoever hath but the ſmalleſt degree of modeſty will be aſhamed if they read the firſt chapter of Luke. Now, the ſermons of Chriſt, the ſum of which is ſhortly compriſed by theſe three Evangeliſts, do eaſily deliver their writing from all contempt. But John thundering from on high, thoſe whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth down their ſtubbornneſs more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come forth all theſe ſnarling critics, that have a great pleaſure to ſhake the reverence of ſcripture out of their own and other men's hearts, let them read John's Goſpel, whether they will or no, they ſhall there find a thouſand ſentences that may at leaſt awaken waken their ſluggiſhneſs, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their own conſciences to reſtrain their laughing. The ſame is to be thought of Peter and Paul, in whoſe writings although the more part be blind, yet the very heavenly majeſty in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were faſt tyed unto it. But this one thing doth ſufficiently advance their doctrine above the world, that Matthew being before wholly given to the gain of his money board, Peter and John brought up in their fiſher boats, all plain illiterate men, had learned nothing in mens ſchool that they might deliver to other. Paul, not only from a profeſſed, but alſo from a cruel and bloody enemy converted to a new man, with ſudden and unhoped change doth ſhew, that being compelled by heavenly authority, he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought againſt. Now let theſe dogs deny, that the holy Ghoſt, came down upon the apoſtles, or let them diſcredit the hiſtory: yet ſtill the truth it ſelf openly crieth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghoſt, which being before time deſpiſed men among the common people, ſuddenly began ſo glorioufly to treat of heavenly myſteries.

No ſmall eſtimation ariſes to the ſcripture, if the general and continual agreement of men in yielding conſent and credit unto it be conſidered.

12. Furthermore there are likewiſe many very good reaſons, why the conſent of the church ſhould not be eſteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no ſmall matter, that ſince the ſcripture was firſt publiſhed, the wills of ſo many ages have conſtantly agreed to obey it. And that howſoever Satan with all the world hath laboured by marvelous means either to oppreſs it, or overthrow it, or utterly to blot and deface it out of mens remembrance, yet ever ſtill, like a palm tree, it hath riſen up above, and remained invincible. For there hath not lightly been in old time any ſophiſter or rhetorician that had any more excellent wit than other, but he hath bent his force againſt the ſcripture: yet they all have nothing prevailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed itſelf to deſtroy it, and yet all their enterpriſes are vaniſhed away, as in ſmoke. How could it have reſiſted being ſo mightily on each ſide aſſailed, if it had none other defence but man's? Yea, rather it is hereby proved, that it came from God himſelf, that all the labours of men ſtriving againſt it, yet it hath of its own power ſtill riſen up. Beſide that not one city alone, nor one nation only hath agreed to receive and embrace it: but ſo far as the world extendeth in length and breadth, the ſcripture hath attained her credit, by one holy conſent of divers nations, which in other things were in nothing agreeable one with another. And foraſmuch as ſuch agreement of minds, ſo divers and diſagreeing in manner in all things elſe, ought much to move us, becauſe it appeareth, that the ſame is brought about none other way, but by working of the heavenly majeſty: no ſmall eſtimation groweth unto it, when we behold their godlineſs, that do ſo agree, I mean not of them all, but only of thoſe, with whom as with lights it pleaſed God to have his church to ſhine.

The dignity of ſcripture not a little aſſeertained by the conſtant ſufferings of ſo many that have ſealed it with their blood.

13. Now with what aſſuredneſs of mind ought we to ſubmit ourſelves to that doctrine which we ſee eſtabliſhed and witneſſed with the blood of ſo many holy men? They, when they had but once received it, ſticked not boldly, without fear, yea, and with great chearfulneſs to die for it: how ſhould it then come to paſs, that we having it conveyed to us with ſuch an aſſured pledge, ſhould not with certain and unmoveable perſuaſion take hold of it? It is therefore no ſmall confirmation of the ſcripture, that it hath been ſealed with the blood of ſo many witneſſes, eſpecially when we conſider, that they ſuffered death to bear witneſs of their faith: and not of their frantic diſtemperance of brain, as ſometime the erroneous ſpirits are wont to do, but with a firm and conſtant, and yet ſober zeal of God? There be other reaſons and thoſe not few nor weak, whereby the ſcripture hath her dignity and majeſty, not only aſcertained unto godly hearts, but alſo honourably defended againſt the ſubtilties of cavillers, yet be they ſuch as be not of themſelves ſufficiently available to bring ſtedfaſt credit unto it, until the heavenly Father, diſcloſing therein his majeſty, doth bring the reverence thereof out of all controverſy. Wherefore then only the ſcripture ſhall ſuffice to that knowlege of God that bringeth ſalvation, when the certainty thereof ſhall be grounded upon the inward perſuaſion of the holy Ghoſt. So thoſe teſtimonies of men that ſerve to confirm it ſhall not be vain, if as ſecond helps of our weakneſs they follow that chief and higheſt teſtimony. But they act fondly that will have it perſuaded by proof to the unfaithful, that the ſcripture is the word of God, which cannot be known but by faith. For good reaſon therefore doth Auguſtine give warning, that godlineſs and peace of mind ought to go before to make a man underſtand ſome what of ſo great matters. De utilitate credendi.

CHAP. IX.

That those fantastical men, who, forsaking scripture resort unto revelation, do overthrow all the principles of godliness.

The spirit of Christ is given not to guide men without the scripture, but according to the scripture.

NOW they who forsaking the scripture do imagine I know not what way to attain unto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with error, as to be carried with rage. For there have arisen of late certain giddy brained men, who most presumptuously pretending a school of the spirit, both themselves do forsake all reading, and also do scorn their simplicity, which still follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I would fain know of these men, what spirit that is, by whose inspiration they are carried up so high, that they dare despise the doctrine of the scriptures as childish and base. For if they answer that it is the spirit of Christ, then such carelessness is worthy to be laughed at. For I think they will grant, that the apostles of Christ and other faithful men in the primitive church were enlightened with none other spirit. But none of them did learn of that spirit to despise the word of God: but rather every one was moved more to reverence it, as their writings do most plainly witness. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Isaiah. For where he saith: "My "spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I "have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of "thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed for-"ever: Isa. lix. 21." He doth not bind the old people to the outward doctrine, as though they were set to learn to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true and perfect felicity of the new church under the reign of Christ, that it shall no less be led by the voice of God than by the spirit of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewd men with wicked sacrilege do sever asunder those things that the prophet hath joined with an inviolable knot. Moreover, Paul being rapt up into the third heaven, yet ceased not to go forward in the doctrine of the law and the prophets, even so as he exhorteth Timothy, a doctor of singular excellency, to apply reading, 1 Tim. iv. 13. And worthy is that commendation to be remembred, wherewith he setteth forth the scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprove, that the servants of God may be made perfect, 2 Tim. iii. 16. How devilish a madness is it to feign, that the use of scripture is but transitory, and lasteth but for a while: which indeed guideth the children of God even to the last end? Again, I would have them answer me this: whether they have tasted of another spirit than that which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madness, yet I think they are not carried with such giddiness, that they dare so boast, But what manner of spirit did he speak of in his promise? even that spirit which should not speak of itself, but should minister and inspire into their minds those things which the Lord himself had taught by his word, John xvi. 13. It is not therefore the office of the spirit which is promised us, to feign new and unheard-of revelations, or to coin a new kind of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the received doctrine of the gospel, but to seal to our minds the self same doctrine that is commended unto us by the gospel.

By the scripture the spirit is tried whether it be of God or no, neither is it dishonourable for the spirit so to be tried.

2. Whereby we plainly understand, that we ought very studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the scripture, if we would take any use and fruit of the spirit of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedful to the doctrine of the prophets, which yet might seem to have given place after the rising of the light of the gospel. On the other side, if any spirit leaving the wisdom of the word of God, doth impose upon us another doctrine, that the same spi- ought rightfully to be suspected of vanity and lying. For what? when Satan transformeth himself into an angel of light, what credit shall the holy Ghost have among us, if it be not distinctly known by some assured mark? And truly it hath been plainly pointed out unto us by the word of the Lord, but that these miserable men do willingly covet to err to their own destruction, while they seek a spirit rather from themselves than from him. But (say they) it is dishonourable, that the spirit of God, whom all things ought to obey, should be subject to the scripture. As if this were a dishonour to the holy Ghost to be every where equal and like to itself, to agree with itself in all things, and no where to vary. Indeed if it were to be tried by the rule either of men or angels, or any other rule whatsoever, ever, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if ye liſt ſo to term it, into bondage. But when it is compared with itſelf, when it is conſidered in itſelf, who can therefore ſay, that there is any wrong done unto it? But thus it is brought to trial. I grant, but ſuch a trial wherewith it was his own pleaſure to have his majeſty eſtabliſhed. It ought to content us ſo ſoon as he entereth into us. But leaſt under his name the ſpirit of Satan ſhould creep in, he will have us to know him by that image of himſelf, which he hath printed in the ſcriptures: he is the author of them, he cannot be various and unlike himſelf. Therefore it muſt needs be, that he continually remain ſuch as he hath ſhewed himſelf therein. This is no diſhonour unto him, unleſs perhaps we count it honourable to ſwerve and go out of kind from himſelf.

As the ſcripture is a dead letter when we read it, having not the life of the ſpirit, ſo the ſpirit is a dangerous guide if we follow it, leaving the conduct of the ſcripture; they muſt go hand in hand, each aſſuring & warranting other.

3. Whereas they cavil that we reſt upon the letter that ſlayeth, herein they ſuffer puniſhment for deſpiſing of the ſcripture. For it is plain enough that Paul there contendeth againſt the falſe apoſtles, who, commending the law without Chriſt, did call away the people from the benefit of the New Teſtament, wherein the Lord doth covenant, that he will put his law in the inward part of believers, and write it in their hearts. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killeth the readers of it when it is ſeparated from the grace of Chriſt, and not touching the heart, only ſoundeth in the ears. But if it be effectually printed in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt, if it preſent Chriſt unto us; then it is the word of life, converting ſouls, giving wiſdom to little ones, &c. Alſo in the ſame place the apoſtle calleth his preaching, the miniſtry of the holy Ghoſt, 2 Cor. iii. 8. meaning that the holy Ghoſt doth ſo ſtick faſt in his truth which he hath expreſſed in the ſcriptures, that then only he putteth forth and diſplayeth his force, when the ſcripture hath her due reverence and dignity. And it diſagreeth not herewith which I before ſaid, that the word itſelf is not much aſſured unto us, unleſs it be confirmed by the witneſs of the holy Ghoſt. For with a certain mutual knot the Lord hath coupled together the aſſurance of his word and of his ſpirit, ſo that perfect reverence to the word doth then ſettle in our minds when the holy Ghoſt ſhineth upon us to make us therein behold the face of God: and on the other ſide, without all fear of being deceived we do embrace the holy Ghoſt, when we recognize him in his own image, that is, in his word. Thus it is undoubtedly: God brought not abroad his word among men for ſudden ſhew, meaning at the coming of his ſpirit by and by to take it away again, but he after ſent the ſame ſpirit with whoſe power he had diſtributed his word, to make an end of his work with effectual confirmation of his word. In this manner Chriſt opened the minds of the two diſciples, not that they ſhould caſt away the ſcriptures and grow wiſe of themſelves, but that they ſhould underſtand the ſcriptures, Luke xxiv. 27. Likewiſe Paul when he exhorteth the Theſſalonians not to quench the ſpirit, 1 Theſſ. v. 19. doth not carry them up on high to vain ſpeculations without the word, but by and by ſaith further, that prophecies are not to be deſpiſed: whereby without doubt is meant, that the light of the ſpirit is quenched ſo ſoon as prophecies come to be deſpiſed. What ſay theſe proudly ſwelling men, raviſhed with the ſpirit to theſe things which reckon this only to be an excellent illumination, when careleſsly forſaking and bidding farewel to the word of God, they both boldly and raſhly do take hold of all that they have conceived in their ſleep? Truly, a far other ſobriety becometh the children of God: who, as they ſee that without the ſpirit of God they are void of all light of truth, ſo do they know that the word is the inſtrument wherewith the Lord diſtributeth to the faithful the light of his ſpirit. For they know none other ſpirit but that which dwelt and ſpake in the apoſtles, by whoſe oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the word.

CHAP. X.

That the ſcripture, to correct all ſuperſtition, doth in compariſon ſet the true God againſt all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

The ſame power, providence, mercy, and juſtice which ſhineth in the creation of the world, is alſo

BUT, becauſe we have ſhewed, that the knowlege of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is ſomewhat plainly ſet forth, is yet more familiarly and plainly declared in the word: now, it is worth while to consider, whether the Lord shew himself such in the scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his works. But I shall at this time be contented only to point unto it, whereby the godly minds being admonished, may know what is chiefly to be searched in the scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certain mark in their seeking. I do not yet touch the peculiar covenant, whereby God separated the stock of Abraham from other nations. For even then he appeared the redeemer, in receiving for his children by free adoption those that before were enemies. But we are yet about that knowlege that resteth in the creation of the world, and ascendeth not to Christ the mediator. And although by and by it shall be good to allege certain places out of the New Testament, forasmuch as even out of it both the power of God the creator, and his providence in preserving of the first nature is approved, yet I warn the readers before, what is now my purpose to do, to the end that they pass not the appointed bounds. So for this present, let it suffice us to learn, how God the maker of heaven and earth doth govern the world by him created. Every where is proclaimed both his fatherly bounty, and inclined will to do good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his severity, which shew him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doers, specially where his patience nothing prevaileth with the obstinate.

Moses, David and Jeremiah, teach the same which heaven & earth do teach concerning God, namely, his power, goodness, mercy, holiness, justice, judgment, and truth, and they teach to the same end, that we might yield him obedience, & put confidence in him.

2. In certain places are set forth more plain descriptions, wherein his natural face is as in an image represented to be seen. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawful for men to understand of God. "The Lord (saith he) "the Lord, a merciful God, and "gracious, patient, and of much "mercy, and true, who keepeth "mercy unto thousands, which "takest away iniquity and wicked doings, before whom the "innocent shall not be innocent, "which rendrest the wickedness "of the fathers to the children "and children's children. Exod. "xxxiv. 6." Where let us mark, that his eternity and being of himself, is expressed in the twice repeating of that honourable name and that then his excellencies are rehearsed, in which is described unto us, not what he is in respect to himself, but what a one he is toward us: that this knowlege of him may rather stand in a lively feeling, than in an empty and supernatural speculation. And here we do hear recited those attributes of his which we observed are manifest in the heaven and earth, that is to say, clemency, bounty, mercy, justice, judgment and truth. For might and power are contained under this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the prophets set him forth when they mean fully to describe his holy name. But because I would nor heap up too many examples together at this present let one Psalm suffice us, wherein the sum of all his excellencies is so exactly reckoned up to us, that nothing can seem to be omitted. Psal. clxv. 3. And yet there is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceive God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himself in his word. In Jeremiah, where he pronounceth, what a one he would have us know him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet coming all to one effect. "He that glorieth (saith "he) let him glory in this, that he knoweth me to "be the Lord that exerciseth mercy, justice, and "judgment in the earth. Jer. v. 2." Surely, these three things are very necessary for us to know: mercy, in which alone consisteth all our salvation: judgment, which is daily executed upon evil doers, and more grievous is prepared for them to eternal destruction: justice, whereby the faithful are preserved and most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceived, the prophecy saith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou mayest glory in God. And yet here are not omitted either his truth or his power, or his holiness or goodness. For how should the knowlege stand sure which is here required of his justice, mercy and judgment, unless it did rest upon his unmoveable truth? And how should we believe that he doth govern the earth with justice and judgment, but by understanding his power? And whence cometh his mercy but of his goodness? If then all his ways be mercy, judgment and justice, in them must holiness also needs be seen. And to no other end is directed that knowlege of God that is set forth unto us in the scriptures, than is that knowlege also which appeareth imprinted in his creatures; that is to say, first it moveth us to the fear of God, and then to place our confidence in him, to the end we may learn first to honour him with perfect innocency of life and unfeigned obedience, and then to rely wholly upon his goodness.

3. But here I mean to gather a sum of general doctrine doctrine. And firſt let the readers obſerve, that the ſcripture to the end to direct us to the true God, doth expreſsly exclude, and caſt away all the gods of the Gentiles, becauſe commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath been corrupted. True it is indeed that the name of one God was every where known and celebrated. For even they that worſhipped a great number of gods, ſo oft as they did ſpeak according to the proper ſenſe of nature, they ſimply uſed the ſingular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone, And this was wiſely marked by Juſtine the martyr, which for this purpoſe made a book of the monarchy of God, where by many teſtimonies he ſheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engraven in the hearts of all men. The ſame thing alſo doth Tertullian prove by the common phraſe of ſpeech. But foraſmuch as all without exception are by their own vanity either drawn or fallen to falſe forged devices, and ſo their ſenſes are become vain, therefore all that ever they naturally underſtood of the being but one God, availed no further, but to make them inexcuſable. For even the wiſeſt of them do plainly ſhew the wandering error of their mind, when they wiſh ſome god to aſſiſt them, and ſo in their prayers they call upon uncertain gods. Moreover in this that they imagined God to have many natures. although they thought ſomewhat leſs abſurdly than the common people did of Jupiter, Mercury, Venus, Minerva and others, yet were they not free from the deceits of Satan, as we have already ſaid elſewhere, whatſoever ways of eſcape the philoſophers have ſubtilly invented, they cannot purge themſelves of rebellion, but that they all have corrupted the truth of God. For this reaſon Habakkuk, after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to ſeek God in his own temple, that the faithful ſhould not admit him to be any other than ſuch as he had diſcloſed himſelf by his word. Hab. ii.

CHAP. XI.

That it is unlawful to attribute unto God a viſible form, and that generally they forſake God, ſo many as do erect to themſelves any images.

The ſcripture is of no one thing more careful than leſt men corrupt the glory of God, firſt by conceiving, and then by expreſſing him under any ſhape or ſimilitude.

BUT as the ſcripture providing for the rude and groſs wit of man, uſeth to ſpeak after the common manner: ſo when it meaneth to make diſtinctly known the true God from the falſe gods, it chiefly compareth him with idols: not that it doth allow theſe inventions that are more ſubtilly and finely taught by the philoſophers, but the plainlier to diſcloſe the fooliſhneſs of the world, yea, rather their madneſs in ſeeking God ſo long as they cleave every one to their own imaginations. Therefore that excluſive definition which we commonly hear, bringeth to nought all that manner of Godhead, that men frame to themſelves by their own opinion, becauſe God himſelf is the only proper witneſs of himſelf. In the mean time, ſince this brutiſh groſſneſs hath poſſeſſed the whole world, to covet viſible ſhapes of God, and ſo to forge themſelves gods of timber, ſtone, gold, ſilver, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to hold this principle, that with wicked falſhood the glory of God is corrupted, ſo oft as any ſhape is feigned to repreſent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glory of his Deity to himſelf alone, meaning to teach us what manner of worſhipping him he alloweth or refuſeth, addeth immediately: "Thou ſhalt "make thee no graven image, nor any ſimilitude, "Exod. xx. 4." in which words he reſtraineth our liberty, that we attempt not to repreſent him with any viſible image. And then he ſhortly reckoneth up all the forms wherewith of long time before, ſuperſtition had begun to turn his truth into lying. For we know that the Perſians worſhipped the ſun, yea, and ſo many ſtars as the fooliſh nations ſaw in the ſky, ſo many gods they feigned them. And ſcarce was their any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiſer than the reſt, becauſe they worſhipped God in the ſhape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another leſs meet to be uſed, but without any exception, he rejecteth all images, pictures and other ſigns, whereby the ſuperſtitious thought to have God near unto them.

Not only Moſes, Iſaiah and Paul,

2. This is eaſy to be gathered by the reaſons which he joineth to the prohibition. Firſt with Moſes:

but also blind idolaters themselves have taught that the majesty of God is defiled when he is represented in any bodily shape.

Moses: "Remember that the Lord "hath spoken to thee in the vale "of Horeb. Thou heardest a "voice, but thou sawest no body. "Therefore take heed to thy self, "least peradventure thou be de-"ceived and make to thy self "any likeness, Deut. iv. 10, 12, "15. &c." We see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfeit shapes, that we may know that they forsake God whosoever do covet to have visible forms of him. Of the prophets, only Isaiah shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the majesty of God is defiled with uncomely and foolish counterfeiting, when he being without body, is likened to bodily matter: being invisible, to a visible image: being a Spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lump of timber, stone, or gold, Isa. xl. 18. chap. xli. 7. xlv. 9. and xlvi. 5. In like manner reasoneth Paul: Forasmuch as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by art and man's device, Acts xvii. 29. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoever images are erected, or pictures painted to express the shape of God, they simply displease him as certain dishonours of his majesty. And what marvel is it if the holy Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heaven, since he compelleth the very wretched and blind idolaters themselves to confess this in earth? It is known how Seneca complained as may be seen in Augustine. "They dedicate (saith he) the holy "immortal and inviolable gods in most vile and base "stuff, and put upon them the shapes of men and "beasts, and some of them with kind of man and "woman mingled together, and with sundry shapen "bodies, and such they call gods, which if they should "receive breath and meet them, would be reckoned "monsters, Lib 6. De civ. Dei. cap. 10." Whereby again plainly appeareth, that it is a fond cavillation, wherewith the defenders of images seek to escape, which say that the Jews were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only, which God bringeth forth of his eternal being and the continual order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Jews but to the Athenians when he confuted their error in counterfeiting a shape of God.

Although God hath used to declare the presence of his godhead by corporal signs, yet even therein he hath still given some mark to shew that hereupon we should not presume to erect unto ourselves a representation of that Deity which we cannot comprehend. The Jews having such rudiments is no argument why we should have them because they had much less worship them, which they did not.

3. God indeed, I grant, sometimes in certain signs hath given a presence of his Godhead, so as he was said to be seen face to face, but all these signs ever he shewed, did aptly serve for means to teach, and withal did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloud and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glory, yet did they as it were bridle and restrain the minds of men, that they should not attempt to pass any further. Wherefore, not Moses himself, to whom God disclosed himself most familiarly in comparison of others, obtained by prayer to see that face, but received this answer, that man is not able to sustain so great brightness. The holy Ghost appeared under the likeness of a dove, but since he immediately vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithful are put in mind, that they ought to believe him to be an invisible spirit, that holding them contented with his virtue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This that God appeared sometimes in form of a man, was a foretelling of the revelation that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawful for the Jews to abuse this pretence to erect to themselves a representation of the Godhead in the shape of a man. Also the mercy seat wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made, as it might teach that the best beholding of the Godhead is this, when mens minds are carried beyond themselves with admiration of it. For the cherubins with their wings streched abroad did cover it, the veil did hid it, and the place itself being set far inward, did of itself sufficiently keep it secret. Therefore it is manifest that they are very mad, who go about to defend the images of God and of saints, with the example of these cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shew that images are not fit to represent the mysteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpose, that hiding the mercy seat with their wings, they should not only keep back the eyes of men, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash boldness. For this end it was, that the prophets described the Seraphins shewed them in a vision, with their face covered, Isa. vi 2.: whereby they signify, that so great is the brightness of the glory of God, that the angels themselves are are kept from direct beholding it, and the ſmall ſparks thereof that ſhine in the angels are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet ſo many as rightly judge, do acknowlege that the cherubins of whom we now ſpeak, pertained only to the old manner of introduction, as it were of children, uſed in the law. So to allege them now for an example to our age, is an abſurdity. For that childiſh age, as I may ſo term it, is paſſed, for the which ſuch rudiments were appointed. And it is a great ſhame that the pagan writers are better expounders of the law of God than the Papiſts are. Juvenal reproacheth the Jews, as it were in ſcorn, that they honour the white clouds and the Deity of heaven. I grant he ſpeaketh perverſely and wickedly: and yet he ſpeaketh more truly in ſaying that they have among them no image of God, than the Papiſts do who prate that they had a viſible image of God. And whereas that people with a certain firey zeal, brake out oftentimes to ſeek them idols, even as waters out of a great freſh ſpring boil out with violent force: hereby rather let us learn how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatry, leſt throwing upon the Jews the blame of that fault which is common to all, we ſleep a deadly ſleep under vain allurements to ſin.

The matter whereof idols are made, their makers, their meaſure, doth make them ſeem worſe than mad, who allow the graving or painting, or honouring of ſuch things as the figures of God.

4. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth this ſaying: "The idols of the "Gentiles are gold and ſilver, "even the works of men's hands, "Pſal. cxv. 4. and cxxxv. 15." Becauſe the prophet doth conclude from the matter itſelf, that they are no gods that have a golden or ſilver image: and he taketh it for confeſſed truth that it is a fooliſh feigned invention whatſoever we conceive of our own ſenſe concerning God. He nameth rather gold and ſilver, than clay or ſtone, that the beauty or the price ſhould not ſerve to bring a reverence to idols. But he concludeth generally, that nothing is leſs allowable, than gods to be made of dead matter. And in the mean while he ſtandeth as much upon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a raſhneſs, who themſelves bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vaniſh away at every moment, yet dare give the honour of God to idols. Man muſt needs confeſs that himſelf is but a creature of a day's continuance, and yet he will have a piece of metal to be counted God, to which himſelf gave the beginning to be a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the will of men? Very juſtly doth the heathen Poet give them this taunt:

I was ſometime a fig tree log,
a block that ſerv'd for nought:
The workman doubted what of me were fitteſt to be wrought;
A form to ſit upon, or elſe
a Priap god to be.
At length he thought the better was a god to make of me.

Forſooth an earthly ſilly man that breatheth out his own life in a manner every moment, by his workmanſhip ſhall convey the name and honour of God to a dead ſtock. But foraſmuch as Epicurus in ſcoffing jeſting hath cared for no religion, let us leave the taunts of him and ſuch as he, and let the rebuking of the prophet prick us, or rather thruſt us through where he ſaith, that they are too much beaſtly witted, that with the ſelf ſame piece of wood do make a fire and warm themſelves, do heat the oven to bake bread, do roaſt or ſeeth fleſh, and do make them a god before which they fall down humbly to pray, Iſa. lxiv. 15. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuſe them by the law, but alſo doth reproach them that have not learned of the foundation of the earth: for that there is nothing leſs convenient than to bring God to the meaſure of five foot, who is above all meaſure and incomprehenſible. And yet this ſame monſtrous thing which is quite contrary to the order of nature, cuſtom ſheweth to be natural to men. We muſt moreover bear in mind, that ſuperſtitions are in ſcripture commonly rebuked in this phraſe of ſpeech, That they are the works of mens hand which want the authority of God: that this may be certain, that all theſe modes of worſhip that men do deviſe of themſelves are deteſtable. The prophet in the Pſalm doth amplify the madneſs of them that therefore are indowed with underſtanding, that they ſhould know that all things are moved with the only power of God, and yet they pray for help to things dead and ſenſeleſs. But becauſe the corruption of nature carrieth as well all nations, as each man privately to ſo great madneſs at laſt the holy Ghoſt thundereth with terrible curſes againſt them, ſaying: "Let them that make them "become like to them, and ſo many as truſt in them, Iſa. xl. 19. chap. ii. 8. xxxi 7. and lvii. 10. Hoſ. xiv. 3. Mica. 5. 14. Pſal cxv. 8. And it is to be noted that a ſimilitude is no leſs forbidden than a graven image, whereby the fond ſubtilty of the Greeks is confuted. For they think they are well diſcharged if they grave not a god, while in painting

ing they do more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not only to be made by the graver, but also to be counterfeited by any other workman, because such counterfeiting is evil and to the dishonour of his majesty.

They who seek the knowlege of God in such books, learn nothing but errors and lies by them.

5. I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens books. Gregory so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth far otherwise, in whose school if Gregory had been taught, he would never so have spoken. For whereas Jeremiah plainly saith, that the stock is a doctrine of vanity: Jer. x. 8. And whereas Habakkuk teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lies: surely hereof is a general doctrine to be gathered, that it is vain and lying whatsoever men learn by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say, that the prophets reprove them only who abused images to wicked superstition. I grant that to be true: but I add further, that which is easy for all men to see, that they condemn that thing wholly which the Papists take for an assured principle, that images are instead of books. For they do in comparison set images against God, as things directly contrary, and such as never can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I have alleged. Since there is but one true God whom the Jews did worship, it is amiss and falsely done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceived that thereby seek for the knowlege of God. Finally, if it were not true that it is a deceitful and corrupt knowlege of God that is learned by images, the prophet would not so generally condemn it. At least this much I win of them, when we shew that it is vanity and lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehearse word for word that which the prophets have taught.

By Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, the Elibertine council, and Varro himself, the counterfeiting of God by imagery, condemned as a thing which diminsheth his fear and bringeth his glory into contempt.

6. Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius have written of this matter, who scruple not to take it for certain that they were all mortal, of whom images are to be seen. Likewise Augustine: who without doubting pronounceth that it is unlawful not only to worship images, but also to set up images to God. And yet saith he no other thing but the same which many years before was decreed by the Elibertine council whereof this is the xxxvi. chapter. It is ordained that no pictures be had in the church, that the thing which is honoured and worshipped be not painted on the walls. But most notably is that which in another place Augustine allegeth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his own assent, that they who first brought in the images of gods, both took away the fear of God, and brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peradventure it should be but of small authority. Yet ought it of right to make us ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darkness came to this light, to see corporeal images are therefore unmeet for the majesty of God, because they diminish the fear of God, and encrease error in men. The proof it self witnesseth that this was no less truly than wisely spoken. But Augustine having borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it forth as of his own mind. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, encreased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the fear of God is therefore diminished or rather taken away thereby, because his majesty may easily in the foolishness, and in the fond and absurd forgeing of images grow to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by proof find to be so true. Whosoever therefore will desire to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learn than of images, what is meet to be known concerning God.

If the images which Papists propose as books of holiness, were not patterns of impurity as they are, yet are they no fit means to instruct the people of God, before whom Christ should rather be painted by teaching, than taught by painting.

7. Wherefore if the Papists have any shame, let them no more use this shift to say that images are lay mens books, which by many testimonies of scripture are so openly confuted. And altho' I grant them so much, yet should they not get much thereby for defence of their idols what monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well known. The pictures and images that they dedicate to saints what are they but examples of extreme riot and uncleanness, whereunto if any would fashion himself he were worthy to be beaten with staves? surely, the brothelhouses, can shew harlots more chastely and soberly attired, than their temples shew images of these whom they would have called virgins. Even as uncomely array give they to the martyrs. Let them therefore fashion their idols at least to some some honest shew of shamfacedness that they may some what more modestly, and with greater colour of pretence ly in saying that they are the books of some holiness. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithful people in holy places, whom God would have there instructed with far other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: whereunto they shew themselves to have a mind not very heedful, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papists call lay and unlearned men whose unskilfulness may bear to be taught only by images? Forsooth even those whom the Lord acknowlegeth for his disciples, to whom he vouchsafeth to revail the heavenly wisdom, whom he willeth to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdom. I grant indeed as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many who cannot be without such books. But whence I pray you groweth that dulness, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was meet to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause, that they who had the cure of churches gave over their office of teaching to idols, but because themselves were dumb. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the gospel, painted out in a manner crucified before our eyes. To what purpose then were it to have commonly set up in churches so many crosses of wood, stone, silver and gold, if this were well and faithfully beaten into the peoples heads, that Christ died to bear our curse upon the cross, to cleanse our sins with the sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his blood, and finally to reconcile us to God the Father? Of which one thing they might learn more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the covetous do set their minds and eyes faster upon the golden and silver crosses, than upon any words of God.

Imagery is ancient & springeth from the ancient root of infidelity, men not believing or not considering God to be present, unless they have some visible sign for advertisement of his presence.

8. As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is written in the book of wisdom that they were the first authors of them, who gave this honour to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I grant that this evil custom was very ancient, and I deny not that it was the firebrand wherewith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry, did more and more burn therein. Yet do I not grant that this was the first original of this mischief. For it appeareth by Moses that images were used before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, whereof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in use. When he telleth that Rachel had stoln her father's idols, he mentions it as a common fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continual worship of idols. After the general flood, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many years but that men according to their own lust feigned them gods. and it is likely that the holy patriarch yet living, his childrens children were given to idolatry, so that to his bitter grief he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but lately purged with so horrible judgment. For Thare and Nachor even before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false gods, as Joshuah testifieth, Josh. xxiv. 2. Seeing the generation of Shem so soon swerved what shall we judge of the posterity of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of man, as it is full of pride and rash boldness, presumeth to imagine God according to its own conceit: and as it is possessed with dulness, yea, overwhelmed with gross ignorance, so it conceiveth vanity and a fond fansy instead of God. And in these evils is added a new mischief, that man attempteth to express in workmanship such a God as he inwardly conceiveth. Thus the mind begetteth the idol, and the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites proveth that this was the beginning of idolatry, that men do not believe that God is among them, unless he shew himself carnally present. We know not (said they) what is become of this Moses: make us gods that may go before us. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not believe that he was nigh unto them, unless they did see with their eyes a corporal representation of his face to be a witness unto them of the God that governed them. Their mind was therefore to know by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is always unquiet till it hath gotten some counterfeit device like itself, wherein it may vainly delight as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages since the creation of the world, men, to obey this blind desire, have erected signs wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnal eyes.

9. After such invention forged, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought

sent God, men were brought first to think that his presence was restricted unto those images, then to imagine that there was some divine thing in them, and at length flatly to worship them.

that they beheld God in images they did also worship him in, them. At length being both with minds and eyes altogether fastned, thereon, they began to wax more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and have them in admiration, as if there were some divine nature in them. So that it appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were persuaded in some gross opinion; not to think the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certain power of the divinity abide in them. Therefore whether you represent to yourself either God or a creature in the image, when you fall down to worship, you are already bewitched with some superstiton. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not only images to be erected that are made to express a likeness of him, but also any titles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandment of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soon as they have forged a visible form for God, they also restrict the power of God unto it. So beastly foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfeit him, and therefore must they needs worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idol, or God in the idol. This is always idolatry, when honours due to God are given to an idol, under what colour soever it be. And because God will not be worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is given to idols is taken from him. Let them take heed to this who seek for pretences to defend the abominable idolatry, with which these many ages past, true religion hath been drowned and overthrown. But (say they) the images are not taken for gods. Neither were the Jews themselves so unadvised as to forget that it was God by whose hands they had been brought out of Egypt before they made the calf. Yea when Aaron said, that those were the gods by whom they were delivered out of the land of Egypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plain token of their meaning, that they would still keep that God that was their deliverer, so that they might see him go before them in the calf. Neither is it to be believed that the heathen were so stupid as to believe, that God was no other thing but stocks and stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but still they kept the same gods in their mind: and there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images form to themselves many gods. Besides tho' they did daily consecrate new images, yet did they not think that they made new gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine saith were pretended by the idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common people answered; that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deity who resided in it in an invisible manner. And they that were of somewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worship the image, nor the spirit in it, but by the corporeal image they did behold the sign of that thing which they ought to worship? How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Jews, or of the Gentiles were no otherwise minded than as I have said: being not contented with a spiritual understanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure and nearer imprinted in them. When once such disordered counterfeiting of God pleased them well, they never ended, till daily more and more deluded with new deceits, they imagined that God did shew forth his power in images. And nevertheless, both the Jews were persuaded that under such images they did worship the one true Lord of heaven and earth: and likewise the Gentiles, their false gods, whom yet they feigned to dwell in heaven.

The same fault in Papists which was in idolatrous Jews and Gentiles.

10. Whosoever deny that it hath thus been done in time past, yea within our own remembrance, they impudently lie. For, why fall they down before them? And when they pray, why turn they towards them as to the ears of God? For it is true that Augustine saith, that no man prayeth or worshippeth when he so beholdeth an image, but he is so affected in mind, that he thinketh himself to be heard by it, or that it will do for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference between the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reverence or none done to it, they honour another solemnly? Why do they weary themselves with vowed pilgrimages to visit those images whereof they have the like at home? Why do they at this day in defence of them as it were for their religion and country, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort as they would better suffer to have the one only God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I do not reckon up the gross errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and do in a manner possess the hearts of all men. I do only shew what themselves do confess when they mean most moſt of all to excuſe themſelves of idoatry. We do not call them (ſay they) our gods. No more did the Jews nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time paſt: and yet the prophets each where ceaſe not to caſt in their teeth their fornication with ſtocks and ſtones, for doing no more but ſuch things as are daily done by them that would be counted Chriſtians, that is to ſay, that they carnally worſhipped God in ſtocks and ſtones.

The difference that they put between themſelves and idolaters, is but a ſhift. They are not acquitted from the ſame ſin becauſe they give it another name.

11. Although I am not ignorant, nor think good to paſs it over, as if I knew it not, how they ſeek to eſcape with a more ſubtle diſtinction, whereof I ſhall again make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretend that the worſhip which they give to images, is idolodulia, which is ſervice of images, and not idololatria, which is worſhip of images. For ſo they term it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God, give unto images and pictures that worſhip which they call doulia, or ſervice. And ſo they think themſelves without blame, if they be but the ſervants and not alſo the worſhippers of idols: as though it were not a little lighter matter to worſhip than to ſerve. And yet while they ſeek a hole to hide them in the Greek word, they childiſhly diſagree with themſelves. For ſeeing latrevein in Greek ſignifieth nothing but to worſhip, their ſaying cometh but to this effect, as if they would ſay, that they worſhip indeed their images, but without any worſhipping. And there is no cauſe why they ſhould ſay that I ſeek to catch them in words: but they themſelves, while they ſeek to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the ſimple, do diſcover their own ignorance. And yet though they be never ſo eloquent, they ſhall not attain by their eloquence to prove unto us that one ſelf ſame thing is two ſundry things. Let them (I ſay) ſhew me a difference in the thing itſelf whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot eſcape guiltineſs of his fault, by giving his ſin a new deviſed name: ſo it is abſurd to the laſt degree to imagine that theſe men are acquit by new device of a name, if in the matter itſelf they nothing differ from thoſe idolaters, whom they themſelves are compelled to condemn. But ſo far are they from proving that their caſe differeth from the caſe of thoſe idolaters, that rather the fountain of all this whole miſchief is an unorderly countfeiting, wherein they have ſtrived with them, while both with their own wit they deviſe, and with their own hands they frame them ſignifying forms to expreſs them a faſhion of God.

Images, whether they be of ſtories, or only of bodies may be both made and uſed, ſo that they be not made to repreſent God, nor otherwiſe abuſed when they are made.

12. And yet am I not ſo ſuperſtitious that I think no images may be allowed at all. But foraſmuch as carving and painting are the gifts of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully uſed. Leſt theſe things which God hath given us for his glory and for our own benefit be not only defiled by diſordered abuſe, but alſo turned to our own deſtruction. We think it unlawful to have God faſhioned out in viſible form, becauſe himſelf hath forbidden it, and becauſe it cannot be done without ſome defacement of his glory. And leſt they think that it is only we that are of this opinion they who have been converſant in their works ſhall find that all ſound writers did always reprove the ſame thing. If then it be not lawful to make any bodily image of God, much leſs ſhall it be lawful to worſhip it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawful that only thoſe things be painted and graven whereof our eyes are capable: but that the majeſty of God which is far above the ſenſe of our eyes, be not abuſed with uncomely deviſed ſhapes. Of this ſort are partly hiſtories and things done, partly images and faſhions of bodies, without expreſſing of any things done by them. The firſt of theſe have ſome uſe in teaching or admoniſhing a man: but what profit the ſecond can bring ſave only delectation, I ſee not. And yet it is evident, that even ſuch were almoſt all the images that heretofore have ſtood up in churches. Whereby we may judge that they were there ſet up not by diſcreet judgment or choice, but by fooliſh and unadviſed deſire. I ſpeak not how much amiſs and uncomely they were for the moſt part faſhioned, nor how licentiouſly painters and carvers have in this point ſhewed their wantonneſs, which thing I have already touched. Only I ſpeak to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet do they nothing avail to teach.

Images dangerous and unfit to be in churches.

13. But leaving alſo that difference, let us by the way conſider whether it be expedient in chriſtian temples to have any images at all that do expreſs either things done or the bodies of men. Firſt, if the authority of the ancient church do any thing move us, let us remember that for about five hundred years together, while religion yet better flouriſhed, and ſincere doctrine was in force, the christian churches were universally without images. So they were then first brought in for the decoration of churches, when the sincerity of ministration was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them that were the first authors thereof. But if a man compare age with age, he shall see that they were greatly degenerated from that uprightness of them that were without images. What? do we think that these holy fathers would have suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they judged profitable and good for them? But rather because they saw little or no profit in it, and much danger to lurk underneath it, they did rather of purpose and advisedly reject it, than by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in express words testify: "When "they be set in such places (saith he) honourably "on high, to be seen of them that pray and do "sacrifice, although they want both sense and life, "yet with the very likeness that they have of lively "members and senses, they so move the weak minds "that they seem to live and breathe, &c. Epist. 49." And in another place: For that shape of members doth work and in manner enforce thus much, that the mind living within a body doth think that body to have, sense which he seeth like unto his own. And a little after: Images do more avail to bow down an unhapy soul, by this that they have mouth, eyes, ears, and feet, than to amend it by this that they neither speak, nor see, nor hear, nor go. This truly seemeth to be the cause why John willed us to beware not only of worshipping of images, but also of images themselves, 1 John v. 21. And we have found it too much in experience, that thro' the horrible madness which hath heretofore possessed the world to the destruction in a manner of all godliness, so soon as images be set up in churches, there is as it were a sign set up of idolatry, because the folly of men cannot refrain itself, but it must forthwith run on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much danger flowing from that: yet when I consider for what use temples are ordained, methinks it is very ill beseeming the holiness thereof to receive any other images than these lively and natural images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrate. I mean baptism and the Lord's supper and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to be occupied and more lively to be moved, than that they should need any other images framed by the wit of men. Lo this is the incomparable advantage of images, which can by no value be recompenced, if we believe the Papists.

The frivolous argument of Papists whereby it was disputed in the Nicene synod that images were to be had in churches.

14. I think I had spoken enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene synod doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speak more. I mean not that most famous synod which Constantine the great assembled, but that which was holden eight hundred years ago, by the commandment and authority of Irene the empress. For that synod decreed, that images should not only be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoever I should say, the authority of the synod would make a great prejudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much move me, as to make it appear to the readers how far their rage extended, that were more desirous of images than became Christians. But first let us dispatch this. They who at this day maintain the use of images, allege the decree of that Nicene synod for their defence. But there is extant a book of confutation bearing the name of Charles the Great which by the phrase we may gather to have been written at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the bishops that were present at that council, and the arguments wherewith they contended. John the Legate of the East parts said: God created man after his own image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to have images. The same man thought that images were commended unto us in this sentence: "Shew me thy face because it is "beautiful." Another to prove that images ought to be set upon altars, cited this testimony: "No man "lighteth a candle and putteth it under a bushel." Another, to shew that the beholding of them is profitable for us, brought forth a verse out of the Psalms: The light of thy countenance is sealed upon us. Another took this similitude: as the patriarch used the sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men have the images of saints instead of the images "of the Gentiles." To the same purpose have they wrested this saying: "Lord I have loved the beauty of thy house. but especially witty is the exposition of this place: "As we have heard so have we seen," that God is not known by only hearing of his word, but also by looking upon images. Like is the sharp divice of bishop Theodore. Marvelous (saith he) is God in his saints. And in another place: In the saints that are in the earth: therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally, so filthy are their unsavoury follies that it grieveth me to rehearse them.

15. When

Their arguments brought for proof that they might be worshipped.

15. When they talk of the worshipping: then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharaoh, and of the rod of Joseph, and of the pillar that Jacob set up. Although in this last example, they do not only deprave the meaning of the scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seem to them marvelous strong and meet proofs. Worship his footstool. Again, worship on his holy hill. Again, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scorn put the personage of a riding fool upon the patrons of images, could he gather together greater and grosser follies? But to put all out of doubt, Theodosius bishop of Mira, doth so earnestly confirm by the dreams of this Arch-deacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heaven to shew for it. Now let the favourers of images go and press us with the decree of that synod. As though these reverend fathers do not altogether discredit themselves, in either so childish handling, or so ungodly and foully tearing the scriptures.

Honour, and the same honour given by that synod unto images which is due unto God himself.

16. Now come I to these monstrous impieties which it is strange they ever durst utter, and still more surprizing that they were not cried out against with detestation of all men. And it is good that this outragiously wicked madness be discovered, that at least the false colour of antiquity may be taken away, which the Papists pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the bishop of Amorum pronounceth an anathema or curse against all those who will not have images worshipped. Another imputeth all the calamities of Greece and the Eastern parts to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the prophets the apostles and martyrs worthy to suffer in whose time there were no images? They add further. If the Emperor's image be met with perfume and incense, much more is this honour due to the images of saints. Constantius bishop of Constance in Cyprus, professeth that he reverently imbraceth images, and affirmeth that he will give to them the same honourable manner of worship that is due to the Trinity that giveth life. And whosoever refuseth so to do, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And, and that ye should not think that this was the private sentence of one man, they did all assent unto it. Yea, John the Legate of the Eastern parts being further transported with heat, said it were better to bring all brothel-houses into the city, than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all heretics are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemn farewel, this clause was added, let them be glad and rejoice that having the image of Christ do offer sacrifice unto it. Where is now the distinction of latria and dulia, worship and service, wherewith they are wont to seek to blind the eyes both of God and men? For the council without any exception doth give even as much unto images as unto the living God himself.

CHAP. XII.

That God is severally discerned from idols, that he may be only and wholly worshipped.

True religion cleaveth to one set frame of worshipping one God, and him alone. Superstition though it make that one God the chiefest, doth nevertheless divide his honour amongst many. Lib. 2. de nat. deorum.

WE said in the beginning, that the knowledge of God consists not in bare speculation, but includes in it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched how he is rightly worshipped, which point shall be in other places more largely set forth. Now I do but shortly repeat, that so oft as the scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striveth not for the bare name of God, but withal commandeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the Godhead, be not given to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doth differ from superstition, eusebeia, in Greek signifieth as much as true worship, because always even the blind themselves gropping in darkness, have found that this rule ought to be holden, that God be not unorderly worshipped. The name of religion, although Cicero truly and well deriveth from relegere, to record, or gather up together: yet is the reason that he assigneth forced and far fetched, that good worshippers did often record and diligently weigh what was the truth. I rather think that that name is set as a contrary to wandering liberty, because the greater part of the world unadvisedly taketh hold of that which they first meet withal, and fleeth about hither and thither:

but true godlineſs, to the end it may ſtand in ſtedfaſt ſtate, relegit, that is to ſay, doth gather up itſelf together within her bonds. Like as I think ſuperſtition to have her name hereof, that not being contented with the manner and order perſcribed, ſhe heapeth up together a ſuperfluous number of vain things. But to leave the words, it hath always been agreed by the conſent of all ages, that religion is with falſe errors corrupted and perverted. Whereupon we gather, that it is a very fond colour which the ſuperſtitious do pretend, when with undiſcreet zeal they give themſelves leave to do all things. And although this confeſſion found in the mouths of all men; yet herein a ſhameful ignorance bewrayeth itſelf, that neither they cleave to the one God, nor have any regard of order in the worſhipping of him, as we have already ſhewed. But God, to claim his own right unto himſelf, crieth out that he is jealous, and that he will be a ſevere revenger if he be mingled with any falſe gods. And then he ſetteth forth the lawful manner of worſhipping, to hold mankind in obedience. He containeth both theſe points in his law, when firſt he bindeth the faithful unto himſelf, that he only may be their law-maker: and then he preſcribeth a rule whereby to be worſhipped after his own mind. Of the law, becauſe the uſes and ends thereof are many, I will treat in place fit for it. Now I only touch this point, that thereby men are bridled that they run not out of the way to wrong worſhippings. Now, as I firſt ſaid, we muſt bear in mind, that if all that ever properly belongeth to the Deity do not reſt in God alone, he is ſpoiled of his honour, and his worſhip broken. And there muſt we ſomewhat heedfully mark with what ſubtilties ſuperſtition deceiveth. For it doth not ſo revolt unto ſtrange gods that it ſeemeth to forſake the higheſt God, or to bring him down into the number of other gods: but whilſt ſhe granteth unto him the higheſt place, ſhe ſetteth round about him a number of leſſer gods, among whom ſhe divideth his offices. And ſo (tho' covertly and craftily) the glory of the Godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the old time, as well they of the Jews as of the Gentiles did ſet beneath the Father and judge of gods, a great multitude of gods which would every one according to his degree in common have with the higheſt God the government of the heaven and earth. So the ſaints that in a few ages paſt departed this life, are advanced to the fellowſhip of God, to be worſhipped, called upon, and honoured inſtead of him. And yet with ſuch abominatlon we think that the majeſty of God is not ſo much as divided, when indeed it is in a great meaſure ſuppreſſed and extinguiſhed, ſaving that we retain ſtill a poor opinion of his ſupreme power: and in the mean time deceived with entangled ſubtilties, we are in a diſtracted manner drawn aſide to divers gods.

2. For this purpoſe alſo was intended the diſtinction of latria and dulia, as they term them, that is worſhip and ſervice, whereby they might freely ſeem to give away the honours of God to angels and dead men. For it is evident, that the worſhip which the Papiſts give unto ſaints, differeth nothing in deed from the worſhip of God. For all alike without diverſity they worſhip both God and them: ſaving that when they are charged with it, they wind away with this exception, that they keep ſtill for God the honour that is due unto him inviolate, becauſe they leave unto him the worſhip that they call latria. But ſince the queſtion ſtandeth upon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them ſo careleſsly to mock in a matter of all others the moſt weighty? But to let that alſo paſs, yet gain they nothing by this diſtinction, but to prove, that they give worſhip to one God, and ſervice to another. For latria in Greek ſignifieth as much as in Latin cultus, and in Engliſh worſhip. Dulia, properly ſignifies ſervice. And yet ſometimes in ſcripture this difference is confounded together without diverſity. But grant it be a perpetual difference, then muſt we ſearch what both the words may mean. Dulia is ſervice, latria is worſhip. Now no man doubteth that to ſerve, is more than to worſhip. For many times a man could hardly bear to ſerve him whom he would not ſtick to worſhip. So it is an unequal dealing, to give to the ſaints that which is the greater, and to leave God that which is the leſſer. But many of the ancient authors have uſed this diſtinction. What matters it, if all men do perceive ſuch a diſtinction to be not only improper but altogether fooliſh.

The diſtinction which Papiſts make between the honour they do unto God and unto ſaints is unfit and fooliſh.

3. Now leaving nice ſubtilties, let us conſider the matter itſelf. When Paul putteth the Galatians (Gal. iv. 8.) in remembrance what they were before that they were enlightned with the knowlege of God, he ſayeth that they gave duliam ſervice to thoſe that by nature were no gods. Although he names latriam or worſhip, is therefore their

are ſo due unto God alone, that they cannot without impiety be made common unto any other.

their ſuperſtition excuſable? He doth nevertheleſs condemn their perverſe ſuperſtition, which he termeth by the name of dulia ſervice, than if he had expreſſed the name of latria, worſhip. And when Chriſt repulſeth the aſſaults of Satan with his buckler, that "it is written, "thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God," (Mat. iv. 10.) the name of latria was not brought in queſtion. Satan required but an adoration. Likewiſe when the angel reproved John, becauſe he fell down on his knees before him, (Rev. xix. 10.) we ought not to think that John was ſo mad that he would give unto the angel the honour that was due only to God. But becauſe it was not poſſible, but that all worſhip that is joined with religion ſavoureth ſomewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the angel, but that he muſt take away ſomewhat from the glory of God. We read indeed often, that men have been honoured, but that was a civil honour, as I may ſo call it. But religion hath another rule, which ſo ſoon as it is joined with worſhip, bringeth with it a prophane abuſe of the honour of God. The ſame may we ſee in Cornelius, Acts x. 25. He not only ſlenderly profited in godlineſs, but that he had learned to give the ſovereign worſhip to God alone. Therefore, when he fell down before Peter, he did it not of this meaning, to worſhip him in the ſtead of God: and yet did Peter earneſtly forbid him to do that which he did. And why ſo? but becauſe men do never ſo narrowly put difference between the worſhip of God and of his creatures: but that without diverſity they give away that unto the creature, which belongeth unto God. Wherefore, if we have one God, we muſt remember, that nothing be it never ſo little, muſt be taken away from his glory; but that he keep ſtill that which is properly his. Therefore Zechariah when he preached of the reparing of the church, (Zech. xiv. 9.) in plain words expreſſeth: That there ſhall not only be one God, but alſo that there ſhall be one name of that God, to the end that he have nothing in common with idols. What manner of worſhip God requireth, we ſhall ſee in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleaſed him in his law to preſcribe unto men what is lawful and right, and ſo to bind them to a certain rule, that every man ſhould not give himſelf leave to deviſe what form of worſhip he pleaſes. But becauſe it is not expedient to load the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touch that point yet. Only let it ſuffice for this time to keep in mind, that the giving any others any part of that worſhip which is due to God alone is downright ſacrilege, or a robbing of God. And firſt ſuperſtition deviſed to give divine honours to the ſun, or other ſtars or idols: then followed ambitious pride, which garniſhing mortal men with ſpoils taken from God, preſumed to prophane all that ever was holy. Although this principle remained among them, to honour the ſovereign Deity, yet grew it in uſe indifferently to offer ſacrifices to ſpirits, leſſer gods, or dead men of honour. So ſlippery is the way to ſlide into this fault, to make common to a number that which God ſeverely challengeth to himſelf alone.

CHAP. XIII.

That there is taught in the ſcriptures one eſſence of God from the very creation, which eſſence containeth in it three perſons.

The ſcripture teaching God to be an eſſence unmeaſureable and ſpiritual, doth not only ſtay men from meaſuring God by ſenſe and from imagining any earthly thing of him, but alſo by the one doth convince the Manichees, by the other the Anthropomorphites of madneſs.

THat which is taught in the ſcriptures concerning the incomprehenſible and ſpiritual eſſence of God, ought to ſuffice not only to overthrow the fooliſh errors of the common people, but alſo to confute the fine ſubtilties of prophane philoſophy. One of the old writers ſeemed to have ſaid very well, 'That God is all that we do ſee, and all that we do not ſee.' But by this means he hath imagined the Godhead to be diffus'd into all the parts of the world. Although God, to the intent to keep men in ſober mind, ſpeak but ſparingly of his own eſſence, yet by thoſe two names of addition that I have rehearſed, he doth both take away all groſs imaginations, and alſo repreſs the preſumptuous boldneſs of man's mind. For ſurely his immeaſurable greatneſs ought to make us afraid, that we attempt not to meaſure him with our ſenſe: and his ſpiritual nature forbiddeth us to imagine any thing earthly or fleſhly of him. For the ſame cauſe he often aſſigneth his dwelling place to be in heaven. For though, as he is incomprehenſible, he filleth the earth alſo: yet becauſe he ſeeth our minds by

reaſon of their dulneſs to lie ſtill in the earth, for good cauſe he lifteth us up above the world, to ſhake off our ſloth and ſluggiſhneſs. And here falleth to ground the error of the Manichees, which in appointing two original beginnings, have made the devil in a manner equal with God. Surely, this was as much as to break the unity of God and reſtrain his unmeaſurableneſs. For where they have preſumed to abuſe certain teſtimonies: that ſheweth a foul ignorance, as their error itſelf ſheweth a deteſtable madneſs. And the Anthropomorphites are alſo eaſily confuted, who have imagined God to conſiſt of a body, becauſe oftentimes the ſcripture aſcribeth unto him a mouth, ears, eyes, hands, and feet. For what man, yea though he be ſlenderly witted, doth not underſtand that God doth ſo with us ſpeak as it were childiſhly, as nurſes do with their babes? therefore ſuch manner of ſpeeches do not ſo plainly expreſs what God is, as they do apply the underſtanding of him to our ſlender capacities. Which to do, it behoved of neceſſity that he deſcended a great way beneath his own height.

The ſcriptures teach one divine eſſence wherein there are three diſtinguiſhed, but not divided perſons ſubſiſting.

2. But he alſo ſetteth out himſelf by another ſpecial mark, whereby he may be more nearly known. For he ſo declareth himſelf to be but one, that he yet giveth himſelf diſtinctly to be conſidered in three perſons: which except we learn, a bare and empty name of God without any true God fleeth in our brain. And that no man ſhould think that he is a threefold God, or that the one eſſence of God is divided in three perſons, we muſt here ſeek a ſhort and eaſy definition to deliver us from all error. But becauſe many do make much about this word Perſon, as a thing invented by man: how juſtly they do ſo, it is beſt firſt to ſee. The apoſtle naming the Son the engraved form of the hypoſtaſis of his Father, he undoubtedly meaneth, that the Father hath ſome being, wherein he differeth from the Son. For to take it for eſſence (as ſome expoſitors have done, as if Chriſt like a piece of wax printed with a ſeal did repreſent the ſubſtance of the Father) were not only hard but alſo an abſurdity. For ſince the eſſence of God is ſingle or one and indiviſible, he that in himſelf containeth it all, and not by piece-meal, or by derivation, but in whole perfection, ſhould very improperly, yea, fooliſhly be called the engraved form of him. But becauſe the Father although he be in his own property diſtinct, hath expreſſed himſelf wholly in his Son, it is for good cauſe ſaid, that he hath given his hypoſtaſis to be ſeen in him. Wherewith aptly agreeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightneſs of his glory. Surely by the apoſtle's words we gather, that there is a certain proper hypoſtaſis in the Father, that ſhineth in the Son: whereby alſo again is eaſily perceived the hypoſtaſis of the Son that diſtinguiſheth him from the Father. The like order is in the holy Ghoſt. For we ſhall by and by prove him to be God, and yet he muſt needs be other than the Father. Yet this diſtinction is not of the eſſence, which it is unlawful to make manifold. Therefore if the apoſtle's teſtimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three hypoſtaſis. This term ſeeing the Latins have expreſſed by the name of Perſon, it were too much pride and frowardneſs to wrangle about ſo clear a matter. But if we liſt word for word to tranſlate, we may call it ſubſiſtence. Many in the ſame ſenſe have called it ſubſtance. And the name of Perſon hath not been in uſe among the Latins only, but alſo the Grecians, perhaps to declare a conſent, have taught that there are three Proſopa, that is to ſay Perſons in God. But they, whether they be Greeks or Latins that differ one from another in the word, do very well agree in the ſum of the matter.

With the manner of Trinity and Perſon no man ſhould be offended.

3. Now howſoever the hereticks cry out againſt the name of Perſon, or ſome overmuch preciſe men do carp that they like not the word feigned by the device of men; ſince they cannot get of us to ſay, that there be three, whereof every one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many gods: what unreaſonableneſs is this, to diſlike words, which expreſs none other thing but that which is teſtified and approved by the ſcriptures? It were better (ſay they) to reſtrain not only our meanings but alſo our words within the bounds of ſcripture, than to deviſe ſtrange terms that may be the beginnings of diſagreement and brawling: ſo do we tire ourſelves with ſtrife about words: ſo the truth is loſt in contending: ſo charity is broken by odiouſly brawling together. If they call that a ſtrange word, which cannot be ſhewed in ſcripture, as it is written in number of ſyllables; then they bind us to a hard law, whereby is condemned all expoſition that is not pieced together, with bare laying together of texts of ſcripture. But if they mean that to be ſtrange, which being curiouſly deviſed, is ſuperſtitiouſly defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either improperly, or to no profit uſed, which withdraweth from the ſimplicity of the word of God, then with all my heart

I em-

I embrace their ſober mind. For I judge that we ought with no leſs devout reverence to talk of God than to think of him, for as much as whatſoever we do of ourſelves think of him, is fooliſh, and whatſoever we ſpeak is unſavoury. But there is a certain meaſure to be kept. We ought to learn out of the ſcriptures a rule both to think and ſpeak, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our mind, and words of our mouth. But what hindereth us, but that ſuch as in ſcripture are to our capacity doubtful and entangled, we may in plainer words expreſs them, being yet ſuch words as do reverently and faithfully ſerve the truth of the ſcripture, and be uſed ſparingly, modeſtly, and not without occaſion? Of which ſort there are examples enough. And whereas it ſhall by proof appear that the church of great neceſſity was forced to uſe the names of Trinity, and Perſons, if any ſhall then find fault with the newneſs of words, ſhall he not be juſtly thought to be grieved at the light of the truth, as he that blameth only this, that the truth is made ſo plain and clear to deſcern?

The crooked ſubtilties of heretics hath cauſed ſound believers to deviſe new words for plainer opening of that, under which their poiſon lurked, as, Conſubſtantial, againſt the Arians; Perſonal Trinity, againſt the Sabellians.

4. Such newneſs of words, if it be ſo called, cometh then chiefly in uſe, when the truth is to be defended againſt wranglers that do mock it out with cavils. Which thing we have at this day too much in experience, who have great buſineſs in vanquiſhing the enemies of true and ſound doctrine. With ſuch folding and crooked winding theſe ſlippery ſnakes do ſlide away, unleſs they be ſtrongly gripped and holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending againſt falſe doctrines, were compelled to ſhew their meanings in exquiſite plainneſs, leſt they ſhould leave any crooked byways to the wicked, to whom the doubtful conſtructions of words were hiding-holes of errors. Arius confeſſed Chriſt to be God, and the Son of God, becauſe he could not gainſay the evident words of God, and as if he had been ſo ſufficiently diſcharged, did feign a certain conſent with the reſt. But in the mean while he ceaſed not to ſcatter abroad that Chriſt was created, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end that they might draw forth his winding ſubtilty out of his den, the antient fathers went further, pronouncing Chriſt to be the eternal Son of the Father and conſubſtantial with the Father. Hereat wickedneſs began to boil, when the Arrians began to hate and deteſt the name Omoouſion, conſubſtantial. But if in the beginning they had ſincerely and with plain meaning confeſſed Chriſt to be God, they would not now have denied him to be conſubſtantial with the Father. Who dare now blame theſe good men as brawlers and contentious, becauſe for one little word's ſake, they were ſo keen in diſputation, and diſturbed the peace of the church? But that little word ſhewed the difference between the true believing Chriſtians, and the Arians who were robbers of God. Afterward roſe up Sabellius who accounted in a manner for nothing the names of the Father, the Son, and holy Ghoſt, ſaying in diſputation that they were not made to ſhew any manner of diſtinction, but only were ſeveral additions of God, of which ſort there are may. If he came to diſputation, he confeſſed that he believed the Father God, the Son God, the holy Ghoſt God. But afterwards he would readily ſlip away with ſaying, that he had in no otherwiſe ſpoken than as if he had named God, a powerful God, juſt God, and wiſe God: and ſo he ſung another ſong, that the Father is the Son, and the holy Ghoſt is the Father, without any order, without any diſtinction. The good doctors who then had care of godlineſs, to ſubdue his wickedneſs, cried out on the other ſide, that there ought to be acknowleged in one God three properties: and to the end to fence themſelves againſt the crooked winding ſubtilties with plain and ſimple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly ſubſiſt in one God, or (which is the ſame thing) that there did ſubſiſt in the unity of God a Trinity of Perſons.

5. If then the names have not been without cauſe invented, we ought to take heed, that in rejecting them we be not juſtly blamed of proud preſumptuoſneſs. I would to God they were buried indeed, ſo that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father, and the Son, and the holy Ghoſt be one God: and yet that the Father is not the Son, nor the holy Ghoſt the Son, but diſtinctly by certain property. Yet I am not ſo preciſe, that I can find in my heart to ſtrive for bare words. For I obſerve, that the antient fathers, who otherwiſe ſpake very religiouſly of ſuch matters, did not every where agree one with another, nor every one with himſelf. For what forms of ſpeech uſed by the councils doth Hillary excuſe? To how great liberty doth Auguſtine ſometimes break forth?

The words which have been in this caſe deviſed for opening of the truth, ſo that the things themſelves be agreed upon, are neither over ſtiffly to be urged, nor too forwardly to be refuſed.

How unlike are the Greeks to the Latins? But of this disagreement one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latins wanted to express the word Omoousion, they called it Consubstantial, declaring the substance of the Father and the Son to be one, thus using the word substance for essence. Whereupon Hierom to Damasus saith, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substances in God: and yet above a hundred times you shall find in Hillary, that there are three substances in God. In the word hypostasis, how is Hierom difficulted? for he suspecteth that there lurketh poison in naming three hypostasis in God. And if a man do use this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that it is an improper speech, if he spake unfeignedly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seek to charge the bishops of the East, whom he sought to charge with an unjust slander. Sure this one thing he speaketh not very truly, that in all prophane schools, Ousia, essence, is nothing else but hypostasis, which is proved false by the common and accustomed use. Augustine is more modest and gentle, who although he says, De trint. li. 5. cap. 8, 9. that the word hypostasis in that sense is strange to Latin ears, yet so far is it off, that he taketh from the Greeks their usual manner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins who had followed the Greek phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the fifth book of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this end, as though he meant that he had by unskilful men been wrongfully applied unto this matter. Yea, and the same Hillary himself layeth it as a great fault to the heretics charge, De trin. li. 2. that by their frowardness he is compelled to put those things in peril of the speech of men, which ought to have been kept in religiousness of minds, plainly confessing that this is to do things unlawful, to speak what ought not to be spoken, to attempt things not licensed. A little after, he excuseth himself with many words, for that he was so bold to utter new names. For after he had used the natural names, Father, Son, and holy Ghost, he addeth that whatsoever is sought further, is beyond the compass of speech, beyond the reach of sense, and beyond the capacity of understanding. And in another place he saith, that happy are the bishops of Gallia, who had not received, nor knew any other confession, but that old and simple one, which from the time of the apostles was received in all churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrung out of necessity, by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to express that which is, but that it should not be unspoken how the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost are three. This modesty of the holy men ought to warn us, that we do not forthwith so severely, like censors, brand them with infamy who refuse to subscribe and swear to such words as we propound them: so that thay do not of pride, or frowardness, or of malicious craft. But let them again consider, by how great necessity we are driven to speak so, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable manner of speech. Let them also learn to beware, lest since we must meet on the one side with the Arians, on the other side with the Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to cavil, they bring themselves in suspicion, that they be the disciples either of Arius or of Sabellius. Arius saith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was created, and had a beginning. He saith Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the ears of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithful be, although by singular prerogative. Say once that Christ is consubstantial with his Father, then pluck you off his visor from the dissembler, and yet you add nothing to the scripture. Sabellius saith, that the several names, Father, Son, and holy Ghost, signify nothing in God severally distinct: say that they are three, and he will cry out that you name three gods. Say that there is in one essence a Trinity of persons, then shall you in one word both say what the scripture speaketh, and stop their vain babling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstition, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would never so fain, that can deny but that when we hear of one, we must understand an unity of substance: when we hear of three in one essence, that it is meant of the persons of the Trinity. Which thing being without fraud confessed, we stay no longer upon words. But I have long ago found, and that often, that whosoever do obstinately quarrel about words, do keep within them a secret poison: so that it is better willingly to provoke them, than for their pleasure to speak darkly.

6. But leaving disputation of words, I will now begin to speak of the matter itself. I call therefore a Person, a subsistance in the essence of God, which having relation to the other, is distinguished from them with uncommunicable property. By the name of the subsistance we mean another thing than the essence. For if the word word had simply been God, and in the mean time had nothing severally proper to itself, John had said amiss that it was with God. (John i. 1.) Where he forthwith addeth, that God himself was the same word, he calleth us back again to the one single essence. But because it could not be with God, but that it must rest in the Father: hereof ariseth that subsistance, which though it be joined to the essence with an unseparable knot, yet hath it a special mark whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistances, I say, that each having relation to other, is in property distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no less to the Son and the holy Ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Son, the several properties of either doth distinguish him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper unto every of them is uncommunicable. For that which is given to the Father for a mark of difference, cannot agree with, nor be given to the Son. And I do not dislike the definition of Tertullian, (Lib. contra praxeam.) provided it be rightly understood, "That there is in God a certain dispostion, or distribution which yet changeth nothing of the unity of the essence."

The Word whereof in scripture it is said that the spirit was of it, the world made and sustained by it, that it was begotten of God before the worlds, that it worketh with the Father, that it is the cause of all things, is no sounding voice, but that essential word which is the Son of God, the true and very God himself.

7. But before I proceed any further, it is useful to prove the Godhead of the Son and of the holy Ghost. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from another. Surely when the word of God is spoken of in the scripture, it were a very great absurdity to imagine it only a fading and vanishing voice, which being sent into the air, proceeds from God himself, of which sort were the oracles given to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the word is meant to be the perpetual wisdom abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no less did the old prophets speak with the spirit of Christ, than did the apostles and all they who after them did propagate the heavenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must understand that the word was before all worlds begotten of the Father, And if the Spirit was of the word, whose instruments were the prophets, we do undoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the world, when he setteth the Word as the mean. For why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating all his works said, Be this done, or that done, but that the unsearchable glory of God may shiningly appear in his images? The subtle and babling men do easily mock out this, with saying that the name Word, is is there taken for his bidding or commandment. But better expositors are the apostles, (Heb. i. 2.) who teach that the worlds were made by the same, and that he sustaineth them all with his mighty Word. For here we see that the word is taken for the bidding or commandment of the Son, who is himself the eternal and essential Word to the Father. and to the wise and sober it is not dark that Solomon saith, (Eccl. xxiv. 14.) where he bringeth in Wisdom begotten of God before all worlds, and bearing rule in the creation of things, and in all the works of God. For to say that it was a certain commandment of God, serving but for a time, were very foolish and vain: whereas indeed it was God's pleasure at that time to shew forth his stedfast and eternal purpose, yea, and something more secret. To which intent also maketh that saying of Christ, John v. 17. "My Father and I do work even to this day." For in saying, That from the beginning of the world he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then, that the meaning of God's speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, and so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doth John speak, when he sheweth that the same Word, who from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all things, John i. 3. For he both giveth to the word a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth unto it something peculiar to itself, and plainly sheweth how God in speaking was the creator of the world. Therefore as all revelations proceeding from God do well bear the name of of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the highest place the substantial Word, the fountain of all oracles, which being subject to no alteration, abideth always one and the self same with God, and is God himself.

The word in the beginning of things began to shew itself, but was before any

8. Here many dogs do bark against us, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead do secretly steal from him his eternity. For they say, that the word then began first to be, when thing began, and was itſelf without beginning.

God in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But very undiſcreetly do they to imagine a certain innovation of the ſubſtance of God. For as thoſe names of God that have relation to his outward work, began to be given unto him after the beginning of his work, as for example, this that he is called the Creator of heaven and earth; ſo doth godlineſs know or admit no name that ſhould ſignify any new thing in himſelf to have chanced unto God. For if any ſhould come to him from elſewhere than in himſelf, then this ſaying of James ſhould fail, "that every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableneſs, neither ſhadow of turning." Therefore nothing is leſs to be ſuffered, than to feign a beginning of that word, which both always was God, and afterwards was Creator of the world. But full ſubtilly forſooth do they reaſon, that Moſes in ſaying that God then firſt ſpake, doth ſecretly ſhew, that there was no word in him before. Which is a moſt trifling argument. For it followeth not, becauſe a thing at ſome one certain time beginneth to be ſhewed openly, that therefore it had never any being before. But I conclude far otherwiſe and ſay: ſeeing that in the ſame moment that God ſaid, Let light be made, the power of the word appeared and ſhewed itſelf, Gen. i. 3. the ſame word was long before, but if a man aſk how long before he ſhall find no beginning. For he appointed no certain ſpace of time when himſelf ſaid: Father, glorify me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was, John xvii. 5. And this thing John alſo left not untouched, becauſe he firſt ſheweth that in the beginning the word was with God, before that he cometh to the creation of the world. We ſay therefore again, that the word which was conceived of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternity, true eſſence, and Godhead is proved.

The places of ſcripture which prove Chriſt to be God and the ſhifts which the Jews have to avoid them.

9. Although I do not yet touch the perſon of the Mediator, but do defer it to that place where we ſhall ſpecially treat of the redemption: yet becauſe it ought to be certainly holden without controverſy among all men, that Chriſt is the ſame word clad with fleſh, in this place will be very fit to recite all thoſe teſtimonies that prove Chriſt to be God. When it is ſaid in the fortieth and five Pſalm, "thy "throne O God, is forever and ever:" the Jews do cavil and ſay, that the name Elohim is alſo applyed to the angels and ſovereign powers. But in all the ſcripture there is not a like place, that raiſeth an eternal throne to any creature. For he is here not ſimply called God, but alſo the eternal Lord. Again this title is given to none but with an addition, as it is ſaid: that Moſes ſhall be for a god to Pharoah, Exod. vii. 1. Some read it in the Genetive caſe which is very fooliſh. I grant indeed that oftentimes a thing is called Divine or of God, that is notable by any ſingular excellence: but hereby the tenor of the text it appeareth, that ſuch a meaning were hard and forced, and will not agree. But if their ſtubbornneſs will not ſo yield, in Iſa. ix. 6. is very plainly brought in for all one both Chriſt and God, and he that is adorned with the ſovereign power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (ſaith he) is the name whereby they ſhall call him, the mighty God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the Jews cavil again, and turn the text thus: "This is the name whereby the mighty "God the father of the world to come ſhall call "him:" ſo that they leave this only to the Son to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpoſe ſhould ſo many names of addition in this place be heaped up to God the Father, ſeeing it is the purpoſe of the prophet to adorn Chriſt with ſuch ſpecial notes as may build our faith upon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like ſort called the mighty God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer than that place of Jeremiah where he ſaith, "that this ſhall be the name whereby the ſeed of David ſhall be called, JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS, Jer. xxiii. 6. For where the Jews themſelves do teach, that all other names of God are but adjective names of addition, and that this only name JEHOVAH which they call unſpeakable is a ſubſtantive name to expreſs his eſſence: we gather that the Son is the only and eternal God who ſaith in another place that he will not give his glory to another, Iſa. xlii. 8. But here alſo they ſeek to eſcape away, becauſe that Moſes gave that name to the altar that he builded: and Ezekiel gave it to the new city Jeruſalem. But who doth not ſee that the altar was builded for a monument that God was the advancement of Moſes, and that Jeruſalem is not adorned with the name of God, but only to teſtify the preſence of God? For thus ſaith the prophet: The name of the city from that day ſhall be (JEHOVAH SHAMMAH) THE LORD IS THERE, Ezek. xlviii. 35. And Moſes ſaith thus: he builded an altar and called the name of it, (JEHOVAH-NISSI,) THE LORD MY BANNER, Exod. xvii. 15. But more buſineſs ariſeth by an other place of Jeremiah, where the ſame title is applied to Jeruſalem

in theſe words: This is the name whereby they ſhall call her, JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS, Jer. xxxiii. 16. But this teſtimony is ſo far from making againſt the truth which we defend, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before teſtifyed that Chriſt is the true Jehovah from whom floweth righteouſneſs, now he pronounceth that the church ſhall ſo verily feel the ſame, that ſhe may gloriouſly uſe the very name itſelf. And ſo in the firſt place is ſet the fountain and cauſe of righteouſneſs, in the other the effect.

The Word communicating itſelf with men, took the office & name of an angel, yet ſtill ſhewed itſelf to be the God of unſpeakable glory.

10. Now if this do not ſatisfy the Jews, that Jehovah is ſo often preſented in the perſon of an angel I ſee not with what cavillations they can mock it out. It is ſaid, that the angel appeared to the holy fathers: and the ſame angel challengeth to himſelf the name of the eternal God. If any take exception and ſay, that this is ſpoken in reſpect of the perſon that he repreſenteth: this knot is not thus looſed. For being a ſervant he would not ſuffer ſacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the angel refuſing to eat bread, commanded ſacrifice to be offered to Jehovah, Judges vi. 7. And then he proveth that himſelf indeed was the ſame Jehovah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had ſeen not only an angel but God. And thence came it that he ſaid, we ſhall die becauſe we have ſeen God. And when his wife anſwereth, if Jehovah would have ſlain us, he would not have received ſacrifice at our hands: in this ſhe doth confeſs that he was God which before was called the angel. Beſide this, the anſwer of the angel himſelf taketh away all doubt of it, ſaying: Why doſt thou aſk me of my name, which is marvelous? So much the more deteſtable was the wickedneſs of Serveto, when he affirmed that God never appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an angel was worſhipped in place of him. But truly and wiſely have the true teaching doctors of the church expounded, that the ſame principal angel was the word of God, who then as aforehand began to execute the office of mediator. For though he was not clothed with fleſh, yet he came down as a mean between God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithful. Therefore his near communicating of himſelf, made him to be called an angel: yet ſtill in the meantime he retained that which was his own, to be the God of unſpeable glory. The ſame thing meaneth Hoſea, who after he had recited the wreſtling of Jacob with the angel, ſaith; "Jehovah the God of hoſts, "Jehovah worthy of memory is his name, Hoſ. xii. "5." Here again Serveto carpeth, that God did bear the perſon of an angel. As though the prophet did not confirm that which Moſes had ſaid: why doeſt thou aſk of me thy name? And the confeſſion of the holy Patriarch doth ſufficiently declare that he was not a created angel, but one in whom the full Godhead reſided when he ſaid: I have ſeen God face to face, Gen. xxxii. 30. And for this cauſe Paul ſaith, that Chriſt was guide of the people in in the wilderneſs, 1 Cor. x. 4. For though the time was not yet come of his abaſement: yet that eternal word ſhewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the ſecond chapter of Zechariah be weighed without contention, the angel that ſent another angel was by and by pronounced to be the God of hoſts, and to him is ſovereign power aſcribed. I omit innumerable teſtimonies on the which our faith ſafely reſteth, although they do not much move the Jews. For when it is ſaid in Iſaiah: "Behold, this is our God, this is Jehovah, we "ſhall wait upon him, and he ſhall ſave us, Iſa. xxv. "9." They that have eyes may ſee, that herein is meant God who raiſeth up for the ſalvation of his people. And theſe vehement demonſtrations twice repeated ſuffer it to be drawn no other where but to Chriſt. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachi, where he promiſeth that he ſhall come, the Lord who was then deſired to his own temple, Mal. iii. 1. But to none but to the only ſovereign God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the prophet doth claim for Chriſt. Whereupon followeth that Chriſt is the ſame God that was ever honoured among the Jews.

11. As for the New Teſtament, it aboundeth with innumerable teſtimonies, therefore we muſt travel rather ſhortly to chuſe out few, than largely to heap up all. For though the apoſtles ſpeak of him ſince he was now become the Mediator in fleſh: yet all that I ſhall bring forth ſhall aptly ſerve to prove his Godhead. Firſt, this is worthy to be ſingularly marked, that thoſe things which were before ſpoken touching the eternal God, the apoſtles do ſhew that they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Chriſt. For where Iſaiah prophecyeth that the Lord of hoſts ſhall be to the Jews and Iſraelites a ſtumbling ſtone and a rock to fall upon. Paul affirmeth that the ſame is fulfilled in Chriſt, Rom. ix. 24. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hosts. Likewise in another place, "We "must a (saith he) once be brought to appear be- "fore the judgment throne of Christ. For it is "written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me "shall all tongues swear, Rom. xiv. 10, 11." Seeing God in Isaiah speaketh this thing of himself, and Christ indeed performeth it in himself, it followeth that he is the self same God, whose glory may not be withdrawn to another, Isa. lv. 23. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeth out of the Psalms, is evident that it can be applyed to none but to God alone. Ascending on high he hath carried captivity captive, Psal. lxviii. 18. meaning that such ascending was in a shadow shewed, when God in notable victory against foreign nations did shew forth his power, but he declareth that in Christ it whas more fully performed. So John testifieth that it was the glory of the Son that was revealed to Isaiah by a vision, whereas indeed the prophet himself writeth that the majesty of God appeared unto him. And it is evident that those things which the apostle writing to the Hebrews applieth to the Son are the plain titles of God; as, "Thou Lord in the beginning didst lay the founda- "tions of heaven and earth, &c. Heb. i. 10." "A- "gain, Worship him all ye his angels, ver. 6." And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in these Psalms, he himself alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose up and had mercy of Sion. It was he that claimed to himself the kingdom of all nations and lands. And why should John stick to apply the majesty of God to Christ, which in his preface had said that the word was always God? Why should Paul fear to set Christ in the judgment throne of God, having before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he said that he was God blessed to the end of worlds? And to make appear, how well he agreeth in this point with himself, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be praised to the end of worlds, then he is the same, to whom in another place he affirmeth all glory and honour to be due. And this he hideth not, but plainly crieth out, that he would have counted it no robbery, if he had shewed himself equal with God, but that he willingly abased himself, Philip. ii. 6. And that the wicked should not carp that he is some made God, John goeth further and saith: "He is the true God and the eternal life," 1 John v. 20. Although it ought abundantly to satisfy us, that he is called God, especially of that witness which expresly affirmeth unto us, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witness is Paul, which saith thus: "How many soever be "called gods, either in heaven or in earth, to us "there is but one God of whom are all things, "1 Cor viii. 5, 6." When we hear of the same mouth, that God was manifested in the flesh, 1 Tim. iii. 16. that God with his own blood purchased the church unto himself, Acts xx. 28. Why should we imagine a second God which he himself acknowlegeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lord and his God, doth profes that he is that only one God, whom he had always worshipped, John xx. 28.

His working with the Father, his governing of the world, his pardoning of sins, his perceiving the very thoughts of the heurts, proved him to be very God.

12. Now if we esteem his Godhead by the works that in the scripture are ascribed unto him, it shall thereby more evidently appear. For when he said that from the beginning he was thitherto working with his Father: the Jews who were most dull in understanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceived that he took upon him the power of God, And therefore as John telleth. "They sought the more to kill him, because de did "not only break the sabbath, but also did call God "his Father, making himself equal with God." John v. 17. How dull shall we be then, If we do not perceive that his Godhead is here plainly affirmed? And truly to order the world with providence and power, and to govern all things with the authority of his own might, which the apostle ascribeth unto him, belongeth to none but only the Creator, Heb. i. 3, And he not only shareth the government of the world with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord crieth out by the prophet, "I "am he, I am he, that do away thine offences for "mine own sake." Isa. xliii. 25. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Jews thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgive sins, Christ not only affirmed in words, but also proved by miracle that this power belonged unto himself, Matth. ix. 4, 6. We see therefore that he hath, not the ministration, but the power of forgiveness of sins, which the Lord saith he will not suffer to pass away from himself to any. What shall we say of searching, and piercing into the secret thoughts of hearts? is it not the property of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby it is gathered that he is God.

That he wrought miracles by his own power, and gave power unto others to work: that he is the author of life and salvation: that he is goodnes and justice itself; that men are commanded to believe and trust in him: that his name is called upon, that we are taught to glory in the knowlege of him, that the same things are wished jointly from the Father and from him, these are proofs of his Godhead.

13. Now in his miracles how plainly and clearly doth he appear? And though I grant that as well the prophets as the apostles did equal and like miracles to those that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministration disposed the gifts of God, he shewed forth his own power. He used sometimes prayer, to the end to give glory unto his Father. But we see for the most part his own power shewed unto us. And how could it otherwise be but that he was the very author of miracles that by his own authority gave power to others to deal miracles abroad? For the Evangelist declareth, that he gave power to the apostles to raise up the dead, to heal the lerprous, to cast out devils, &c. Mat. x. 8. and they so used the ministration thereof, that they sufficiently shewed that this power came not from any but from Christ, Mark iii. 15. and vi. 7. "In the name of Jesus Christ (saith Peter) raise and walk," Acts iii. 6. It is therefore no wonder if Christ alleged his miracles to confound the unbelief of the Jews, John v. 36. and x. 37. and xiv. 11. forasmuch as they were such as being done by his own power, did give a most plain testimony of his Godhead. If elsewhere than in God there is no salvation, no righteousnes, no life: and Christ containeth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can object against me and say, that life and salvation is poured into him by God: for it is not said that he received salvation, but that he is salvation himself. And if none be good but only God, Matth. xix. 17. how can he be only man, being I will not say good and just, but goodnes and justice itself? Yea, from the first beginning of the creation, as the Evangelist witnesseth, in him was life: and even then being life was the light of men, John i. 4. Wherefore being supported with such proofs, we are bold to repose our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an ungodlines that robbeth God, for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Believe ye in God saith he, believe then also in me, John xiv. 1. And so doth Paul expound those two places of Isaiah, "Whosoever trusteth in him, shall not be put to "shame," Isa. xxvi. 16. Again, "Out of the root "of Jesse shall he come that shall rise to rule peoples, "in him shall the nations trust," Isa. xi. 10. And why should we seek out more testimonies of scripture in this matter, when we so often meet with this sentence? "He that believeth in me hath eternal "life," Rom. x. 11. and xv. 12. Moreover the invocation which hangeth upon faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the majesty of God, if he have any thing at all proper to himself. For one prophet saith, "Whosoever calleth upon the name of Jehovah shall be saved," Jo. ii. 32. And another saith, "A most strong tower is the name of Jehovah," Prov. xxviii. 10. to it the righteous shall flee and he shall be saved, but the name of Christ is called upon for salvation: it followeth therefore that he is Jehovah. As for invocation, we have an example of it in Stephen, when he saith, Lord Jesus receive my spirit, Acts vii. 59. Again, in the whole church, as Ananias testifieth in the same book. Lord (saith he) thou knowest how great evils this man hath done to thy saints that call upon thy name. Acts ix. 13. And that it may be more plainly understood that the whole fulnes of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the apostle doth confes that he brought no doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowlege of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowlege, 1 Cor. ii. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Son only is preached unto us, whom he commandeth to glory in the knowlege of himself alone? Who dare say, that he is but a creature, of whom the only knowlege is our whole glory? Besides that, the salutations set before the epistles of Paul, wish the same benefits from the Son which they do from the Father: whereby we are taught not only that those things which the Father giveth us do come unto us by his intercession, but also by community of power, he is the author of them. Which knowlege by practice is without doubt more certain and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the godly mind doth behold God most present, and in manner handle him, where it feeleth itself to be quickened, enlightned, saved, justified and sanctified.

Reasons proving the Godhead of the holy Ghost, as it preserved the world in that original confusion, it regenerateth, it sent the prophets, it giveth life, the offices are attri-

14. Wherefore out of the same fountains we must fetch our means of proving the Godhead of the holy Ghost. Very plain is the testimony of Moses in the history of creation, that the Spirit of God was upon the depths, or upon the unfashionable heap, Gen. i. 2. because he sheweth that not only the beauty of the world that is now to be seen is preserved by the power of the Spirit, but ere this beauty was added, the Spirit was then buſied in preſerving that confuſed lump of things. And that ſaying of Iſaiah cannot be cavilled againſt, Iſa. xlviii. 16. And now Jehovah and his Spirit hath ſent me. For he communicateth with the holy Ghoſt his chief power in ſending of prophets. Whereby appeareth the divine majeſty of the holy Ghoſt. But our beſt proof, I have ſaid, ſhall be by familiar uſe. For that which the ſcriptures impute unto it, is far from the property of creatures, and ſuch a thing as we ourſelves do learn by aſſured experience of godlineſs. For he it is that being every where diffuſed abroad, doth ſuſtain and give growing and life to all things in heaven and in earth. And by this point he is proved to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any bounds: but by pouring his lively force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the very work of God. Moreover, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any preſent quickening: what ſhall we judge of him from whoſe power the ſame proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his own power, the ſcripture in many places teacheth: and not of that only, but alſo of the immortality to come. Finally, as unto the Son, ſo unto him alſo are applied all thoſe offices that are moſt of all properly belonging to the Godhead, 1 Cor. ii. 10. For he ſearcheth the deep ſecrets of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counſel, 1 Cor. xii. 10. He giveth wiſdom and ſkill to ſpeak, whereas the Lord pronounceth to Moſes that it belongs to him only to do it, Exod. iv. 11. So by him we come to a partaking of God, ſo that we may feel his power as it were working life in us. Our juſtification is his work. From him is power, ſanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing ſoever may be thought of, becauſe it is the holy Ghoſt only from whom proceedeth all kind of gifts. For that ſentence of Paul is right worthy to be noted. Although there be divers gifts, and manifold and ſundry is the deſtribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirit: becauſe he maketh him not only the original and beginning, but alſo the author. Which a little after is more plainly expreſſed in theſe words. One and the ſame Spirit diſtributeth all things as he will, 1 Cor. xii. 11. For if he were not ſomething ſubſiſting in God, he would not attribute unto him choice of mind and will. Therefore moſt evidently doth Paul give to the holy Ghoſt divine power, and ſheweth that he is ſubſtantially reſident in God.

buted unto it which are proper unto God, as to ſearch the ſecrets of God, &c.

The holy Ghoſt in ſcripture plainly termed God.

15. And the ſcripture itſelf, when it ſpeaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that we are the temple of God, becauſe his ſpirit dwelleth in us: 1 Cor. iii. 17. and vi. 19. which thing is not lightly to be paſſed over. For whereas God ſo often promiſeth that he will chuſe us for a temple to himſelf, that promiſe is no other way fulfilled, but by his ſpirit dwelling in us. 2 Cor. vi. 16. Surely, as Auguſtine very well ſaith: Auguſt. ad maximinum. Epi. 66. if we were commanded to make unto the holy Ghoſt a temple of timber and ſtone becauſe ſuch worſhip is due to God only, it were a clear argument that he is God: now therefore how clearer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our ſelves to be a temple for him? And the apoſtle himſelf calleth us ſometimes the temple of God, ſometimes the temple of the holy Ghoſt, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lyed to the holy Ghoſt, ſaid that he lyed not unto men but unto God. Act. v. 3. And where Iſaiah bringeth in the Lord of hoſts ſpeaking, Iſai. vi. 9. Paul teacheth that it is the holy Ghoſt that ſpeaketh. Act. xxviii. 25. Yea, where commonly the prophets ſay, that the words which they utter are the words of the Lord of hoſts, Chriſt and the apoſtles do refer them to the holy Ghoſt. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Jehovah, that is, the chief author of prophecies. Again, where God complaineth that he was provoked to wrath by the ſtubbornneſs of his people, in ſtead of that Iſaiah ſaith that his holy Spirit was grieved. Iſa. xliii. 10. Laſt of all, if blaſphemy againſt the holy Ghoſt be not forgiven in this world nor in the world to come, whereas he may obtain pardon that hath blaſphemed againſt the Son: Mat. xii. 30. Mar. iii. 29. Luke. xii. 10. his divine majeſty is hereby plainly proved, the offence or diminiſhment whereof is an unpardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpoſe omit many teſtimonies that the antient writers have uſed. They have thought it a marvelous meet place to allege out of David: Pſal. xxxiii. 6. "With the "word of the Lord the heavens were ſtabliſhed, and "all the power of them with the ſpirit of his mouth," to prove that the world was no leſs the work of the holy Ghoſt than of the Son. But foraſmuch as it is commonly uſed in the Pſalms to repeat one thing twice: and in Iſaiah, the ſpirit of his mouth is as much to ſay as his word, that reaſon is very weak, Iſai. xi. 4. Therefore I thought good to touch a few ſuch things as godly minds might ſoundly reſt upon.

16. And

In the Trinity of persons the unity of God is proved by this, that there is but one faith and one baptism.

16. And as God hath more plainly disclosed himself by the coming of Christ, so is he also in the three persons become more familiarly known. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice us for this present. Paul so joineth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptism, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this manner. Because there is but one faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby proveth there is but one faith. Eph. iv 5. Therefore if we be entered into the faith and religion of one God by baptism: we must needs think him the true God in whose name we are baptised: And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemn protestation, Christ meant to testify that the perfect light of faith was already delivered, when he said: baptise them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the holy Ghost. Mat. xxviii. 19. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightness hath appeared in the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost. Whereby is evident that in the essence of God abide three persons in which the one God is known. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to look hither and thither nor diversely to wander about, but to have regard to the one God, to be applied to him, and to stick fast in him; it is hereby easily proved, that if there be divers kinds of faith, there must also be many gods. Now whereas baptism is a sacrament of faith: it proveth unto us the unity of God, because it is but one. And hereof also followeth, that it is not lawful to be baptised but into one God, because we embrace the faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What meant Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father the Son, and the holy Ghost, but that we ought with one faith to believe in the Father, Son, and the holy Ghost? Therefore since this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Word and the Spirit are nothing else but the very self essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arians prat, who confessing the Godhead of the Son, did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, who would have to be understood by the Spirit, only the gifts of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisdom, understanding, prudence, fortitude, fear of God do proceed from him; so he only is the Spirit of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godliness. Yet is not he divided according to the distribution of his graces: but howsoever they be diversely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith. 1 Cor. xii. 11.

The Son distinguished from the Father, and the Spirit from them both.

17. Again, there is shewed in the scriptures a certain distinction of the Father, from the Word, and of the Word from the Spirit. In discussing whereof, how great religiousness and sobriety we ought to use, the greatness of the mystery it self doth admonish us. And I very well like that saying of Gregory Nazianzene: In sermone de sacro baptismo. I cannot think upon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightness of the three: And I cannot severally discern the three, but I am suddenly driven back to one. Wherefore let it not come in our minds once to imagine such a Trinity of persons as may hold our thought withdrawn into severalities, and do not forthwith bring us again to that unity. The names of Father, Son, and holy Ghost, do prove a true distinction, that no man should think them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his works is diversely entitled: but yet it is a distinction, not a division. The places that we have already cited, do shew that the Son hath a property distinct from the Father, because the Word had not been with God, if he had not been another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himself from the Father, when he saith, that there is another which beareth him witness. John v. 3. and viii. 16. And for this purpose maketh that which in another place is said, that the Father created all things by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certain manner distinct from him. Moreover, the Father came not down into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not, nor rose again, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh, but it is manifest that he was also before, the only begotten in the bosom of the Father, John i. 18. For who can abide to say, that then the Son entered into the bosom of the Father, when he descended from heaven to take manhood upon him? He was therefore before in the bosom of the Father, and enjoyed his glory with the Father, John xiv. 6. and xv. 26. As for the distinction of the holy Ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how often doth he shew it to be another beside himself? as when he promiseth that he will send another comforter, and often in other places.

That the Father is of none, the Son is of the Father, and the Spirit is of both.

18. But to borrow ſimilitudes from matters of men, to expreſs the force of this diſtinction, I know not whether it be expedient. Indeed the antient fathers are wont ſo to do ſometimes: But withal they do confeſs, that whatſoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cauſe I am much afraid to be any way bold, leaſt if I bring forth any thing unfitly, it ſhould give occaſion either to the malicious to cavil, or to the unſkilful to be deceived. Yet ſuch diſtinction as we have marked to be ſet out in the ſcriptures, it is not good to have left unſpoken. And that is this, that to the Father is given the beginning of working, the fountain and ſpring of all things: to the Son wiſdom, counſel, and the very diſpoſition in the doing of things: to the holy Ghoſt is aſſigned power and effectual working. And although eternity belong unto the Father, and eternity to the Son, and to the holy Ghoſt alſo, foraſmuch as God could never have been without his wiſdom and power and in eternity is not to be ſought, which was firſt or laſt: yet this obſervation of order is not vain or ſuperfluous, wherein the Father is reckoned firſt, and then of him the Son, and after of them both the holy Ghoſt. For every man's mind of itſelf inclineth to this, firſt to conſider God, then the wiſdom riſing out of him, and laſt of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpoſe in execution. In what ſort the Son is ſaid to be of the Father only, and the holy Ghoſt both of the Father and the Son, is ſhewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the eight chapter to the Romans, where the ſame Spirit is without difference ſometimes called the Spirit of Chriſt, and ſometimes of him that raiſed up Chriſt from the dead: and that not without cauſe. For Peter doth alſo teſtify that that was the Spirit of Chriſt, wherewith the prophets did propheſy, whereas the ſcriptures ſo often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

That the Trinity of perſons is an argument to prove the unity of God: & in what ſenſe the Father is the beginning of the Son.

19. Now this diſtinction is ſo far off from ſtanding againſt the ſingle unity of God, that thereby we may prove that the Son is one God with the Father, becauſe he hath one Spirit with him, and that the holy Spirit is not a thing diverſe from the Father and the Son. For in each hypoſtaſis is underſtood the whole ſubſtance, with this, that every one hath his own property. The Father is whole in the Son, and the Son is whole in the Father, as himſelf affirmeth: "I am in the Father, "and the Father is in me, John xiv. 10." And the eccleſiaſtical writers do not grant the one to be ſeparated from the other by any difference of eſſence. By theſe names that betoken diſtinction (ſaith Auguſtin) that is meant whereby they have relation one to another, and not the very ſubſtance whereby they are all one, Auguſt. hom. de. temp. 38. By which meaning are the ſayings of the antient writers to be made agree, which otherwiſe would ſeem not a little to diſagree. For ſometimes they ſay that the Father is the beginning of the Son, and ſometimes that the Son hath both Godhead and eſſence of himſelf, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cauſe of this diverſity Auguſtin doth in another place well and plainly declare, when he ſaith: Chriſt having reſpect to himſelf, is called God, and to his Father is called the Son. And again, the Father as to himſelf is called God, as to his Son is called the Father, where having reſpect to the Son he is called the Father, he is not the Son: and whereas to the Father he is called the Son, he is not the Father: and where he is called as to himſelf the Father, and as to himſelf the Son: it is all one God. Therefore when we ſimply ſpeak of the Son: without having reſpect to the Father, we do well and properly ſay, that he is of himſelf: and therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation between him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Son. All the whole fifth book of Auguſtin concerning the Trinity doth nothing but ſet forth this matter. And much ſafer it is to reſt in that relation that he ſpeaketh of than, in too ſubtilly penetrating into the high myſtery, to wander abroad by many vain ſpeculations.

The diverſity of perſons, & the order of them ſtandeth well enough with one ſingle divine eſſence, whereunto we muſt have recourſe when the Father, the Son, or the Spirit ſeverally is called God and not imagine

20. Let them therefore that are pleaſed with ſoberneſs, and contented with meaſure of faith, ſhortly learn ſo much as is profitable to be known: that is, when we profeſs that we believe in one God, under the name of God, we underſtand the one only and ſingle eſſence in which we comprehend three perſons or hypoſtaſis. And therefore ſo oft as we do indefinitely ſpeak of the name of God, we mean no leſs the Son and the holy Ghoſt than the Father. But when each to be a distinct God from the other.

when the Son is joined to the Father, then cometh in a relation, and so we make distinction between the persons. And because the properties in the persons being an order with them, so as the beginning and original is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Son, or the holy Ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly given to the Father. By this means is retained the unity of the essence, and regard is had to the order, which yet doth diminish nothing of the Godhead of the Son and of the holy Ghost. And whereas we have already seen that the apostles do affirm that the Son of God is he, whom Moses and the prophets do testify to be Jehovah the Lord, we must of necessity always come to the unity of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacrilege for us to call the Son a distinct God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himself cannot be said to be this or that. Now, that the name of Jehovah the Lord, indefinitely taken, is applyed to Christ appeareth by the words of Paul, where he saith: Therefore I have thrice prayed the Lord, because that after he had received the answer of Christ, "My grace is sufficient for thee, 2 Cor. xii. 9.:" he saith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certain that the name LORD is there set for JEHOVAH, and therefore to restrict it to the person of the Mediator were very fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Son. And we know that after the accustomed manner of the Greeks, the apostles do commonly set the word KYRIOS, Lord, instead of JEHOVAH. And not to fetch an example far off, Paul did in no other sense pray to the Lord, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Joel, Acts ii. 16. Joel ii. 28. Whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. But where this name is peculiarly given to the Son, we shall see that there is another reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Now it is enough to bear in mind when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Even so is the whole God called by Christ himself the Spirit. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spiritual, wherein the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost are comprehended. Which is very plain from the scripture. For even as there we hear God to be made a Spirit: so we do hear the holy Ghost, for so much as it is an hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

With what sobriety we ought to dispute against heretics about the mystery of the Trinity.

21. But forasmuch as satan, to the end to root out our faith, hath always moved great contentions, partly concerning the divine essence of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of persons: and as in a manner in all ages he hath stirred up wicked spirits to trouble the true teachers in this behalf; so at this day he strives out of the old embers to kindle a new fire: therefore here it is good to answer the perverse foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath been our purpose, to lead as it were by the hand those that are willing to learn and not to strive hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we have already peaceable shewed, must be rescued from the cavils of the wicked: Altho' my chief labour shall yet be applyed to this end, that they who give gentle and open ears to the word of God, may have whereupon stedfastly to rest their foot. In this point, if any where at all in the secret mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heed that neither our thought nor our tongue proceed any further than the bounds of God's word do extend. For how may the mind of man by his capacity define the immeasurable essence of God, which never yet could certainly determine how great is the body of the sun which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? Yea, how may she by her own guiding attain to discuss the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her own substance? Wherefore let us willingly give over unto God the knowlege of himself. For he only, as Hillary saith, is a convenient witness to himself, who is not known but by himself, Hilar. lib. pri. de. Trinitate. We shall give it over unto him, if we shall both conceive him to be such as he hath revealed himself unto us, and shall not elsewhere search to know of him, than by his own word. There are to this end written five homilies of Chrysostom against the Anomei. Yet the boldness of sophisters could not be restrained by them from babling unbridledly. For they have behaved themselves in this matter no whit more modestly than they are wont to do in all other cases. By the unhappy success of which indiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend ourselves to labour in this question rather with tractable willingness to learn, than with sharpness of wit, and never have in our mind either to search for God any where else than in his holy word, or to speak any thing of him, but having his word going before to guid us, or to speak any thing but that which is taken out of the ſame word. The diſtinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghoſt, as it is very hard to know, ſo doth it occaſion more labour and perplexity to ſome men's underſtandings than is expedient. Let them remember that the minds of men do enter into a maze when they follow their own curioſity, and ſo let them ſuffer themſelves to be ruled by the heavenly oracles, howſoever they cannot attain the height of the myſtery.

The monſtrous impiety of Servetus.

22. To make a regiſter of the errors, wherewith the pureneſs of faith in this point of doctrine hath in times paſt been corrupted, were too long and full of unprofitable tediouſneſs: and the moſt part of heretics have ſo attempted to overwhelm the glory of God with groſs doting errors, that they have thought it enough for them to ſhake and trouble the unſkilful. And from a few men have ſprung up many ſects, whereof ſome do tear in ſunder the eſſence of God, ſome do confound the diſtinction that is between the perſons. But if we hold faſt that which is already ſufficiently ſhewed by the ſcripture, that the eſſence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghoſt, is ſingle and undivided: again, that the Father by a certain property differeth from the Son, and the Son from the holy Ghoſt: we ſhall ſtop up the gate not only againſt Arius and Sabellius, but alſo the other antient authors of errors. But becauſe in our time there are riſen up certain fanciful men, as Serveto and others of the ſame ſtamp, who have encumbred all things with new deceits: it is good in few words to diſcuſs their falſhoods. The name of the Trinity was ſo hateful, yea, ſo deteſtable to Serveto, that he ſaid, that all the Trinitaries, as he called them, were utterly godleſs. I omit the fooliſh words that he had deviſed to rail withal. But of his opinion this was the ſum. That God is made Tripartite, when it is ſaid, that there abideth three perſons in his eſſence, and that this Trinity is but a thing imagined, becauſe it diſagreeth with the unity of God. In the mean time the perſons he would have to be certain outward conceptions of form, which are not truly ſubſiſting in the eſſence of God, but do repreſent God unto us in this or that faſhion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing diſtinct, becauſe once the Word and the Spirit were all one: but ſince that Chriſt aroſe God out of God, the holy Ghoſt ſprung alſo another God out of him. And though ſometimes he colour his follies with allegories, as when he ſaith, that the eternal Word of God was the Spirit of Chriſt with God, and the bright ſhining of his form: Again, that the holy Ghoſt was the ſhadow of the Godhead; yet afterwards he bringeth the Godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of diſtribution, there is both in the Son and in the holy Spirit a part of God, even as the ſame ſpirit in us, and alſo in wood and ſtones, is ſubſtantially a portion of God. What he bableth of the perſon of the Mediator, we ſhall hereafter ſee in place convenient. But this monſtrous forged device, that a perſon is nothing elſe but a viſible form of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation. For whereas John pronounceth, that the Word was God before the world was yet created, John i. 1. he maketh it much differing from a conception of form. But if then alſo, yea, and from fartheſt eternity of time, that Word which was God was with the Father, and had his own proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figurative ſhining: but it neceſſarily followeth that he was an hypoſtaſis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirit, but in the hiſtory of the creation of the world, yet he is not there brought in as a ſhadow, but an eſſential power of God, when Moſes ſheweth that the very unfaſhioned lump was ſuſtained in him. Gen. i. 2. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternal Spirit was always in God, when he preſerved and ſuſtained the confuſed matter of heaven and earth, until beauty and order were added unto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or repreſentation of God as Serveto dreameth. But in other points he is compelled more openly to diſcloſe his wickedneſs, in ſaying, that God by his eternal purpoſe appointing to himſelf a viſible Son, did by this means ſhew himſelf viſible. For if that be true, there is no other Godhead left unto Chriſt, but ſo far as he is by the eternal decree of God ordained his Son. Moreover, he ſo transformeth thoſe imagined ſhapes, that he ſticketh not to feign new accidents in God. But this of all other is moſt abominable, that he confuſedly mingleth as well the Son of God, as the holy Ghoſt, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the eſſence of God, of which every portion is God. And namely he ſaith, that the ſpirits of the faithful are coeternal and conſubſtantial with God: altho' in another place he aſſigneth the ſubſtantial Deity, not only to the ſoul of man, but alſo to other creatures.

That the eſſence of God doth not

23. Out of this ſink came forth another like monſter. For certain lewd men meaning to eſcape the hatred

hatred and ſhame of the wickedneſs of Serveto, have indeed confeſſed, that there are three perſons, but adding a manner how: that the Father who truly and properly is the one only God, informing the Son and the holy Ghoſt, hath poured his Godhead into them. Yea, they forbear not this horrible manner of ſpeech, that the Father is by this mark diſtinguiſhed from the Son and the holy Ghoſt, that he is the only eſſentiator or maker of the eſſence. Firſt they pretend this colour, that Chriſt is every were called the Son of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they mark not, that though the name of God be alſo common to the Son, yet by reaſon of preeminence it is ſometimes given to the Father only, becauſe he is the fountain and original of the Deity, and that for this purpoſe, to make the ſingle unity of the eſſence to be thereby noted. They take exception and ſay, If he be truly the Son of God, it is inconvenient to have him reckoned the Son of a perſon. I anſwer that both are true: that is, that he is the Son of God, becauſe he is the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds (for we come not yet to ſpeak of the perſon of the Mediator) and yet for explication's ſake we ought to have regard to the perſon, that the name of God be not taken ſimply but for the Father only. For if we mean none to be God but the Father, we plainly throw down the Son from the degree of God. Therefore ſo often as mention is made of the Godhead, we muſt not admit of a compariſon between the Son and the Father, as though the name of God did belong only to the Father. For truly the God that appeared to Iſaiah was the true and only God, Iſa. vi. 1. and yet John affirmeth that the ſame was Chriſt, John xii. 41. And he that by the mouth of Iſaiah teſtified, That he ſhould be a ſtumbling ſtone to the Jews, Iſa. viii. 14. was the only God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the ſame was Chriſt, Rom. ix. 33. He that crieth out by Iſaiah, I live, and to me every knee ſhall bow, (Iſa. xlv. 23.) is the only God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the ſame was Chriſt, Rom. xiv. 11. For this purpoſe ſerve the teſtimonies that the apoſtle reciteth, Heb. i. 10. "Thou, O God, haſt laid the foundations of heaven and earth, Pſal. cii. 26." Again, "Let all the angels of God worſhip him, Pſal. xcvii. 7." which things belong to none, but to the only God. And yet he ſaith, that they are the proper titles of Chriſt. And this cavil is nothing worth, that that is given to Chriſt, which is proper to God, becauſe Chriſt is the ſhining brightneſs of his glory. For becauſe in each of theſe places is ſet the name of Jehovah, it followeth, that it is ſo ſaid in reſpect that he is God of himſelf. For if he be Jehovah, it cannot be denied that he is the ſame God that in another place crieth out by Iſaiah, "I, I am, and beſide me there is no God, Iſa. xliv. 6." It is good alſo to conſider that ſaying of Jeremiah, "The gods that have not made the heaven and earth, let them periſh out of the earth that is under heaven, Jer. x. 11." Whereas on the other ſide we muſt needs confeſs, that the Son of God is he, whoſe Godhead is often proved in Iſaiah by the creation of the world. And how can it be that the Creator, who giveth being to all things, ſhall not be of himſelf, but borrow his being of another? For whoſoever ſaith that the Son was eſſentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himſelf. But the holy Ghoſt ſaith the contrary, naming him Jehovah. Now if we grant that the whole eſſence is in the Father only, either it muſt be made partable, or be taken from the Son, and ſo ſhall the Son be ſpoiled of his eſſence, and be a God only in name and title. The eſſence of God, if we believe theſe triflers, belongeth only to the Father, for as much as he is only God, and is the eſſence-maker of the Son. And ſo ſhall the Godhead of the Son be an abſtract from the eſſence of God, or a derivation of a part out of the whole. Now muſt they needs grant by their own principle, that the holy Ghoſt is the Spirit of the Father only. For if he be a derivation from the firſt eſſence, which is only proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirit of the Son: which is confuted by the teſtimony of Paul, where he maketh the Spirit common to Chriſt and the Father. Moreover, if the perſon of the Father be wiped out of the Trinity, wherein ſhall he differ from the Son and holy Ghoſt, but in this, that he only is God? They confeſs Chriſt to be God, and yet they ſay, he differeth from the Father. Again, there muſt be ſome mark of difference to make that the Father be not the Son. They who affirm that mark of difference to be in the eſſence, do manifeſtly bring the true Godhead of Chriſt to nothing, which cannot be without eſſence, yea, and that the whole eſſence. The Father differeth not from the Son, unleſs he have ſomething proper to himſelf that is not common to the Son. What now will they find wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the eſſence, let them anſwer if he have not communicated the ſame to the Son. But that could not be in part, for to ſay that he made half a God were impious. Beſide that by this means they do wickedly tear in ſunder the eſſence of God. It remaineth therefore that the eſ-ſence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father and the Son. And if that be true, then as touching the eſſence there is no difference of the one from the other. If they ſay, that the Father in giving his eſſence, remaineth nevertheleſs the only God, with whom the eſſence abideth; then Chriſt ſhall be a figurative God, and a God only in ſhew and in name but not in deed: becauſe nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this ſaying, "HE THAT IS hath ſent me unto you, Exod. v. 13."

The arguments anſwered which are brought to prove the Father to be the only true God.

24. It is eaſy by many places to prove that it is falſe which they hold, that ſo oft as there is in ſcripture mention made abſolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in thoſe places that they themſelves do allege, they manifeſtly diſcover their own want of conſideration, becauſe there is alſo ſet the name of the Son. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatively taken, and therefore reſtrained to the perſon of the Father. And their objection where they ſay, If the Father were not only the true God, he ſhould himſelf be his own Father, is anſwered with one word. It is not inconvenient for degree and order's ſake, that he be peculiarly called God who hath not only of himſelf begotten his wiſdom, but alſo is the God of the Mediator, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For ſince Chriſt was openly ſhewed in the fleſh, he is called the Son of God, not only in reſpect that he was the eternal word, before all worlds begotten of the Father, Matth, xix. 17. but alſo becauſe he took upon him the perſon and office of the Mediator to join us unto God. And becauſe they ſo boldly excluded the Son from the honour of God, I would fain know whether the Son when he pronounceth, that none is good but God, doth take goodneſs from himſelf? I do not ſpeak of his human nature, leſt perhaps they ſhould take exception, and ſay, that whatſoever goodneſs was in it, it came of free gift. I aſk whether the eternal Word of God be good or no? If they ſay no, then we hold their ungodlineſs ſufficiently convinced: in ſaying yea, they confound themſelves. But whereas at the firſt ſight, Chriſt ſeemeth to put from himſelf the name of Good, that doth the more confirm our meaning. For ſince it is the ſingular title of God alone, foraſmuch as he was after the common manner ſaluted by the name of Good, in refuſing falſe honour, he did admoniſh them, that the goodneſs wherein he excelled, was the goodneſs that God hath. I aſk alſo, where Paul affirmeth that only God is immortal, wiſe, and true, 1 Tim. i. 17. whether by theſe words Chriſt be brought into the number of mortal, fooliſh, and falſe? Shall not he then be immortal, that from the beginning was life to give immortality to angels? Shall not he be wiſe, who is the eternal wiſdom of God? Phil. ii. 10. Shall not the truth itſelf be true? I aſk furthermore, whether they think that Chriſt ought to be worſhipped or no? For he claimeth this unto himſelf, to have every knee bow before him: it followeth that he is God who did in the law forbid any other to be worſhipped but himſelf. If they will have that meant of the Father only which is ſpoken in Iſaiah, "I am, and none but I, Iſa. xliv. 6." this teſtimony I turn againſt themſelves, foraſmuch as we ſee, that whatſoever pertaineth to God is given to Chriſt. And their cavil hath no place, that Chriſt was exalted in the fleſh, wherein he had been abaſed, and that in reſpect of the fleſh, "all authority is given him in heaven and in earth, Phil. ii. 7." becauſe although the majeſty of king and judge extend to the whole perſon of the Mediator, yet if he had not been God openly ſhewed in fleſh, he could not have been advanced to ſuch height, but that God ſhould have diſagreed with himſelf. But this controverſy Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was equal with God before he did abaſe himſelf under the ſhape of a ſervant. Now how could this equality have ſtood together, unleſs he had been the ſame God whoſe name is JAH and JEHOVAH: that rideth upon the Cherubin, that is King of all the earth and Lord of the worlds? Now howſoever they bable againſt it, it cannot be taken from Chriſt which Iſaiah ſaith in another place, Iſa. xxv. 9. "He, he, is our God, for him we have waited," whereas in theſe words he deſcribeth the coming of God the Redeemer, not only that ſhould bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but alſo fully in all points to reſtore the church. And with their other cavil they nothing prevail, in ſaying, that Chriſt was God in his Father. For though we confeſs that in reſpect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we affirm that it is a deteſtable invention to ſay, that the eſſence is only proper to the Father, as though he were the only God-maker of the Son. For by this means either he ſhould have more eſſences than one, or elſe they call Chriſt God only in title and imagination. If they grant that Chriſt is God, but next after the Father, then ſhall the eſſence be in him begotten and faſhioned, which in the Father is unbegotten and unfaſhioned. I know that many ſcornful men do laugh at this that we gather the diſtinction of persons out of the words of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus, "Let us make man after our image, Gen. i. 26." But yet the godly readers do see how vainly and foolishly Moses should bring in this as a conference of divers together, if there were not in God more persons than one. Now certain it is, that they whom the Father spake unto, were uncreated: but nothing is uncreated but God himself, yea the one only God. Now therefore unless they grant that the power of creating was common, and the authority of commanding common, to the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost: it shall follow that God did not inwardly thus speak to himself, but directed his speech to other foreign workmen. Finally, one place shall easily answer two of their objections. For whereas Christ himself pronounceth that God is a Spirit, this were not convenient to be restrained to the Father only, as if the Word himself were not of spiritual nature. If then the name of Spirit doth as well agree with the Son as with the Father, I gather that the Son is also comprehended under the infinite name of God. But he addeth presently after that, That none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they who worship him in spirit and truth: whereupon followed another thing, because Christ doth under a head execute the office of a teacher, he doth give the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroy his own Godhead, but by degrees to lift us up unto it.

There is one indivisible divine essence, which is unbegotten, absolutely of itself and without beginning.

25. But in this they are deceived, that they dream of certain undivided singular things, whereof each hath a part of the essence. But by the scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essential God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Son as of the holy Ghost is unbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himself begotten his Wisdom, therefore rightfully as is abovesaid, he is counted the original and fountain of all the Godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is unbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is unbegotten. And foolishly they think that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternity, because they ascribe in a false and cavilling manner unto us an invention of their own brain, as though we did allege that by derivation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is evident by our writings, that we do not draw the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction between them. If the persons were separated from the essence, then perhaps their reasons were like to be true. By that means it should be a Trinity of Gods and not of persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence do meet to make up the Trinity, as though we did imagine that there descended three Gods out of it. And this other exception of theirs is equally foolish, where they say, That then the Trinity, should be without God. For though it meet not to make up the distinction as a part or member, yet neither are the persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Son is none otherwise the Son but because he is God. We say therefore, that the Godhead is absolutely of itself. Whereby we grant that the Son in so much as he is God, is of himself without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Son, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himself. And all orthodox writers who in old time have spoken of the Trinity, have only applied this name to the Persons, for so much as it were not only an absurd error but also a piece of manifest impiety, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will have these three to meet, the Essence, the Son, and the holy Ghost, it is plain that they do destroy the essence of the Son and the holy Ghost, for else the parts joined together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in every distinction. Finally, if the Father and the Son were synonimous or several names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the God-maker, and nothing should remain in the Son but a shadow, and the Trinity should be nothing else, but the joining of one God with two creatures.

Christ though the Son of God, yet properly God not by a certain derived Deity, but by the same Godhead whereby his Father is God.

26. Whereas they object, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Son: to that we have already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father only, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as these mad-men do fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father, "This is life eternal, that men believe in the one true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent, John xvii. 3." For speaking in the person of the Mediator, he keepeth the degree that is mean between God and man: and yet is not his majesty thereby diminished. For though he abased himself, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the apostle in the second chapter to the Hebrews, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the angels, yet he scrupleth not to affirm withal, that he is the same eternal God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, under this name of God is comprehended the Godhead which is his also. So when he said to the apostles, "It is profitable that I go up to the Father, because the Father is greater, John xvi. 17." He giveth not unto himself only the second degree of Godhead to be as touching his eternal essence inferior to the Father, but because having obtained the heavenly glory, he gathereth together the faithful to the partaking of it. He setteth his Father in the higher degree, insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightness that appeareth in heaven, differeth from that measure of glory that was seen in him being clothed with flesh. After like manner in another place Paul saith, "That Christ shall yield up the kingdom to God and his Father, that God may be all in all, 1 Cor. xv. 24." There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternal continuance from the Godhead of Christ. If he shall never cease to be the Son of God, but shall alway remain the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that under the name of Father, is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend unto us, that lifting us up unto his Father, he might also lift us up unto himself, in asmuch as he is all one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawful nor right so exclusively to restrain the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Son. For, John doth for this cause affirm that he is true God, that no man should think that he resteth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I wonder what these framers of new gods do mean, that while they confess Christ to be true God, yet they forthwith exclude him from the Godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the Godhead poured from one to another, be not a certain new forged imagination.

Irenæus far from thinking the Father only and not the Son to be properly eternal God.

27. Whereas they heap up many places out of Irenæus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the only and eternal God of Israel: that is either done from a shameful ignorance, or from extreme wickedness. For they ought to have considered, that then the holy man had to do in disputation with those frantic men who denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in old time spake by Moses and the prophets, but that he was I know not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the world. Therefore he labours wholly in this point, to make it plain that there is no other God preached of in the scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is wrong to imagine any other, and therefore it is no wonder if he so often conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken of by Christ and the apostles. And in like manner now, whereas we are to oppose another sort of error, we may truly say that the God which in old time appeareth to the Fathers, was no other but Christ. But if any man object that it was the Father, our answer is in readiness, that when we strive to defend the Godhead of the Son, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heed to this purpose of Irenæus, all that contention shall cease. And also by the sixth Chapter of the third book, this whole strife is ended, where the good man insists strongly on this point, to prove that he who is in scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God, is verily the one only God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let us remember that this was the principal point whereupon stood all his disputation, as by the whole process thereof doth appear: and specially the lxvi. Chapter of the second book, that he is not called the Father by dark similitude or parable, who is not very God in deed. Moreover in another place he saith, lib. iii. cap. 9. that as well the Son as the Father were jointly called God by the prophets and apostles, Cap. 12. ejusdem lib. Afterwards he defineth how Christ, who is Lord of all, and King, and God, and Judge, received power from him who is the God of all, that is to say, in respect of his subjection, because he was humbled even to the death of the cross. And a little after cap. 16. ejusdem lib. he affirmeth, that the Son is the maker of heaven and earth, who gave the law by the hand of Moses, and appeared to the fathers. Now if any man do prat that with Irenæus only the Father is the God of Israel, I will turn again upon him that which the same writer plainly teacheth, Ibi. ca. 18. & 23. that Christ is all one and the same: and also he applieth unto him the prophecy of Habakkuk: "God shall come out of the south." To the same purpose serveth that which is read in the ninth chapter of the fourth book. Christ himself therefore with the Father is the God of the living. And in the twelfth chapter of the same book he expoundeth that that Abraham believed God, becauſe Chriſt is the the maker of heaven and earth and the only God.

Tertullian as far from that opinion.

28. And with no more truth do they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though he be rough ſometimes and crabbed in his manner of ſpeech, yet doth he plainly teach the ſum of that doctrine which we defend. That is to ſay, whereas he is the one God, yet by diſpoſition and order he is his word: that there is but one God in unity of ſubſtance, and yet that the ſame unity by myſtery of orderly diſtribution is diſpoſed into Trinity, that there are three, not in ſtate, but in degree, not in ſubſtance, but in form, not in power, but in order. He ſaith that he defendeth the Son to be a ſecond next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father; but by way of diſtinction. In ſome places he ſaith that the Son is viſible. But when he hath reaſoned on both parts he defineth that he is inviſible in ſo much as he is the word. Finally where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his own perſon, he proveth himſelf far from that error which we confute. And though he doth acknowlege no other God but the Father, yet in the next piece of his writing expounding himſelf, he ſaith, that he ſpeaketh not excluſively in reſpect of the Son, becauſe he denyeth that the Son is any other God beſide the Father and that their ſole government is not broken by diſtinction of perſon. And from the perpetual courſe of his purpoſe it is eaſy to gather the meaning of his words. For he diſputeth againſt Praxeas, that though God be diſtinguiſhed into three perſons, yet are there not made many gods nor the unity torn in ſunder. And becauſe according to the romantic notion of Praxeas Chriſt could not be God, but he muſt alſo be the Father, therefore he ſo much laboureth about the diſtinction. Whereas he calleth the word and the Spirit a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kind of ſpeech, yet is it excuſable, becauſe it is not referred to the ſubſtance, but only ſheweth the diſpoſition and order that belongeth only to the Perſons, as Tertullian himſelf witneſſeth. And on this depends that: How many perſons thinkeſt thou there are, O moſt froward Praxeas, but even ſo many as there be names? And ſo a little after that, they may believe the Father and the Son each in their names and Perſons. Hereby I think may be ſufficiently confuted their impudence, who ſeek to beguile the ſimple with colour of Tertullian's authority.

The antient fathers of the church with general conſent teach Chriſt to be the ſame God with the Father.

29. And ſurely whoſoever ſhall compare together the writings of the antient authors, ſhall find no other thing in Irenæus, than that which hath been taught by others that came after him. Juſtin is one of the antienteſt, and he in all things doth agree with us. Yet let them object that he, as the reſt do, calleth the Father of Chriſt the only God The ſame thing doth Hilary teach, yea, and ſpeaketh more hardly, that the eternity is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the eſſence of God from the Son? And yet does he ſtrenuouſly defend the ſame faith which we embrace. Yet are they not aſhamed to pick out certain mangled ſentences whereby they would perſuade, that Hilary is a patron of their error. Whereas they bring in Ignatius: if they will have that to be of any authority, let them prove that the apoſtles made a law for lent and ſuch like corruptions of religion, nothing is more unſavoury than thoſe fond trifles that are publiſhed under the name of Ignatius. Wherefore there impudence is ſo much leſs tolerable who put on ſuch masks in order to deceive. Moreover the conſent of the antient fathers is plainly perceived by this, that at the council of Nice, Arius never durſt allege for himſelf the authority of any on allowed writer. And none of the Greekes or Latins doth excuſe himſelf and ſay, that he diſſenteth from them that went before. It is needleſs to mention that Auguſtin, whom theſe baſe men do moſt hate, hath diligently ſearched the writings of them all, and how reverently he did embrace them. Truly even in matters of leaſt weight he uſeth to ſhew what compelleth him to diſſent from them. And in this matter, if he had read any thing doubtful or dark in others he hideth it not. But the doctrine that theſe men ſtrive againſt, he taketh it as confeſſed, that from the remoteſt time of antiquity it hath been without controverſy embraced. And by one word it appeareth that he was not ignorant what others had taught before him, where he ſaith, that in the Father is unity, viz. in the firſt book of Chriſtian doctrine; will they pratingly ſay, that he then forgot himſelf? But in another place he clears himſelf of ſuch reproach, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, becauſe he is of none: conſidering indeed wiſely, that the name of God is eſpecially aſcribed to the Father, becauſe if the beginning ſhould not be reckoned at him, the ſingle unity of God cannot be conceived. From what has been already advanced, it is hoped the pious reader will perceive, that all the cavils, with which Satan hath hitherto endeavoured to corrupt or darken the pure doctrine of truth, are plainly confuted. Finally, I truſt that the principal things relating to this point of doctrine, will appear to have been fully enough declared, provided the readers will ſet bounds to curioſity, and will not ſeek with more keenneſs than becomes them for troubleſome and perplexed diſputations. For it is not my intention to pleaſe thoſe who are immoderately fond of ſpeculation. Truly I have omitted nothing of ſubtle purpoſe that I thought to make againſt me. But while I ſtudy to edify the church, I thought it beſt to leave many things untouched which were both of ſmall avail, and would put the readers to pain with the ſuperfluous tediouſneſs thereof. For, to what purpoſe, for inſtance, were it to diſpute, whether the Father doth always beget? Forasmuch as it is folly to imagine a continual act of begetting, ſince it is evident that from eternity there have been three perſons in God.

CHAP. XIV.

That the ſcripture, even in the creation of the world and of all things, doth by certain marks put a difference between the true God and falſe gods.

The creation of the world taught by Moſes, that men might know the God who made it, and not enquire why he made it no ſooner.

ALTHOUGH Iſaiah (chap. xl. 21.) doth juſtly reproach the worſhippers of falſe gods with ſlothfulneſs, in that they have not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and round compaſs of the heavens, which is the true God: yet ſuch is the dulneſs and groſſneſs of our underſtanding, that leſt the faithful ſhould fall away to the inventions of the Gentiles, it was neceſſary to have God more expreſly painted out unto them. For whereas the ſaying, that God is the mind of the world, which is reckoned the moſt tolerable deſcription that is found among the philoſophers, is but vain, it behoveth us more familiarly to know him, leſt we always waver in doubtfulneſs. Therefore it was his pleaſure to have a hiſtory of the creation remaining, whereupon the faith of the church might reſt, and ſeek for none other God but him, whom Moſes hath declared to be the maker and builder of the world. There is firſt ſet forth the time that by continual proceeding of years the faithful might come to the firſt original of mankind, and of all things. Which knowlege is very neceſſary, not only to confute the monſtrous fables that ſometime were ſpread in Egypt and other parts of the world, but alſo, that the beginning of the world once being known, the eternity of God may more clearly ſhine forth and raviſh us in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moved with that ungodly taunt, that it is ſurpriſing why it came no ſooner in the mind of God to make the heaven and the earth, and why he ſitting idle did ſuffer ſo immeaſurable a ſpace to paſs away, ſince he might have make it many thouſand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the world that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to ſix thouſand years. For what reaſon God ſo long deferred it, is neither lawful nor expedient for us to enquire. Becauſe if the human mind will ſtrive to attain thereunto, it ſhall fail an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for us to know what God himſelf, on purpoſe to try the modeſty of our faith, has thought fit to conceal from us. And well did that pious old man ſpeak, who when a wanton fellow did in ſcorn demand of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, anſwered, that he builded hell for curious fools. Let this grave and ſevere warning curb the wantonneſs that tickleth many, yea, and driveth them to evil and dangerous ſpeculations. Finally, let us remember that the ſame inviſible God whoſe wiſdom, power and juſtice is incomprehenſible, doth ſet before us the hiſtory of Moſes as a looking-glaſs, wherein his lively image appeareth. For as the eyes that either are grown dim with age, or dull with any diſeaſe, do not diſcern any thing plainly, unleſs they be aſſiſted with ſpectacles: in like manner, ſuch is our weakneſs, that unleſs the ſcripture direct us in ſeeking of God, we do inſtantly run out into vanity. And they who follow their own wantonneſs, becauſe they are now warned in vain, ſhall all too late feel to their own horrible deſtruction, how much it had been better for them reverently to receive the ſecret counſels of God, than to vomit out blaſphemies to obſcure the heavens withal. And juſtly doth Auguſtin (Lib. de gen. contra Ma.) complain, that wrong is done to God when further cauſe of things is ſought for than his only will. The ſame man in another place (De civit. Dei, lib. 40.) doth wiſely warn us, that it is no leſs evil to move queſtion of immeaſurable ſpaces of times than of places. For how broad ſoever the circuit of the heaven heaven is, yet is there ſome meaſure of it. Now, if one ſhould quarrel with God for that the emptineſs wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, ſhall not all the godly abhor ſuch wantonneſs? They run into the like madneſs who buſy themſelves about God's ſitting ſtill, becauſe at their appointment he made not the world innumerable ages ſooner. To ſatisfy their own greedineſs of mind, they deſire to paſs without the compaſs of the world, as though in ſo large a circuit of heaven and earth, they could not find things enough that with their ineſtimable brightneſs may overwhelm all our ſenſes: as though in ſix thouſand years, God hath not ſhewed examples, in continual conſideration whereof, our minds may be exerciſed. Let us therefore willingly abide encloſed within thoſe bounds wherewith it pleaſed God to encompaſs us, and as it were to penn up our minds, that they ſhould not ſtray abroad with liberty of wandering.

The dividing of the creation into ſix days, the order of creating, and the manner which Moſes uſed in ſpeaking of God, do ſhew what we ought eſpecially to learn by that hiſtory.

2. For the ſame reaſon it is that Moſes declareth, that the work of God was not ended in a moment, but in ſix days. For by this circumſtance we are withdrawn from forged inventions to the only one God, who divided his works into ſix days, that it ſhould not grieve us to be occupied all the time of our life in conſidering of it. For though our eyes, what way ſoever we turn them, are compelled to look upon the works of God, yet ſee we how fickle our head is, and if any good thoughts do touch us, how ſoon they paſs away. Here again man's reaſon murmureth, as though ſuch proceedings were diſagreeing with the power of God, until ſuch time as being made ſubject to the obedience of faith, ſhe learn to keep that reſt whereunto the hallowing of the ſeventh day calleth us. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be conſidered the fatherly love of God towards mankind, in this; that he did not create Adam until he had ſtored the world with all plenty of good things: for if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and empty, if he had given him life before there was any light, he ſhould have ſeemed not ſo well to provide for his accommodation. But now, whereas he firſt diſpoſed the motions of the ſun and the planets for the uſe of man, and furniſhed the earth, the waters and the air with living creatures, and brought forth abundance of fruits to ſuffice for food, taking upon him the care of a diligent and provident houſholder, he ſhewed his marvellous goodneſs towards us. If a man do with great care reſolve in his own mind thoſe things which I do but ſhortly touch, it ſhall appear that Moſes was the ſure witneſs and publiſher of one God the creator of all things. I omit here that which I have already declared, that he ſpeaketh not there only of the bare eſſence of God, but alſo ſetteth forth unto us his eternal Wiſdom and Spirit, to the end we ſhould not dream that God is any other, than ſuch as he will be known by the image which he hath there expreſſed.

The creation of angels is a thing neceſſary to be known, both becauſe they are the moſt noble part of God's works, and alſo becauſe there are a variety of errors concerning angels, which cannot without ſuch knowlege be refuted.

3. But before I begin to ſpeak more at large of the nature of man, I muſt ſay ſomewhat of angels. Becauſe, though Moſes ſuiting himſelf to the rudeneſs of the common people, reciteth in his hiſtory of the creation no other works of God, but ſuch as are ſeen with our eyes. Yet whereas afterwards he bringeth in angels for miniſters of God, we may eaſily gather, that God was the creator of them in whoſe ſervice they employ their labour and offices. Though therefore Moſes ſpeaking according to the capacity of the people, doth not at the very beginning rehearſe the angels among the creatures of God, yet that is no cauſe to the contrary, but that we may plainly and expreſsly ſpeak thoſe things of them, which the ſcripture in other places commonly teacheth. Becauſe if we deſire to know God by his works, ſo noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beſides that, this point of doctrine is very neceſſary for the confuting of many errors. The excellency of the nature of angels hath ſo dazled the minds of many, that they thought the angels had wrong offered them, if they ſhould be made ſubject to the authority of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And hereupon were they feigned to be gods. There roſe up alſo one Manichæus with his ſect, who formed to themſelves two original beginnings of things, God and the Devil, and to God he aſcribed the origin of good, and to the Devil the origin of evil. If our minds ſhould be entangled with this error, God ſhould not keep whole his glory in the creation of the world. But whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternity and ſelf-exiſtence, as I may ſo term it, they who give that unto the Devil, do they not in a manner give him the title of Godhead? Now what becomes of the omnipotence of God, if such power, be granted to the Devil, that he may put in execution what he will, though God say nay and withstand it? As for the only foundation that the Manichees have, that it is unlawful to ascribe unto God who is good, the creation of any thing that is evil; that nothing hurteth the true faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally evil in the whole universe, because neither the frowardness and malice both of man and the Devil, nor the sins that proceed thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and justice, Therefore to answer those perverse devices, it behoveth us to lift up our minds higher that our eyes can attain to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creed God is called the creator of all things, things invisible are expressed. Yet will we be careful to keep the measure that the rule of godliness appointeth, lest the readers with searching to understand further than is expedient, should wander abroad being led away from the simplicity of faith. And surely, forasmuch as the Holy Ghost teacheth us always what is for our profit, and since what is of small avail to edification, he doth either leave wholly unspoken, or but lightly, and as it were cursorily touch; it will be also our duty to be content to be ignorant of those things which do not profit us.

Superfluous speculations, and curious questions about angels, are to be rewarded.

4. That the angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordained to execute his commandments, are also his creatures, is a truth which ought certainly to be held undeniable. To move doubt of the time and order that they were created in, would it not rather be a sign of meddling perverseness than of diligence! Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heavens were made, with all their host, Gen. i. 2. to what purpose then is it, curiously to search, what day the other more secret host of heaven beside the stars and planets first began to be? But, because I will not be tedious, let us, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keep one rule of modesty and sobriety, that of obscure things we neither speak, nor think, nor yet desire to know any other thing than what hath been taught us by the word of God: and another point, that in reading of scripture we continually rest upon the searching and studying of such things as are plain and certain to edification, and not give ourselves to curiosity or study of things which are unprofitable. And because it was God's pleasure to instruct us, not in trifling questions, but in sound godliness, fear of his name, true confidence, and duties of holiness; let us content ourselves with such knowlege. Wherefore, if we will be truly wise, we must abandon those vanities which idle men have taught without warrant from the word of God, concerning the nature, degree, and multitude of angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more fondly embraced, and are more pleasant unto them than such things as are of practice daily. But if it grieve us not to be the scholars of Christ, let it not grieve us to follow that order of learning which he hath appointed. By this means it shall come to pass, that being contented with his doctrine, we shall not only forbear, but also abhor superfluous speculations, from which he calleth us away. No body can deny, that the same Dionysius, whatsoever man he was, hath disputed many things both subtilly and smartly in his hierarchy of heaven: but if a man examine it more nicely, he shall find that for the most part it is but mere babling. But the duty and business of a divine is, not to delight men's ears with prating, but to establish their minds in the faith, by teaching them things that are true, certain, and profitable. If one should read that book, he would think that the man were dropped down from heaven, and did tell of things not that he had learned by hearsay, but that he had seen with his eyes. But Paul who was ravished above the third heaven, hath uttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it was not lawful for a man to speak the secrets which he had seen. Therefore bidding adieu to that trifling sort of wisdom, let us consider by the simple doctrine of the scripture, what the Lord would have us know concerning his angels.

Angels in scripture, termed armies, potentates, principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, gods.

5. It is commonly read in the scripture, that the angels are heavenly spirits, whose ministration and service God useth for executing those things which he hath decreed. For which reason that name is given them, because God useth them as messengers, to shew himself unto men. And upon like reason are derived the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a guard surround their prince, and do adorn and set forth the honourable shew of his Majesty, and like like ſoldiers they are always attending upon the enſign of their captain, and are ever ſo prepared and in readineſs to do his commandments, that as ſoon as he doth but beckon to them, they prepare themſelves to work, or rather are at their work already. Such an image of the throne of God to ſet out his royalty, the other prophets do deſcribe, but principally Daniel, where he ſaith, that when God ſeated himſelf on his throne of judgment, there ſtood before him thouſands of thouſands, and ten thouſand times ten thouſand of angels, Dan. vii. 10. And becauſe God doth by them marvellouſly ſhew forth and declare the might and ſtrength of his hand, therefore they are named (Col. i. 10.) potentates or ſtrengths, becauſe he exerciſeth and uſeth his authority in the world by them, therefore they are ſometimes called (Eph. i. 21.) principalities, ſometimes powers, ſometimes dominions. Finally, becauſe in them as it were ſitteth the glory of God, for this cauſe alſo they are called thrones: though of this laſt name I will not certainly ſay, becauſe another expoſition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (ſpeaking nothing of that name) the holy Ghoſt often uſeth thoſe other former names to advance the dignity of the miniſtry of angels. For it were not reaſon that thoſe inſtruments ſhould be let paſs without honour, by whom God doth remarkably ſhow forth the preſence of his majeſty. Yea, for that reaſon they are many times called gods, becauſe in their miniſtry, as in a looking-glaſs, they partly repreſent unto us the Godhead. Although indeed I am not diſpleaſed with this expoſition which ſome ancient writers give, That Chriſt was the angel, where the ſcripture ſaith, (Gen. xviii. 32.) That the angel of God appeared unto Abraham, Jacob, Moſes, and others, yet oft times where mention is made of all the angels, this name is given unto them. And this ought not to ſeem ſurpriſing. Becauſe if this honour be given to princes and governors, (Pſal. lxxxii. 6.) that in their office ſtand in the ſtead of God who is the ſovereign king and judge, much greater cauſe there is why it ſhould be given to angels, in whom the brightneſs of the glory of God much more abundantly ſhineth.

The ſervice which angels do unto men.

6. But the ſcripture inſiſts chiefly upon teaching us that which might moſt contribute to our comfort and to the confirmation of faith: that is to ſay that the angels are the diſpenſers and inſtruments of God's bounty towards us. And therefore the ſcripture reciteth, that they watch for our ſafety; they take upon them the defence of us, they direct our ways, they take care that no evil come nigh us. The ſentences are univerſal, which principally pertain to Chriſt the head of the church, and then to all the faithful. Pſal. xci. 11. "He hath given his angels "charge of thee to keep thee in all thy ways: they "ſhall bear thee up in their hands, leſt thou daſh "thy foot againſt a ſtone." Again, Pſal. xxxiv. 8. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about "them that fear him, and he delivereth them." Whereby God ſheweth that he appointeth to his angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keep. After this order the angel of the Lord, (Gen. xvi. 9.) doth comfort Agar, when ſhe fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her miſtreſs. God promiſeth to Abraham his ſervant (Gen. xxiv. 7.) an angel to be the guide of his journey. Jacob in bleſſing of Ephraim and Manaſſes, (Gen. xlviii. 16.) prayeth, that the angel of the Lord, by whom he himſelf had been delivered from all evil, may make them proſper. So the angel was ſet (Exod. xiv. 19. and xxiii. 20.) to defend the tents of the people of Iſrael. And ſo oft as it pleaſed God to reſcue Iſrael out of the hands of their enemies, he raiſed up deliverers by the miniſtry of angels. So finally (to the end I need not rehearſe many more) the angels miniſtred to Chriſt (Matth. iv. 11.) and were ready aſſiſtants to him in all neceſſities. They brought tidings to the women of his reſurrection, Luke xxii. 43. and to the diſciples of his glorious coming. Acts i. 10. And ſo to fulfil their office of defending us, they fight againſt the devil and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God upon them that are bent againſt us. As we read that the angel of God to deliver Jeruſalem from a ſiege, ſlew in one night a hundred fourſcore and five thouſand in the camp of the king of Aſſyria. 2 Kings xix. 35.

Whether every man have his peculiar angel to attend upon him, is an idle and a needleſs queſtion.

7. But whether to every of the faithful be a ſeveral angel aſſigned for their defence, I dare not certainly affirm. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the angel of the Perſians, and the angel of the Grecians, he ſheweth that he meant, that there are to kingdoms and provinces certain angels appointed as governors. And when Chriſt ſaith that the angels of Children do always behold the face of the Father, he ſeems to mean, that there are certain angels to whom the preſervation of them is given in charge. But I cannot tell whether we ought from that to gather, that every one hath his angel ſet over him. But this is to be holden for certainty, that not one angel only hath care of every one of us, but that they all by one conſent do watch for our ſafety. For it is ſpoken of all the angels together, Luke xv. 7. that they more rejoice of one ſinner converted to repentance, than of ninety and nine juſt perſons that have not departed from their righteouſneſs. And it is ſaid of more angels than one, Luke xvi. 23. that they conveyed the ſoul of Lazarus into the boſom of Abraham. And not without cauſe did Eliſeus (2 King xvi. 17.) ſhew to his ſervant ſo many fiery chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that ſeemeth more plain than the reſt to prove this point. For when Peter being brought out of priſon knocked at the doors of the houſe where the brethren were aſſembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they ſaid it was his angel. It ſhould ſeem that this came in their mind by the common opinion, that to every of the faithful are aſſigned their angels for governors. Although however it may be anſwered here, that it may well be, notwithſtanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may think it was any one angel, to whom God had given charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continual keeper, Acts. xii. 15. as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to every one two angels, as it were divers ghoſts, a good angel and a bad. But it is not worth while, curiouſly to ſearch for that which doth not much concern us to know. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the heavenly hoſt do watch for his ſafety, I do not ſee what he can be the better, if he underſtand that there is one angel peculiarly appointed to keep him. And they who reſtrain unto one angel the care that God hath to every one of us, do great wrong to themſelves, and to all the members of the church: as if that power to ſuccour us had been vainly promiſed us, wherewith being encompaſſed and defended, we ſhould fight the more boldly.

The different degrees of honour amongſt Angels, & the certainty of their number are things unknown.

8. They that dare take upon them to define the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them look well what foundation they have. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great Prince, and with Jude, the Archangel. And Paul ſaith, it ſhall be an Archangel that ſhall with ſound of trumpet call men to judgment. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours between Angels, or diſtinguiſh one from another by ſpecial marks, and appoint every one his place and ſtation? For the two names that are in ſcripture, Michael, and Gabriel; and if you pleaſe to add the third out of the hiſtory of Tobit, may by their ſignification ſeem to be given to the Angels, according to the capacity of our weakneſs, although I had rather leave that expoſition at large. As for the number of them, we hear from Chriſt's mouth of many legions, Mat. xxvi. 55. from Daniel of many companys of ten thouſands; Dan. vii. 10. the ſervant of Elizeus ſaw many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is ſaid, that do encamp round about them that fear God. Pſal. xxxiv 8. As for ſhape, it is certain, that ſpirits have none, and yet the ſcripture for the capacity of our underſtanding doth not in vain under Cherubin and Seraphin repreſent to us Angels with wings, to the intent we ſhould not doubt that they will be ever with incredible ſwiftneſs, ready to ſuccour us, ſo ſoon as need ſhall require, as if the lightning ſent from heaven ſhould flie unto us with ſuch ſwiftneſs as it is wont. Whatſoever more than this may be ſought of both theſe points, let us believe it to be of that ſort of myſteries, whereof the full revelation is deferred to the laſt day. Wherefore let us remember to take heed both of too much curioſity in ſearching and too much boldneſs in ſpeaking.

Againſt the opinion of the Sadducees, who denied that there are any ſuch ſpirits as we call angels.

9. But this one thing which many troubleſome men do call in queſtion, is to be holden for certainty, that angels are miniſtring ſpirits, whoſe ſervice God uſeth for the defence of his, and by whom he both diſtributeth his benefits among men, and alſo putteth his other works in execution. It was in the old time the opinion of the Sadducees, that by angels is meant nothing elſe, but either the motions that God doth inſpire in men, or the tokens that he ſheweth of his power. But againſt this error cry out ſo many teſtimonies of ſcripture, that it is ſurpriſing that ſo groſs ignorance could be allowed in that people. For to omit thoſe places that I have before alleged, where are recited thouſands of legions of angels; where joy is given unto them: where it is ſaid that they uphold the faithful with their hands, and carry their ſouls into reſt: that they ſee the face of the Father, and ſuch like: there are other places whereby it is clearly proved, that they are indeed ſpirits of a nature that hath ſubſtance. For whereas (Acts viii. 53.) Steven and (Gal. iii. 19.) that the law was given by the hand of angels; and Chriſt ſaith, that the elect after the reſurrection ſhall be like unto angels, Matth. xxii. 30. that the day of judgment is not known to the very very angels, Luke ix. 26. that he ſhall then come with his holy angels; however they be wreſted yet muſt they be ſo underſtood. Likewiſe, when Paul chargeth Timothy (1 Tim. v. 21.) before Chriſt and his choſen angels, to keep his commandments, he meaneth not qualities or inſpirations without ſubſtance, but very ſpirits. And otherwiſe it is inconſiſtent what is written in the epiſtle to the Hebrews, (Heb. i. 4. and ii. 16.) that Chriſt is become more excellent than angels, that the world is not made ſubject unto them; that Chriſt took upon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we mean not the bleſſed ſpirits to whom may theſe compariſons agree? And the author of the epiſtle expoundeth himſelf, (Heb. xii. 22.) where he placeth in the kingdom of heaven the ſouls of the faithful and the holy angels together. Alſo the ſame that we have already alleged, that the angels of children do always behold the face of God; that they do rejoice at our ſafety, that they wonder at the manifold grace of God in the church; that they are ſubject to Chriſt the head. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth this, that they ſo oft appeared to the holy fathers in the form of men; that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Chriſt himſelf for the principal pre-eminence that he hath in the perſon of the mediator, is called an angel. This I thought proper to touch by the way, to furniſh the ſimple with defence againſt the fooliſh and unreaſonable opinions, which many ages ago raiſed by Satan do now and then ſpring up again.

That which angels do for us, muſt not cauſe us to render the honour unto them that we owe to God.

10. Now it remains, that we ſeek to meet with that ſuperſtition which is commonly wont to creep in, where it is ſaid, that angels are the miniſters and diſpenſers of all good things unto us. For by and by man's reaſon falleth to this point, to think, that therefore all honour ought to be given them. So cometh it to paſs that thoſe things which belong only to God and Chriſt, are conveyed away to angels. By this means we ſee that in certain ages paſt, the glory of Chriſt hath been many ways obſcured, when angels, without warrant from God's word, were loaded with immeaſurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we ſpeak againſt, there is almoſt none more antient than this. For it appeareth that Paul himſelf had much to do with ſome, who ſo advanced angels, that they in a manner would have brought Chriſt under ſubjection. And therefore he doth ſo carefully preſs this point in his epiſtle to the Coloſſians, that Chriſt is not only to be preferred before all angels, but that he is alſo the author of all the good things that they have: to the end we ſhould not forſake him and turn unto them, who cannot ſufficiently help themſelves, but are fain to draw out of the ſame fountain that we do. Surely foraſmuch as there ſhineth in them a certain brightneſs of the majeſty of God, there is nothing to which we are more prone, than with a certain admiration to fall down in worſhipping of them, and to give unto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing John in the Revelation confeſſeth to have happened to himſelf, but he addeth withal, that he received this anſwer; "See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow-ſervant. Worſhip God."

Our frailty is the cauſe why God who might do all things for us by himſelf, doth ſo many things by the miniſtry of his angels.

11. But this danger we ſhall well beware of, if we do conſider why God uſeth rather by them, than by himſelf without their ſervice to declare his power, to provide for the ſafety of the faithful, and to communicate the gifts of his goodneſs among them. Surely he doth not this of neceſſity, as though he could not act without them: for ſo oft as pleaſeth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his work to paſs only with a beck: ſo far is he from needing any aſſiſtance from them in order to facilitate his work. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weakneſs, ſo that we want nothing that may avail our minds, either in raiſing them up in good hope, or confirming them in aſſurance. This one thing ought to be more than ſufficient for us, that the Lord declares that he himſelf is our protector. But while we ſee ourſelves beſet with ſo many dangers, with ſo many hurtful things, and with ſo many kinds of enemies, it may be (ſuch is our weakneſs and frailty) that we are ſometimes filled with trembling fear, or fall into deſpair, unleſs God, according to the proportion of our capacity, do make us to conceive his preſence with us. For this reaſon he not only promiſeth that he will take care of us himſelf, but alſo that he hath an innumerable guard of angels whom he hath charged to watch for our ſafety, and that ſo long as we are compaſſed with the garriſon and ſupport of them whatſoever danger happeneth, we are out of all reach of hurt. I grant we do wrong, when after this ſimple promiſe of the protection of God himſelf, we ſtill look about from whence other help may come unto us. But foraſmuch as it pleaſeth the Lord, of his infinite mercy and goodneſs, to help this our fault, there is no reaſon why we ſhould neglect ſo great a benefit of his. An example thereof we have in the ſervant of Eliſeus, who when he ſaw the hill beſieged with the army of the Syrians, and that there was no way left to eſcape, was ſtruck down with fear, as if his maſter and he were then utterly deſtroyed. Then Eliſeus prayed to God to open his ſervant's eyes, and by and by he ſaw the hill covered with horſes and fiery chariots, that is, with a multitude of angels to keep him and the prophet ſafe. 2 Kings vi. 17. Encouraged with this viſion, he gathered up his heart again, and was able with an undaunted mind to look down upon his enemies, with a ſight of whom he was before in a manner driven out of his ſenſes.

That which God doth uſe to relieve our weakneſs, muſt not cauſe us to diminiſh his glory.

12. Wherefore whatſoever is ſaid of the miniſtry of angels, let us apply it to this end, that overcoming all diſtruſt, our hope may be the more ſtrongly fixed in God. For theſe ſuccours are therefore provided us of God, that we ſhould not be terrified with the multitude of enemies, as though they could prevail againſt his help, but ſhould flie unto that ſaying of Eliſeus, that there are more on our ſide than be againſt us. How much then is it againſt order of reaſon, that we ſhould be led away from God by angels, who are ordained for this purpoſe, to teſtify that his help is more preſent among us? But they do lead us away indeed, if they do not ſtraight lead us as it were by the hand to him, that we may have eye unto, call upon, and publiſh him for our only helper: if we conſider not them to be as his hands that move themſelves to no work but by his direction: if they do not hold us faſt in the one mediator Chriſt, ſo that we may depend wholly upon, lean all upon him, be carried to him and reſt in him. For that which is deſcribed in the viſion of Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 12. ought to ſtick and be faſtened in our minds, how angels deſcend down to the earth unto men, and from men do go up to heaven by a ladder, whereupon ſtandeth the Lord of hoſts. Whereby is meant, that by the only interceſſion of Chriſt it cometh to paſs, that the miniſteries of the angels do come unto us, as he himſelf affirmeth, ſaying: "Hereafter ye ſhall ſee the "heavens open and the angels deſcending upon "the Son of Man," John i. 51. Therefore the ſervant of Abraham being committed to the cuſtody of the angel, (Gen xxiv. 7.) doth not therefore call upon the angel to help him, but aſſiſted with that commendation, he prayeth to the Lord, and beſeecheth him to ſhew his mercy to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them miniſters of his power and goodneſs, to the intent to part his glory with them: ſo doth he not therefore promiſe us his aſſiſtance in their miniſtration, that we ſhould divide our confidence between him and them. Let us therefore forſake that Platonical philoſophy, (Plato in Epynonide & Cratilo.) to ſeek the way of God by angels, and to honour them for this purpoſe, that they may make God more propitious unto us, which ſuperſtitious and curious men have from the beginning gone about, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

That which the ſcripture hath concerning devils is to make us watchful, not to diſcourage us.

13. As for ſuch things as the ſcripture teacheth concerning devils, they tend in a manner alſo to this end, that we may be careful to beware aforehand of their ſnares and preparations, and furniſh ourſelves with ſuch weapons as are ſtrong and ſure enough to drive away even the ſtrongeſt enemies. For whereas Satan is called the God and prince of the world, whereas he is named the ſtrong armed man, the ſpirit that hath power of the air, and a roaring lyon: theſe deſcriptions ſerve to no other purpoſe, but to make us more wary and watchful, and readier to enter in battle with him. Which is alſo ſometimes ſet out in expreſs words. For Peter, after he had ſaid, that the devil goeth about like a roaring lyon, ſeeking whom he may devour, by and by addeth this exhortation, "Whom reſiſt, ſtedfaſt in the faith." And Paul, after he had given warning that we wreſtle not with fleſh and blood, but with the princes of the air, the powers of darkneſs, and ſpiritual wickedneſſes, by and by exhorteth us to put on ſuch armour as may ſerve for ſo great and dangerous a conflict. Wherefore let us alſo apply all to this end, that being warned how there doth continually approach upon us an enemy, yea, an enemy that is in courage moſt hardy, in ſtrength moſt mighty, in cunning devices moſt ſubtle, in diligence and ſpeed indefatigable, with all ſorts of engines plenteouſly furniſhed, in ſkill of war moſt ready, we ſuffer not ourſelves by ſloth and cowardice to be ſurpriſed, but on the other ſide with bold and hardy minds ſet our foot to reſiſt him (and becauſe this war is only ended by death) encourage ourſelves to continue. But ſpecially knowing our own weakneſs and unſkilfulneſs, let us call upon the help of God and undertake nothing but upon truſt of him, foraſmuch as it is in him only to give us wiſdom, ſtrength, courage and armour.

14. And

The reaſon why ſometimes many devils, and ſometimes only one is mentioned.

14. And that we ſhould be the more ſtirred up and enforced ſo to do, the ſcripture warneth us, that there are not one or two or a few enemies, but great armies that make war with us. For it is ſaid, that Mary Magdalene (Mark xvi. 9.) was delivered from ſeven devils, wherewith ſhe was poſſeſſed. And Chriſt ſaith, (Matth. xii. 42.) that it is the ordinary cuſtom, that if after a devil be once caſt out, a man make the place open again, he bringeth ſeven ſpirits worſe than himſelf, and returneth into his poſſeſſion, finding it empty. Yea, it is ſaid (Luke viii. 30.) that a whole legion beſieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that we muſt fight with an infinite multitude of enemies, leſt deſpiſing the fewneſs of them, we ſhould be more ſlack to enter in battle, or thinking that we have ſome reſpite in the mean time granted, we ſhould give ourſelves to idleneſs. Whereas many times Satan or the devil is named in the ſingular number, thereby is meant that power of wickedneſs which ſtandeth againſt the kingdom of juſtice. For as the church and the fellowſhip of ſaints have Chriſt to their head, ſo the faction of the wicked is repreſented to us with their prince, who hath the principal authority among them. After which manner this is ſpoken, "Go, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire that "is prepared for the devil and his angels." Matth. xxv. 41.

The malice of Satan being ſuch as it is, we muſt have unappeaſable war with him.

15. Here alſo this ought to ſtir us up to a perpetual war with the devil, for that he is every where called the enemy of God and of us. For if we have a regard to God's glory, as it is meet we ſhould, then ought we with all our force to bend ourſelves againſt him, who goeth about to extinguiſh it. If we be diſpoſed to maintain the kingdom of Chriſt as we ought, then muſt we needs have an unappeaſable war with him who conſpireth the ruin thereof. Again, if any care of our own ſafety do touch us, then ought we to have neither peace nor truce with him who continually lieth in wait for the deſtruction of it. Such a one is he deſcribed in the third chapter of Geneſis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honour, and throweth man himſelf headlong into deſtruction. Such a one alſo is he ſet forth in the Evangeliſts, where he is called an enemy, and is ſaid to ſcatter tares, to corrupt the ſeed of eternal life. Mat. xiii. 28. In ſhort, that which Chriſt teſtifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherer, and a liar, John viii. 44. we find by experience in all his actions. For he corrupteth the truth of God with lies, obſcureth the light with darkneſs, entangleth the minds of men with errors, raiſeth up hatreds, kindleth contentions and ſtrifes, doth all things to this end to overthrow the kingdom of God, and drown men with himſelf in eternal perdition. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature froward, ſpiteful and malicious. For needs muſt there be great frowardneſs in that wit, that is made to oppoſe the glory of God and ſalvation of men. And that doth John ſpeak of in his epiſtle, when he writeth that he ſinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, leader and principal perpetratrator of all malice and wickedneſs.

Satan being at the firſt created good, hath ſwerved out of his kind by falling voluntarily from God.

16. But foraſmuch as the devil was created by God, let us remember that this malice which we aſcribe to his nature, is not by creation, but by depravation. For whatſoever damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himſelf by his own apoſtacy and fall: Which the ſcripture therefore gives us warning of, leaſt thinking that he came out ſuch a one from God, we ſhould aſcribe that to God himſelf which is fartheſt from him. For this reaſon doth Chriſt ſay that ſatan ſpeaketh of his own when he ſpeaketh lies, and addeth a cauſe why, "becauſe he abode not in the truth." John viii. 44. Now when he ſaith that he abode not in the truth, he ſheweth that once he had been in the truth. And when he maketh him the father of lying, he taketh this from him, that he cannot lay that fault to God whereof he himſelf is cauſe to himſelf. Although theſe things be but ſhortly and not very plainly ſpoken, yet this is enough for this purpoſe, to deliver the majeſty of God from all ſlander, And what does it avail to know more or to any other purpoſe concerning devils? Many perhaps do grudge, that the ſcripture doth not orderly and diſtinctly in many places ſet forth the fall, and the cauſe, manner, time, and faſhion, thereof. But becauſe theſe things do not concern us, it was better, if not to be ſuppreſſed wholly, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly, becauſe it was not beſeeming for the holy Ghoſt to feed curioſity with vain hiſtories without any fruit: and we ſee that it was the Lord's purpoſe to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we ſhould learn to edification. Therefore, leſt we ourſelves should tarry long upon things superfluous, let us be content shortly to know thus much concerning the natures of devils that at the first creation they were the angels of God; but by departing wholly from God and goodness they both destroyed themselves and are become instruments of destruction to others. Thus much, because it was profitable to be known, is plainly taught in Peter and Jude. God spared not (say they) his angels which had sinned, and kept not their first state, but had forsaken their dwelling place. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude i. 6. And Paul naming the elect angels, doth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate angels in comparison against them. 1 Tim. v. 20.

That Satan stubbornly resisteth God, it is by God's own permission: but the will of God disposeth the effects which come from Satan, and turneth them to good.

17. As for the discord and strife that we say is between God and Satan, we must so understand it that still we hold this for certain, that he can do nothing but by the will and permission of God. For we read in the history of Job, (Job i. 6. and ii. 1.) that he presented himself before God to receive his commandments, and durst not go forward to do any enterprise till he had obtained leave. So when Ahab was to be deceived (1 Kings xxii. 29.) he took upon him that he would be the spirit of lying in the mouth of all the prophets, and so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the evil spirit of the Lord that tormented Saul, 1 Sam. xvi. 14. and xviii. 10. because by him as with a scourge the sins of the wicked king were punished. And in another place it is written, (Psalm xxxiv.) that the plagues were laid upon the Egyptians by the evil angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testify, that the blinding of the wicked is the work of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. 2 Thess. ii. 9. It is evident therefore that Satan is under the power of God, and so governed by his authority that he is compelled to do him service. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, that the works of Satan disagree with the works of God, we do therewithal affirm that this disagreement and strife depends on the permission of God. I speak not now of his will, nor of his endeavour, but of the effect only. For since the devil is wicked of nature, he is not inclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly carried to stubbornness and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himself and of his own wickedness, that of desire and purpose he opposeth God. And by this wickedness he is stirred up to the undertaking those things which he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tied and restrained by the bridle of his power, he executeth only those things that are permitted him by God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to apply his service whithersoever God compelleth him.

Satan beareth not full sway over the faithful, over the wicked he reigneth at pleasure.

18. Now because God boweth the unclean spirits hither and thither as he pleaseth, he so manages this government, that they exercise the faithful with battle, they set upon them out of ambushes, they assault them with invasions, they press them with fighting, and oftentimes weary them, trouble them, make them afraid, and sometimes wound them, but never overcome nor oppress them. But the wicked they subdue and draw away, they reign upon their souls and bodies, and abuse them as bond-slaves to all mischievous deeds. As for the faithful because they are disturbed by such enemies, therefore they hear these exhortations. Do not give place to the devil. Eph. iv. 27. The devil your enemy goeth about as a roaring lyon, seeking whom he may devour, whom resist ye being strong in faith, 1 Pet. v. 8. and such like. Paul confesseth (2 Cor. xii. 7.) that he himself was not free from this kind of strife, when he saith, that for a remedy to tame pride, the angel of Satan was given to him by whom he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Satan's head, Gen. iii. 15. pertaineth generally to Christ, and to all his members, therefore, I say, that the faithful can never be overcome nor oppressed by him. They are many times struck down, but they are never so confounded withal, but that they recover themselves. They fall down many times with violence of strokes, but but they are afterwards raised up again: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they so labour in all the course of their life that in the end they obtain the victory: but I speak not this concerning every action of theirs. For we know that by the just vengeance of God David was for a time given over to Satan, by his motion to number the people: 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. & not without cause Paul saith there is hope of pardon, although any have been entangled with the snares of the devil. Therefore in another place the same apostle saith, that the promise above alleged is begun in this life, wherein we must wrestle, and is performed after our wrestling is ended:

when he ſaith, Rom. xvi. 20. the God of peace ſhall ſhortly bruiſe Satan under you feet. This victory hath always fully been in our head Chriſt, becauſe the prince of the world had nothing in him, but in us that are his members it doth now partly appear, and ſhall be perfectted when being unclothed of our fleſh by which we are yet ſubject to weakneſs, we ſhall be full of the power of the holy Ghoſt: in this manner when the kingdom of Chriſt is raiſed up and advanced, Satan with his power falleth down, as the Lord himſelf ſaith, Luke x. 18. "I ſaw Satan fall as lightening from heaven." For by this anſwer he confirmeth that which the apoſtles had reported of the power of his preaching. Again, Luke xii. 21. "When the prince poſſeſſeth "his own palace, all things that he poſſeſſeth are "in peace, but when their cometh a ſtronger, he "is caſt out, &c." And to this end Chriſt in dying overcame Satan who had the power of death, and triumphed upon all his armies, that they ſhould not hurt the church, for otherwiſe they would every moment an hundred times deſtroy it. For (conſidering what is our weakneſs, and what is his furious ſtrength) how could we ſtand, yea never ſo little time, againſt his manifold and continual aſſaults, but being ſupported by the victory of our captain? Therefore God ſuffereth not the devil to reign over the ſouls of the faithful, but only delivereth him the wicked and unbelieving to govern, whom God doth not vouchſafe to have reckoned in his flock. For it is ſaid, that he poſſeſſeth this world without controverſy till he be thruſt out by Chriſt. Again, 2 Cor. iv. 4. that he doth blind all them that believe not the goſpel. Again, that he performeth his work in the ſtubborn children, Eph. ii. 2. and deſervedly, for all the wicked are the veſſels of his wrath. Therefore, to whom ſhould they be rather ſubject than to the miniſter of God's vengeance? Finally, they are ſaid to be of their father the devil, John viii. 44. becauſe as the faithful are hereby known to be the children of God, 1 Joh. iii. 8. becauſe they bear his image: ſo they by the image of Satan into which they are wholly fallen, are properly diſcerned to be his children.

Devils are really ſubſiſting ſpirits, and not affections only, or perturbations of the mind.

19. As we have before confuted that trifling philoſophy concerning the holy angels, which teacheth that they are nothing elſe but good inſpirations or motions, which God ſtirreth up in the minds of men: ſo in this place muſt we confute them who fondly ſay, that devils are nothing elſe but evil affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thruſt into us by our fleſh. That may we ſhortly do, becauſe there are many teſtimonies of ſcripture, and thoſe plain enough upon this point. Firſt, where the unclean ſpirits are called angels, apoſtates, who have departed wholly from their original, the very names do ſufficiently expreſs, that they are not motions or affections of minds, but rather indeed, as they are called, minds or ſpirits endowed with ſenſe and underſtanding. Likewiſe, whereas both Chriſt and John do compare the children of God with the children of the devil: were it not an unfit compariſon, if the name of the devil ſignified nothing elſe but evil inſpirations? And John addeth ſomewhat more plainly, that the devil ſinneth from the beginning. Likewiſe when Jude bringeth in Michael the archangel fighting with the devil, doubtleſs he ſetteth againſt the good angel an evil and rebellious angel. With which agreeth that which is read in the hiſtory of Job, (Job i. 6.) that Satan appeared with the holy angels before God. But moſt plain of all are thoſe places which make mention of the puniſhment which they begin to feel by the judgment of God, and ſpecially ſhall feel at the reſurrection. Matth. viii. 29. "Son of David, "why art thou come before the time to torment "us?" Again, Matth. xxv. 41. "Go, ye curſed, "into everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil and "and his angels." Again, Jude 19. "If he ſpared "not his own angels that had ſinned, but caſt them "down into hell, and delivered them into chains "of darkneſs, to be kept unto damnation, &c." How fond ſhould theſe ſpeeches be, that the devils are ordained to eternal judgment, that fire is prepared for them, that they are now already prepared, for them, that they are now already tormented and vexed by the glory of Chriſt, if there were no devils at all? But becauſe the matter needeth no diſputation among them who believe the word of the Lord, and little good is done with teſtimonies of ſcripture among thoſe vain ſtudents of ſpeculation, whom nothing pleaſeth but that which is new: I ſuppoſe I have performed that which I purpoſed, that is, that the godly minds ſhould be furniſhed againſt ſuch fond errors, wherewith unquiet men do trouble both themſelves and others who are more ſimple. But it was good to touch this, leſt any entangled with that error, while they think they have none to ſtand againſt them, ſhould wax more ſlow and unprovided to reſiſt.

20. In the mean time time let it not be wearifome unto us, in this ſo beautiful a ſtage to take godly delight of the manifeſt and ordinary works of God. For, as I have elſewhere already ſaid, though this be not the chief, yet is it in order the firſt doctrine of faith, to remember, that what way ſoever we turn our eyes, all that we ſee are the works of God, and with godly conſideration to conſider for what end God did make them. Therefore that we may conceive by faith ſo much as behoveth us to know of God, it is good firſt of all to learn the hiſtory of the creation of the world, how it is ſhortly related by Moſes, and afterwards more largely ſet out by holy men, ſpecially by Baſil and Ambroſe. From thence we ſhall learn that God by the power of his Word and Spirit created the heavens and the earth out of nothing, and thence produced all living creatures, and things without life, with marvellous order diſpoſed the innumerable variety of things, to every thing he gave the proper nature, aſſigned their offices, appointed their places and habitations, and whereas all things are ſubject to corruption, yet hath he ſo provided, that of all ſorts ſome ſhall be preſerved to the laſt day, and therefore ſome he cheriſheth by ſecret means, and poureth now and then as it were a new livelineſs into them, and to ſome he hath given the power to increaſe by generation, that in their dying that whole kind ſhould not die together. So hath he marvellouſly garniſhed the heaven and the earth, with ſo abſolutely perfect plenty, variety and beauty of all things as poſſibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous houſe furniſhed and ſtored with abundance of moſt finely choſen ſtuff; laſt of all, how in framing man and adorning him with ſo goodly beauty, and with ſo many and ſo great gifts, he hath ſhewed in him the moſt excellent example of all his works. But becauſe it is not my purpoſe at this preſent to ſet forth at large the creation of the world, let it ſuffice to have once again touched theſe few things by the way. For it is better, as I have already warned the readers, to draw a fuller underſtanding of this matter out of Moſes, and others that have faithfully and diligently conveyed the hiſtory of the world by writing to perpetual memory.

The firſt thing that we are to conſider attentively when we behold the heaven and the earth is, what attributes of God there are preſented to be ſeen in creatures.

21. It is to no purpoſe, to make much ado in diſputing, to what end the conſideration of the works of God ought to tend, or to what mark it ought to be applied: foraſmuch as in other places already a great part of this queſtion is declared, and ſo much as belongeth to our preſent purpoſe may in few words be determined. Truly if we had a mind to ſet out as it is worthy, how ineſtimable wiſdom, power, juſtice, and goodneſs of God appeareth in the framing of the world, no eloquence, no garniſhment of ſpeech could ſuffice the largeneſs of ſo great a matter. And no doubt it is God's pleaſure that we ſhould be continually occupied in ſo holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glaſſes the infinite riches of his wiſdom, juſtice, bounty and power, we ſhould not run over them, as it were with a flying eye, or with a vain wandering look, as I may ſo call it, but that we ſhould with conſideration dwell long upon them, revolve them earneſtly and faithfully in our minds, and oft repeat them, with remembrance But becauſe we are now employed in that kind of writing that relates to order of teaching, it is proper we omit thoſe things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be ſhort, let the readers know that then they have conceived by faith, what this meaneth that God is the creator of heaven and earth, if they firſt follow this univerſal rule, diligently to attend to and perpetually to call to mind thoſe excellencies which God preſenteth to be ſeen in his works then, that they ſo learn to apply themſelves that they may therewith be throughly moved in their hearts. The firſt of thoſe we do when we conſider how excellent an artificer's work it was to place and aptly ſet in ſo well diſpoſed order the multitude of the ſtars that is in heaven, that nothing can be deviſed more beautiful to behold: to ſet and fix ſome of them in their ſtations ſo that they cannot move, and to other ſome, to grant a free courſe, but ſo that moving they wander not beyond their appointed ſpace, ſo to temper the motion of them all, that it may divide in meaſure the days and nights, months, years, and ſeaſons of the year, and to bring this inequality of days which we daily ſee to ſuch a tempered order, that it hath no confuſion. Likewiſe, when we obſerve his power in ſuſtaining ſo great a body, in governing the ſo ſwift whirling about of the engine of heaven, and ſuch like. For theſe few examples do ſufficiently declare what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For elſe, if I ſhould labour as I ſaid, to expreſs it all in words, I ſhould never make an end, foraſmuch as there are ſo many miracles of the power of God, ſo many tokens of his goodneſs, ſo many examples of his wiſdom, as there are forms of things in the world, yea as there are things either great or ſmall.

The effect of our conſidering the creatures of God muſt be the feeling of his goodneſs toward ourſelves, and our growing thereby in faith, hope and godlineſs.

22. Now remaineth the other part which cometh nearer to faith, that while we conſider that God hath ordained all things for our protection and ſafety, and therewithal do feel his power and grace in our ſelves, and in ſo great good things that he hath beſtowed upon us: we may thereby ſtir up ourſelves to the truſt, invocation, praiſe and love of him. Now, as I have before ſaid, God himſelf hath ſhewed in the very order of creation, that for man's ſake he created all things. For it is not without cauſe that he divided the making of the world into ſix days, whereas it had been as eaſy for him in one moment to have in all points accompliſhed his whole work, as it was by ſuch proceeding from piece to piece to come to the end of it. But then it pleaſed him to ſhew his providence and fatherly care towards us, that before he made man he prepared all that he foreſaw ſhould be profitable for him and fit for his preſervation. How great unthankfulneſs now ſhould it be to doubt, whether this good Father doth care for us, whom we ſee to have been careful for us ere that we were born? How wicked were it to tremble for diſtruſt leſt his goodneſs would at any time leave us deſtitute in neceſſity, which we ſee was diſplayed for us being not yet born, with great abundance of all good things? Beſide that we hear by Moſes that by his liberality all that ever is in the world is made ſubject to us. Gen. i. 26. and i. 29. Sure it is that he did it not to mock us with an empty name of gift. Therefore we ſhall never lack any thing, ſo far as it ſhall be available for our preſervation. Finally, to make an end, ſo oft as we name God the creator of heaven and earth let this come in our minds withal, that the diſpoſition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand and power, and that we are his children whom he hath taken into his own charge and keeping to nouriſh and bring up: that we may look for all good things at his hand, and aſſuredly, that he will never ſuffer us to want ſuch things as are needful for our ſafety, to the end our hope ſhould depend upon no other but himſelf: that whatſoever we deſire, our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing ſoever we receive profit, we may acknowlege it to be his benefit, and confeſs it with thankſgiving: that being allured with ſo great ſweetneſs of his goodneſs and liberality, we may ſtudy to love and honour him with all our heart.

CHAP. XV.

What a one man was created: wherein there is treated of the powers of the ſoul, of the image of God, of free-will, and of the firſt integrity of nature.

Man's firſt excellency doth ſtop their mouths who blame God with man's fall, and his being made ſo excellent out of the earth, doth both humble him, and commend his maker.

NOW muſt we ſpeak of the creation of man, not only becauſe he is among all the works of God the moſt noble and moſt excellent example of his juſtice, wiſdom and goodneſs: but alſo becauſe, as we have ſaid in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, unleſs we have withal a mutual knowlege of ourſelves. Although the ſame knowlege be of two ſorts, the one know what we were created at the firſt beginning, the other to know what our eſtate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to ſmall profit for us to know our creation, unleſs we did alſo in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformity of our nature;) yet at this time we will be content with a deſcription of our nature when it was pure. And before we deſcend to this miſerable eſtate whereunto man is now in thraldom, it is good to learn what a one he was created at the beginning. For we muſt take heed that in preciſely declaring only the natural evils of man, we ſeem not to impute them to the Author of nature. For ungodlineſs thinketh herſelf to have ſufficient defence in this colour, if it may lay for herſelf that whatſoever fault ſhe hath, the ſame did after a certain maner proceed from God, and ſticketh not if ſhe be accuſed, to quarrel with God, and to lay the fault upon him whereof ſhe is worthily accuſed. And they that would ſeem to ſpeak ſomewhat more reverently of the majeſty of God, yet do willingly ſeek to excuſe their own wickedneſs by nature, not conſidering that therein though not openly, they blame God alſo, to whoſe reproach, it ſhould fall if it were proved that there is any fault in nature. Since then we see that our flesh casteth about for all the ways to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her own evils may any way be put off from her, we must diligently labour to meet with this mischief. Therefore we must so handle the calamity of mankind, that we cut off all excuse, and deliver the justice of God from all accusation. Afterward in place convenient we shall see how far men are now from that pureness that was given to Adam. And first, we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a bridle was put upon his pride, for there is no greater absurdity, than for them to glory in their excellency, who do not only dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselves in part but earth and ashes. but forasmuch as God did not not only vouchsafe to give life unto an earthen vessel, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortal spirit, Adam might justly glory in so great liberality of his maker.

The soul of man many ways proved to be a spiritual and immortal substance.

2. Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soul and body, and by the name of soul I mean an immortal essence and yet created, which is the nobler part of him. Sometimes it is called the spirit. Although when these two names soul and spirit are joined together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when spirit is set by itself, it meaneth as much as soul. As when Solomon, Eccl. xii. 7. speaking of death, saith that then the spirit returneth to him that gave it. And Christ commending his spirit to his father, Luke xxiii. 46. and Stephen his spirit to Christ, Acts vii. 59. do both mean none other thing, but that when the soul is delivered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetual keeper of it. As for them who imagine that the soul is therefore called a spirit, because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essence: but the thing itself, and all the scripture sheweth, that they do grosly err. True it is, that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to be, they wax dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lights they are blinded with darkness, so that they do not think upon this, that they shall remain alive after death. And yet is not the light so quenched in darkness, but that they are touched with some feeling of immortality. Surely the conscience which discerning between good and evil, answereth the judgment of God, is an undoubted sign of an immortal Spirit. For how could a motion without essence attain to come to the judgment seat of God, and throw it self into fear by finding her own guiltiness? For the body is not moved with fear of a spiritual pain, but that falleth only upon the soul. Whereby it followeth, that the soul hath an essence. Moreover the very knowlege of God doth prove that the souls which ascend up above the world are immortal; for a vanishing liveliness were not able to attain to the fountain of life. Finally, forasmuch as so many excellent gifts wherewith man's mind is endowed, doth proclaim that there is some divine thing engraven in it, there are even so many testimonies of an immortal essence. For that sense which is in brute beasts, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently before it. But the nimbleness of the mind of man which vieweth the heaven and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in understanding and memory, digesteth every thing in order, and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainly shew that there lieth hidden in man a certain thing distinct from the body. We conceive by understanding the invisible God and angels, which the body cannot do. We know things that are right, just, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the spirit is the seat of this understanding. Yea, and our sleep itself, which astonishes a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plain proof of immortality, forasmuch as it doth not only minister unto us, thoughts of those things that never were done, but also the foreknowlege of future events. I touch these things shortly, which even profane writers do excellently set out with greater embellishment of words; but with the godly readers a simple putting in mind of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soul were not a certain thing by itself distinct from the body, the scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remove out of the tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put off that which is corruptible, finally at the last day we may receive reward every man as he hath behaved himself in his body. For these places and others that we do every where commonly light upon, do not only manifestly distinguish the soul from the body, but also in giving to the soul the name of man do shew that it is the principal part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithful, 1 Cor. vii. 1. to cleanse themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and the spirit, he maketh two parts of man, in which abideth the filthiness of sin. And Peter, where (1 Pet. ii. 25.)

ii. 25.) he calleth Chriſt the ſhepherd and biſhop of ſouls, ſhould have ſpoken fondly if there were no ſouls about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conveniently ſtand together which he ſaith (1 Pet. i. 9.) of the eternal ſalvation of ſouls, and where he biddeth to cleanſe our ſouls, 1 Pet. i. 3. and where he ſaith that evil deſires do fight againſt the ſoul, and where the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, (Heb. xiii. 16.) ſaith, that the paſtors do watch that they may yield account for our ſouls, unleſs it were true that ſouls had a proper eſſence. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth it that Paul calleth God for witneſs to his own ſoul, becauſe it could not be called in judgment before God unleſs it were ſubject to puniſhment. And this is alſo more plainly expreſſed in the words of Chriſt, Luke xii. 5. when he biddeth us to fear him, who after that he hath killed the body, can caſt the ſoul into hell fire. Now where the auther of the epiſtle to the Hebrews doth diſtinguiſh the fathers of our fleſh from God, who is the only Father of ſpirits, he would not otherwiſe more plainly affirm the eſſence of ſouls. Moreover, if the ſouls remained not alive being delivered from the priſons of their bodies, Chriſt ſhould very fondly have brought in the ſoul of Lazarus joying in the boſom of Abraham, and again, the ſoul of the rich man ſubject to horrible torments, Luke xvi. 22. The ſame thing doth Paul confirm, when he teacheth, that we wander abroad from God, ſo long as we dwell in the fleſh, and that we enjoy his preſence being out of the fleſh. 2 Cor. v. But, becauſe I will not be long in a matter that is not obſcure, I will add only this out of Luke, (Acts xxiii. 8.) that it is reckoned among the errors of the Sadducees, that they did not believe that there were any ſpirits and angels.

Man was created like to God, not in the faſhion of his body, nor becauſe he was framed at the firſt according to the ſhape which the Son of God ſhould afterwards take upon him: nor becauſe he was like unto Chriſt, who is properly God's Image, but becauſe in his firſt integrity he reſembled the excellency of his creator.

3. Alſo a ſtrong proof hereof may be gathered of this, where it is ſaid, that man is created like to the image of God. For altho' the glory of God do appear in the outward ſhape of man, yet it is no doubt that the proper ſeat of the image of God is in the Soul. I do not deny that as concerning our outward ſhape, inaſmuch as the ſame doth diſtinguiſh and ſeparate us from brute beaſts, we do alſo therein more nearly approach to God than they: neither will I much ſtand againſt them who think that this is to be accounted of the image of God, that where all other living creatures do in a grovelling manner behold the ground, to man is given an upright face, and he is commanded to look upon the heaven, and to raiſe his countenance toward the ſtars: ſo that this remains certain, that the image of God which appeareth or ſhineth in theſe outward ſigns, is ſpritual. For Oſiander (whom his writings declare to have been in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the image of God without difference, as well to the body as to the Soul, mingleth heaven and earth together. For he ſaith, that the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghoſt did ſettle their image in man, becauſe though Adam had ſtood without falling yet ſhould Chriſt have become man. And ſo by their opinion the body that was appointed for Chriſt, was but an example or figure of that bodily ſhape which then was formed. But where ſhall we find that Chriſt is the image of the ſpirit? I grant indeed that in the perſon of the mediator ſhineth the glory of the whole Godhead. But how ſhall the eternal Word be called the image of the Spirit, whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it overthroweth the diſtinction between the Son and holy Ghoſt, if he do here call him his image. Moreover, I would fain learn of him how Chriſt doth reſemble the holy Ghoſt in the fleſh that he took upon him, and by what marks and features he doth expreſs the likeneſs of him. And whereas the ſaying, Let us make man after our image, Gen. i. 16. doth alſo belong to the perſon of the Son, it followeth, that he muſt be the image of himſelf, which is againſt all reaſon. Beſide that if Oſiander's invention be believed, man was faſhioned only after the figure and pattern of Chriſt in that he was man, and ſo that form out of which Adam was taken was Chriſt, in that that he was to be clothed with fleſh, whereas the ſcripture in a far other meaning teacheth, that he was made after the image of God. But their ſubtle invention is more colourable who do thus expound it, that Adam was created in the image of God, becauſe he was faſhioned like unto Chriſt, who is the only image of God. But that expoſition alſo is not ſound. Alſo ſome interpreters make a great diſputation about image and likeneſs, while they ſeek a difference between thoſe two words, where is no difference at all, ſaying that this word likeneſs is added to expound the other. Firſt, we know that among the Hebrews ſuch repetitions are common where they expreſs one thing twice: and in the thing itſelf there is no doubt, bnt that man is therefore called the image mage of God, becauſe he is like to God, Whereby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, who do ſo ſubtilly argue about the words, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to ſay, image, in the ſubſtance of the ſoul, or Demuth, that is to ſay, likeneſs in the qualities, or what other thing ſoever it be that they teach. For whereas God determined to create man after his own image, this being ſomewhat darkly ſpoken, he doth as by way of explication repeat it in this ſaying, After his likeneſs: as if he would have ſaid, that he would make man, in whom he would repreſent himſelf as in an image, becauſe of the marks of likeneſs graven in him. And therefore Moſes a little after reciting the ſame thing, doth repeat the image of God twice, leaving out the name of likeneſs. And it is a trifling objection that Oſiander maketh, that not a part of man, or the ſoul only with the gifts thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam who had his name given him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling I ſay, will all readers that have their ſound judgment reckon this an objection. Forwhere whole man is called mortal, yet is not the ſoul thereby made ſubject to mortality. Again, where he is called a living creature endowed with reaſon, it is not thereby meant, that the body hath reaſon and underſtanding. Although therefore the ſoul is not the whole man, yet it is not inconvenient, that man in reſpect of the ſoul be called the image of God, although I hold ſtill that principle which I have before eſtabliſhed, that the image of God extendeth to the whole excellency, whereby the nature of man hath pre-eminence among all kind of living creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integrity that man had when he was endowed with right underſtanding, when he had his affection framed according to reaſon, and all his ſenſes governed in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truly reſemble the excellency of his creator. And though the principal ſeat of the image of God were in the mind and heart, or in the ſoul and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not ſo much as the body, wherein did not ſome ſparks thereof appear. Certain it is that alſo in all the parts of the world, there do ſhine ſome reſemblance of the glory of God: whereby we may gather that where it is ſaid, that his image is in man, there is in ſo ſaying a certain ſecret compariſon, that advanceth man above all other creatures, and doth as it were diſtinguiſh him from the common ſort. Neither is it to be denied, that the angels were made after the likeneſs of God; ſince (as Chriſt himſelf teſtifieth, Matth. xxii. 30.) our chief perfection ſhall be to become like unto them. But not without cauſe doth Moſes by that peculiar title ſet forth the grace of God toward us, ſpecially, where he compareth only viſible creatures with men.

4. But yet it ſeemeth that there is not given a full definition of the image of God, unleſs it more clearly appear in what qualities man excelleth: and whereby he ought to be counted a glaſs, reſembling the glory of God. But that can be by no other thing better known, than by the repairing of man's corrupted nature. Firſt, It is doubtleſs, that when Adam fell from his eſtate, he was by that departure eſtranged from God. Wherefore altho, we grant that the image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it ſo corrupted, that all that remaineth, is but ugly deformity. Therefore the beginning of recovery of ſafety for us, is in that reſtoring which we obtain by Chriſt, who is alſo for the ſame cauſe called the ſecond Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 14. becauſe he reſtored us unto true and perfect integrity. For altho' where Paul doth in compariſon ſet the quickening Spirit that Chriſt giveth to the faithful, againſt the living ſoul wherein Adam was created, he ſetteth forth the more abundant meaſure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principal point, that this is the end of our regeneration, that Chriſt ſhould new-faſhion us to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, Col. iii. 10. that the new man is renewed according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeth this ſaying: Put on the new man who is created according to God, Eph. iv. 24. Now it is to be ſeen what Paul doth principally comprehend under this renewing. Firſt, He ſpeaketh of knowlege, and after of pure righteouſneſs and holineſs. Whereby we gather that the image of God was firſt of all to be ſeen in the light of the mind, in the uprightneſs of the heart, and ſoundneſs of all the parts. For altho' I grant that this is a figurative phraſe of ſpeech to ſet the part for the whole: yet cannot this principle be overthrown, that that thing which is the chief in the renewing image of God, was alſo the principal in the creation of him. And for the ſame purpoſe maketh it that in another place he teacheth, 2 Cor. iii. 18. That we, beholding the glory of God with open face, are transformed into the ſame image. Now do we ſee how Chriſt is the moſt perfect image of God, according to which we being faſhioned faſhioned are ſo reſtored, that in true godlineſs, righteouſneſs, pureneſs, and underſtanding, we bear the image of God. Which principle being eſtabliſhed, Oſiander's imagination of the ſhape of our body doth eaſily vaniſh away of itſelf. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the image and glory of God, 1 Cor. xi. 7. and the woman is excluded from that degree of honour, it appeareth by the reſt of the text, that the ſame is to be applyed only to civil order of policy. But that under the name of image, whereof we ſpeak, is comprehended all that belongeth to the ſpiritual and eternal life, I think is already ſufficiently proved. And the ſame thing doth John, (John i. 4.) confirm in other words; ſaying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternal Word of God was the light of men. For where his purpoſe was to praiſe the ſingular grace of God, whereby man excelleth all living creatures, to diſtinguiſh him from the common ſort, becauſe he hath attained no common life, but joined with the light of underſtanding, he therewithal ſheweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore ſince the image of God is the uncorrupted excellency of the nature of the nature of man, which ſhined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was ſo corrupted and almoſt defaced, that nothing remaineth ſince that ruin, but what is diſordered, mangled, and filthily ſpotted: yet the ſame doth in ſome part appear in the elect, in ſo much as they are regenerate, and ſhall obtain its full brightneſs in heaven. But that we may know on what parts it conſiſteth, it will be proper to treat of the powers of the ſoul. For that ſpeculative device of Auguſtine (lib. de tri. 10. de civi. dei. 11.) is not found, where he ſaith, that the ſoul is a glaſs of the Trinity, becauſe that there are in it underſtanding, will, and memory. Neither is their opinion to be approved, who ſet the image of God in the power of dominion given unto him, as if he reſembled God only in this mark, that he is appointed Lord and poſſeſſor of all things, whereas indeed the image of God is properly to be ſought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the ſoul.

The excellency wherein man reſembleth God, conſiſteth in knowlege, and holineſs, not in the number of the faculties of his mind, nor in the power which God gave him over other creatures.

Man was not made in the likeneſs of God becauſe his ſoul was a portion of the Godhead, or becauſe the eſſential juſtice of God was poured into him.

5. But before I go any further, it is needful that I meet with the doting error of the Manichees, which Servetus hath attempted to bring in again in this age. Where it is ſaid, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, Gen. ii. 7. They thought that the ſoul did convey into man the ſubſtance of God, as if ſome portion of the immeaſurable God were come into man. But it is eaſy even ſhortly to ſhow how many groſs and foul abſurdities this deviliſh error draweth with it. For if the ſoul be by derivation part of the eſſence of God, it ſhall follow that the nature of God is ſubject, not only to change and paſſions, but alſo to ignorance, evil luſts, weakneſs, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconſtant than man, becauſe contrary motions do toſs and diverſly drown his ſoul, oftentimes he is blinded by ignorance, frequently he yieldeth as vanquiſhed even to ſmall temptations, and we know that the ſoul itſelf is the ſink and receiver of all filthineſs, all which things we muſt aſcribe to the nature of God, if we grant that the ſoul is of the eſſence of God, or a ſecret inflowing of Godhead. Who would not abhor this monſtrous device? Truly indeed doth Paul alledge out of Aratus, Acts xvii. 28. that we are the offſpring of God, but in quality and not in ſubſtance, inaſmuch as he hath garniſhed us with godly gifts. But in the mean time, to tear in ſunder the eſſence of the Creator, as to ſay, that every man doth poſſeſs a part of it, is too much madneſs. Therefore we muſt certainly hold, that the ſouls, altho' the image of God be graven in them, were no leſs created than the angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one ſubſtance into another, but a beginning of eſſence made of nothing. And altho' the ſpirit of man came from God, and in departing out of the fleſh returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be ſaid, that it was taken out of his ſubſtance. And in this point alſo Oſiander, while he glorieth in his illuſions, hath entangled himſelf with an ungodly error, not acknowleging the image of God to be in man without his eſſential juſtice, as tho' God by the ineſtimable power of his holy Spirit could not make us like unto himſelf, unleſs Chriſt ſhould ſubſtantially pour himſelf into us. With whatſoever colour many do go about to diſguiſe theſe deceits, yet ſhall they never ſo beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wits, but that they will eaſily ſee that theſe things ſavour of the Manichees error. And where ſaint Paul treateth of the reſtoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like form to God, not by inflowing of his ſubſtance, but by grace and power of his Spirit. For he ſaith, 2 Cor. iii. 18. That in beholding the glory of Chriſt, we are transformed into the ſame image, as by the Spirit of God, which ſurely ſo worketh in us, that it maketh us not of one ſubſtance with God.

6. It were but folly to borrow of the philoſophers a definition of the ſoul, of whom almoſt none, except

except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortal ſubſtance. Indeed ſome other alſo, that is, the Socratics, do touch it, but ſo as none doth plainly teach that to other, which himſelf was not perſuaded. But therefore is Plato of the better judgment, becauſe he doth in the ſoul conſider the image of God. Some other do ſo bind the powers and virtues of the ſoul to this preſent life, that being out of the body they leave to it nothing. Now we have already taught from the Scripture, that it is an incorporeal ſubſtance: now muſt we add that altho' properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is ſet in the body, and doth there dwell as in a houſe, not only to miniſter life to all the parts of the body, and to make the inſtruments thereof meet and fitly ſerving for the actions that they are appointed for, but alſo to bear the chief office in governing the life of man, and that not only about the duties in this earthly life, but alſo to ſtir us up to the ſervice of God. Altho' this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceived, yet even in the vices themſelves there remain imprinted ſome leavings thereof. For whence cometh it but of ſhame, that men have ſo great care what be reported of them? And whence cometh ſhame, but of regard of honeſty? Whereof the beginning and cauſe is, that they underſtand that they are naturally born to obſerve juſtice, in which perſuaſion is incloſed the ſeed of religion. For as without all controverſy man was made to meditation of the heavenly life: ſo is it certain, that the knowlege thereof was engraven in his ſoul. And ſurely man ſhould want the principal uſe of his underſtanding, if he ſhould be ignorant of his own felicity, whereof the perfection is, that he be joined with God, and therefore it is the chief action of the ſoul to aſpire thereunto. And ſo the more that every man ſtudieth to approach unto God, the more he thereby proveth himſelf to be endued with reaſon. As for them who would have divers ſouls in man, that is, a feeling ſoul, and a reaſonable ſoul, altho' they ſeem to ſay ſomewhat by reaſon proveable, yet becauſe there is no ſtedfaſt certainty in their reaſons, we muſt reject them, unleſs we had a mind to vex ourſelves in things trifling and unprofitable. A great diſagreement ſay they, there is between the inſtrumental motions and the part of the ſoul endued with reaſon. As tho' reaſon itſelf did not alſo diſſent from itſelf, and ſome devices of it do ſtrive with other ſome, as they were armies of enemies. But foraſmuch as that troubleſomeneſs proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amiſs to gather thereby, that there are two ſouls, becauſe the powers of the ſoul do not agree together, in ſuch well-framed order as they ought. But as for more ſubtile diſputation of the powers themſelves, I leave that to the philoſophers. A ſimple definition ſhall ſuffice us for edification of godlineſs. I grant that the things that they teach are true, and not only pleaſant but alſo profitable to be known, and well gathered of them, and I forbid not ſuch as are deſirous to learn to ſtudy them. Firſt therefore, I admit that there are five ſenſes, which Plato (in Theæteto) choſe to call inſtruments, whereby all objects are poured into common ſenſe, as into a place of receipt: then followeth phantaſy, which judgeth thoſe things one from other that common ſenſe hath conceived: next is reaſon, to which belongeth the univerſal judgment of things: laſt, is the underſtanding mind, which with earneſtly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all thoſe things, that reaſon is wont to diſcourſe upon, and conſider. And to the underſtanding mind, reaſon and fancy, which are the three powers of the ſoul, that reſt in knowlege; (Ariſt. Ethicorum lib. 1. ca. ult. Item lib. 6. ca. 2.) there do anſwer three other that do reſt in appetite, that is to ſay, will, the parts whereof are to covet thoſe things that the underſtanding mind and reaſon do lay before it: the power of anger, which catcheth thoſe things that reaſon and fancy do miniſter unto it. The power of deſiring, which taketh hold of theſe things that fancy and ſenſe preſenteth it. Altho' theſe things be true, or at the leaſt likely to be true, yet becauſe I fear that they ſhall more entangle us with obſcureneſs, than further us, I think it beſt to paſs them over. If any man, chuſe otherwiſe to divide the powers of the ſoul, and to call the one the power of appetite, which altho' it be without reaſon itſelf, yet doth obey reaſon, if it be by other mean directed, and to call the other the power of underſtanding, which is by itſelf partaker of reaſon, I am not much againſt it, neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to ſay, ſenſe, underſtanding, and appetite. But let us rather chuſe a diviſion, that is within the capacity of all men, which cannot be had of the philoſophers. For they, when they mean to ſpeak moſt plainly, do divide the ſoul into appetite and underſtanding, but either of theſe they make of two ſorts. Underſtanding, they ſay, (Themiſt. de anima lib. 2. ca. 49. De duplici intel. de finib. lib. 3.) is ſometimes contemplative, which being contented with only knowlege, hath no moving of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expreſſed by this word ingenium, wit. Sometimes they ſay it is practical, which by conceiving of good or evil doth diverſly move the will. And appetite they do divide into will and luſt. Will they call that, when appetite which they call horme obeyeth reaſon, and luſt they call that, when the appetite, ſhaking off the yoke of reaſon, runneth out to intemperance. So always they imagine reaſon to be that in man, whereby man may rightly govern himſelf.

Two principal parts of the ſoul, underſtanding & will.

7. But we are conſtrained ſomewhat to depart from this manner of teaching, becauſe the philoſophers who knew not the corruption of man's nature, which came for puniſhment of his fall, do wrongfully confound the two very divers ſtates of man. Let us therefore thus think of it, that there are in the ſoul of man two parts, which ſhall ſerve at this time for our preſent purpoſe, that is to ſay, underſtanding and will. And let it be the office of underſtanding, to diſcern between objects, or things ſet before it, as each of them ſhall ſeem worthy to be liked or diſliked: and the office of will, to chuſe and follow that which underſtanding pronounceth good, and to reject and avoid that which underſtanding ſhall diſapprove. Let us not here be ſtopt at all with the nice ſubtilties of Ariſtotle, (Eth. lib. cap. 2.) That the mind hath of itſelf no moving, but that it is choice which moveth it, which choice he calleth the deſiring underſtanding. But to the end we be not intangled with ſuperfluous queſtions, let this ſuffice us, that the underſtanding is as it were the guide and governor of the ſoul, and that will hath always regard to the appointment of underſtanding, and followeth the judgment thereof, in her deſires. Agreeably to which, Ariſtotle himſelf hath juſtly ſaid, that avoiding or following is in appetite ſuch a ſimilar thing, as in the underſtanding mind affirming and denying is. Now, how certain the government of underſtanding is to direct the will: that we will conſider in another place. Here we mean only to ſhow that there can be found no power in the ſoul but that may well be ſaid to belong to the one of theſe two members. And in this ſort under the power of underſtanding we comprehend ſenſe, which others do ſo diſtinguiſh, that they ſay ſenſe is inclined to pleaſure, for which underſtanding followeth that which is good: and that ſo it cometh to paſs, that the appetite of ſenſe is concupiſcence and luſt, the affection of underſtanding is will. Again, inſtead of the name of appetite, which they better like, I place the name of will, which is more commonly uſed.

The perfection of man's underſtanding and will in his firſt creation.

8. God therefore hath furniſhed the ſoul of man with an underſtading mind, whereby he might diſcern good from evil, and right from wrong; and having the light of reaſon going before him, might ſee what is to be purſued or avoided. For which reaſon the philoſophers have called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adjoined will, to which belongeth choice. With theſe noble gifts the firſt ſtate of man excelled, ſo that he not only had enough of reaſon, underſtanding, wiſdom, and judgment, for the government of this earthly life, but alſo to climb up even to God and to eternal felicity. Then to have choice added unto it, which might direct the appetites, and order all the inſtrumental motions, and that ſo the will might be altogether agreeable to the government of reaſon. In this integrity, man had free-will, whereby, if he would, he might have attained eternal life. For here it is out of place to move queſtion of the ſecret predeſtination of God: becauſe we are not now about to diſcuſs what might have chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might have ſtood if he pleaſed, becauſe he fell not but by his own will. But becauſe his will was pliable to either ſide, and there was not given him conſtancy to continue, therefore he ſo eaſily fell. Yet his choice of good and evil was free. And not that only, but alſo in his underſtanding mind, and in his will was moſt great uprightneſs, and all his inſtrumental parts orderly framed to obedience, until by deſtroying himſelf he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence cometh it that all the philoſophers were ſo blinded, becauſe that in a ruin they ſought for an upright building, and for ſtrong joints in an unjointed overthrow. This principle they held, that man could not be a living creature, endued with reaſon, unleſs there were in him a free choice of good and evil: and they conſidered, that otherwiſe all the difference ſhould be taken away between virtues and vices, unleſs man did order his own life by his own advice. Thus far had they ſaid well if there had been no change in man, which change becauſe they knew not of, it is no wonder tho' they confound heaven and earth together. But as for them who profeſſing themſelves to be the diſciples of Chriſt, do yet ſeek for free-will in man, that hath been loſt and drowned in ſpiritual deſtruction, they in going mean between the philoſophers opinions and heavenly doctrine are plainly deceived, ſo that they touch neither heaven nor earth. But of theſe things we ſhall better ſpeak in place fit for them: now only this we have to bear in mind, that man at his firſt creation was far other than his poſterity ſterity ever ſince, who taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him received an infection derived to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the parts of his ſoul were framed to right order, then ſtood ſafe the ſoundneſs of his underſtanding mind, and his will free to chuſe the good. If any do object that it ſtood but in ſlippery ſtate, becauſe his power was but weak, I anſwer that that ſtate was yet ſuch as ſufficed to take from him all excuſe, neither was it reaſonable to reſtrain God to this point, to make man ſuch a one as either could not or would not ſin at all. I grant ſuch a nature had been better, but therefore preciſely to quarrel with God, (Auguſt. Gen. lib. 11. cap. 7, 8, 9.) as tho' it had been his duty to have given that unto man, is too much unjuſtice, foraſmuch as it was in his own choice to give how much pleaſed him. But why he did not uphold him with the ſtrength of ſtedfaſt continuance, that reſteth hidden in his own ſecret counſel: it is our part only to be ſo far wiſe as with ſobriety we may. Man received indeed to be able if he would, but he had not to will that he might be able. (De correp. et grat. ad Valentin. ca. 12.) For of this will ſhould have followed ſtedfaſt continuance. Yet he is not excuſable, who received ſo much that of his own will he hath wrought his own deſtruction. And there was no neceſſity to compel God to give him any other than a mean will and a frail will, that of man's fall he might gather matter for his own glory.

CHAP. XVI.

That God by his power doth nouriſh and maintain the world, which himſelf hath created, and by his providence doth govern all the parts thereof.

Men naturally by ſenſe are brought to confeſs God the creator, we by faith acknowlege him to be the governor, not in general of the world, but of every particular thing in the world.

BUT it were very fond and inſipid to make God a creator for a moment, who doth nothing ſince he hath once made an end of his work. And in this point principally ought we to differ from the prophane men, that the preſence of the power of God may ſhine unto us no leſs in the continual ſtate of the world, than in the firſt beginning of it. For though the minds of the very wicked in only beholding of the heaven and earth, are compelled to riſe up unto the creator, yet hath faith a certain peculiar manner by itſelf, whereby it giveth to God the whole praiſe of creation. And therefore ſerveth that ſaying of the apoſtle, which we before alleged, that we do not underſtand but by faith, that the world was made by the word of God. For unleſs we paſs forward even unto his providencc, we do not yet rightly conceive what this meaneth, that God is the creator, howſoever we do ſeem to comprehend it in our minds, and confeſs it with our lips. When the ſenſe of the fleſh hath once ſet before it the power of God in the very creation, it reſteth there, and when it proceedeth furtheſt of all, it doth nothing but ponder and conſider the wiſdom, power, and goodneſs of the workman in making ſuch a piece of work (which things do of themſelves offer and thruſt themſelves in ſight of men whether they will or no) and a certain general doing in preſerving and governing the ſame, upon which dependeth the power of moving. Finally, it thinketh that the lively energy at the beginning put into all things by God, doth ſuffice to ſuſtain them. But faith ought to pierce deeper, that is to ſay, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the ſame is the perpetual governor and preſerver of them: and that not by ſtirring with an univerſal motion as well the whole frame of the world, as all the parts thereof, but by ſuſtaining, cheriſhing and caring for, with ſingular providence every one of thoſe things that he hath created, even to the leaſt ſparrow. So David, Pſal. xxxiii. 6. after he had firſt ſaid, that the world was created by God, by and by deſcendeth to the continual courſe of his providence. "By the word of the Lord, ſaith he, were the heavens made, and all the hoſt of them by the breath of his mouth." Soon after: "The Lord looked down upon the ſons of men," and ſo the reſt that he ſaith farther to the ſame effect. For altho' they do not all reaſon ſo orderly, yet becauſe it were not likely to be believed, that God had care of human affairs, unleſs he were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earneſtly believe that God made the world, unleſs he be perſuaded that God hath alſo care of his works: therefore not without cauſe David doth by good order convey us from the one to the other. Generally indeed both the philoſophers do teach, and mens minds do conceive that all parts of the world are enlivened with the ſecret inſpiration of God. But yet they attain not ſo far as David both himſelf proceedeth and carrieth all the godly godly with him, saying, "All things wait upon "thee, that thou mayst give them their meat "in due season, that thou givest them they gather. "thou openest thine hand, they are filled with "good. But if thou hide thy face, they are trou- "bled. If thou take away their breath, they die, "and return to their dust. Again, if thou send "forth thy spirit, they are created, and thou renew- "est the face of the earth." Psal civ. 27. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, Acts xvii. 28. that we have our being and are moved, and do live in God, yet they are far from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth unto us: because they taste not of God's special care whereby alone his fatherly favour is known.

We do injury unto God when we ascribe the works of his providence unto fortune, as also when we speak of nature working without the hand of God guiding her in every work.

2. That this difference may the better appear, it is to be known, that the providence of God, such as it is taught in the scripture, is in comparison set as contrary to fortune and chances that happen by adventure. Now forasmuch as it hath been commonly believed in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in all men, that all things happen by fortune, it is certain, that that which ought to have been believed concerning providence, is by that wrong opinion not only darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among thieves or wild beasts; if by wind suddenly rising he suffer shipwreck on the sea, if he be killed with the fall of a horse or of a tree, if another wandering in desert places find remedy for his poverty, if having been tossed with the waves, he attain to the shore, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chances as well of prosperity as adversity the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Christ, Matth. x. 28. that all the hairs of his head are numbered, will seek for a cause further off, and will firmly believe that all chances are governed by the secret counsel of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them have its own property naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so far as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments, whereby God continually poureth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will inclineth and turneth them to this or that action. Of no creature is the power more marvellous or more glorious than of the sun. For besides that it giveth light to the whole world with his brightness, how great a thing is this that he cherisheth and quickeneth all living creatures with his heat? thathe breatheth fruitfulness into the earth with his beams? that out of seeds warmed in the bosom of the ground, he draweth a budding greenness, and sustaining the same with new nourishments doth increase and strengthen it till it rise up in stalks? that he feedeth it with continual vapour, till it grow to a flower, and from a flower to fruit? That then also with baking it, he bringeth it to ripeness? That trees likewise and vines being warmed by him, do first bud and shoot forth branches, and after send out a a flower, and of a flower do engender fruit? But the Lord, because he would claim the whole glory of all these things to himself, made the light first to be, Gen. i. 3. and the earth to be furnished with all kinds of herbs and fruits before that he created the sun. A godly man therefore will not make the sun to be either a principal or a necessary cause of those things which were before the creation of the sun, but only an instrument which God useth, because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leave it and do all things as easily himself. Then when we read that the sun stood still two days in one degree at the prayer of Joshua, Josh. x. 13. and that the shadow thereof went back ten degrees for Hezekiah's sake 2 Kings xx. 11. by those few miracles God hath declared, that the sun doth not daily so rise and go down by blind instinct of nature, but that he to renew the remembrance of his fatherly favour towards us, doth govern the course thereof. Nothing is more natural than spring tide to come immediately after winter, summer after spring, and harvest in course after summer. But in this orderly course is plainly seen so great and so unequal diversity, that it may easily appear that every year, month and day, is governed by a new and special providence of God.

They who do not acknowlege that God directeth the working of every particular thing do not only rob him of his honour but themselves of a double benefit, hope of good things, and deliverance from fear of evil.

3. And truly God doth claim and will have us ascribe unto him an almightiness, not such as the sophisters do imagine, vain, idle, and as it were sleeping, but waking, effectual, working and busied in continual doing. Nor such a one as is only a general beginning of a confused motion, as if he would command a river to flow by his appointed channels, but such a one as is bent and ready at all his particular movings. For he is therefore called almighty, not because he can do and yet ſitteth ſtill and doth nothing, or by general inſtinct only continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but becauſe he governing both heaven and earth by his providence ſo ordereth all things that nothing chanceth but by his adviſed purpoſe. For whereas it is ſaid in the Pſalms, Pſal. cxv. 3. that he doth whatſoever he will, therein is meant his certain and determined will. For it were very fond to expound the prophet's words after the philoſopher's manner, that God is the firſt agent or doer, becauſe he is the beginning and and cauſe of all moving: Whereas the faithful ought rather in adverſity to eaſe themſelves with this comfort, that they ſuffer nothing but by the ordinance and commandment of God, becauſe they are under his hand. If then the government of God do ſo extend to all his works, it is a very childiſh cavil to circumſcribe it within the influence of nature. And yet they do not only defraud God of his glory but deprive themſelves of a moſt profitable doctrine, whoſoever do reſtrain the providence of God within ſo narrow bounds, as if he ſuffered all things to be carried with an ungoverned courſe, according to a perpetual law of nature. For nothing were more miſerable than man if he ſhould be left ſubject to every motion of the heaven, the air, the earth, and the waters. Beſide that by that mean the ſingular goodneſs of God towards every man is too much diſhonourably diminiſhed. David crieth out (Pſal. viii. 2.) that babes yet hanging on their mothers breaſts are eloquent enough to magnify the glory of God, becauſe even ſo ſoon as they be come out of the womb, they find food prepared for them by his heavenly care. This is indeed generally true, ſo that yet our eyes and ſenſes do not paſs over that unnoticed which experience plainly ſheweth, that ſome mothers have full and plentiful breaſts, ſome others almoſt dry, as it pleaſeth God to feed one more liberally, and another more ſcarcely. But they who give the due praiſe to the almightineſs of God, do receive double profit thereby, the one, that he hath ſufficiently large ability to do them good, in whoſe poſſeſſion are both heaven and earth, and to whoſe beck all creatures do attend upon, to yield themſelves to his obedience: the other, that they may ſafely reſt in his protection, to whoſe will are ſubject all theſe hurtful things that may any way be feared, by whoſe authority as with a bridle Satan is reſtrained with all his furies and all his preparation, upon whoſe beck doth hang all that ever is againſt our ſafety. And no other way but this can the immeaſurable and ſuperſtitious fears be corrected or appeaſed, which we oftentimes conceive by dangers happening unto us. Superſtitiouſly fearful I ſay we be if where creatures do threaten us or give us any cauſe of fear, we be ſo afraid thereof, as if they had of themſelves any force or power to do us harm, or did unforeſeen, or by chance hurt us, or as if againſt the hurts that they do, there were not ſufficient help in God. As for example, The prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they ſhould not Jer. x. 2. fear the ſtars and ſigns of the heaven, as the unbelievers are wont to do. He condemneth not every kind of fear. But when the unbelievers to give away the government of the world from God unto Planets, do feign that their felicity or miſery doth hang on the decrees and predictions of the ſtars and not of the will of God, ſo cometh it to paſs, that their fear is withdrawn away from that only one, whom they ought to have regarded, unto the ſtars and comets. Whoſo therefore will beware of this unfaithfulneſs, let him keep always in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandering power, working or motion, but that they are governed by the ſecret counſel of God, ſo that nothing can happen but that which is decreed by him both knowing and willing it ſo ſo be.

That God doth not only behold what is done, but order and diſpoſe the doing of things both above and beneath.

4. Firſt therefore let the readers learn, that providence is called that, not wherewith God idly beholdeth from heaven what is done in the world, but wherewith as guiding the ſtern he ſetteth and ordereth all things that come to paſs. So doth it no leſs belong to his hands than to his eyes. For when Abraham ſaid unto his ſon, Gen. xx. 8. God ſhall provide, he meant not only, that God did foreknow the ſucceſs then to come, but that he did caſt the care of a thing to him unknown upon the will of God, who is accuſtomed to bring things doubtful and confuſed to a certain end. Whereby followeth, that providence conſiſteth in doing: for too much fondly do many trifle in talking of bare foreknowlege. Their error is not altogether ſo groſs who give unto God a government but diſordered, and without adviſed choice, (as I have before ſaid,) that is to ſay, ſuch as whirleth and driveth about with a general motion the frame of the world with all the parts thereof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of every creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithſtanding this providence which they call univerſal) that all creatures may be moved by chance, or man may turn himſelf hither or thither by free choice of his will. And ſo do they divide divide the government between God and man, that God by his powe inſpireth into man a motion whereby he may act according to the nature planted in him, and man regulates his own actions by his own voluntary advice: briefly they mean that the world, the affairs of mankind, and mankind themſelves are governed by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I ſpeak not of the Epicureans (which peſtilence the world hath always been filled with) who dream of an idle and ſlothful God: and others as mad as they, who in old time imagined that God did ſo rule about the middle region of the air that he left things beneath to fortune: for againſt ſo evident madneſs, the dumb creatures themſelves do ſufficiently cry out. For, now my purpoſe is to confute that opinion which is in a manner commonly believed, which giving to God a certain blind, and I know not what uncertain motion, taketh from him the principal thing, that is, by his incomprehenſible wiſdom to direct and diſpoſe all things to their end: and ſo in name only and not indeed it maketh God ruler of the world, beeauſe it taketh from him the government of it. For what (I beſeech you) is it elſe to govern, but ſo to be over them that are under thee, that thou mayeſt rule them by appointed order? Yet do I not altogether reject that which is ſpoken of the univerſal providence: ſo that they will again grant me this, that the world is ruled by God, not only becauſe he maintaineth the order of nature which himſelf hath ſet, but alſo becauſe he hath a peculiar care of every one of his works. True it is, that all ſorts of things are moved by a ſecret inſtinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternal command of God, and that which God hath once determined doth of it ſelf proceed forward. And to this may that be applied which Chriſt ſaith, that he and his Father were even from the beginning always working. And that which Paul teacheth, Acts xvii. 28. that in him we live, move and have our being, and that which the Author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, meaning to prove the Godhead of Chriſt, ſaith, Heb i. 3. that by the word of his power all things are upheld. But they do wrong who by this colour do hide and darken the ſpecial providence, which is confirmed by ſo certain and plain teſtimonies of ſcripture, that it is ſurprizing that any man could doubt of it. And ſurely they themſelves who draw the ſame veil which I ſpeak of to hid it, are compelled by way of correction to add, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they do wrongfully reſtrict the ſame only to peculiar actions. Wherefore we muſt prove that God doth ſo attend to the ordering of all events, and that they do ſo proceed from his determinate counſel, that nothing happeneth by chance.

5. If we grant that the beginning of motion belongeth to God but that all things are either of themſelves or by chance carried whither the inclination of nature driveth them, the mutual ſucceſſion by turns of days and nights, of winter and ſummer, ſhall be the work of God, in ſo much as he appointing to every one their duties, hath ſet them a certain law, that is, That they ſhould always keep one meaſure in equal proportion, as well the days that come after the nights, the months after, and years after years. But when ſometimes immoderate heats with dryneſs do burn up all the grain, ſometimes unſeaſonable rains do mar the corn, when ſudden harm cometh by hail and tempeſts: that ſhall not be the work of God, unleſs perhaps it be becauſe the clouds or fair weather, or cold or heat have their beginning of the meeting of the planets or other natural cauſes. But by this mean is there no room left, neither for the fatherly favour, nor for the judgments of God. If they ſay that God is abundantly good to mankind becauſe he poureth into the heaven and earth an ordinary power, whereby they do afford him nouriſhment: that is too vain and prophane an invention, as though the fruitfulneſs of one year were not the ſingular bleſſing of God, and dearth and famine were not his curſe and vengeance? But becauſe it were too long to gather together all the reaſons that ſerve for this purpoſe, let the authority of God himſelf ſuffice us. In the law and in the prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that ſo oft as he watereth the earth with dew and rain, he declareth his favour; and that when by his comandment the heaven is hardened like iron, when corn is conſumed with blaſting and other harms, when the fields are ſtruck with hail and tempeſts, it is a token of his certain and ſpecial vengeance. If we grant theſe things, then is it manifeſt that there falleth not a drop of rain but by the certain commandment of God. Pſal. clxvii. 9. David praiſeth the general providence of God, that he giveth meat to the young ravens birds which call upon him: but when God himſelf threatneth famine to living creatures, doth he not ſufficiently declare that he feedeth every thing that lives ſometimes with a ſmall, ſometimes with a larger portion as he thinketh good? It is a childiſh thing thing, as I ſaid before to limit this to particular actions, whereas Chriſt ſpeaketh without exception, Matth. x. 29. that not a ſparow of never ſo ſmall a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birds be ruled by the purpoſe of God, then muſt we needs confeſs with the prophet, Pſal. cxiii. 5, 6. that he ſo dwelleth on high, yet he humbleth himſelf to look upon all thing that happen in heaven and earth.

The providence of God in diſpoſing the conditions of men.

6. But becauſe we know that the world was made principally for mankinds ſake, we muſt therefore conſider this end in the government of man. The prophet Jeremiah crieth out, Jer. x. 23. "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not "in himſelf: it is not in man that walketh to di-"rect his ſteps." And Solomon ſaith, Prov. xx. 24. "Man's goings are of the Lord, how can a "man then underſtand his own way?" Now let them ſay that man is moved by God according to the inclination of his own nature, but that man himſelf doth turn that motion whitherſoever he pleaſes. But if that were truly ſaid, then ſhould man have the free choice of his own ways. Perhaps they will deny that, becauſe he can do nothing without the power of God. But ſeeing it is certain that the prophet and Solomon do aſcribe unto God, not only power, but alſo choice and appointment, they cannot ſo eſcape away. But Solomon in another place, Prov. xvi. 1. doth finely rebuke this raſhneſs of men, who preſcribe unto themſelves another end without reſpect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. "The preparations "(ſaith he) of the heart are in man, but the an-"ſwer of the tongue is from the Lord." It is a fond madneſs that men will take upon them to do things without God, who cannot ſo much as ſpeak but what he will. And the ſcripture, to expreſs more plainly that nothing at all is done in the world but by God's appointment, ſheweth that thoſe things which ſeem moſt fortuitous and accidental, are ſubject to God, and under his direction. For what can you more aſcribe to chance, than when a broken bough falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man paſſing by it? But the Lord ſaith far otherwiſe, Exod. xxi. 12. who confeſſeth that he hath delivered him into the hand of the ſlayer. Likewiſe, who doth not leave the happening of lots to the blindneſs of fortune? But the Lord ſuffereth it not, who claimeth the judgment of them to himſelf; for he ſaith, that it cometh not to paſs by a man's own power that ſtones are caſt into the lap, and drawn out again, but that thing which only might be ſaid to come of chance, he teſtifieth to come from himſelf. For the ſame purpoſe maketh that ſaying of Solomon, Prov. xvi. 33. "The poor "man and the uſurer meet together, God lighten-"eth both their eyes." For although poor men and rich be mingled together in the world, while every one hath his ſtate aſſigned him from God, he admoniſheth that God who giveth light unto all men is not blind, and ſo he exhorteth the poor to patience, becauſe whoſoever are not contented with their own ſtate, they ſeek to ſhake off the burthen that God hath laid upon them. So another prophet rebuketh the ungodly men who aſcribe to the diligence of men or to fortune, that ſome lie in miſery and ſome riſe up to honour. Pſal. lxxv. 7. "Pro-"motion cometh neither from the eaſt, nor from "the weſt, nor from the ſouth; but God is the "judge, he putteth down one, and ſetteth up ano-"ther." Becauſe God cannot put off the office of a judge, thereupon the prophet proveth that by his ſecret purpoſe, ſome are in honour, and others remain in contempt.

The common events which are ſeen in the world come from the ſpecial providence of God.

7. And likewiſe I affirm that particular wants are generally witneſſes of Gods ſingular providence Exod. xix. 13. God raiſed in the deſart a ſouth wind to bring the people plenty of fowls: When his pleaſure was to have, Jonah i. 4. Jonah thrown into the ſea, he ſent out a wind to raiſe up a tempeſt. But they who maintain that God governeth not the world, will ſay that this happened beſide common uſe: but thereby I do gather that never any wind doth riſe or increaſe but by the ſpecial commandment of God. For otherwiſe it ſhould not be true, that he maketh the winds his meſſengers, and firey flames his miniſters, that he maketh the clouds his chariots, and rideth upon the wings of the wind, Pſal. civ. 4. unleſs he did by his will drive about the clouds and winds, and ſhew in them the ſingular preſence of his power. So in another place we are taught that ſo oft as the ſea ſwelleth with blaſts of winds, thoſe violences do teſtify a ſingular preſence of God. Pſal. cvii. 25. He commandeth and raiſeth up the ſtormy winds which lifteth up the waves thereof, and then he maketh the ſtorm a calm, ſo that the waves thereof are ſtill. As in another place he ſaith, that he ſcourged the people with burning winds. So, whereas the power of engendring is naturally given to men, yet God will have it imputed to his ſpecial grace, that he leaveth ſome in barreneſs, and vouch-vouchſafeth to grant iſſue to other ſome; the fruit of the womb is his gift. Therefore ſaid Jacob to his wife, Gen. xxx 2. am I as God that can give you children? But to make an end: there is nothing more ordinary in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the holy Ghoſt pronounceth, Iſa. iii. 1. that not only the growing of the fruits of the earth is the ſpecial gift of God, but alſo that men live not by bread alone, becauſe it is not the very full feeding that nouriſheth, but the ſecret bleſſing of God: as on the other ſide he threateneth, that he will break the ſtay of bread. Neither could we earneſtly pray for our daily bread, unleſs God did give us food with his fatherly hand. Therefore the prophet, to perſuade the faithful that God in feeding them doth fulfil the office of a good father of a family, doth put them in mind, that he giveth meat to all fleſh. Pſal. cxlvi. and xxxiv. 16, 17. Finally when we have on the one ſide; The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears bent to their prayers: on the other ſide: The eye of the Lord is upon the the ungodly to deſtroy the memory of them out of the earth: Let us know that all creatures both above and beneath are ready to obedience, that he may apply them to what uſe ſoever he will; whereupon is gathered, that not only his general providence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but alſo by his marvellous counſel is applied to a certain and proper end.

The doctrine concerning God's providence, doth not eſtabliſh Stoical deſtiny, but excludeth Heatheniſh fortune and chance.

8. They who would render this doctrine odious, do cavil that this is the learning that the Stoicks teach of fate or deſtiny, which alſo was once laid for reproach to Auguſtin. (Lib. 2. ad Bon. cap. 6.) As for us, altho' we are loth to ſtrive about words, yet we allow not this word fate, both becauſe it is one of thoſe whoſe profane novelties ſaint Paul teacheth us to fly, and becauſe ſome men do go about with the odiouſneſs thereof to bring God's truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoicks, it is wrongfully laid to our charge. For we do not as the Stoicks do, imagine a neceſſity by a certain perpetual knot and intangled order of cauſes which is contained in nature: but we make God the judge and governor of all things, who according to his wiſdom hath even from the furtheſt end of eternity decreed what he would do, and now by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Whereupon we affirm that not only the heaven and earth and other creatures without life, but alſo the purpoſes and inclinations of men are ſo governed by his providence, that they are directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then? will one ſay, doth nothing happen by fortune or by chance? I anſwer, That Baſilius Magnus hath truly ſaid that fortune and chance are expreſſions of the Heathens, with the ſignification of which the minds of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if every good ſucceſs be the bleſſing of God, and every calamity and adverſity be his curſe, then is there, with reſpect to the affairs of mankind, no place left for fortune or chance. We ought alſo to be moved with this ſaying of Auguſtin: In his book againſt the Academics, (Retr. lib. 1. cap. 1.) he ſaith: "It doth diſpleaſe me that I have ſo often "named fortune, altho' my meaning was not to have "any goddeſs underſtood thereby, but only a caſual "happening in outward things either good or evil. "Of which word fortune are derived thoſe words "which no religion forbiddeth us to uſe forte, forſan, forſitan, fortaſſe, fortuito, that is, perhaps, "peradventure, by fortune, and by chance, which "yet muſt all be applied to the providence of God. "And that did I not leave unſpoken when I ſaid, for "perchance even the ſame that is commonly called "fortune is alſo ruled by ſecret order. And we call "chance in things nothing elſe, but that whereof "the reaſon and cauſe is unknown. I ſaid this in"deed, but it repenteth me that I did there ſo name "fortune. Foraſmuch as I ſee that men have a ve"ry evil cuſtom, that where they ought to ſay, thus "it pleaſed God, they ſay, thus it pleaſed fortune." Finally, he doth commonly in his books teach, That the world ſhould be unorderly whirled about, if any thing were left to fortune. And altho' in another place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free-will of man, and partly by the providence of God, yet doth he a little after ſufficiently ſhew that men are ſubject unto and ruled by providence, taking this for a principle, That nothing is more oppoſite to reaſon, than to ſay, That any thing happeneth but by the ordinance of God, for elſe it ſhould happen without cauſe or order, by which reaſon he alſo excludeth that happening which depends upon the will of man: and ſoon after he ſays, in plainer terms, that we ought not to ſeek a cauſe of the will of God. And ſo oft as he maketh mention of permiſſion, (Quæſt. lib. 83. de tri. lib. 3. cap. 4.) how that is to be underſtood, ſhall very well appear from one place where he proveth, That the Divine will is the ſupreme and firſt cauſe of all things, becauſe nothing happeneth but by his commandment or permiſſion. Surely he does not imagine God ſits ſtill idle in a watch-tower, when it is his pleaſure to ſuffer any thing, whereas he uſeth an actual will (as I may ſo call it) which otherwiſe could not be called a cauſe.

A thing may be termed accidentally, and be ſaid to happen by fortune in reſpect of us who ſee not the cauſe, when in reſpect of God who hath appointed it, it is neceſſary, and tho' not in its own nature, yet by reaſon of his appointment inevitable.

9. But for as much as the dulneſs of our underſtanding cannot by a great way attain to the height of God's providence, we muſt uſe a diſtinction to help to lift it up. I ſay therefore, howſoever all things are ordained by the purpoſe and certain diſpoſition of God, yet to us they are accidental; not that we think that fortune ruleth the world and men, and unadviſedly toſſeth all things up and down (for ſuch beaſtlineſs ought to be far from a Chriſtian heart) but becauſe the order, mean, end, and neceſſity of thoſe things that happen, doth for the moſt part ly ſecret in the purpoſe of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore thoſe things are as it were fortuitous, which yet it is certain to come to paſs by the will of God: For they ſeem no otherwiſe, whether we conſider them in their own nature, or whether we eſteem them according to our knowlege and judgment. As for example, let us put the caſe, that a merchant being entered into a wood in company of true men, doth unwiſely ſtray away from his fellows, and in his wandering chanceth upon a den of robbers, lighteth among thieves, and is killed, his death was not only foreſeen with God's eye, but alſo determined by his decree. For it is not ſaid that he did foreſee how far each man's life ſhould extend, but that he hath ſet and appointed bounds which cannot be paſſed, John xiv. 5. And yet ſo far as the capacity of our mind conceiveth, all things herein ſeem to happen by chance. What ſhall a Chriſtian here think? even this, whatſoever happened in ſuch a death, he will think it in nature happening by fortune as it is indeed, but yet he will not doubt that the providence of God did govern to direct fortune to her end. The ſame holds true with regard to all future contingencies. For as all things that are to come are uncertain unto us, ſo we hang them in ſuſpence, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth ſettled in our hearts, that nothing ſhall happen but that which God hath already foreſeen. In this meaning is the name of chance oft repeated in Eccleſiaſtes, becauſe, at the firſt ſight, men do not attain to ſee the firſt cauſe which is far hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the ſecret providence of God, was never ſo blotted out of the hearts of men, but that even in the darkneſs there always ſhined ſome ſparks thereof. So the ſoothſayers of the Philiſtines, altho' they waver in doubtfulneſs, yet they aſcribe adverſity partly to God, partly to fortune. If (ſay they) the ark go that way, we ſhall know that it is God that hath ſmote us; but if it go the other way, then a chance hath happened to us. Indeed they did fooliſhly, when their ſkill in ſoothſaying deceived them, (1 Sam. vi. 9.) to flee to fortune, but in the mean time we ſee them conſtrained, ſo that they dare not think that the calamity which befel them was owing to fortune. But how God, with the bridle of his providence, turneth all ſucceſſes whither it pleaſeth him, may appear from one remarkable example: Behold, even at one moment of time, when David was found out, and near taken in the deſart of Mahon, 1 Sam. xxiii. 26. even when the Philiſtines invaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God, meaning to provide for the ſafety of his ſervant, did throw this obſtacle in Saul's way, ſurely, altho' the Philiſtines their taking up arms, was a ſudden thing, and contrary to the expectation of men, yet we ought not to ſay, that it happened by chance. But thoſe things which appear to us to happen by chance, faith will acknowlege to have been owing to a ſecret impulſe of God. I grant there doth not always appear the like reaſon, but doubtleſs we ought to believe, that whatſoever changes of things are ſeen in the world, are brought about by the direction and influence of God's inviſible hand. But that which God purpoſeth is ſo of neceſſity to come to paſs, that yet it is not of neceſſity preciſely nor by the nature of itſelf. Of this we have a familiar example in the bones of Chriſt. Foraſmuch as he had put on a body like unto ours, no wiſe man will deny that his bones were naturally capable of being broken, yet was it impoſſible that they ſhould be broken: whereby we ſee again, that not without cauſe the ſchoolmen invented the diſtinctions of neceſſity in reſpect, and neceſſity abſolute, of conſequent and conſequence, whereas God had ſubject to brittleneſs the bones of his Son, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, and ſo brought to neceſſity by reaſon of his own purpoſe, that that thing could not be, which naturally might have been.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVII.

Whereto and to what end this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certain of the profit thereof.

Four things in considering the providence of God do make the consideration thereof sweet and comfortable, that it serveth for things to come, as well as past: that it worketh by, with, and without means: that it respecteth principally the church of God: & that it worketh even when the course of things doth seem to persuade the contrary.

NOW forasmuch as the inward thoughts of men are inclined to vain curious subtilties, it is scarcely possible but they shall encumber themselves with entangled doubts whosoever do not know the true and right use of this doctrine. Therefore, it will be expedient here to touch shortly, to what end the Scripture teacheth, That all things are ordered by God. And first of all it is to be observed, That the providence of God ought to be considered as regarding the time to come, as well as the time past. Secondly, That the same is in such sort the governor of all things, that sometimes he worketh by means, sometimes without means, and sometimes against all means. Last of all, That it tendeth to this end, that God may shew that he takes care of all mankind, but especially that he watches and rules over his church, which he condescends more nearly to look into. And this is also to be added, that altho' either the paternal favour and beneficence of God, or oftentimes the severity of his judgment do brightly appear in the whole course of his providence: yet sometimes the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought insinuates itself into our minds, that the affairs of mankind are turned and whirled about by the blind direction of fortune, or so that the flesh excites us to murmur, as if God did to make himself pastime, toss them like tennis balls. True it is, that if we were with quiet and still minds ready to learn, the very success itself would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to train those who are his own people unto patience, or to correct their evil affections and tame their wantonness, or to bring them down to the renouncing of themselves, or to awake their drowsiness: on the other side to overthrow the proud, to disappoint the subtilty of the wicked, to confound their devices. But howsoever the causes be secret and unknown to us; we must assuredly hold that they are laid up in hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to cry out with David, God, thou hast made thy wonderful works so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward us. I would declare and speak of them, but they are more than I am able to express, Psal. xl. 5. For altho' always in our miseries we ought to think upon our sins, that the very punishment may excite us to repentance, yet do we see how Christ giveth more power to the secret purpose of his Father, than to punish every one according to his desert. For of him that was born blind he saith, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents; but that the glory of God may be shewed in him, John ix. 3. For here natural sense murmureth, when calamity cometh even before birth, as if God did unmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserved it. But Christ doth testify, that in this Looking-glass the glory of his Father doth shine to our sight, if we have clear eyes to behold it. But we must keep modesty, that we draw not God to yield cause of his doings, but let us so reverence his secret judgments, that his will be unto us, a most just cause of all things. When thick clouds do cover the heaven, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heavysome mistiness is cast before our eyes, and the thunder troubleth our ears, and all our senses are amazed with terror, we think that all things are confounded and troubled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heaven the same quietness and calmness that was before. So must we think that while the troublesome state of things in the world taketh from us ability to judge, God, by the pure light of his righteousness and wisdom, doth in well framed order govern and dispose even those very troublesome motions themselves to a right end. And surely very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalf, who dare more boldly call the works of God to account and examine his secret intentions, and to give unadvised sentence of things unknown, than they will do of the deeds of mortal men. For what is more preposterous than to use such modesty towards our equals, that we had rather suspend our judgment than to incur the blame of rashness, and on the other side proudly to triumph upon the dark judgments of God, which it became us to regard with reverence?

As we are to yield obedience to the known revealed

2. Therefore, no man shall duly and profitably consider the providence of God, but he that con-will of his law, ſo reverence is due to the ſecret Will, according to which he ruleth by providence.

conſidering that he hath to do with his Creator and the Maker of the world, doth with ſuch humility as he ought ſubmit himſelf to fear and reverence. Hereby it cometh to paſs, that ſo many dogs at this day, do with venomed bitings, or at leaſt barking, attack this doctrine, becauſe they will have no more to be lawful for God, than their own reaſon informeth them. And alſo they rail at us with all the ſpitefulneſs that they are able, for that not contented with the commandments of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further ſay, That the world is ruled by his ſecret counſels. As tho' the things that we teach were an invention of our own brain, and as tho' it were not true that the Holy Ghoſt doth everywhere expreſly ſay the ſame, and repeateth it with innumerable forms of ſpeech. But becauſe ſome ſhame reſtraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blaſphemies againſt the heaven; they pretend that they contend with us, to the end they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not grant that whatſoever happeneth in the world, is governed by the incomprehenſible purpoſe of God, let them anſwer, to what end the Scripture ſaith, that his judgments are a deep bottomleſs depth, Pſal. xxxvi. 7. For, whereas Moſes crieth out that the will of God is not to be ſought afar off in the clouds, or in the depths, becauſe it is familiarly ſet forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomleſs depth. Of the which Paul alſo ſaith; "O the depth of the riches both of the wiſdom and "knowlege of God! how unſearchable are his judg-"ments, and his ways paſt finding out? For who "hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath "been his counſellor?" Rom. xi. 33, 34. And it is indeed true, that in the goſpel and in the law are contained myſteries which are far above the capacity of our ſenſe: but foraſmuch as God for the comprehending of theſe myſteries which he hath vouchſafed to reveal by his word, doth enlighten the minds of them that are his, with the ſpirit of underſtanding: now is there no bottomleſs depth, but a way wherein we may walk in ſafety, and a lamp, to guide our feet, and the light of life, and the ſchool of certain and plainly diſcernable truth. But his marvellous order of governing the world, is juſtly called a bottomleſs depth: becauſe, while it is concealed from us, we ought reverently to worſhip it. Admirably well hath Moſes expreſſed both theſe in few words. "Secret things (ſaith he, Deut. xxix. 29.) "belong to the Lord our God: but things revealed "belong to us and to our children for ever." We ſee how he biddeth us not only to ſtudy in meditation of the law, but alſo reverently to look up unto the ſecret providence of God. And in the book of Job, (chap. xxvi. 14.) is rehearſed one title of this depth, that it humbleth our minds. For, after that the author of that book in ſurveying up and down the frame of the world, had honourably treated of the works of God, at length he addeth: "Lo, theſe "are parts of his ways, but how little a portion is "heard of him?" For which reaſon in another place he maketh difference between the wiſdom that remaineth with God, and the meaſure of wiſdom that he hath appointed for men. For after he hath diſcourſed of the ſecrets of nature, he ſaith, That wiſdom is known to God only, and is concealed from the eyes of all living creatures. But ſoon after, he ſaith further, That it is publiſhed to the end it ſhould be ſearched out: becauſe it is ſaid unto man, "Be-"hold, the fear of God is wiſdom," Job xxviii. 28. For this purpoſe maketh the ſaying of Auguſtin: (Lib. 83. quæſt. cap. 23.) Becauſe we know not all things which God doth concerning us in moſt good order; that therefore in only good will we do according to the law, becauſe his providence is an unchangeable law. Therefore, ſince God doth claim unto himſelf the power of governing the world, which is to us unknown, let this be to us a law of ſoberneſs and modeſty, quietly to obey his ſovereign authority, that his will may be to us the only rule of juſtice, and the moſt juſt cauſe of all things. I mean not that abſolute will, of which the Sophiſters do babble, ſeparating by wicked and profane diſagreement his juſtice from his power, but I mean that providence which governs all things; from which proceedeth nothing but what is right: altho' the cauſes thereof are kept out of our view.

The leud inferences which wicked men draw from the doctrine of God's providence becauſe they do not rightly and ſoberly diſcern it.

3. Whoſoever ſhall be framed to this modeſty, they neither for the time paſt will murmur againſt God for their adverſities, nor lay upon him the blame of wicked actions, as Agamemnon in Homer did, ſaying, "I am not the cauſe "but Jupiter and fate;" nor yet again, as carried away with deſtinies, will they by deſpair throw themſelves into deſtruction, as that young man in Plautus, who ſaid, "Unſtable is the chance of things: "the Fates drive men at their pleaſure, I will get "me to ſome rock there to make an end of my goods "and life together." Neither yet (as another did) will they pretend the name of God to palliate and cover cover their own miſchievous actions; for ſo ſaith Lyconides in another comedy: God was the mover: I believe it was the will of the gods: for if it had not been their will, I know it ſhould not ſo come to paſs. But rather they will ſearch and learn out of the ſcripture what pleaſeth God, that by the guidance of the holy Ghoſt, they may ſtrive to attain to that. And alſo being ready to follow God, whitherſoever he calleth, they ſhew indeed that nothing is more profitable than the knowlege of his doctrine. Very fooliſhly do profane men make a noiſe with their ſilly tales, ſo that they in manner confound heaven and earth together as the ſaying is: If God (ſay they) have marked the point of our death, we cannot eſcape it: then it is labour vainly loſt in taking heed to ourſelves. Therefore, whereas one man dareth not venture to go the way that he heareth to be dangerous, leſt he be murthered of thieves: another ſendeth for phyſicians, and wearieth himſelf with medicines to ſuccour his life: another forbeareth groſs meats for fear of impairing his feeble health: another dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous houſe. Finally, whereas men deviſe always and endeavour with all diligence of mind whereby they may attain that which they deſire: either all theſe remedies are vain, which are ſought, as to alter the will of God, or elſe life and death, health and ſickneſs, peace and war, and other things, which men as they covet or hate them, do by their efforts endeavour to obtain or eſcape, are not determined by his certain decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithful are prepoſterous or at leaſt ſuperfluous, wherein petition is made that it will pleaſe the Lord to provide for thoſe things which he hath already decreed from eternity. To be ſhort, they deſtroy all counſels that men do take for time to come as things againſt the providence of God, which hath determined what he would have done, without calling them to account. And then whatſoever has already happened, they ſo impute it to the providence of God, that they wink at the man whom they know to have done it. Thus hath a ruffian ſlain an honeſt citizen? he hath executed (ſay they) the purpoſe of God. Hath one ſtolen, or committed fornication? In either of theſe caſes, becauſe he hath done what was foreſeen and ordained by the Lord, he acts as a miniſter of his providence. Hath the ſon careleſly, neglecting all remedies waited for the death of his father? he could not reſiſt God who had fore-ordained this ſo to happen from eternity. So all miſchievous actions they call virtues, becauſe they obey the ordinance of God.

The providence of God doth not aboliſh but eſtabliſh the means by leaving the end certain only to itſelf, to us uncertain, that we might take the ways which are likely to bring unto that end which we ſhould purpoſe to ourſelves.

4. But with regard to things to come, Solomon doth eaſily reconcile the purpoſes of men with the providence of God. For as he laugheth to ſcorn their folly, who boldly do undertake any thing without the Lord, as tho' they were not ruled by his hand: ſo in another place he ſpeaketh in this manner: "The heart of "man purpoſeth his way, but "the Lord doth direct his ſteps," meaning that we are not hindered by the eternal decrees of God, but that under his will we may both provide for ourſelves, and diſpoſe all things belonging to us. And that is not without a manifeſt reaſon. For he who hath limited our life within appointed bounds, hath therewithal left with us the care thereof, hath furniſhed us with means and helps to preſerve it, hath made us to have knowlege before hand of dangers, and that they ſhould not oppreſs us unawares, he hath given us proviſions and remedies. Now it is plain to ſee what is our duty, that is to ſay: If God hath committed to us our own life to defend, our duty is to defend it. If he offer us helps, our duty is to uſe them. If he ſhew us dangers before hand, our duty is not to run raſhly into them. If he miniſter us remedies, our duty is not to neglect them. But no danger ſhall hurt unleſs it be fatal, which by all remedies cannot be overcome. But what if dangers be therefore not fatal, becauſe God hath aſſigned the remedies to repulſe and overcome them? See how thy manner of reaſoning agreeth with the order of God's diſpoſition. Thou gathereſt that danger is not to be taken heed of, becauſe foraſmuch as it is not fatal, we ſhall eſcape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enjoin thee to take heed of it, becauſe he will not have it fatal unto thee. Theſe mad men do not conſider that which is plain before their eyes, that the ſkill of taking counſel and heed is inſpired into men by God, whereby they may ſerve his providence in preſerving of their own life: as on the other ſide by negligence and ſloth they procure to themſelves theſe evils which he hath appointed for them. For how cometh it to paſs, that a circumſpect man while he provideth for himſelf, doth wind himſelf out of evils that hang over him, and the fool periſheth by unadviſed raſhneſs, but becauſe both folly and wiſdom are the inſtruments of God's diſpoſition on both parts? Therefore it pleaſed God to hide from us all things to come, to this end that we ſhould meet with them as things doubtful, and not ceaſe to ſet prepared remedies againſt them, till either they be overcome, or be paſt all help of care. And for this cauſe I have before admoniſhed, that the providence of God doth not alway ſhew itſelf naked, but as God by uſing of means doth in a certain manner clothe it.

5. The ſame men do raſhly and inconſiderately draw the chances of time paſt to the naked providence of God. For becauſe upon it depends whatſoever comes to paſs, therefore (ſay they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor man-ſlaughters, are committed without the will of God. Why then, ſay they, ſhall a thief be puniſhed, becauſe he hath ſpoiled him whom the Lord's will was to puniſh with poverty? Why ſhall the murderer be puniſhed who hath ſlain him whoſe life the Lord had ended? If all ſuch men do ſerve the will of God, why ſhall they be puniſhed? But I deny that they ſerve the will of God. For we may not ſay, that he who is carried with an evil mind doth ſervice unto God as commander of it, where indeed he doth but obey his own wicked luſt. He obeyeth God, who being informed of his will, doth labour to that end, to which God's will calleth him. But whereby are we informed of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doing of things we muſt ſee that ſame will of God, which he declareth in his word. God requireth of us only that which he commandeth. If we do any thing againſt his commandment, it is not obedience, but obſtinacy and tranſgreſſion. But unleſs he would, we ſhould not do it. Be it ſo. But do we evil things to this end, to obey him? But he doth not command us to do them, but rather we ruſh on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but ſo raging with the intemperance of our own luſt, that of ſet purpoſe we bend our efforts againſt him. And by theſe means in evil doing we ſerve his juſt ordinance, becauſe according to the infinite greatneſs of his wiſdom he hath good ſkill to uſe evil inſtruments to do good. And ſee how fooliſh is their manner of arguing? They would have the doers unpuniſhed for miſchievous acts, becauſe they are not committed but by the diſpoſition of God. I grant more: that thieves and murderers and other evil doers are the inſtruments of God's providence, whom the Lord doth uſe to execute thoſe judgments which he hath with himſelf determined. But I deny that their evil doings ought to have any excuſe thereby. For why? ſhall they either entangle God in the ſame wickedneſs with them, or ſhall they cover their naughtineſs with his righteouſneſs? They can do neither of theſe. Becauſe they ſhould not be able to excuſe themſelves, they are accuſed by their own conſcience. And becauſe they ſhould not be able to blame God, they find all the evil in themſelves, and in him nothing but a lawful uſe of their wickedneſs. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you cometh the ſtink in a dead carrion, which hath been both rotted and diſcloſed by heat of the ſun? All men do ſee that it is raiſed by the beams of the ſun. Yet no man doth therefore ſay, that the ſun beams do ſtink. So when there reſteth in an evil man the matter and guiltineſs of evil, what cauſe is there why it ſhould be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he uſe their ſervice at his pleaſure? Away therefore with this doggiſh frowardneſs, which may indeed afar off bark at the juſtice of God, but cannot touch it.

The ſweet and ſober meditation which a chriſtian ought to have of God's providence.

6. But theſe cavils, or rather doting errors of frantic men, ſhall eaſily be ſhaken away, by godly and holy meditation of the providence, which the rule of godlineſs teacheth us, ſo that thereof may grow unto us, a good and moſt pleaſant fruit. Therefore a chriſtian heart when it is moſt aſſuredly perſuaded that all things come to paſs by the diſpoſition of God, and that nothing happeneth by chance, will always bend his eyes to him as to the principal cauſe of things, and yet will conſider the inferior cauſes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the ſingular providence of God doth watch for his preſervation, which providence will ſuffer nothing to happen, but that which ſhall turn to his good and ſalvation. And becauſe he hath to do firſt of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will aſſure himſelf that God's providence doth reign in both. As touching men, whether they be good or evil, he will acknowlege that all their counſels, wills, enterpriſes and powers are under the direction of God, ſo that it is in God's will to turn them whitherſoever he pleaſes and to reſtrain them ſo oft as pleaſeth him. That the ſingular providence of God doth keep watch for the ſafety of the faithful, there are many and moſt evident promiſes to witneſs. Pſal. lv. 22. Caſt thy burden upon the Lord

Lord, and he ſhall ſuſtain thee, and ſhall not ſuffer the righteous to fall for ever, Pſal. xci. 1. becauſe he careth for us. Zach. ii. 8. He that dweleth in the ſecret place of the Moſt High, ſhall abide under the ſhadow of the Almighty. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. Zech. ii. 8. I will be thy ſhield, a brazen wall, I will be an enemy to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. Iſa. xlv. 22. And alſo this is the principal intent in the hiſtories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with ſuch diligence keep the ways of ſaints, that they do not ſo much as ſtumble againſt a ſtone, Therefore as a little before we have rightfully rejected their opinion, who do imagine an univerſal providence of God, that ſtoopeth not ſpecially to the care of every creature: yet principally it ſhall be good to recognize the ſame ſpecial care toward ourſelves. Whereupon Chriſt after he had affirmed (Matth.x. 29.) that not a ſparrow of the leaſt value, doth fall to the ground without the will of the Father, doth by and by apply it to this end, that we ſhould conſider, that how much we are more worth than ſparrows, with ſo much near care doth God provide for us, and he extendeth that care ſo far, that we may be bold to truſt that the hairs of our head are numbered. What can we wiſh ourſelves more, if not ſo much as a hair can fall from our head, but by his will? I ſpeak not only of all mankind, but becauſe God hath choſen his church for a dwelling houſe for himſelf, it is no doubt but that he doth by ſingular examples ſhew his care in governing of it.

The comfort which riſeth from the conſideration of God's diſpoſing both evil and good.

7. The ſervant of God being ſtrengthened with both promiſes and examples, will join with them the teſtimonies which teach that all men are under God's power, whither it be to incline their minds to good will, or to reſtrain their malice from doing hurt. For it is the Lord who giveth us favour not only with them that wiſh us well, but alſo in the ſight of the Egyptians, Exod. iii. 21. and as for the maliciouſneſs of our enemies, he knoweth how by divers ways to ſubdue it. For ſometimes he taketh away their wits from them, ſo that they can conceive no ſound or ſober advice, like as he ſent forth Satan to fill the mouths of all the prophets with lying to deceive Achab, 1 Kings xxii. 22. He made Rehoboam mad by the young mens counſel, that he might be ſpoiled of his kingdom by his own folly, 1 Kings xii. 10. Many times when he granteth them wit, yet he maketh them ſo afraid and aſtoniſhed, that they have neither inclination nor power to go about that which they have conceived. Sometimes alſo when he hath permitted them to attempt that which luſt and rage did counſel them to, he doth in convenient time break off their violent motions, and ſuffereth them not to arrive at the end they had deſigned. So did he before the time bring to nought the counſel of Achitophel 2 Sam. xvii. 7. that ſhould have been to David's deſtruction. So alſo he taketh care to govern all his creatures for the benefit and ſafety of them that are his, yea, and to govern the devil himſelf, who as we ſee durſt enterpriſe nothing againſt Job, Job i. 12. without God's permiſſion and commandment. Of this knowlege the neceſſary conſequence to a good chriſtian is, Thankfulneſs of mind in proſperity and alſo patience in adverſity, and an incredible aſſuredneſs againſt the time to come. Whatſoever therefore ſhall happen to ſuch a man proſperouſly and according to his hearts deſire, all that he will aſcribe unto God, whether he feel the bounty of God by the miniſtry of men, or be aſſiſted by lifeleſs creatures. For thus he will think in his mind: "Surely it is "the Lord who hath inclined their minds to me, "who hath joined them unto me, to be inſtruments "of his goodneſs towards me." In plenty of the fruits of the earth, thus he will think, that it is the Lord who heareth the heaven, that the heaven may hear the earth, that the earth alſo may bear her fruits. In other things he will not doubt that it is only the bleſſing of the Lord, by which things proſper, and put in mind by ſo many cauſes he will not abide to be unthankful.

To behold the hand of God in all things which we ſuffer, maketh us both patient and penitent.

8. If any adverſity befal him he will immediately therein alſo lift up his mind to God, whoſe hand availeth much to imprint in us a patience and quiet moderation of heart. If Joſeph had ſtill continued in recording the falſhoods of his brethren, he could never have taken a brotherly mind towards them. But becauſe he bowed his mind to the Lord, he forgat the injury, and inclined to meekneſs and clemency inſomuch that of his own accord comforted his brethren and ſaid: Gen. xlv. 8. "It is not you that "ſold me into Egypt, but by the will of God I "was ſent before you to ſave your lives. You in-"deed thought evil of me, but the Lord turned it "to good." If Job had had reſpect to the Chaldees by whom he was troubled, he would forthwith have been kindled to revenge. But becauſe he did therewithal acknowlege it to be the work of God; he

he comforted himſelf with this moſt excellent ſaying: Job. i. 21. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath "taken away; bleſſed be the name of the Lord." So David when Shimei had railed and caſt ſtones at him, if he had looked upon man, he would have encouraged his ſoldiers to return the injury. But becauſe he underſtood that Shimei did it not without the moving of the Lord, he rather appeaſed them. 2 Sam. xvi. 10. "Let him alone (ſaid he) "for the Lord hath commanded him to curſe." With the ſame bridle in another place doth he reſtrain the intemperance of ſorrow. "I held my peace (ſaith "he) and became as dumb, becauſe thou, O Lord, "didſt it." If there be more effectual remedy againſt wrath and impatience; ſurely he hath not a little profited who hath learned in this behalf to think upon the providence of God, that he may always call back his mind to this point. It is the Lord's will, therefore it muſt be ſuffered, not only becauſe it is not lawful to ſtrive againſt it, but alſo becauſe he willeth nothing but that which is both juſt and expedient. In ſum this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leaving their malice (which would do nothing but urge us to ſorrow, and whet our minds to revenge) ſhould remember to climb up unto God, and learn to believe aſſuredly, that whatſoever our enemy hath miſchievouſly done againſt us, was both ſuffered and ſent by God's diſpoſition. Paul, to reſtrain us from requitting of injuries, doth wiſely put us in mind, Eph. vi. 12. that we are not to wreſtle with fleſh and blood, but with the ſpiritual enemy the devil, that we may prepare ourſelves to ſtrive with him. But this is the moſt profitable leſſon for the appeaſing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arm as well the devil as all wicked men to ſtrive with us, and that he ſitteth as judge to exerciſe our patience. But if the misfortunes and miſeries that oppreſs us, do happen without the work of men, let us remember the doctrine of the law: whatſoever is proſperous floweth from the fountain of God's bleſſing, and that all adverſities are his curſings: and let that moſt terrible warning make us afraid: Deut. xxviii. "If ye walk ſtubbornly againſt me, I will alſo "walk ſtubbornly againſt you." In which is rebuked our ſluggiſhneſs, when according to the common ſenſe of the fleſh accounting all to be but chance that happeneth of both ſorts, we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worſhip him, nor urged forward with his ſcourges to repentance. This ſame is the reaſon, why Jeremiah (Lam. iii. 38.) and Amos (Amos iii. 6.) did ſo ſharply rebuke the Jews, becauſe they thought that things as well good as evil came to paſs without the commandment of God. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth that ſpeech of Iſaiah, Iſ. xlv. 6. "I the Lord form the light, and create "darkneſs: I make peace, and create evil: I the "Lord do all theſe things."

The way to conſider wiſely of inferior and ſecond cauſes, whether they be of things paſt, or things to come.

9. And yet in the mean time a godly man will not wink at the inferior cauſes. Neither will he, becauſe he thinketh them the miniſters of God's goodneſs: by whom he hath received benefit, therefore let them paſs unconſidered, as though they had deſerved no thanks by their gentleneſs: but he will heartily think himſelf bound unto them, and will willingly own his obligation, and labour as he ſhall be able, and as occaſion ſhall ſerve, to recompence it. Finally, in benefits received he will reverence and praiſe God as the principal author, but he will honour men as the miniſters, and as the truth is indeed he will underſtand that he is by the will of God bound to them, by whoſe hand it was God's will to be beneficial unto him. If he ſuffer any loſs by negligence or want of foreſight, he will determine in his mind, that the ſame was done indeed with the will of God, but he will impute it alſo to himſelf. If any man be dead through ſickneſs whom he hath negligently handled, whereas of duty he ſhould have taken good heed unto him, although he be not ignorant, that the man was come unto his appointed time beyond which he could not paſs, yet will he not thereby leſſen his offence, but becauſe he had not faithfully diſcharged his duty toward him, he will ſo take it as if he had periſhed by fault of his negligence. Much leſs when there is uſed any fraud, and conceived malice of mind, in committing either murther or theft, will he excuſe it under pretence of God's providence, but he will in the ſelf ſame evil act ſeverally behold both the righteouſneſs of God and the wickedneſs of man, as both do manifeſtly ſhew themſelves. But principally in things to come he will have conſideration of ſuch inferior cauſes. For he will reckon it among the bleſſings of God if he be not diſappointed of the helps of men which he may uſe for his ſafety. And ſo he neither will be negligent in taking of counſel, nor ſlothful in craving their help whom he ſeeth to have ſufficient whereof he may be ſuccoured: but thinking that whatſoever creatures can any way profit him, the ſame are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his uſe as the lawful inſtruments of God's providence. And becauſe he doth not certainly know what ſucceſs the buſineſs will have that he goeth about, (ſaving that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will provide for his benefit) he will carefully purſue that which he ſhall think expedient for himſelf, ſo far as he can conceive in mind and underſtanding. And yet in taking of counſels he will not be carried on by his own wit, but will commit and yield himſelf to the wiſdom of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence ſhall not ſo ſtay upon outward helps, that if he have them he will careleſly reſt upon them, or if he want them he will be afraid as left deſtitute, for he will have his mind alway fixed upon the providence of God, neither will he ſuffer himſelf to be drawn away from theſtedfaſt beholding thereof by conſideration of preſent things. So though Joab acknowleged that the ſucceſs of battel is in the will and hand of God, yet he gave not himſelf to ſlothfulneſs, but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaveth it unto the Lord to govern the end. 2 Sam. x. 12. "We will ſtand valiant (ſaith "he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: "but the Lord do what is good in his eyes." This knowlege ſhall ſtrip us of raſhneſs and wrongful confidence, and ſhall drive us to continual calling upon God: and alſo ſhall uphold our minds with good hope, ſo as we may not doubt aſſuredly and boldly to depiſe thoſe dangers that compaſs us about.

The fears which every moment of our life bringeth, if our minds be not ſettled in the knowlege of God's providence.

10. In this point doth the ineſtimable felicity of a godly mind ſhew forth itſelf. Innumerable are the evils that do beſet man's life, and do threaten him ſo many deaths. As, not to go further than ourſelves: foraſmuch as our body is a receptacle of a thouſands diſeaſes, yea, hath encloſed and doth nouriſh within it the cauſes of diſeaſes; man cannot carry himſelf but he muſt needs alſo carry about with him many forms of his own deſtruction, and draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it elſe be called, where he neither is cold, nor ſweateth without peril? Now whitherſoever thou turn thee, all things that are about thee are not only untruſty friends to thee. but do in a manner openly threaten and ſeem to ſhew thee preſent death. Go into a ſhip, there is but a foot thickeſs between thee and death. Sit on horſeback, in the ſlipping of one foot thy life is in danger. Go through the ſtreets of the city: even how many tiles are upon the houſes, to ſo many perils art thou ſubject. If there be an iron tool in thy hand or thy friend's, thy harm is ready prepared. How many wild beaſts thou ſeeſt, they are all armed to thy deſtruction. If thou mean to ſhut up thy ſelf, even in a garden well fenced, where may appear nothing but pleaſantneſs of air and ground, there ſometimes lurketh a ſerpent. The houſe which is continually ſubject to fire, doth in the day-time threaten thee with poverty, and in the night time with falling upon thy head. Thy field, foraſmuch as it lyeth open to hail, froſt, drowth and other tempeſts, it warneth thee of barreneſs, and thereby famine. I ſpeak not of priſonings, treaſons robberies, open violence, of which part do beſiege us at home, and part do follow us abroad. In theſe ſtraits muſt not man needs be moſt miſerable, which even in life half dead doth plainly draw forth a careful and fainting breath, as if he had a ſword continually hanging over his neck? But thou wilt ſay, that theſe things happen ſeldom, or at leaſt not always, nor to all men, and never all at once. I grant it, but ſeeing we are put in mind by the examples of others, that the ſame things may happen to ourſelves, and that our life ought of duty no more to be free than theirs, it cannot be, but that we muſt dread and fear them, as things that may befal us. Now what can a man imagine more miſerable than ſuch a fearfulneſs? Beſides, that it is not without diſhonourable reproach of God to ſay, that he hath ſet open man, the nobleſt of all his creatures to their blind and unadviſed ſtrokes of fortune. But here my purpoſe is to ſpeak only of the miſery of man, which he ſhould feel, if he ſhould be brought ſubject under fortune's dominion.

What boldneſs, and quietneſs of mind the knowlege of the providence of God worketh.

11. But when the light of God's providence hath once ſhined upon a godly man, he is now relieved and delivered not only from the extreme anguiſh and fear with which he was before oppreſſed, but alſo from all care. For as juſtly he feareth fortune, ſo he dare boldly commit himſelf to God. This is (I ſay) his comfort to underſtand that his heavenly Father doth ſo hold in all things with his power, ſo ruleth them with his authority and countenance, ſo ordereth them with his wiſdom that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that he is received into God's tuition, and committed to the charge of angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but ſo far as it ſhall pleaſe God the governor to give them place. For ſo is it ſung in the pſalm: Pſalm. xci. 3. For he ſhall deliver thee from the ſnare of the fowler and from the noiſom peſtilence. He ſhall cover thee under his wings, and thou ſhalt be ſure under his feathers. His truth ſhall be thy ſhield and buckler. Thou ſhalt not be afraid of the fear of the night, nor of the arrow that flieth by day, nor of the peſtilence that walketh in darkneſs, nor of the plague that deſtroyeth at noon-day. And from thence proceedeth that boldneſs of the ſaints to glory. The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what fleſh may do to me. Pſal. cxiii. 6. The Lord is my protector, why ſhall I be afraid? If whole camps ſtand up againſt me, if I walk in the midſt of the ſhadow of death, I will not ceaſe to hope well. Whence, I pray you, have they this that their aſſuredneſs is never ſhaken away from them? but hereby, that where the world ſeemeth in ſhew to be without order whirled about, they know that God worketh every where, whoſe work they truſt ſhall be for their preſervation. Now if their ſafety be ſhaken either by the devil or by wicked men, in that caſe if they were not ſtrengthened with remembrance and meditation of providence, they muſt needs be ſoon diſcouraged. But when they call to mind, that the devil and all the rout of the wicked, are ſo every way holden in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceive any miſchief againſt us, nor go about it when they have conceived it, nor if they go never ſo much about it, can ſtir one finger to bring it to paſs but ſo far as he ſhall ſuffer, yea, ſo far as he ſhall command, and that they are not only holden faſt bound with fetters, but alſo compelled with bridle to do ſervice: here have they abundantly wherewith to comfort themſelves. For as it is the Lord's work to arm their fury and to turn and direct it whither it pleaſeth him, ſo is it his work alſo to appoint meaſure and end that they do not after their own will licentiouſly triumph. With which perſuaſion Paul being eſtabliſhed, did by the permiſſion of God appoint his journey in another place which he ſaid was in one place hindered by Satan. 1 Theſ. ii. 18. 1 Cor. xvi. 7. If he had only ſaid that he had been ſtopped by Satan, he ſhould have ſeemed to give him too much power, as if it had been in Satan's hand to overthrow the wiſe purpoſes of God: but when he maketh God the judge upon whoſe permiſſion journeys do hang, he doth therewithal ſhew, that Satan whatſoever he go about, can accompliſh nothing but by God's will. For the ſame reaſon doth David, becauſe for the ſundry changes wherewith man's life is toſſed and as it were whirled about, he doth fly to this ſanctuary, ſaith that his times are in the hand of God. Pſal. xxxi. 16. He might have ſaid either the courſe of his life, or time in the ſingular number. But by the word times, he meant to expreſs that howſoever the ſtate of man be unſteady, whatſoever alterations do now and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cauſe Rezin and the king of Iſrael, when joining their powers to the deſtruction of Judah, they ſeemed as fire brands kindled to waſte and conſume the land, are called by the prophet ſmoking brands, (Iſa. vii. 4.) which can do nothing but breathe out a little ſmoke. So when Pharaoh was terrible to all men by reaſon of his riches, ſtrength and number of men, he himſelf is compared to a beaſt of the ſea, and his army to fiſhes. Therefore God ſaith (Ezek. xxix. 4.) that he will take the captain and the army with his hook and draw them whether he pleaſes. Finally, becauſe I will not dwell long upon this point, if a man obſerve it he ſhall eaſily ſee that the extremity of all miſeries is the ignorance of God's providence, and the chief good conſiſts in the knowlege thereof.

12. Concerning the providence of God, this that is ſaid were enough for ſo much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithful, (for to fill the vain curioſity of men, nothing can be ſufficient, neither is it to be wiſhed that they be ſatisfied) were it not for certain places, which ſeem to mean otherwiſe than is above declared, that God hath not ſtedfaſt and ſtable purpoſe but changeable according to the diſpoſition of inferior things. Firſt, in ſome places there is mention made of the repentance of God, as Gen. vi. 6. that he repented him of the creating of man: 1 Sam. xv. 11. of the advancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that he will (Jer. xviii. 8.) repent him of the evil that he had determined to lay upon his people, ſo ſoon as he perceiveth any converſion of them from ſin. Again, there are recorded divers repeals of his decrees. He had declared by Jonas to the Ninevites, (Jonah iii. 4.) that after forty days once paſt, Nineveh ſhould be deſtroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle ſentence. He had by the mouth of Iſaiah, pronounced death to Hezekiah, (Iſa. xxxv. 3, 5.) which he was moved by his tears and prayers to defer. Hereupon many do argue, that God hath not appointed the affairs of men by eternal decree, but yearly, daily, and hourly, hourly, appointeth this or that, as every man's deſervings are, or as he thinketh it, equity and juſtice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to hold, that the ſame can no more be in God, than ignorance, error and weakneſs. For if no man do wittingly and willingly throw himſelf into the caſe that he need to repent, we cannot ſay that God doth repent, but that we muſt alſo ſay, that God is ignorant what will come to paſs, or that he cannot avoid it, or that he headlong and unadviſedly runneth into a purpoſe whereof he by and by bethinketh him. But that it is ſo far from the meaning of the holy Ghoſt, that in the very mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, becauſe he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be obſerved, that in the ſame chapter they are both ſo joined together, that the compariſon doth very well bring the ſhew of repugnancy to agreement. His changing is figurativly ſpoken, that God repented that he had made Saul king; ſoon after it is added: 1 Sam. xv. 29. The ſtrength of Iſrael ſhall not lie, nor ſhall be moved with repenting. Becauſe he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his unchangeableneſs is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certain that the ordinance of God in diſpoſing human affairs, is perpetual and above all repentance. And that his conſtancy ſhould not be doubtful, his very adverſaries have been compelled to bear him witneſs. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not chuſe but break forth into this ſaying, Num. xxiii. 19. that God is not man, that he ſhould lie, neither the ſon of man, that he ſhould repent: and that it is not poſſible that he ſhould not do what he hath ſaid, and not make good what he hath ſpoken.

It diſproveth not the ſettled purpoſe of God in appointing all things that he is ſaid to repent him, and that plagues firſt denounced are afterwards recalled.

God is ſaid to repent himſelf, not becauſe he changeth his purpoſe, but the events which his unchangeable purpoſe was to change.

13. What meaneth then this name of repentance? even in the ſame ſort that all the other phraſes of ſpeech which do deſcribe God unto us, after the manner of men. For, becauſe our weakneſs doth not reach to his highneſs, that deſcription of him which is taught us, was meet to be framed low to our capacity, that we might underſtand it. And this is the manner how to frame it low for us, to paint out himſelf not ſuch a one as he is in himſelf, but ſuch a one as he is perceived of us. Whereas he himſelf is without all moving of a troubled mind, he yet teſtifieth that he is angry with ſinners. Like as therefore when we hear that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any moving at all in him, but rather to conſider that this ſpeech is borrowed of our common ſenſe, becauſe God beareth a reſemblance of one chafed and angry ſo oft as he exerciſeth judgment: ſo ought we to underſtand nothing elſe by this word of repentance but a changing of deeds, becauſe men by changing of their deeds, are wont to declare that they diſlike them. Becauſe then every change among men is an amendment of that which diſpleaſes them, and amendment proceeds from repentance; therefore by the name of repentance is meant only, that God changeth in his works. In the mean time yet neither is his purpoſe nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth on with one continual courſe that which he had from eternity foreſeen, allowed and decreed, howſoever the alteration ſeem ſudden in the eyes of men.

Whenſoever a thing denounced from God is recalled, it was denounced with condition, if not expreſt, yet ſecret.

14. Neither doth ſacred hiſtory ſhew that God's decrees were repealed when it ſheweth that the deſtruction was pardoned to the Ninevites (Jonah iii. 10.) which had been before pronounced, and that the life of Hezekiah was prolonged after warning given him of death. Iſa. xxxv. 5. They that ſo conſtrue it are deceived in underſtanding of threatenings; which although they do ſimply affirm, yet by the event it ſhall be perceived that they contained a ſecret condition in them. For why did God ſend Jonas to the Ninevites to tell them before hand of the ruin of their city? Why did he by Iſaiah give Hezekiah warning of death? For he might have brought to nought both him and them without ſending them any word of their deſtruction. He meant therefore another thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to ſee it coming afar off. Even this he meant; not to have them deſtroyed, but to have them amended that they ſhould not be deſtroyed. Therefore this that Jonas propheſied that Nineveh ſhould fall after forty days, was done to this end that it ſhould not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Hezekiah, was done for this purpoſe that he might obtain longer life. Now who doth not ſee that God meant by ſuch threatenings to awaken them to repentance, whom he made afraid to the end that they might eſcape the judgment which they had deſerved by their ſins? If that be ſo agreed, the nature of the things themſelves doth lead us to this, to underſtand in the ſimple threatening a ſecret implied condition, which is alſo confirmed firmed by like examples. The Lord rebuking the king Abimelech, becauſe he had taken away Abraham's wife from him, Gen. xvi. 3. uſeth theſe words: Behold thou ſhalt die for the woman that thou haſt taken, for ſhe hath a huſband. But after he had excuſed himſelf, God ſaid thus: Reſtore the wife to her huſband, for he is a prophet, and ſhall pray for thee that thou mayeſt live. If not: know that thou ſhalt die the death and all that thou haſt. You ſee how in his firſt ſentence he vehemently ſtriketh his mind to bring him to be more heedfully bent to make amends, and in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of theſe that there was any thing withdrawn from the firſt purpoſe of God, by this that he made void the thing which he had pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternal ordinance, when in giving warning of the puniſhment he moveth thoſe to repentance, whom his will is to ſpare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his word, ſaving that he doth not expreſs the ſame thing in ſyllables which is yet eaſy to underſtand. For that ſaying of Iſaiah muſt needs remain true: Iſa. xiv. 27. "The Lord of Hoſts hath determined, and who "ſhall be able to undo it? His hand is ſtreched out "and who ſhall turn it away."

CHAP. XVIII.

That God doth ſo uſe the ſervice of wicked men, and ſo boweth their minds to put his judgments in execution, that yet ſtill himſelf remaineth pure from all ſpot.

How God doth not only permit but appoint the things to be done which wicked men do.

THERE ariſeth a hard queſtion out of other places, where it is ſaid that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himſelf and all the reprobate. For the ſenſe of the fleſh ſcarcely conceiveth how he working by them, ſhould not gather ſome ſpot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and juſtly condemn his miniſters. Upon this was deviſed the diſtinction between doing and ſuffering: becauſe many have thought this doubt impoſſible to be diſſolved: that both Satan and all the wicked are ſo under the hand and power of God, that he directeth their malice, unto what end it pleaſeth him, and uſeth their wicked doings to the executing of his judgments. And their modeſty were peradventure excuſable, whom they ſhew of abſurdity putteth in fear, if it were not ſo that they do wrongfully with a lying defence go about to deliver the juſtice of God from all unrightful blame. It ſeemeth to them unreaſonable, that man ſhould by the will and commandment of God be made blind, and ſo by and by be puniſhed for his blindneſs. Therefore they ſeek to eſcape by this ſhift, that this is done by the permiſſion but not by the will of God. But he himſelf plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth reject that ſhift. As for this that men do nothing but by the ſecret commandment of God, and do trouble themſelves in vain with deliberating, unleſs he do by his ſecret direction ſtabliſh that which he hath before determined, it is proved by innumerable and plain teſtimonies. It is certain that this which we before alleged out of the Pſalm, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the actions of men. If God be the certain appointer of war and peace, as it is there ſaid and that without exception: who dare ſay that men are carried cauſeleſly with blind motion while God knoweth not of it, and ſitteth ſtill? But in ſpecial examples will be more agreeable plainneſs. By the firſt chapter of Job we know, that Satan doth no leſs appear before God to receive his commandments than do the angels which do willingly obey. Indeed it is after a diverſe manner and for a diverſe end: but yet ſo that he cannot go about any thing but with the will of God. Although there ſeem afterwards to be added a bare permiſſion of him to affiict the holy man: yet becauſe that ſaying is true: the Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away, as it pleaſed God ſo is it to come to paſs: We gather that God was the author of that trial of Job, Job i. 2. whereof Satan and the wicked thieves were miniſters. Satan goeth about to drive the holy man by deſperation to madneſs. The Sabeans cruelly and wickedly do invade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Job acknowlegeth that he was by God ſtripped of all his goods and made poor, becauſe it ſo pleaſed God. Therefore whatſoever men or Satan himſelf attempt, yet God manages all their efforts ſo as to turn them to the executing of his judgments. It was God's pleaſure to have the falſe king Ahab deceived: 2 Kings. xxii. 20. the Devil offered his ſervice thereunto: he was ſent with a certain commandment, to be a lying ſpirit in the mouth of all the prophets. If the blinding and madneſs of Ahab be the judgment of God, then the device of bare permiſſion is vain. For it were a fond thing to ſay, that the judge doth only ſuffer and not alſo decree what he will have done, and command the miniſters to put it in execution. It was the Jews purpoſe to deſtroy Chriſt, Pilate and the ſoldiers to follow their raging luſt, and yet in a ſolemn prayer the diciples do confeſs, that all the wicked men do nothing elſe but that which the hand and counſel of God had determined: even as Peter had before preached that, Chriſt was by the decreed purpoſe and foreknowlege of God delivered to be ſlain. As if he ſhould ſay: that God from whom nothing is hid, from the beginning did knowingly and willingly appoint that which the Jews did execute, as in another place he ſays, that God who ſhewed before by all his prophets that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, hath ſo fulfilled it. Acts iv. 28. Acts ii. 23, Acts iii. 18. 2 Sam. xvi. 22. Abſolom defiling his father's bed (2 Sam. xii. 12.) with inceſtuous adultery, commited deteſtable wickedneſs. Yet God pronounceth that this was his own work. For the words are theſe: thou haſt done it ſecretly, but I will do it openly, and before the ſun. Jeremiah pronounceth Jer. l. 25. that all the cruelty that the Chaldees uſed in Judea was the work of God. For which cauſe Nebuchadnezzar is called the ſervant of God, God every where crieth out that with his hiſſing, with the ſound of his trumpet, with his power and commandment the wicked are ſtired up to war. He calleth the Aſſyrian the rod of his wrath, and the ax that he moveth with his hand. The deſtruction of the holy city and ruin of the temple he calleth his work. Iſai. v. 26. Chap. x. 5. and xix. 25. David not murmuring againſt God, but acknowleging him for a righteous judge, (2. Sam. x. 10) yet confeſſeth that the curſings of Shemei proceeded from the command of God. The Lord (ſaith he) commanded him to curſe. We often find in ſacred hiſtory, that whatſoever happneth it cometh of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, (1 Kings xi. 31. the death of the ſons of Eli (1 Sam. ii. 34.) and very many things of the like nature. They who are in the leaſt converſant in ſcripture do ſee that for ſhortneſs ſake, I bring forth out of many teſtimonies only a few by which however it appeareth plainly enough, that they do trifle and talk fondly, who thruſt in a bare permiſſion in place of the providence of God, as though God ſat in a watch-tower waiting for the chances of fortune, and ſo his judgments ſhould depend upon the will of men.

The providence of

2. Now as concerning ſecret motions, that which Solomon ſpeaketh of the heart of a king, Prov. xxi. 1. that it is turned whitherſoever God pleaſeth, extendeth ſurely to all mankind, and is as much in affect as if he had ſaid: whatſoever we conceive in mind, is by the ſecret inſpiration of God directed to his end.

God is a governeſs which directs all the inclinations of the mind of man whether they bend unto good or evil.

And truly if he did not work in the minds of men it were not rightly ſaid, that he taketh away the lip from the true ſpeakers, and wiſdom from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. Ezek. vii. 26. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearful ſo far forth as their hearts are taken with his fear. Lev. xxvi. 36. So David went out of the camp of Saul, 1 Sam. xxvi. and none was aware of it, becauſe the ſleep of God was come upon them all. But nothing can be deſired to be more plainly ſpoken, than where he ſo oft pronounceth, that he blindeth the eyes of men, and ſtriketh them with giddineſs, that he maketh them drunk with the ſpirit of drowſineſs, caſteth them into madneſs, and hardneth their hearts. Theſe things alſo many do refer to permiſſion, as if in forſaking the reprobate he ſuffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that ſolution is too fond, foraſmuch as the holy Ghoſt in plain words expreſſeth that they are ſtriken with blindneſs and madneſs by the juſt judgment of God. Eccle. vii. 5. Rom. vii. 23. It is ſaid, that he hardned the heart of Pharaoh, Exod. viii 15. alſo that he did make dull and ſtrenthen it. Some do with an unſavory cavil mock out theſe phraſes of ſpeech, becauſe in another place it is ſaid, Pharaoh did harden his own heart, there is his own will ſet for the cauſe of his hardning. As though theſe things did not very well agree together, although in divers manners, that man while he is moved in working by God, doth alſo work himſelf. And I do turn back their objection againſt themſelves. For, if to harden do ſignify but a bare permiſſion then the very motion of obſtinacy ſhall not be properly in Pharaoh. Now how weak and fooliſh were it ſo to expound, Exod. iii. 21. as if Pharaoh did only ſuffer himſelf to be hardned? Moreover the Scripture cutteth of all occaſions from ſuch cavils, for God ſaith, I will hold his heart. Joſ. xi. 20. So of the inhabitaints of the land of Canaan, Moſes ſaith, that they went forth to battle, becauſe the Lord had hardned their hearts. Pſal. cv. 25. Which ſame thing is repeated by another prophet, ſaying: He turned their hearts that they ſhould hate his people. Iſai. x. 6. Again in Iſaiah he ſaith, that he will ſend the Aſſyrians againſt the deceitful nation, and will command them to carry away the ſpoils, and violently take the prey not meaning that he will teach wicked and obſtinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his judgments as if they did bear his comandments graven in their minds. Whereby appeareth that they were moved by the certain appointment of God. I grant that God doth frequently work in the reprobate by Satan's ſervice as a mean, but yet ſo that Satan doth his office by God's moving, and proceedeth ſo far as is given him. 1 Sam xvi. 14. The evil ſpirit troubled Saul, but it is ſaid that it was of God, that we may know that the madneſs of Saul came of the juſt vengeance of God. It is alſo ſaid that the ſame Satan doth blind the minds of the unfaithful: 2 Cor. iv. 4. but how ſo, but only becauſe the effectual working of error cometh from God himſelf, to make them believe lies that refuſe to obey the truth? After the firſt manner of ſpeaking it is ſaid If any prophet ſhall ſpeak lyingly, Eze. xiv. 9. I the Lord have deceived him. According to the other manner of ſpeech it is ſaid, that he giveth men into a reprobate mind: Rom. i. 28. and to caſt them in to filthy deſires, becauſe he is the chief author of his own juſt vengeance, and Satan is but only a miniſter thereof. But becauſe we muſt treat of this matter again in the ſecond book, where we ſhall diſcourſe of free or bound will of man, I think I have already ſhortly ſpoken ſo much as this place required. Let this be the ſum of all, that foraſmuch as the will of God is ſaid to be the cauſe of all things, his providence is thought the governeſs in all purpoſes and works of men, ſo as it ſheweth forth her force not only in the elect, who are governed by the holy Spirit, but alſo compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

There are not contrary wills in God, although he forbid the doing of evil, and yet be willing to have it done: but our blindneſs whereby we diſcern not how theſe two do agree maketh us to imagine that they diſagree when in truth they do not.

3. Foraſmuch as hitherto I have recited only ſuch things as are writen in the ſcriptures, plainly and not doubtfully, let them that fear not wrongfully to ſlander the heavenly oracles, take heed what manner of judgment they take upon them. For if by feigned pretending of ignorance they ſeek a praiſe of modeſty, what can be imagined more proudly done, than to ſet one ſmall word againeſt the authority of God? as "I think otherwiſe, I like not to have this touched." But if they openly ſpeak evil, what prevail they with ſpiting againſt the heaven? But this is no new example of way-wardneſs, becauſe there have been in all ages wicked and ungodly men, that with raging mouth barked againſt this point of doctrine. But they ſhall feel that thing indeed to be true, which long ago the holy Ghoſt ſpake by the mouth of David, that God may overcome when he is judged. Pſal. li. 6. David doth by the way rebuke the madneſs of men in this ſo unbridled licentiouſneſs, that of their own filthineſs they do not only argue againſt God, but alſo take upon them power to condemn him. In the mean time he ſhortly admoniſheth that the blaſphemies which they vomit up againſt the heaven do not reach unto God, but that he driving away the clouds of cavils, doth brightly ſhew forth his righteouſneſs, and alſo our faith (becauſe being grounded upon the word of God, it is above all the world, 1 John v.4.) doth from her high place contemptuouſly look down upon theſe miſts For firſt, where they object, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in two contrary wills, becauſe he decreeth thoſe things by ſecret purpoſe, which he hath openly forbidden by his law, that is eaſily wiped away. But before I anſwer it, I will once again give the readers warning that this cavil is thrown out not againſt me, but againſt the holy Ghoſt, who taught the holy man Job this confeſſion: Job i. 21. as it pleaſed God, ſo it came to paſs. When he was ſpoiled by thieves, he acknowleged in the injury and hurt that they did him, the juſt ſcourge of God. What ſaith the ſcripture in other places? The ſons of Eli obeyed not their father, 1 Sam. ii. 25. becauſe it was God's will to kill them. Alſo another prophet crieth out that God who ſitteth in heaven doth whatſoever he will. Pſal. cxv. 3. And now I have ſhewed plainly enough that God is the author of all thoſe things which theſe judges would have to happen only by his idle permiſſion: he teſtifieth that he createth light and darkneſs, Iſai. xlv. 7. that he formeth good and evil, that no evil happneth which he himſelf hath not made. Amos iii. 6. Let them tell me I beſeech them, whether he doth willingly or againſt his will execute his own judgments? But as Moſes teacheth, that he who is ſlain by the falling of an ax by chance, is delivered by God into the hand of the ſtriker: Deut. xix. 5. ſo the whole church ſaith in Luke, that Herod and Pilate conſpired to do theſe things, which the hand and purpoſe of God had decreed. Acts iv. 28. And truly if Chriſt were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to us? And yet the will of God neither doth ſtrive with it ſelf, nor is changed, nor feigneth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and ſimple in him, it ſeemeth to us manifold, becauſe according to the weakneſs of our underſtanding we conceive not how God in divers maner willeth and willeth not one ſelf thing. Paul, after that he hath ſaid, that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden myſtery, Eph. iii. 10. within a little after ſaith further, that in it was manifeſtly ſhewed the manifold wiſdom of God: becauſe for the dulneſs of our capacity, the wiſdom of God ſeemeth to us manifold, or (as the old interpreter hath tranſlated it) of many faſhions: ſhall we therefore dream that there is any variety in God himſelf, as though he either changeth his purpoſe, or diſſenteth from himſelf? Rather when we conceive not how God will have the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to do, let us call to mind our own weakneſs, and therewithal conſider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cauſe called inacceſſible, becauſe it is covered with darkneſs. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Therefore all godly and ſober men will eaſily agree to this ſentence of Auguſtine, (Encherid. ad Laur. ca. 101.) that ſometimes man with good will willeth that which God willeth not. As if a good ſon willeth to have his father to live, whom God will have to die. Again it may come to paſs, that man may will the ſame thing with an evil will which God willeth with a good will. As if an evil ſon willeth to have his father to die, and God alſo willeth the ſame. Now the firſt of theſe two ſons willeth that which God willeth not, and the other ſon willeth that which God alſo willeth, and yet the naturalneſs of the firſt ſon doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrary thing, than the unnaturalneſs of the other ſon that willeth the ſame thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, and to what end the will of every one is to be applied, to have it either allowed or diſallowed. For thoſe things which God willeth well he bringeth to paſs by the evil wills of evil men. But a little before he had ſaid, that the apoſtate angels in their falling away, and all the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themſelves, did that which God would not, but in reſpect of the omnipotency of God, they could by no means ſo do, becauſe while they did againſt the will of God, the will of God was done upon them. Whereupon he crieth out: Great are the works of God, and ought to be ſought out of all them that have pleaſure therein: that in marvellous manner the ſame thing is not done without his will which is alſo done againſt his will, becauſe it could not be done if he did not ſuffer it: and yet he doth it not againſt his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not ſuffer a thing to be done evil, unleſs for that he is omnipotent, he could of evil make good.

4. In the ſame manner is anſwered or rather vaniſheth away the other objection: that if God do not only uſe the ſervice of wicked men, but alſo governeth their counſels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, and therefore men are unworthily condemned if they execute that which God hath decreed, becauſe they obey his will: for it is wrong to confound his will and commandment together, which appear by innumerable examples to differ widely. For though when Abſolom abuſed his father's wives, it was God's will to puniſh David's adultery with that diſhonour: yet he did not therefore command the wicked ſon to commit inceſt, unleſs perhaps you mean it in reſpect of David, as he ſpeaketh of the railings of Shemei. For when he confeſſeth that Shemei raileth at him by the commandment of God, he doth not therein commend his obedience, as if that froward dog did obey the commandment of God, but acknowleged his tongue to be the ſcourge of God, he patiently ſuffereth to be corrected. And let it be carefully remembred, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his ſecret judgment, they are not to be excuſed, as though they did obey his commandment, which indeed of their own evil inclination they do purpoſely break. Now how that thing is of God, and is ruled by his ſecret providence, which men do wickedly, the election of king Jeroboam is an example, in which the raſhneſs and madneſs of the people is ſeverely condemned, becauſe they perverted the order appointed by God, and falſely fell from the houſe of David, and yet we know it was his will that he ſhould be anointed. Whereupon in the very words of Hoſea there appeareth a certain ſhew of repugnancy, Hoſea viii. 4. that where God complained that that kingdom was erected without his knowlege, and againſt his will, in another place he ſaith, Hoſea xiii. 11. that he gave the kingdom to Jeroboam in his rage. How ſhall theſe ſayings agree? that Jeroboam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the ſame God? Even thus, becauſe neither could the people fall from the houſe of David, but that they muſt ſhake off the yoke which God hath laid upon them: neither yet had God his liberty taken away, but that he might ſo puniſh the unthankfulneſs of Solomon. We ſee therefore how God in not willing falſe breach of allegiance, yet to another end juſtly willeth a falling away from their prince, whereupon Jeroboam beſide all hope was by holy anointing driven to be king. After this manner doth the ſacred hiſtory ſay, that there was an enemy raiſed up to ſpoil Solomon's ſon of part of his kingdom. Let the readers diligently conſider both theſe things, becauſe it hath pleaſed God to have the people governed under the hand of one king. Therefore when it was divided into two parts, it was done againſt his will. And yet the diviſion took beginning of his will. For ſurely whereas the prophet both by words and ceremony of anointing did move Jeroboam when he thought of no ſuch thing, to hope of the kingdom, this was not done without the knowlege or againſt the will of God, which commanded it ſo to be done, and yet is the rebellion of the people juſtly condemned, for that as it were againſt the will of God, they fell from the poſterity of David. In this manner it is alſo afterwards further ſaid, that where Rehoboam proudly deſpiſed the requeſt of the people, this was done by God to confirm the word which he had ſpoken by the hand of Ahijah his ſervant. Lo how againſt God's will the the ſacred unity is torn in ſunder, and yet with the will of the ſame God ten tribes do forſake Solomon's ſon. Let us add another like example. Where the people conſenting, yea laying their hands unto it, the ſons of Ahab were ſlain, and all his offspring rooted out. 2 Kings x. 7. Jehu ſaid indeed truly, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that had been ſpoken by the hand of his ſervant Elias. And yet not unjuſtly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, becauſe they had put their hands unto it. Are ye righteous, ſaith he? If I have conſpired againſt my lord, who hath killed all theſe? I have before, as I think, already declared plainly, how in the ſelf ſame work both the fault of man doth diſcover itſelf, and alſo the righteouſneſs of God glorioufly appeareth. And for modeſt wits this anſwer of Auguſtine ſhall alway ſuffice, Epiſt. 48. ad Vincen. whereas the Father delivered the Son, and Chriſt delivered his body, and Judas delivered the Lord: why in this delivering is God righteous, and man guilty? becauſe in the ſame one thing which they did, the cauſe was not one, for which they did it. If any be more cumbered with this that we now ſay, there is no conſent of God with man, where man by the righteous moving of God doth that which is not lawful, let them remember that which Auguſtine ſaith in another place: (De gratia & libero arbitrio ad Valent. cap. 20.) Who ſhall not tremble at theſe judgments, where God worketh even in the hearts of evil men whatſoever he will, and yet rendereth to them according to their deſervings? And truly in the falſhood of Judas, it ſhall be no more lawful to lay the blame of the wicked deed to God, becauſe he himſelf willed him to be delivered, and did deliver him to death, than it ſhall be to give away the praiſe of our redemption to Judas. Therefore the ſame writer doth in another place truly tell us, that in this examination God doth not enquire what men might have done, or what they have done, but what their will was to do, that purpoſe and will may come into the account. They that think this hard, let them a little while conſider, how tolerable their own waywardneſs is, while they refuſe a thing witneſſed by plain teſtimonies of ſcripture, becauſe it exceedeth their capacity, and do find fault that thoſe things are uttered, which God, unleſs he had known them profitable to be known, would never have commanded to be taught by his prophets and apoſtles. For our being wiſe ought to be no more but to embrace with meek willingneſs to learn, and that without exception whatſoever is taught in the holy ſcriptures. As for them that do more frowardly outrage in prating againſt it, ſince it is evident that the babble againſt God, they are not worthy of a longer confutation.

BOOK SECOND.

Which treateth of the KNOWLEGE of GOD the REDEEMER in CHRIST; which Knowlege was firſt opened to the Fathers in the time of the Law, and then to us in the Goſpel.

CHAP. I.

That by Adam's ſin and falling away, mankind became accurſed, and did degenerate from his firſt eſtate: wherein is treated of Original ſin.

We muſt learn thoroughly to know ourſelves, that the conſideration of the graces of God may make us thankful, and the beholding of our miſeries, humble us.

NOT without cauſe hath the knowlege of himſelf been in the old proverb ſo much commended to man. For if it be thought a ſhame to be ignorant of all things that pertain to the courſe of a man's life, then much more ſhameful is the not knowing of ourſelves, whereby it cometh to paſs, that in taking counſel of any thing neceſſary we are miſerably dazled, yea, altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this leſſon is, ſo much more diligently muſt we take heed that we do not diſorderly uſe it, as we ſee ſome of the philoſophers have done. For they in exhorting man to know himſelf, do withal appoint this to be the end, why he ſhould know himſelf, that he ſhould not be ignorant of his own dignity and excellency: and nothing elſe do they will him to behold in himſelf, but that whereby he may ſwell with vain confidence, and be puffed up with pride. But the knowlege of our ſelves, firſt ſtandeth in this point, that conſidering what was given us in creation, and how bountifully God continueth his gracious favour toward us, we may know how great had been the excellency of our nature, if it continued uncorrupted: and we may withal think upon this, that there is nothing in us of our own, but that we have as it were gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed upon us, that we may always depend upon him. Then, that we call to mind our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw down all glorying and trust of ourselves, overwhelm us with shame, and truly humble us. For as God at the beginning fashioned us like his own image to the end to raise up our minds both to the study of virtue and to the meditation of eternal life, so lest the so great nobleness of our kind, which maketh us different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulness, it is good for us to know, that we are therefore endued with reason and understanding, that in keeping a holy and honest life, we should proceed on forward to the appointed end of blessed immortality. But the first dignity cannot come in our mind, but by and by on the other side the heavy sight of our filthiness, and shame doth thrust it self in presence, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, whereupon groweth the hatred and lothing of ourselves and true humility, and there is kindled a new desire to seek for God, in whom every one of us may recover those good things, whereof we are found altogether void and empty.

2. This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of ourselves, I mean, it requireth such a knowlege as may both call us away from all confidence of our own power, and making us destitute of all matter to glory upon, may bring us to submission Which rule it behoveth us to keep, if we will attain to the true mark both of right knowlege and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth us rather to consider our good things, than to look upon our miserable neediness and dishonour, which ought to overwhelm us with shame. For there is nothing that human nature desires more than to be caress'd with flattery: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with over much lightness of belief: whereby it is so much less to be wondered at, since that herein the greatest part of men have perniciously erred. For since there is naturally planted in all mortal men a more than blind love of themselves, they do most willingly persuade themselves that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintainance of other, this most vain opinion doth every where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of himself to make himself live well and happily. But if there be any who are content to think more modestly, howsoever they grant somewhat to God, lest they should seem arrogantly to assume all to themselves, yet they so part it that the principal matter of glory and confidence always remaineth with themselves. Now if there should happen to be any discourse which with its allurements tickleth the pride that already of itself itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delight them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most favourably advanced the excellency of human nature, so hath he been highly acceptable and extremely well liked by men in all ages. But whatsoever such commendation there be of man's excellency that teacheth man rest in himself, it doth nothing but delight with that its sweetness, and indeed so deceiveth that it bringeth to most wretched destruction all them that assent unto it. For to what purpose availeth it for us, standing upon all vain confidence to devise, appoint, atempt and go about those things that we think to be for our advantage, and in our first beginning of enterprise to be forsaken and destitute of sound understanding and true strength, and yet to go on boldly till we fall down into destruction? But it cannot otherwise happen to them that trust they can do any thing by their own power. Therefore if any man give heed to such teachers that hold us in considering only our own good things, he shall not profit in learning to know himself, but shall be carried violently away into the worst kind of ignorance.

The true knowlege of our selves emboldeneth not, but casteth down, it teacheth us what our duty, is, and how unable we are to perform it.

3. Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common natural meaning of all men, that the second part of wisdom consisteth in the knowlege of our selves, yet in the very manner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the judgment of the flesh, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himself, when trusting upon his own understanding and integrity, he taketh boldness, and encourageth himself to doing the duties of virtue, and bidding battle to vices, travelleth with all his study to bend himself to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh upon and trieth himself by the rule of God's judgment, findeth nothing that may raise up his mind to good affiance: and the more inwardly wardly that he hath examined himſelf, the more he is diſcouraged, till being altogether ſpoiled of all confidence, he leaveth to himſelf nothing towards the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God have us to forget the firſt nobleneſs that he gave to our father Adam, which ought in all reaſon to excite us to the ſtudy of righteouſneſs and goodneſs. For we cannot conſider either our own firſt eſtate, or to what end we are created, but we ſhall be urged forward to ſtudy upon immortality, and to deſire the kingdom of God. But that conſideration is ſo far from inſpiring us with courage, that rather diſcouraging us, it fills us with humiliation of ſoul. For what is that firſt eſtate of ours? even that from whence we are fallen. What is that end of our creation? even the ſame from which we are altogether turned away: ſo that lothing our own miſerable eſtate, we may groan for ſorrow, and in groaning may alſo ſigh for the loſs of that dignity. But now when we ſay that man ought to behold nothing in himſelf that may make him of bold courage: we mean that there is nothing in him of which he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any want to hear what knowlege man ought to have of himſelf, let us thus divide it, that firſt he conſider to what end he is created, and endued with gifts that are not to be deſpiſed, by which though he may be ſtirred up to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him conſider his own ſtrength, or rather great want of ſtrength, by perceiving whereof he may ly in extreme confuſion, as one utterly brought to naught. The firſt of theſe conſiderations tendeth to this end, that he may know what is his duty: and the other, how much he is able to do towards the performing of it. We will treat of them both, as the order of teaching ſhall require.

4. But becauſe it muſt needs be that it was not a light negligence, but a deteſtable wicked act which God ſo ſeverely puniſhed we muſt conſider the very form of the ſame in the fall of Adam, that kindled the great vengeance of God upon all mankind. It is a childiſh opinion that hath commonly been received, concerning the intemperance of gluttony, as though the ſum and head of all virtues conſiſted in the forbearing of one only fruit, when there flowed on every ſide ſtore of all ſorts of dainties that were to be deſired, and when in that bleſſed fruitfulneſs of the earth, there was not only plenty, but alſo variety to make entertainment for pleaſure. Therefore we muſt look further, becauſe the forbidding him to eat of the tree of the knowlege of good and evil, was the trial of obedience, that Adam in obeying might prove that he was willingly ſubject to the government of God. And the name of the tree itſelf ſheweth, that that commandment was given for none other end, than for this, that he contented with his own eſtate ſhould not with wicked luſt advance himſelf higher. But the promiſe whereby he was bidden to hope for eternal life, ſo long as he did not eat of the tree of life, and again, the terrible threatening of death ſo ſoon as he ſhould taſte of the tree of knowlege of good and evil, ſerved to prove and exerciſe his faith. Hereof it is not hard to gather, by what means Adam provoked the wrath of God againſt himſelf. Auguſtine indeed ſaith not amiſs, when he aſſerts, that pride was the beginning of all evils. For if ambition had not lifted up man higher than was lawful and than was permitted him, he might have continued in his eſtate: but we muſt fetch a more full definition from the manner of the temptation that Moſes deſcribeth. For ſince the woman was with the deceit of the ſerpent led away by infidelity, now it appeareth that diſobedience was the beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were loſt by one man's diſobedience. Rom. v. 19. But it is withal to be noted, that the firſt man fell from the ſubjection of God, for that he not only was taken with the enticements of Satan, but alſo deſpiſing the truth, did turn out of the way to lying. And ſurely God's word being once deſpiſed, all reverence of God is ſhaken off. Becauſe his majeſty doth no other ways abide in honour among us, nor the worſhip of him remain inviolate, but while we hang upon his mouth. Therefore infidelity was the root of that falling away. But thereupon aroſe ambition and pride, to which was added unthankfulneſs, for that Adam in coveting more than was granted, did irreverently deſpiſe the ſo great liberality of God with which he was enriched. And this was a monſtrous wickedneſs, that the ſon of the earth thought it a ſmall thing that he was made after the likeneſs of God, unleſs he might alſo be made equal with God. If apoſtacy be a filthy and deteſtable offence, by which man draweth himſelf from the allegiance of his Creator, yea, outragiouſly ſhaketh off his yoke: then it is but vain to extenuate the ſin of Adam. Altho' it was no ſimple apoſtacy, but joined with ſhameful reproaches againſt God, while they aſſented to.

the ſlanders of Satan, wherein he accuſeth God of lying, envy, and niggardly grudging; finally, infidelity opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obſtinate rebellion, to make men caſt away the fear of God, and throw themſelves whither their luſt carrieth them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of ſalvtation is opened unto us, when at this day we receive the goſpel by our ears: even as by the ſame windows, when they ſtood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would never have been ſo bold, as to do againſt the commandment of God, but for this, that he did not believe his word, Truly this was the beſt bridle for the right keeping of all affections in good order, to think that there is nothing better than to keep righteouſneſs in obeying the commandments of God, and then that the chief end of happy life is to be beloved of him. He therefore being carried away witht he blaſphemies of the devil, did (as much as in him lay) extinguiſh the glory of God.

All Adam's offſpring through his ſin are made ſinful, not by imputation only, as Pelagius taught, but by propagation, receiving the contagion of ſin and uncleanneſs before they behold the light of this life.

5. As the ſpiritual life of Adam was, to abide joined and bound to his Creator, ſo his allienation from him was the death of his ſoul. Nor is it any wonder if he by his falling away, deſtroyed all his own poſterity, which perverted the whole order of nature in heaven and in earth. All the creatures do groan, ſaith Paul being made ſubject to corruption againſt their will. Rom. viii. If one ſhould aſk the cauſe: no doubt it is for that they bear part of that puniſhment that man deſerved, for whoſe uſe they were created. Since then the curſe that goeth throughout all the coaſts of the word, proceeded from his fault both upward and downward, it is nothing againſt reaſon, if it ſpread abroad into all his iſſue. Therefore after that the heavenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone ſuffer this puniſhment, that in place of wiſdom, ſtrength, holineſs, truth, and juſtice (with which ornaments he had been clothed) there came in the moſt horrible peſtilences, blindneſs, weakneſs, filthineſs, falſhood, and injuſtice, but alſo he entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the ſame miſeries. This is the corruption that cometh by inheritance, which the old writers called original ſin, meaning by this word ſin, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they have had much contention, becauſe there is nothing further off from common reaſon, than all men to be made guilty of one man's fault, and ſo the ſin to become common. Which ſeemeth to have been the cauſe why the oldeſt doctors of the church did but darkly touch this point, or at the leaſt did not ſet it out ſo plainly as was convenient. And yet that fearfulneſs could not bring to paſs, but that Pelagius aroſe, whoſe prophane invention was that Adam ſinned only to his own loſs, and hurted not his poſterity. So thro' this ſubtilty, Satan went about by hiding the diſeaſe, to make it incurable. But when it was proved by manifeſt teſtimony of ſcripture, that ſin paſſed from the firſt man into all his poſterity, he brought this cavil, that it paſſed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men laboured in this point, and above all others Auguſtine, to ſhew that we are corrupted not by foreign wickedneſs, but that we bring with us from the womb of our mother a vicioufneſs planted in our begetting, which to deny was too great ſhameleſſneſs. But the raſhneſs of the Pelagians and Celeſtians will not ſeem marvellous to him, who by the writings of the holy man ſhall perceive, how ſhameleſs beaſts they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubtfully ſpoken that David confeſſeth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceived in ſin. Pſal. li. 7. He doth not there accuſe the ſins of his father or mother, but the better to ſet forth the goodneſs of God toward him, he beginneth the confeſſion of his own wickedneſs at his very begetting. Foraſmuch as it is evident that, that was not peculiar to David alone, it followeth that the common eſtate of all mankind is noted under his example. All we therefore that deſcend of unclean ſeed, are born infected with the contagion of ſin, yea, before that we ſee the light of this life, we are in the ſight of God filthy and ſpotted. Forwho can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one: as it is in the book of Job.

In Adam our nature being corrupted cometh unto us, ſuch as he by ſin had made it: whereupon it followeth, that we are dead becauſe he was dead of whom we are ſons of wrath becauſe they were ſo that begat us: fleſh be-

6. We hear that the uncleanneſs of the parents ſo paſſeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we ſhall not find the beginning unleſs we go up to the firſt parent of us all, to the fountain head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not only the progenitor, but alſo the root of man's nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankind juſtly corrupted: which the apoſtle maketh plain by

by comparing of him and Chriſt. As (ſaith he) by one man ſin entered into the whole world, and death by ſin, and ſo death hath paſſed upon all men, foraſmuch as all have ſinned: ſo by the grace of Chriſt, righteouſneſs and life is reſtored unto us. What will the Pelagians here prat? that Adam's ſin was ſpread abroad by imitation? Then have we no other profit by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, but that he is an example ſet before us to follow? Who can abide ſuch robbery of God's honour? If it be out of queſtion that Chriſt's righteouſneſs is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth alſo that they both were ſo loſt in Adam, as they be recovered in Chriſt: and that ſin and death ſo crept in by Adam, as they are aboliſhed by Chriſt. The words are plain, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt, as by the diſobedience of Adam they were made ſinners: and that therefore between them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping us in his deſtruction, deſtroyed us with him, and Chriſt with his grace reſtored us to ſalvation. In ſo clear light of truth I think we need not a longer or more elaborate proof. So alſo in the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xv. 22. when he goeth about to eſtabliſh the godly in the hope of the reſurrection, he ſheweth that the life is recovered in Chriſt, that was loſt in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth alſo therewithal plainly teſtify, that we were infected with the filth of ſin. For damnation could not reach unto them that were touched with no guiltineſs of iniquity. But it can be no way more plainly underſtood what he meaneth than by relation of the other member of the ſentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is reſtored in Chriſt. But it is well enough known that the ſame is done no other way, than when by marvellous manner of communicating, Chriſt poureth unto us the force of his righteouſneſs. As it is written in another place, that the ſpirit is life unto us, for righteouſneſs ſake. Rom. viii. 10. Therefore we may not otherwiſe expound that which is ſaid that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in ſinning did not only purchaſe miſchief and ruin to himſelf, but alſo threw down our nature headlong into like deſtruction. And that not only to the corruption of himſelf, which pertaineth nothing to us, but becauſe he infected all his ſeed with the ſame corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwiſe the ſaying of Paul could not ſtand true, Eph. i. 3. that all are by nature the ſons of wrath, if they were not already accurſed in the womb. And it is eaſily gathered that nature is there meant not ſuch as it was created by God, but ſuch as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not convenient, that God ſhould be made the author of death. Adam therefore ſo corrupted himſelf, that the infection paſſed from him into all his offſpring. And the heavenly judge himſelf Chriſt, doth alſo plainly enough pronounce, that all are born evil and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatſoever is born of fleſh, is fleſh, John iii. 6. and that therefore the gate of life is cloſed againſt all men, until they be begotten again.

Whether we have our ſouls or no, by derivation from our parents, as we have our bodies, is a needleſs queſtion in this caſe. It ſufficeth us to know that what God beſtowed upon Adam, it was to hold, or to loſe, for, or from, both himſelf, and his. That the children of faithful men are ſanctified, is no diſproof of their original corruptions.

7. Neither for the underſtanding thereof is any curious diſputation needful, which not a little perplexed the old writers, whether the ſoul of the ſon do proceed by derivation from the ſoul of the father, becauſe in it the infection principally reſteth. We muſt be content with this, that ſuch gifts as it pleaſeth the Lord to have beſtowed upon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam, loſt them after he had received them, he loſt them not only from himſelf, but alſo from us all. Who ſhall be careful of a conveyance from ſoul to ſoul, when he ſhall hear that Adam received theſe ornaments, which he loſt, no leſs for us than for himſelf? that they were not given to one man alone, but aſſigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not againſt reaſon, if he being ſpoiled, nature be left naked and poor: if he being infected with ſin, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten root aroſe up rotten branches, which ſent their rottenneſs into the other twigs that ſprung out of them. For ſo were the children corrupted in the father, that they alſo were infective to their children: that is to ſay, ſo was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continual flowing from one to another, it is conveyed from the anceſtors into the poſterity. For the infection hath not her cauſe in the ſubſtance of the fleſh or of the ſoul, but becauſe it was ſo ordained of God, that ſuch gifts as he had given to the firſt man, man ſhould both have them, and loſe them as well for himſelf as for his. As for this that the Pelagians do cavil, that it is not likely that the children do take corruption from godly parents, ſince they ought rather to be ſanctified by their cleanneſs, that is eaſily confuted. For they deſcend not of their ſpiritual regeneration, but of their carnal generation. Therefore as Auguſtine ſaith, (Cont. Pelag. & Celeſt.) whether the unbeliever be condemned as guilty, and the believer acquitted as innocent, they both do beget not innocents, but guilty, becauſe they beget of the corrupted nature. Now whereas they do in manner partake of the parents holineſs, that is the ſpecial bleſſing of the people of God, which proveth not, but that the firſt and univerſal curſe of mankind went before. For of nature is guiltineſs, and ſanctification is of ſupernatural grace.

What original ſin is, and that we are not only ſubject to the puniſhment which our firſt father's fault deſerved, but the infection of his faultineſs is alſo in us.

8. And to the end that theſe things be not ſpoken of a thing uncertain and unknown, let us define Original ſin. But yet I mean not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one only, which I think to be moſt agreeable with truth. Original ſin therefore ſeemeth to be the inheritably deſcending perverſneſs and corruption of our nature, poured abroad into all the parts of the ſoul, which firſt maketh us guilty of the wrath of God, and then alſo bringeth forth theſe works in us, which the ſcripture calleth the works of the fleſh: and that is it properly that Paul often times calleth ſin, Gal. v. 19. And theſe works that ariſe out, as are adulteries, furnications, thefts, hatreds, murthers, revellings, after the ſame manner he calleth the fruits of ſin, although they are likewiſe called ſins both commonly in the ſcriptures, and alſo by the ſame Paul himſelf. Therefore theſe two things are diſtinctly to be noted: that is, that being ſo in all parts of our nature corrupted and perverted, we are now even for ſuch corruption only held worthy of damnation, and convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteouſneſs, innocency and pureneſs. And yet is not that bond in reſpect of another's fault. For where it is ſaid, that by the ſin of Adam we are made ſubject to the judgment of God, it is not ſo to be taken, as if we innocent and undeſerving did bear the blame of his fault. But becauſe of his offending we are all clothed with the curſe, therefore it is ſaid that he hath bound us. Nevertheleſs, from him not the puniſhment only came upon us, but alſo the infection diſtilled from him, abideth in us, to which the puniſhment is juſtly due. Wherefore howſoever Auguſtine doth oftentimes call it another's ſin, (to ſhew the more plainly that it is conveyed into us by propagation) yet doth he alſo affirm withal that it is proper to every one. And the apoſtle (Rom. v. 12.) himſelf expreſly witneſſeth, that therefore death came upon all men, becauſe all men have ſinned, and are wrapped in original ſin, and defiled with the ſpots thereof. And therefore the very infants themſelves, while they bring with them their own damnation from their mother's womb, are bound, not by another's but by their own fault. For though they have not as yet brought forth the fruits of their own iniquity, yet they have the ſeed thereof encloſed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certain ſeed of ſin: therefore it cannot but be hateful and abominable to God. Whereupon followeth, that it is properly acounted ſin before God: for there could be no guiltineſs without ſin. The other point is, that this perverſeneſs never ceaſeth in us, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, even the ſame works of the fleſh that we have before deſcribed: like as a burning furnace bloweth out flame and ſparkles, or as a ſpring doth without ceaſing caſt out water. Therefore they who have defined Original ſin, to be a wanting of Original righteouſneſs which ought to have been in us, although indeed they comprehended all that is in the thing itſelf: yet they have not fully enough expreſſed the force and efficacy thereof. For our nature is not only bare and empty of goodneſs, but alſo is ſo plenteous and fruitful of all evils, that it cannot be idle. They that have ſaid, that it is a concupiſcence, have uſed a word not very far from the matter, if this were added, which is not granted by the moſt part that whatſoever is in man, even from the underſtanding to the will, from the ſoul to the fleſh, is corrupted and ſtuffed full with this concupiſcence: or, to ſay all in a word. that whole man is of himſelf nothing elſe but concupiſcence.

The very underſtanding of man is corrupted and not the ſenſual or inferior part only.

9. Wherefore, I have ſaid that all the parts of the ſoul are poſſeſſed of ſin, ſince Adam fell away from the fountain of righteouſneſs. For not only the inferior appetite allured him, but wicked impiety poſſeſſed the very receſſes of his mind, and pride pierced to the innermoſt part of his heart. So that it is a fond and fooliſh thing to confine the corruption that proceeded from thence only to the ſenſual motions, as they call them, or to call it a certain bait that allureth, ſtirreth and draweth to ſin only that part, which among among them is called ſenſuality. Wherein Peter Lombard hath diſcloſed his groſs ignorance, who ſeeking and ſearching for the place of it, ſaith, that it is in the fleſh, as Paul witneſſeth, not properly indeed, but becauſe it more appeareth in the fleſh, as though Paul did mean only a part of the ſoul, and not the whole nature which is in compariſon ſet againſt ſupernatural grace. And Paul there taketh away all doubt: teaching that corruption reſteth not in one part alone, but that nothing is pure and clean from the deadly infection thereof. For ſpeaking of corrupted nature, he doth not only condemn the inordinate motions of appetites that appear, but eſpecially laboureth to prove that the underſtanding mind is ſubject to blindneſs, and the heart to perverſeneſs. And the ſame third chapter to the Romans is nothing elſe but a deſcription of original ſin. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the ſpirit which is contraſted with the old man and the fleſh, doth not only ſignify the grace whereby the inferior or ſenſual part of the ſoul is amended, but alſo containeth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth command, not only that our groſs appetites be brought to nought, but alſo that we ourſelves be renewed in the ſpirit of our mind, as likewiſe in another place he biddeth us be transformed in newneſs of mind. Whereupon followeth, that the ſame part, wherein moſt of all ſhineth the excellency and nobleneſs of the ſoul, is not only wounded, but alſo ſo corrupted, that it needeth not only to be healed, but in a manner to put on a new nature. How far ſin poſſeſſeth both the underſtanding mind and heart, we will ſee hereafter. Here I only purpoſed ſhortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foot is ſo overwhelmed as with an overflowing of water, that no part of him is free from ſin, and that therefore whatſoever proceedeth from him is accounted for ſin, as Paul ſaith, that all the affections of the fleſh or thoughts are enmity againſt God, and therefore death.

Though we be naturally ſinful, yet is not God the author of our ſin.

10. Now let them go, who preſume to make God author of their ſins, becauſe we ſay that men are naturally ſinful. They do wrongfully ſeek the work of God in their own filthineſs, which they ought rather to have ſought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet ſound and uncorrupted. Therefore our deſtruction cometh of the fault of our own fleſh and not of God, foraſmuch as we periſhed by no other mean but by this, that we degenerated from our firſt eſtate. But yet let not any man here murmur and ſay, that God might have better foreſeen for our ſalvation, if he had provided that Adam ſhould not have fallen. For this objection both is to be abhorred by all godly minds, for the too much preſumptuous curioſity of it, and alſo pertaineth to the ſecret of predeſtination, which ſhall after be treated of in place convenient. Wherefore let us remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuſe not God himſelf the author of nature. True indeed it is, that the ſame deadly wound ſticketh faſt in nature: but it is very material to know, whether it came into nature from elſewhere, or from the beginning hath reſted in it. But it is evident that the wound was given by ſin. Therefore there is no cauſe whey we ſhould complain but of ourſelves: which thing the ſcripture hath diligently noted. For Eccleſiaſtes ſaith: Eccl. vii. 29. This have I found, that God hath made man upright but they have ſought out many inventions. It appeareth that the deſtruction of man is to be imputed only to himſelf foraſmuch as having gotten uprightneſs by the goodneſs of God, he by his own madneſs is fallen into vanity.

We are termed corrupt by nature not becauſe God hath put corruption as a natural quality in us, but becauſe together with our nature it is derived into us, and not gotten by cuſtom.

11. We ſay therefore that man is corrupted with faultineſs natural, but ſuch as proceeded not from nature. We deny that it proceeded from nature, to make it appear that it is rather a quality come from ſome other thing, which has happened to a man, than a ſubſtantial property that hath been put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it natural that no man ſhould think that every man getteth it by evil cuſtom, whereas it holdeth all men bound by inheritably deſcending right. And this we do not of our own heads without authority. For, for the ſame cauſe the apoſtle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath, Eph. ii. 3. How could God, whom all his meaneſt works do pleaſe, be wrathful againſt the nobleſt of all his creatures? But he is rather wrathful againſt the corruption of his work, than againſt his work itſelf. Therefore if, for that man's nature is corrupted, man is not unfitly ſaid, to be by nature abominable to God, it ſhall be alſo not improperly called naturally perverſe and corrupted. As Auguſtine feareth not in reſpect of nature corrupted, to call the ſins natural, which which do neceſſarily reign in our fleſh where the grace of God is abſent. So vaniſheth away the fooliſh trifling device of the Manichees, who when they imagined a corrupt principle having place in man, preſumed to contrive for him a new Creator, leaſt they ſhould ſeem to aſſign to the righteous God the cauſe and origin of evil.

CHAP. II.

That man has now loſt the freedom of will, and ſubjected himſelf to miſerable bondage.

The doctrine which concerneth the bondage of our will, muſt not make us ſlothful nuto good things, as if they did not appertain unto us, but rather humble and careful, that knowing our own weakneſs, we preſume not to truſt unto ourſelves.

SINCE we have ſeen, that the dominion of ſin, ſince the time that it held the firſt man bound unto it, doth not only reign in all mankind, but alſo wholly poſſeſſeth every ſoul: now muſt we more nearly examine, ſince we are brought into that bondage, whether we be ſpoiled of all freedom or no: and if yet there remain any portion, how far the force thereof proceedeth. But to the end that the truth of this queſtion may more eaſily appear unto us, I will by the way ſet up a mark, whereunto the whole ſum may be directed And this ſhall be the beſt way to avoid error, if the dangers be conſidered that are like to fal on both ſides. For when man is put from all uprightneſs, by and by he thereby taketh occaſion of ſlothfulneſs: and becauſe it is ſaid, that by himſelf he can do nothing to the ſtudy of righteouſneſs, forthwith he neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing unto him. Again, he can preſume to take nothing upon himſelf, be it never ſo little, but that both God's honour ſhall be thereby taken from him, and man himſelf be overthrown with raſh confidence. Therefore to the end we ſtrike not upon theſe rocks, this courſe is to be kept, that man being informed that there remaineth in him no goodneſs, and being on every ſide compaſſed about with moſt miſerable neceſſity, may yet be taught to aſpire to the goodneſs whereof he is void, and to the liberty whereof he is deprived, and may be more ſharply ſtirred up from ſlothfulneſs than if it were feigned that he is furniſhed with greateſt power. How neceſſary this ſecond point is, every man ſeeth. The firſt, I ſee is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being ſet out of controverſy, it ought then plainly to ſtand for truth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his own, as far as it behoveth that he be thrown down from falſe boaſting of himſelf. For if it were not granted to man to glory in himſelf even at that time, when by the bountifulneſs of God he was garniſhed with moſt ſingular ornaments, how much ought he now to be humbled, ſince for his unthankfulneſs he is thruſt down from high glory into extreme ſhame? At that time (I ſay) when he was advanced to the higheſt degree of honour, the ſcripture attributeth nothing elſe unto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it ſecretly teacheth, that man was bleſſed, not by his own good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and deſtitute of all glory, do acknowlege God, to whoſe liberality he could not be thankful when he flowed full of the riches of his grace; and that now at length with confeſſion of his own poverty he glorify him, whom in the acknowleging of his good gifts, he did not glorify? Alſo it is as much for our profit, that all praiſe of wiſdom and ſtrength be taken from us, as it pertaineth to the glory of God that they join our ruin with the robbery of God, that give us to any thing more than that which is true. For what is elſe done, when we are taught to fight of our own force, but that we be lifted up on high on a ſtaff of a reed, that it may by and by break, and we fall to the ground? Altho' our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the ſtaff of a reed. For it is but ſmoke all that vain men have imagined and do babble of them. Wherefore not without cauſe is this excellent ſentence oft repeated by Auguſtine, that free will is rather thrown down headlong, than eſtabliſhed by them that defend it. This I thought needful to ſpeak before, as by way of preface for many mens ſakes, who when they hear man's power overthrown from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, do much hate this manner of diſputing as dangerous, much more ſuperfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion neceſſary, and for us moſt profitable.

The opinion of philoſophers concerning the freedom of man's will.

2. Whereas we have a little before, ſaid, that in the underſtanding mind, and in the heart are placed the powers of the ſoul now let us conſider what they both are able to do. The philoſophers indeed indeed with great consent do imagine that in the understanding mind sitteth reason, which like a lamp giveth light to all counsels, and like a Queen governeth the will, for they say that it is so endowed with divine light, that it can give good counsel, and so excelleth in lively force that it is able well to govern. On the other side, that sense is dull and blind that it always creepeth on the ground, and wallowеth in gross objects, and never lifteth up it self to true insight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yield it self to sense to be subdued, is carried on to the study of virtues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into will: but if it give it self subject into the bondage of sense it is by it corrupted and perverted, so that it degenerates into lust. And whereas by their opinion there do reside in the soul, those powers that I have spoken of before, understanding, sense, appetite or will, which word Will is now more commonly used, they say that understanding is endowed with reason, the best governess toward good and blessed life, so that it do hold it self within his own excellency and shew forth the force that is naturally given it. But that inferior motion of it which is called sense, wherewith man is drawn to error and deceit, they affirm to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason and by little and little be vanquished. They place will in the midst between reason and sense as a thing at her own ordering, and having liberty whether it pleases to obey reason, or give forth it self to be ravished by sense.

Philosophers imagine that man hath in and of himself a power as to be vicious, so to make himself vertuous.

3. Sometimes indeed they do not deny, being overcome by very experience, how hardly man establisheth reason to reign as Queen within himself, while sometimes he is tickled with enticements of pleasure, somtimes deceived with false appearance of good things, sometimes importunately moved with immoderate affections and violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or strings of sinews, as Plato saith. (De leg. lib. 1.) For which reason Cicero saith, (Tus. quæst. lib. 3.) that these sparks given by nature, are with perverse opinions and evil manners by and by quenched: But when such diseases have once gotten place in the minds of men, they grant that they do more outragiously overflow, than that they easily may be restrained: and they stick not to compare them to wild horses which throwing away reason as it were casting the chariot driven, do range without controul and without measure. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our own power. For if (say they) it be in our choice to do this or that, then is it also in our choice not to do. Arist. eth. lib. 3. cap. 5. Now if it be in our choice not to do, then is it also to do, but of free choice we seem to do those things that we do, and to forbear those things that we forbear. Therefore if we do any good thing when we please, we may likeways leave it undone: if we do any evil, we may also avoid the same. yet some of them have burst forth into so great licentiousness, that they have boasted that it is indeed God's gift that we live, but our own that we live well and holily. Seneca. And thence cometh that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta because every man himself getteth virtue to himself, therefore never any of the wise men did thank God for it. For (saith he) for virtue we are praised, and in virtue we glory, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our selves. (De nat. Deor. lib. 3.) And a little after: this is the judgment of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisdom to be taken of himself. This therefore is the sum of the opinion of all the philosophers: that the reason of man's understanding is sufficient for a right direction: that will being subject to it, is indeed moved by sense to evil things. But even as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

The antient fathers for fear of contradicting the common received opinion of philosophers, and least they should lead men to sloth have too much exalted the strength of human reason and will.

4. Among the ecclesiastical writers, altho' there have been none who did not acknowlege both that the soundness of reason in man hath been sore wounded by sin, and his will exceedingly entangled with perverse desires, yet many of them have too much assented to the philosophers, of which the antient, as I think did so much extol the strength of man upon this consideration, least if they should have expressly confessed his weakness, first they should have made the philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then least they should give to the flesh, which of itself was dull to goodness, a new occasion of slothfulness. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurdity in the common judgment of men, their study was to make the doctrine of the scripture half to agree with the doctrines of the philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, not to make place for ſlothfulneſs, appeareth by their own words. Hom. de proditione. Chryſoſtome hath in one place: becauſe God hath put both good and evil things in our power, he hath given us freedom of election, and he withholdeth not the unwilling. Chryſoſt. in Gen. hom. 18. Again, oftentimes he that is evil, if he will, is turned into good, and he that is good by ſlothfulneſs falleth and becometh evil, becauſe God made our nature to have free-will, and he layeth not neceſſity upon us, but giving convenient remedies, ſuffereth all to ly in the mind of the patient. Hom. 52. Again, as unleſs we be aſſiſted by the grace of God, we can never do any thing well: ſo unleſs we bring that which is our own, we cannot obtain the favour of God. And he ſaid before, that it ſhould not be all of God's help, but we muſt alſo bring ſomewhat. And this is commonly a familiar word with him, let us do our beſt, God will ſupply the reſt. Wherewith agreeth that which Jerom, ſaith, Dialog. 3. contra. Pelagium. that it is our part to begin, but God's to make an end: our part to offer what we can, his to fulfil what we cannot. You ſee now that in theſe ſayings they gave to man toward the ſtudy of virtue more than was meet, becauſe they thought that they could not otherwiſe awake the dulneſs that was naturally in us. But if they did prove that in it only we ſinned, with what apt handling they have done the ſame, we ſhall after ſee. Surely that the ſayings which we have rehearſed are moſt falſe, ſhall by and by appear. Now although the Greeks more than others and among them principally Chryſoſtome have paſſed meaſure in advancing the power of man's will, yet all the old writers, except Auguſtine, do in this point ſo either vary, or waver, or ſpeak doubtfully, that in manner no certainty can be gathered of their writings. Therefore we will not tarry upon exact reckoning of every one of their ſayings, but here and there we will touch out of every one of them ſo much as the plain declaration of the matter ſhall ſeem to require. As for them that followed after, while every one for himſelf ſought praiſe of wit, in defending of man's nature, they fell continually by little and little one after another into worſe and worſe, till it came ſo far, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his ſenſual part, and to have reaſon altogether, and will for the more part uncorrupted. In the mean time this flew about in all mens mouths, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man, and the ſupernatural were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, ſcarcely the hundred man did even ſlightly underſtand. As for my part, if I would plainly ſhew of what ſort is the corruption of nature, I could be eaſily contented with theſe words. But it is of great moment to conſider carefully what a man, being in all parts of his nature corrupted and ſpoiled of his ſupernatural gifts is able to do. They therefore who boaſted themſelves to be the diſciples of Chriſt, ſpake of this matter too much like philoſophers. for the name of free-will ſtill remained among the Latins, as if a man had ſtill continued in an uncorrupted ſtate. And the Grecians were not aſhamed to uſe the word much more arrogantly: for they called it Autexouſion, that is to ſay, of her own power, as if a man had the power himſelf. Becauſe therefore all, even to the common people, had received this principle, that man was endued with free-will, and many of them that would ſeem excellent, cannot tell how far it extendeth: firſt let us ſearch out the force of the word itſelf, and then let us proceed on by the ſimplicity of the ſcripture, to ſhew what man is able to do of his own nature, toward good or evil. What free-will is, whereas it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet few have defined. Yet it ſeemeth that Origen rehearſed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he ſaid, that it is a power of reaſon to diſcern good or evil, and power of will to chuſe either of them. Lib. 3. περὶ ἀρχῶν. And Auguſtine varieth not from him, when he teacheth, that it is a power of reaſon and will, whereby good is choſen while grace aſſiſteth, and evil when grace ceaſeth. Bernard, while he meaneth to ſpeak more ſubtilly, ſpeaketh more darkly, who ſaith, that it is a conſent by reaſon of the liberty of will that cannot be loſt, and the judgment of reaſon that cannot be avoided. And the definition of Anſelmus is not familiar enough, who ſaith that it is a power to keep uprightneſs for it ſelf. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Schoolmen, have rather embraced Auguſtine's definition, becauſe it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without which they ſaw that will was not ſufficient for itſelf. But they bring alſo of their own ſuch things as they thought either to be better, or to ſerve for plainer declaration. Firſt, they agree that the name of, Arbitrium, that is free choice, is rather to be referred to reaſon, whoſe part is to diſcern between good and evil things: and the adjective free, pertaineth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, ſince freedom properly belongeth to will, Thomas ſaith, that it would very well agree, if free will be called a power of chuſing, which being mixt of underſtanding and appetite appetite, doth more incline to appetite. Par. 1. quæſt. 83. art. 3. Now have we in what things they teach that the power of free-will conſiſteth, that is to ſay, in reaſon and will. Now remaineth that we ſhortly ſee how much they give to either part.

5. They are commonly wont to make ſubject to the free determination of man, things mean, that is, which belong not to the kingdom of God: but they do refer true righteouſneſs to the ſpecial grace of God and ſpiritual regeneration. Which thing while the author of the book Of the calling of the Gentiles, meaneth to ſhew, he reckoneth up three ſorts of wills, the firſt ſenſitive, the ſecond natural, the third ſpiritual, of which he ſaith, that man hath the firſt two at his own liberty, the laſt is the work of the holy Ghoſt in man. Which whether it be true or not, ſhall be treated in place fit for it, for now my purpoſe is but ſhortly to rehearſe the opinions of others, and not to confute them. Hereby it cometh to paſs, that when writers ſpeak of free-will, they principally ſeek not what it is able to do with regard to civil or outward actions, but what it can do to the obedience of the law of God. Which latter point I think ſo to be the principal, that yet I think the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I truſt, I ſhall ſhew a good reaſon. There hath been a diſtinction received in ſchools, that reckoneth up three ſorts of freedoms, the firſt, from neceſſity, the ſecond from ſin, the third from miſery. Of which the firſt ſo naturally ſticketh faſt in man, that it can by no means be taken away: the other two are loſt by ſin. This diſtinction I willingly receive, ſaving that there neceſſity is wrongfully confounded with compulſion: between which two how much difference there is, and how neceſſary that difference is to be conſidered, ſhall appear in another place.

The ſchoolmens opinion touching free-will.

6. If this be received, then ſhall it be out of controverſy that man hath not free-will to do good works, unleſs he be aſſiſted by grace, and that by ſpecial grace, which is given to the only elect by regeneration. For I do not paſs upon theſe frantic men, who babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plain, whether he be altogether deprived of power to do well, or whether he have yet ſome power, although it be but little and weak, which by itſelf indeed can do nothing, but by help of grace doth alſo her part. Lib. 2 diſt. 26. While the maſter of the Sentences goeth about to make that plain, he ſaith there are two ſorts of grace neceſſary for us, whereby we may be made meet to do a good work: the one they call a working grace, whereby we effectually will to do good: the other co-operating grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which diviſion this I am not ſatisfied with, that while he giveth to the grace of God an effectual deſire of good, he ſecretly ſheweth his meaning that man already of his own nature, after a certain manner, deſireth good though uneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is indeed the work of God, yet this he granteth to man, that of his own motion he deſireth that good will. But this is far from the meaning of Auguſtine, from whom yet Lombard would ſeem to have borrowed this diviſion. In the ſecond part of the diviſion, the doubtfulneſs of ſpeech offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong expoſition. For they thought that we do therefore work together with the ſecond grace of God, becauſe it lyeth in our power, either to make void the firſt grace by refuſing it, or to confirm it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the book, Of the calling of the Gentiles, Amb. lib. 2. cap. 5. doth thus expreſs it, that it is free for them that uſe the judgment of reaſon, to depart from grace, that it may be worthy reward not to have departed, and that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghoſt, may be imputed to their merits, by whoſe will it was poſſible to have not been done. Theſe two things I thought fit to remark by the way, that now, reader, thou mayeſt ſee how much I diſſent from the ſoundeſt ſort of the ſchoolmen. For I do much farther differ from the late ſophiſters, even ſo much as they be farther gone from the antient time. But yet ſomewhat, after ſuch a ſort as it is, we perceive by this diviſion, after what manner they have given free-will to man. For at length Lombard ſaith, (Lib. 2. diſt. 25.) that we have not free-will therefore, becauſe we are alike able either to do or to think good and evil, but only that we are free from compulſion: which freedom is not hindered, although we be perverſe and the bond men of ſin, and can do nothing but ſin.

The danger of uſing the name of free-will tho' we take it in a harmleſs meaning.

7. Therefore, man ſhall be ſaid to have free-will after this ſort, not becauſe he hath a free choice as well of good as of evil, but becauſe he doth evil by will, and not by compulſion. That is very well ſaid: but to what purpoſe was it to garniſh ſo ſmall a matter with ſo proud a title? A goodly liberty forſooth, if man be not compelled to ſerve ſin: ſo is he yet a willing ſervant that his will is holden faſt bound with the fetters of ſin: truly I do abhor ſtriving about words wherewith the church is vainly wearied, but I think that ſuch words are with great religious carefulneſs to be taken heed of, which ſound of any abſurdity, eſpecially where the error is hurtful. How few I pray you, are there, who when they hear that free-will is aſſigned to man, do not by and by conceive, that he is Lord both of his own mind and will, and that he is able of himſelf to turn himſelf what way he pleaſes? But ſome one will ſay: that peril ſhall be taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather for as much as the wit of man is naturally bent to falſity, he will ſooner conceive an error of one little word, than a truth out of a long tale. Of which thing we have a more certain experience in this very word, than is to be wiſhed, for omitting that expoſition of the old writers, all they in manner that came after, while they ſtick upon the natural ſignification of the word, have been carried into a truſt of themſelves that bringeth them to deſtruction.

St. Auguſtine's meaning when he uſeth the name of free-will is found and good.

8. But if the authority of the fathers do move us, they have indeed continually the word in their mouth: but they do withal declare, how much they eſteem the uſe of it. Firſt of all Auguſtine, which ſticketh not to call it bond-will. In one place he is angry with them who deny free-will: but he declareth his chief reaſon why, when he ſaith only, let not any man be ſo bold to deny the freedom of will, that he go about to excuſe ſin. But ſurely in another place he confeſſeth, (Lib. 7. cont. Jul.). Hom. 53. in Joan.) that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghoſt, foraſmuch as it is ſubject to luſts that do blind and conquer it. Again, (Ad Anaſt. cap. 44. De perfec. juſtic. Enchir. ad Laur. cap. 30.) that when will was overcome with ſin, whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedom. Again, (Ad Bonif. li. 3. c. 8.) that man having ill uſed his free-will, loſt both himſelf and it. Again, Ibid. (cap. 7.) free-will is become captive, that it can do nothing toward righteouſneſs. Again, (Ad Bonif. li. 1. c. 3.) that it cannot be free; which the grace of God hath not made free. Again, (Ad Bonif. li. 3. c. 7.) that the juſtice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his own ſtrength, but when the holy Ghoſt helpeth, and man's will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all theſe things he ſhortly aſſigns a reaſon, when in another place (De verb. Apoſt. ſermone. 3.) he writeth, that man received great power of free-will when he was created, but he loſt it by ſinning. Therefore in another place, (De ſpiritu & litera cap. 30.) after that he had ſhewed that free-will is ſtabliſhed by grace, he ſharply inveigheth againſt them that take it upon them without grace. Why therefore (ſaith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free-will before that they be made free, or of their own ſtrength if they be already made free? And they mark not that in the very name of free-will, is mention of freedom. 2 Cor. iii. 8. But where the ſpirit of the Lord is there is freedom. If then they be the bond men of ſin, why do they boaſt them of free-will? For of whom a man is overcome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boaſt themſelves as of their own work? Are they ſo free that they will not be his bond-ſervants, who ſaith: John xv. 5. "without me "ye can do nothing? Beſide that alſo in another place he ſeemeth ſportingly to mock at the uſe of that word, when he ſaid, that will was indeed free, but not made free, free to righteouſneſs, but the bondſervant of ſin. (De correptione & gratia. cap. 13.) Which ſaying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteouſneſs, but by choice of will, and from ſin he is not free but by grace of the Saviour. He that doth teſtify, that the freedom of man is nothing elſe but a free making or manumiſſion from righteouſneſs, ſeemeth trimly to mock at the vain name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the uſe of this word with no evil ſignification, he ſhall not be troubled by me for ſo doing. But becauſe I think it cannot be kept without great peril, and that it ſhould turn to a great benefit to the church, if it were aboliſhed: neither will I myſelf uſe it, and I would wiſh others, if they aſk me counſel, to forbear it.

That the fathers who in conſiderations before alledged Section 4. ſeem ſometimes to furniſh man with his own armour, do notwithſtanding

9. I may ſeem to have brought a great prejudice againſt myſelf, who have confeſſed, that all the eccleſiaſtical writers, except Auguſtine, have ſpoken ſo doubtfully or diverſly in this matter, that no certainty can be had out of their writings. For ſome will ſo conſtrue this, that I meant therefore to thruſt them from giving

giving any voice herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this that I simply and in good faith would have godly wits provided for, which if they wait upon those mens opinions in this point, they shall always waver uncertain. In such sort do they sometimes teach, man being spoiled of all strength of free-will, to flee to grace only: sometimes they furnish or seem to furnish him with his own armour. But it is not hard to make appear, that in such doubtfulness of speech, they nothing, or very little esteeming man's strength, have given the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certain sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. De prædestinatione sanctorum lib. 4. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so often repeateth, that we ought to glory of nothing, because we have nothing of our own, but that man wholly despoiled in himself, may learn to depend upon God? What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, (August. in Gen.) when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall live? and that the tree of knowlege of good and evil, is the free choice of will, whereof whoso tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall die? What meaneth that of Chrysostom, (Homilia in advent.) that every man is naturally not only a sinner, but also altogether sin? If we have no good thing of our own: If man from top to toe be altogether sin: if it be not lawful to attempt how much the power of free-will is able to do, how then may it be lawful to part the praise of a good work between God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of others, but least any man should cavil, that I chuse out those things only that make for my purpose, and do craftily leave out such things as make against me, therefore I do forbear such a rehearsal. Yet this I dare affirm, howsoever they be sometimes, too busy in advancing free-will, that this yet was their purposed mark, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his own power, to have his strength reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

A dangerous thing for man to have an opinion of his own strength a blessed thing to mourn with the sense and feeling of his own poverty and inward weakness.

10. But I am here constrained to repeat that, which in the beginning of this chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and thrown down with conscience of his own misery, neediness, nakedness and shame, so hath he best profited in knowlege of himself. For there is no danger to be feared, lest man will take too much from himself, so that he learn, that what he wanteth is to be recovered in God, but to himself he can take nothing more than his own right, be it never so little, but that he shall destroy himself with vain confidence, and conveying the honour of God to himself, become guilty of hainous sacrilege. And truly so oft as this lust invadeth our mind, that we desire to have somewhat of our own, which may rest in ourselves rather than in God, let us know that this thought is ministered us by no other counseller, but by him that persuaded our first parents, to have a will to be like unto God's, knowing both good and evil. If it be the word of the devil that raiseth up man in himself, let us give no place unto it, unless we have a mind to take counsel of our enemy. It is pleasant indeed, for a man to have so much strength of his own, that he may rest in himself. But that we be not allured to this vain confidence, let so many sore sentences make us afraid, by which we be thrown down: as are, cursed is he which trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm. Jer. xvii. 5. Again, that God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither delighteth he in the legs of a man, but delighteth in them that fear him, and attend upon his mercy. Psal. cxlvii. 10. Again, that it is he who giveth strength unto him that fainteth, and unto him that hath no strength, he encreaseth power, even the young men shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall stumble and fall, but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. Isa. xlvi. 6. All which sayings tend to this end, that we lean not upon any opinion of our own strength, be it never so little, if we mean to have God favourable unto us, who resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble. And then again, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will pouer out water upon the thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground. Isa. xliv, 3. Again, all ye that thirst, come unto the waters. Isa. lv. 1. Which promises do testify, that none are admitted to receive the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their own poverty. And such promises are not to be passed over, as that of Isaiah, thou shalt have no more sun to shine by day, neither shall the brightness of the moon shine unto thee; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.

The Lord indeed doth not take away the ſhining of the ſun or moon from his ſervants, but becauſe he will have himſelf alone to be glorious in them, he calleth their confidence far away from theſe things that are counted in their opinion moſt excellent.

Humility therefore a precious virtue, becauſe in acknowleging man's baſeneſs, God's highneſs is advanced.

11. Truly, that ſaying of Chryſoſtom hath always exceedingly well pleaſed me, that the foundation of our wiſdom is humility, (Hom. de perf. evangel.) but yet more that ſaying of Auguſtine, as, ſaith he, that ſame rhetorician being aſked, What was the firſt thing in the rules of eloquence? anſwered, Pronunciation: and what was the ſecond, he anſwered, Pronunciation: and what was the third, he anſwered, Pronunciation: ſo if one aſk me of the rules of Chriſtian religion, the firſt, the ſecond, and third time, and always I would anſwer, Humility. Epiſt 56. ad Dioſ. But he meaneth not humility, when a man knowing ſome little virtue to be in himſelf, abſtaineth from pride and haughtineſs of mind, but when he truly feeleth himſelf to be ſuch a one as hath no refuge but in humility: as in another place he declareth, In Joan. hom. 49. Let no man, ſaith he, flatter himſelf: of his own he is a devil. That whereby he is bleſſed, he hath of God only. For what haſt thou of thine own, but ſin? Take away from thee ſin which is thine own, for righteouſneſs is God's. (Lib. de nat. & gratia, cap. 52. in Pſal. xlv.) Again, why is the poſſibility of nature ſo preſumed on? It is wounded, maimed, troubled and loſt, it needeth a true confeſſion, and not a falſe defence. Again, when every man knoweth that in himſelf he is nothing, and of himſelf he hath no help, his weapons in himſelf are broken, the wars are ceaſed. But it is needful, that all the weapons of wickedneſs be broken in ſunder, ſhivered in pieces and burnt, that thou remain unarmed and have no help thy ſelf. How much more weak thou art in thyſelf, ſo much the more the Lord receiveth thee. So upon the threeſcore and tenth Pſalm he forbiddeth us to remember our own righteouſneſs, that we may acknowlege the righteouſneſs of God: and he ſheweth that God doth ſo commend his grace unto us, that we may know ourſelves to be nothing, that we ſtand only by the mercy of God, when of ourſelves we are nothing but evil. Let us not therefore ſtrive here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our ſalvation which is given to him. For as our humbleneſs is his highneſs, ſo the confeſſion of our humbleneſs hath his mercy ready for remedy. Neither yet do I require that man not convinced ſhould willingly yield himſelf: nor if he hath any power, that he ſhould turn his mind from it, to be ſubdued unto true humility. But that laying away the diſeaſe of ſelf-love and deſire of victory, wherewith being blinded he thinketh too highly of himſelf, he ſhould well conſider himſelf in the true looking-glaſs of the ſcripture.

Man through ſin was made empty of ſupernatural gifts, as faith, love, righteouſneſs: natural, as both underſtanding and will, though they be not quite taken away, yet the ſoundneſs of them is loſt: the unſoundneſs of his underſtanding may be ſeen both by his often ſtraying in that which he ſeeketh, and his not ſeeking that which belongeth moſt unto him.

12. And the common ſaying which they have borrowed out of Auguſtine pleaſeth me well, that the natural gifts were corrupted in man by ſin, and of the ſupernatural he was made empty. For in this latter part of ſupernatural gifts, they underſtand as well the light of faith as of righteouſneſs, which were ſufficient to the attaining of heavenly life and eternal felicity. Therefore baniſhing himſelf from the kingdom of God, he was alſo deprived of the ſpiritual gifts, wherewith he had been furniſhed to the hope of eternal ſalvation. Whereupon followeth, that he is ſo baniſhed from the kingdom of God, that all things that belong to the bleſſed life of the ſoul, are extinguiſhed in him, until by grace of regeneration, he recover them. Of that ſort are faith, the love of God, charity towards our neighbours, the ſtudy of holineſs and righteouſneſs. All theſe things, becauſe Chriſt reſtoreth them unto us, are counted things coming from another to us, and beſide nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Again, ſoundneſs of the underſtanding mind and uprightneſs of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of natural gifts. For though there remain ſomewhat left of underſtanding and judgment, together with will, yet can we not ſay that our underſtanding is ſound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkneſſes. As for our will, the perverſeneſs thereof is more than ſufficiently known. Since therefore reaſon, whereby a man diſcerneth between good and evil, whereby he underſtandeth and judgeth, is a natural gift, it could not be altogether deſtroyed, but it was partly weakned, partly corrupted, ſo that foul ruins thereof appear. In this ſenſe doth John ſay, John i. 5. that the light ſhineth yet in darkdarkneſs, but the darkneſs comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainly expreſſed, that in the perverted and degenerate nature of man, there ſhine yet ſome ſparks that ſhew that he is a creature having reaſon, and that he differeth from brute beaſts, becauſe he is endowed with underſtanding; and yet that this light is choaked with great thickneſs of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, becauſe it is inſeparable from the nature of man, periſheth not, but was bound to perverſe deſires, that it can covet no good thing. This is indeed a full definition, but yet ſuch as needeth to be made plain with more words. Therefore, that the order of our diſcourſe may proceed according to that firſt diſtinction, wherein we divided the ſoul of man into underſtanding and will: let us firſt examine the force of underſtanding. So to condemn it of perpetual blindneſs, that a man leave unto it no manner of ſkill in any kind of things, is not only againſt the word of God, but alſo againſt the experience of common reaſon. For we ſee that there is planted in man a certain deſire to ſearch out truth, to which he would not aſpire at all, but having felt ſome ſavour thereof before. This therefore is ſome ſight of man's underſtanding, that he is naturally drawn with love of truth, the neglecting whereof in brute beaſts, proveth a groſs ſenſe without reaſon, although this little deſire, ſuch as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, becauſe it by and by falleth into vanity. For the wit of man cannot for dulneſs keep the right way to ſearch out truth, but ſtrayeth in divers errors, and as it were groping in darkneſs, oftentimes ſtumbleth, till at length it wander and vaniſh away, ſo in ſeeking truth, it doth diſcover how unfit it is to ſeek and find truth. And then it is ſore troubled with another vanity, that oftentimes it diſcerneth not thoſe things, to the true knowlege of which it were expedient to bend itſelf, and therefore it tormenteth itſelf with vain curioſity, in ſearching out things ſuperfluous and nothing worth: and to things moſt neceſſary to be known, it either taketh no heed, or negligently or ſeldom turneth, but ſurely ſcarce at any time applyeth her ſtudy earneſtly unto them. Of which perverſeneſs, whereas the profane writers do commonly complain, it is found that all men have entangled themſelves with it. Wherefore Solomon, in all his Eccleſiaſtes, when he had gone through all theſe ſtudies, in which men think themſelves to be very wiſe, yet he pronounceth that they are all vain and triſling.

13. Yet do not all labours of wit become always ſo void, but that it attaineth ſomewhat eſpecially when it applieth itſelf to theſe inferior things. Yea, and it is not ſo ſtupid, but that it taſteth alſo ſome little of the higher things, howſoever it more negligently apply the ſearching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiving. For when it is carried up above the compaſs of this preſent life, then is it principally convinced of her own weakneſs. Wherefore, that we may the better ſee how far according to the degrees of her ability, it proceedeth in every thing, it is good that I put forth a diſtinction. Let this therefore be the diſtinction, that there is one underſtanding of earthly things, another of heavenly things. Earthly things I call thoſe that do not concern God and his kingdom, true righteouſneſs, and the bleſſedneſs of eternal life, but have all their reſpect and relation to this preſent life, and are, as it were contained within the bounds thereof. Heavenly things I call the pure knowlege of God, the order of true righteouſneſs, and the myſteries of the heavenly kingdom. Of the firſt ſort are policy, ordering of houſhold, all handy crafts, and liberal ſciences. Of the ſecond ſort are the knowlege of God and God's will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the firſt this we muſt confeſs, becauſe man is a creature naturally formed to live in ſociety, he is alſo by natural inſtinct bent to cheriſh and to preſerve the fellowſhip of theſe companies, therefore we ſee that there are in the minds of all men univerſal impreſſions of a certain civil honeſty and order. Hereby it cometh to paſs, that there is found no man that underſtandeth not, that all human ſocieties ought to be kept in order with laws, and that conceiveth not in his mind the principles of theſe laws. Hereof cometh that ſame perpetual conſent, as well of all nations as of all men unto laws, becauſe the ſeeds thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I conſider not the diſſentions and fightings that afterwards ariſe, while ſome deſire to pervert law and right, the looſe abſolute government of kings, that luſt ſtrayeth abroad inſtead of right, as thieves and robbers, ſome (which is a fault more than common) think that to be unjuſt, which others have ſtabliſhed

Man's natural capacity may attain to the knowlege of things belonging to this preſent life. As firſt, there are in all mens minds certain ſeeds of underſtanding theſe things whereon civil order and policy is grounded.

ed for juſt: and on the other ſide ſtiffly ſay, that to be laudable, which others have forbidden. For theſe men do not therefore hate laws, becauſe they do not know that laws are good and holy, but for that they raging with headſtrong luſt, do fight againſt manifeſt reaſon, and for their fancy do abhor that, which in underſtanding of mind they allow. The latter ſort of it ſtriving in ſuch, that taketh not away the firſt conceiving of equity. For when men do ſtrive among themſelves concerning the points of laws, they agree together in a certain ſum of equity. Wherein is proved the weakneſs of human underſtanding, which even then when it ſeemeth to follow the right way, yet halteth and ſtaggereth, but ſtill this remaineth true, that there is ſown in all men a certain ſeed of politic order. And that is a large proof, that in the ordering of his life, no man is void of the light of reaſon.

Men have naturally a power and faculty to learn and find out arts, wherein notwithſtanding the liberality of God ſhineth: without which all would be as ſome are even mere naturals.

14. Now do follow the arts, both the liberal, and the handy crafts, in learning whereof, becauſe there is in us all a certain aptneſs, in them alſo doth appear the ſtrength of human underſtanding: but altho' all men be not apt to learn them all, yet is this a certain indication of the common natural power, that there is almoſt no man found, whoſe conceit of wit doth not in ſome art or other ſhew forth itſelf. Neither have they only a power or facility to learn, but alſo to deviſe in every art ſome new thing, either to amplify or make perfecter that which hath been learned of another that went before, which thing, as it moved Plato erroneouſly to teach, that ſuch conceiving is nothing elſe but a calling to remembrance, ſo by good reaſon it ought to compel us to confeſs, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the underſtanding of man. Theſe points therefore do plainly teſtify, that there is given to men naturally an univerſal conceiving of reaſon and of underſtanding. Yet is it ſo an univerſal benefit, that therein every man ought for himſelf to acknowlege the peculiar grace of God. To which thankfulneſs the Creator himſelf doth ſufficiently ſtir us up, when he createth natural fools, in whom he maketh us to ſee with what gifts man's ſoul excelleth, if it be not endowed with his light, which is ſo natural in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his bounty towards every man. But the invention and orderly teaching of the ſame arts, or a more inward and excellent knowlege of them which is proper but to a few, is no perfect argument of the common conceiving of wit, yet becauſe without difference it happeneth to the godly and ungodly, it is juſtly reckoned among natural gifts.

The ſkill which philoſophers had in ſundry arts and ſciences, ſheweth what good God hath ſtill left the nature of man enriched withal, although he hath robbed and ſtripped himſelf of the chiefeſt gifts where with God endowed him.

15. So oft therefore as we light upon prophane writers, let us be put in mind by that marvellous light of truth that ſhineth in them, that the wit of man, how much ſoever it be perverted and fallen from the firſt integrity, is yet ſtill clothed and adorned with excellent gifts of God. If we conſider that the Spirit of God is the only fountain of truth, we will neither refuſe nor deſpiſe the truth itſelf, whereſoever it ſhall appear, except we will diſhonourably uſe the ſpirit of God: for the gifts of the holy Ghoſt cannot be contemned without contempt and reproach of himſelf: And what? ſhall we deny that the truth ſhined to the old lawyers, who have ſet forth civil order and diſcipline with ſo great equity? Shall we ſay that the philiſophers were blind both in that exquiſite contemplation, and ſkilful deſcription of nature? Shall we ſay that they had no wit, who by ſetting in order the art of ſpeech, have taught us to ſpeak with reaſon? Shall we ſay that they were mad, who in ſetting forth phyſic, have employed their diligence for us? What of all the mathematical ſciences? ſhall we think them doting errors of mad men? no rather we cannot read the writings of the antients concerning theſe things, without great admiration of their wit. But ſhall we think any thing praiſe worthy or excellent, which we do not acknowlege to come from God? Let us bluſh at the thoughts of ſuch ingratitude into which the heathen Poets fell not, who confeſſed that both philoſophy and Laws and all good arts, were the inventions of the gods. Since then it appeareth that theſe men whom the ſcripture calleth natural men, were of ſo ſharp and deep ſight in ſearching out of inferior things, let us learn by ſuch examples, how many good things the Lord hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath been ſpoiled of the true God.

The knowlege of arts and ſciences is the gift of the ſpirit of God: neither is it to be ne-

16. But yet in the mean time let us not forget, that theſe are the moſt excellent good gifts of the ſpirit of God, which for the common benefit of mankind he diſtributes to whomſoever he pleaſes.

gleсted although in the ſight of God it be but a vanſhiing tranſitory thing.

For if it behoved, that the underſtanding and ſkill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, ſhould be poured into Beſeleel and Oliab by the ſpirit of God it is no wonder if the knowlege of thoſe things which are moſt excellent in human life be ſaid to be communicated unto us by the ſpirit of God. Exod. xxxi. 2. and xxxv. 30. Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould aſk, what have the wicked to do with God's ſpirit, who are altogether eſtranged from God? For where it is ſaid, that the ſpirit of God dwelleth in the faithful only: that is to be underſtood of the ſpirit of ſanctification, by which we are conſecrate to God himſelf, to be his temples: yet doth he nevertheleſs fill move and quicken all things with the vertue of the ſame ſpirit and that according to the property of every kind which he hath given to it by law of creation. If it hath been the will of God that we ſhould be aſſiſted by the labour and ſervice of the wicked in natural philoſophy, in logic in mathamaticks, and other ſuch ſciences let us uſe it, leſt if we neglect the gifts of God, willingly offered in them, we deſervedly ſuffer on account of our ſlothfulneſs. But leſt any one ſhould imagine a man to be bleſſed, when under the elements of this world, there is granted unto him ſo great an ability to conceive truth, it is alſo to be added that all this power to underſtand, and the underſtanding that followeth upon it, is a vain and tranſitory thing in the ſight of God, where is not a ſtedfaſt foundation of truth. For Auguſtine, whom (as we have ſaid) the maſter of the ſentences, and the other ſchoolmen are forced to aſſent to, teacheth moſt truly, where he ſaith, That as the free gifts were taken from man after his fall, ſo theſe natural gifts which remained, were corrupted. Not that they are defiled of themſelves inaſmuch as they come from God, but becauſe they ceaſe to be pure to a defiled man, that he ſhould have no praiſe of them.

As God hath in common endowed men with reaſon, ſo he doth particularly for ſpecial purpoſes pour ſpecial motions into them.

17. Let this be the ſum: That it is ſeen that in all mankind reaſon reſides which is proper to our nature, which maketh us to differ from brute beaſts, as brute beaſts do differ in ſenſe from things without life. For whereas there be born certain natural fools and idiots, that defect obſcureth not the general grace of God: but rather by ſuch ſight we are put in mind, that what is left unto ourſelves, ought juſtly to be aſcribed unto the kindneſs of God, becauſe if he had not ſpared us, rebellion had drawn with it the deſtruction of our whole nature. But whereas ſome do excel in ſharpneſs of conceiving, ſome other do paſs in judgment, ſome have a quicker wit to learn this or that art: in this variety God ſetteth forth his grace unto us, that no man ſhould claim to himſelf as his own, that which floweth from God's mere liberality. For how becometh one more excellent than another, but that in common nature might appear above other the ſpecial grace of God, which in omitting many, ſaith openly, that it is bound to none. Beſides that, God poureth in ſingular motions, according to the calling of every man. Of which thing we meet with many examples in the book of the Judges, where it is ſaid, (Judg. vi. 34.) that the Spirit of the lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in every noble act there is a ſpecial inſtruction. By which reaſon the ſtrong men followed Saul, whoſe hearts the Lord had touched, 1 Sam. x. 6. And when his miniſtring in the kingdom was propheſied of, Samuel ſaid thus: The Spirit of the Lord ſhall come upon thee, and thou ſhalt be another man, 1 Sam. vi. 13. And this was continued to the whole courſe of government: as after it is ſpoken of David, that the Spirit of the Lord came upon him from that day forward. But the ſame is ſpoken in another place as touching particular motions: yea, in Homer men are ſaid to excel in wit, not only as Jupiter hath dealt to every man, but alſo as the time required. And truly experience teacheth, while many times ſuch men ſtand amazed as were moſt ſharp and deep witted, that the wits of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at every moment: for which reaſon it is ſaid, Pſal. cvii. 40. that he taketh wit from the wiſe, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diverſity we diſcern ſome veſtiges of the image of God remaining, which diſtinguiſhes mankind from other creatures.

Touching heavenly things, as the knowlege of God, of his favour towards us, and of the way to frame our lives after his will, man's natural reaſon conceiveth very little in the firſt, in the ſecond nothing at all.

18. Now is to be declared what man's reaſon perceives when it cometh to the kingdom of God and to that ſpiritual inſight, which conſiſteth chiefly in three things: To know God, and his fatherly favour towards us, wherein our ſalvation ſtandeth: and the way to direct our life according to the rule of his law. Both in the firſt two, and in the ſecond properly they who are moſt ſkilful, are blinder than moles. I grant indeed, that there are here and there to be found in the writings of the philoſophers many excellent and proper things concerning Almighty God, but yet in theſe very things one may diſcover a certain giddineſs of imagination. The Lord gave them indeed, as is above ſaid, a little taſte of his Godhead, that they ſhould not pretend ignorance to excuſe their ungodlineſs: and many times he moved them to ſpeak many things, by confeſſion whereof themſelves might be convinced. But they ſo ſaw the things that they ſaw, that by ſuch ſeeing they were not directed to the truth, much leſs did attain unto it; like as a wayfaring man in the midſt of the field, for a ſudden moment, ſeeth far and wide the gliſtering of lightening in the night time, but with ſuch a quickly vaniſhing ſight, that he is ſooner covered again with the darkneſs of the night, than he can ſtir his foot, ſo far is it off that he can be brought into his way by ſuch a help. Beſides, that thoſe ſmall drops of truth, wherewith as it were by chance, they ſprinkle their books, with how many and how monſtrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they never ſo much as dreamed of that aſſuredneſs of God's good will toward us, without which man's wit muſt needs be filled with infinite confuſion. Therefore man's reaſon neither approacheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth ſight unto this truth, to underſtand who is the true God, or what a one he will be towards us.

To know God is the ſpecial gift of God.

19. But becauſe we being intoxicate with a falſe perſuaſion of our own deep inſight, do very hardly allow ourſelves to be perſuaded, that in the things of God it is utterly blind and dull: I think it ſhall be better to confirm it by teſtimonies of ſcripture, than by reaſons. This doth John very well teach in that place which I even now alleged, when he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the ſame life which ſhould be the light of men, and that the light did ſhine in darkneſs, and the darkneſs comprehended it not. John i. 4. He ſheweth indeed, that man's ſoul is lightened with the brightneſs of God's light, ſo that it is never altogether without ſome ſmall flame, or at leaſt ſome ſparkle of it, but yet, that with ſuch a light he comprehendeth not God. And why ſo? becauſe man's quickneſs of wit, as toward the knowlege of God, is but mere darkneſs. For when the holy Ghoſt calleth men darkneſs, he at once ſpoileth them of all ability of ſpiritual underſtanding. Therefore he affirmeth that the faithful who embrace Chriſt, are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the fleſh, or of man, but of God, John i. 13. As if he ſhould ſay, fleſh is not capable of ſo high wiſdom to conceive God and that which is God's, unleſs it be enlightened with the Spirit of God. As Chriſt teſtified, that this was a ſpecial revelation of the Father, that Peter did know him, Matth. xvi. 17.

It is the principal illumination of the Spirit which openeth the eyes of God's elect and theirs only, to ſee the things that are of God.

20. If we were perſuaded of this which ought to be out of all controverſy, that our nature wanteth all that which our heavenly Father giveth to his elect by the Spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt upon. For thus ſpeaketh the faithful people in the prophet: For with thee is the fountain of life, and in thy light we ſhall ſee light. Pſal. xxxiv. 10. The apoſtle teſtifieth the ſame thing when he ſaith, that no man can call Jeſus the Lord, but by the holy Ghoſt. 1 Cor. xii. And John Baptiſt ſeeing the dulneſs of his diſciples, cryeth out, that no man can receive any thing, unleſs it be given him from above. John iii. 27. And that he meaneth by gift a ſpecial illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth from hence, that he complaineth that in ſo many words as he had ſpoken to commend Chriſt to his diſciples, he prevailed nothing. I ſee (ſaith he) that words are nothing to inform mens minds concerning divine things, unleſs the Lord give underſtanding by his Spirit. Yea, and Moſes, when he reproacheth the people with their forgetfulneſs, yet obſerveth this withal, that they can by no means grow wiſe in the myſteries of God, but by the aſſiſtance of God. Deut. xxix. 2. Thine eyes, ſaith he, have ſeen thoſe great tokens and wonders, and the Lord hath not given thee a heart to underſtand, nor ears to hear, nor eyes to ſee. What ſhould he expreſs more, if he called us blocks in conſidering the works of God? Whereupon the Lord by the prophet promiſeth it as a mighty favour, that he will give the Iſraelites a heart that they may know him: Jer. xxiv. 7. thereby intimating that the underſtanding of man is only ſo far ſpiritually wiſe, as it is enlightened by God. And this Chriſt plainly confirmed with his own mouth, when he ſaith, that no man can come to him, but he to whom it ſhall be given from the Father. John vi. 44. What? Is not he himſelf the lively image of the Father in whom the whole brightneſs of his glory is expreſſed unto us? Therefore he could not better ſhew what power we have to know God, than when he ſaith, that we have no eyes to diſcern his image, where it is ſo openly ſet prepreſent before us. What? came he not into the earth for this purpoſe, to declare his Father's will unto men? And did he not faithfully perform his office? Yes ſurely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, unleſs the inward ſchoolmaſter, the holy Ghoſt, ſet open the way to our minds. Therefore none come to him, but they that have heard, and been taught of the Father. What manner of way of learning and hearing is this? Even, when the Holy Ghoſt by marvellous and ſingular power formeth the ears of men to hear, and their minds to underſtand. And leſt that ſhould ſeem ſtrange, he allegeth the prophecy of Iſaiah, Iſa. liv. 13. where when he promiſeth the repairing of the church, that they who ſhall be gathered together to ſalvation, ſhall be taught of the Lord. If God there fortells ſome peculiar thing concerning his elect, it is evident that he ſpeaks not of that kind of learning which was alſo common to the wicked and ungodly. It remaineth therefore that we muſt underſtand it thus, that the way into the kingdom of God is open to no man, but to him in whom the holy Ghoſt by his enlightening ſhall create a new mind. But Paul ſpeaketh moſt plainly of all, who purpoſely entring into a diſcourſe of this matter, after he had condemned all men's wiſdom of folly and vanity, and utterly brought it to nought, at laſt concludeth thus: 1 Cor. ii 14. that the natural man knoweth not the things that are of the ſpirit of God: they are fooliſhneſs unto him; neither can he know them, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. Whom doth he call natural? even him that ſtayeth upon the light of nature. He I ſay comprehendeth nothing in the ſpiritual myſteries of God. Why ſo? is it becauſe by ſlothfulneſs he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would labour never ſo much, he can do nothing, becauſe forſooth they are ſpiritually diſcerned. What meaneth this? becauſe being utterly concealed from the ſight of man, they are opened only by the revelation of the ſpirit: ſo that they are reckoned for folly where the ſpirit of God giveth not light. Before he had affirmed that thoſe things that God hath prepared for them that love him, are far above the capacity of the eyes, of the ears, and of the mind of men. Yea, he teſtifieth that man's wiſdom was a certain vail, whereby man's mind was kept from beholding God. What mean we? The apoſtle pronounceth, that the wiſdom of this world is made folly by God: and ſhall we forſooth give unto it ſharpneſs of underſtanding, whereby it may pierce to the ſecret places of the heavenly kingdom? Far be ſuch brutiſh ſtupidity from us.

21. And ſo that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he aſcribeth it to God alone. Eph. i. 15. God (ſaith he) and the father of glory, give to you the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation. Now thou heareſt that all wiſdom and revelation is the gift of God. What followeth? and enlighten the eyes of your mind. Surely if they need a new revelation, then are they blind of themſelves. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling, &c. Therefore he confeſſeth that the underſtandings of men are not capable of ſo great knowlege, to know their own calling. And let not ſome Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedy that dulneſs or unſkilfulneſs, when by the doctrine of his word he directeth man's underſtanding, whither without a guide he could not have attained. For David had a law, wherein was comprehended all the wiſdom that may be deſired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to have his eyes opened that he may underſtand the myſteries of the ſame law. By which ſpeech truly he ſecretly ſaith, that the ſun riſeth upon the earth where the word of God ſhineth to men; but they get not much thereby, until he himſelf, who is therefore called the father of lights, Jam. i. 17. do give them or open their eyes, becauſe whereſoever he ſhineth not with his Spirit, all things are full of darkneſs. So the apoſtles were well and largely taught by the beſt ſchoolmaſter: yet if they had not needed the Spirit of truth to inſtruct their minds in that ſame doctrine which they had heard before, he would not have bidden them look for him, John xiv. 26. If the thing that we aſk of God, we do thereby confeſs that we want: and God in that that he promiſeth it us, doth argue our need, let no man doubt to confeſs that he is ſo much able to underſtand the myſteries of God as he is enlightened with his grace. He that giveth to himſelf more underſtanding, is ſo much the more blind, for that he doth not acknowlege his own blindneſs.

The word of God can never enlighten mens minds without his grace.

22. Now remaineth the third point, of knowing the rule of ordering our life aright, which we do juſtly all the knowlege of the works of righteouſneſs, wherein the underſtanding of man ſeemeth to be of ſomewhat more acute diſcernment, than in the other two before. For the apoſtle teſtifieth, that the gentiles who have no law, while they do the works of the law, are as a law to themſelves, and do ſhew the law written in their hearts, their conſciences bearing them witneſs, and their thoughts accuſing them within themſelves or excuſing them before God, the judgment of God. If the Gentiles have righteouſneſs naturally graven in their minds, ſurely we cannot ſay that we are altogether blind in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the law natural, of which the apoſtle ſpeaketh in that place, is ſufficiently inſtructed to a right rule of life. But let us conſider to what purpoſe this knowlege of the law is planted in men: then it ſhall preſently appear, how far it bringeth them toward the mark of reaſon and truth. The ſame is alſo evident from the words of Paul, if a man do mark the placing of them. He had ſaid a little before, that they who ſinned in the law, are judged by the law, they who have ſinned without law do periſh without law. Becauſe this might ſeem unreaſonable, that the Gentiles ſhould periſh without any judgment going before, he immediately adds, that their conſcience is to them inſtead of a law, and therefore is ſufficient for their juſt damnation. Therefore the end of the law natural is, that man may be made inexcuſable. And it ſhall be defined not improperly thus, viz. That it is a knowlege of conſcience which ſufficiently diſcerneth between juſt and unjuſt, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proved guilty by their own teſtimony. Such is the tenderneſs of man toward himſelf, that in doing of evil, he always turneth away his mind ſo much as he may from the feeling of ſin. By which reaſon it ſeemeth that Plato was moved to think that there is no ſin done but by ignorance. (In Protagora.) That indeed were fitly ſaid by him, if mens hypocriſy went ſo far in hiding of vices, that the mind might not know itſelf guilty before God. But when the ſinner ſeeking to avoid the judgment imprinted in him, is now and then drawn back unto it, and not ſuffered ſo to wink, but that he is compelled whether he will or no, ſometime to open his eyes; it is falſely ſaid that he ſinned only by ignorance.

There is in man ſome knowlege of that which ſerveth for the ordering of his life aright. namely a certain conſcience of good and evil.

The mind which knoweth generally that evil muſt be ſhunned is notwithſtanding blind in diſcerning particularly what it ſhould ſhun as evil, and carried ſometimes knowingly embrace that evil which it knoweth.

23. Themiſtius ſaith more truly, who teacheth that underſtanding is ſeldom deceived in the general defining of things, that it is blindneſs when it goeth any further, that is, when it cometh down to the ſpecial caſe. Every man, if it be generally aſked, will affirm, that manſlaughter is evil: but he that conſpireth to kill his enemies, deliberateth upon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemn adultery, but in his own, privately he will flatter himſelf. This is ignorance, when a man coming to the ſpecial caſe forgetteth the rule, that he had lately agreed upon in the general queſtion. Of which thing Auguſtine diſcourſeth very finely in his expoſition of the firſt verſe of the lvii. Pſalm. (Paraph. in lib. 3. de anima. cap. 46.) Altho' the ſame thing is not continual. For ſometimes the ſhamefulneſs of the evil deed ſo preſſeth the conſcience, that not deceiving himſelf under falſe reſemblance of a good thing, but knowingly and willingly he runneth into evil. Out of which affection came theſe ſayings: (Medæa apud Ovidium.) I ſee the better and allow it, but I follow the worſe. Wherefore, methinks Ariſtotle hath very aptly made diſtinction between incontinence and intemperance. (Ethic. 7. cap. 3.) Where incontinence reigneth, he ſaith, that there by reaſon of troubled affection or paſſion, knowlege is taken away from the mind, that it marketh not the evil in his own act, which it generally ſeeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediately followeth. But intemperance is not extinguiſhed or broken by feeling of ſin, but on the other ſide obſtinately ſtandeth ſtill in her conceived choice of evil.

The underſtanding attaineth not at all to the chief duties of the firſt table of the law of God: in the ſecond although it perceive more, yet in many things it faileth & never marketh that the ſecret tickling deſire unto ſin is ſin.

24. Now when thou heareſt judgment univerſally named in the difference of good and evil, think it not every ſound and perfect judgment. For if mens hearts are furniſhed with choice of juſt and unjuſt, only to this end, that they ſhould not pretend ignorance, it is not then needful to ſee the truth in every thing. But it is enough and more, that they underſtand ſo far that they cannot eſcape away, but being convicted by the teſtimony of their own conſciences, they even now already begin to tremble at the judgment ſeat of God. And if we will try our reaſon by the law of God which is the exemplar of true righteouſneſs, we ſhall find how many ways it is blind. Truly it attaineth not at all to thoſe that are the chief things things in the first table, as of confidence in God, of giving to him the praise of strength and righteousness, of calling upon his name, of the true keeping of the sabbath. What soul ever by natural sense did find out, that the lawful worshipping of God consisteth in these and like things? For when profane men will worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vain trifles, yet they alway slide back thither again. They deny indeed that sacrifices do please God, unless there be adjoined a pureness of mind; whereby they declare, that they conceive somewhat of the spiritual worshipping of God, which yet they soon corrupt with false inventions. For they can never be persuaded that all is true that the law prescribeth concerning it. Shall I say, that the understanding excelleth in any acuteness of discernment, which can neither of itself be wise, nor hearken to the instructions of others. In the commandments of the second table it hath some more understanding, by so much as they come nearer to the preservation of civil fellowship among men. Altho' even in this also it is found many times to fail. To every excellent nature it seemeth most unreasonable, to suffer an unjust, and too imperious kind of dominion over them, if by any means he may put it away: and the judgment of man's reason is none other, but that it is the part of a servile and base courage, to suffer it patiently: and again, the part of an honest and free born heart, to shake it off. And revenge of injuries is reckoned for no fault among the philosophers. But the Lord condemning that too much nobleness of courage, commandeth his to keep the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the law, our understanding marketh not concupiscence at all. For a natural man suffereth not himself to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choaked up, before that it come to the first entry of this bottomless depth. For when the philosophers mark immoderate notions of mind for faults, they mean those motions that appear and shew forth themselves by gross tokens, but they make no account of those evil desires that do gently tickle the mind.

Our understanding is altogether impotent & blind except it be by grace illuminated not once but continually in every divine and heavenly thing which we have to learn.

25. Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withal before because he imputed all sins to ignorance, so is their opinion to be rejected, who teach that purposeth malice and frowardness is used in all sins. For we find it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is overwhelmed with so many sorts of deception, is subject to so many errors stumbleth at so many obstacles, is entangled with so many straits, that it is far from sure direction. But how little it is esteemed before the Lord in all parts of our life, Paul sheweth when he saith, that we are not sufficient to think any thing of ourselves, as of ourselves. 2 Cor. iii. 5. He speaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh also this away from us, that we should not think that it can come in our minds how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, understanding and head so corrupted, that it can devise or think upon nothing that is right before the Lord? that seemeth too hard to us who do unwillingly suffer ourselves to be spoiled of the sharpness of reason, which we account a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equity, who knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vain: (Psal. xciv. 11.) and who pronounceth plainly, that all the invention of man's heart is only evil. Gen. vi. 3. If all that our wit conceiveth, deviseth upon, purposeth and goeth about, is always evil, how can it come in our minds to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whom only holiness and righteousness is acceptable? So is it to be seen, that the reason of our mind, which way soever it turn itself, is miserably subject to vanity. David knew this weakness in himself, when he prayed to have understanding given him, to learn the Lord's commandments aright. Psal. cxix. 34.) For he secretly saith therein, that his own wit sufficeth him not, who desireth to have a new heart given him. And that not only once, but almost ten times in one Psalm, he repeateth the same prayer; by which repeating he privately declareth, with how great need he is driven to pray it. And that which he prayeth for himself alone: Paul commonly useth to pray for the churches. Phil. i. 4. We cease not (saith he) to pray for you, and to desire that ye may be filled with the knowlege of God in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, that ye may walk worthily of God, &c. Col. i. 9. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let us remember that he doth withal testify, that it lyeth not in man's power. And Augustine so far acknowledgeth this insufficiency of reason to understand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no less necessary for our minds, than the light of the sun is for our eyes. Aug. lib. 2.

De peccat. mer. & remiſ. ca. 5. And not content with that, he addeth a correction of that ſaying, that we lift up our eyes to ſee the light: but the eyes of our mind ly ſhut unleſs the Lord open them. And the ſcripture teacheth that our minds are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterward ſee by themſelves: for that which I even now alleged out of Paul, belongeth to continual proceedings and increaſings. And this doth David expreſsly ſet out in theſe words; (Pſal. cxix. 10.) For when he had been regenerated, and had not ſlenderly profited in true godlineſs, yet he confeſſeth that for every moment he needeth continual direction, leſt he ſhould depart from the knowlege with which he is endued. Therefore, in another place he prayeth to have the right ſpirit renewed, which he had loſt by his own fault, (Pſal. li. 12.) becauſe it belongeth to the ſame God to reſtore unto us the ſame thing being loſt for a time, which himſelf gave at the beginning.

Touchiug the will of man, the general inclination which it hath to that good whereof philoſophers do ſo much talk, proveth not any freedom or ability of dering and aſpiring unto virtue without the motion of the holy Ghoſt.

26. Now is Will to be examined, wherein ſtandeth the chief liberty of free chocie, for it hath been already ſeen, that choice doth rather belong to Will, than to underſtanding. Firſt, that this thing which the philoſophers have taught, and is received with common conſent, that is, that all things by natural inſtinction deſire that which is good, may not ſeem to belong to the uprightneſs of man's will: Let us mark that the force of free will, is not to be conſidered in ſuch appetite, as rather proceedeth of the inclination of the eſſence, than of the adviſement of the underſtanding mind. For even the ſchoolmen do confeſs, that free will hath no action, but when reaſon turneth itſelf to objects, whereby they mean that the object of appetite muſt be ſuch as may be ſubject to choice, and go before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choice. And truly if a man conſider what is the natural deſire of good in man, he ſhall find that it is common to him with beaſts. For they alſo deſire to be well, and when any ſhew of good appeareth that moveth their ſenſe, they follow it. But man doth neither chooſe by reaſon, that he may follow with diligence that thing which is indeed good for him, according to the excellency of his immortal nature, nor taketh reaſon to counſel, nor bendeth his mind, but without reaſon, without counſel, like a beaſt, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedom of will, if a man by ſenſe of nature be carried to deſire that which is good: but this is requiſite, that he diſcern good by right reaſon, and when he hath known it, that he chuſe it, and when he hath choſen it, that he follow it. But leaſt any man ſhould doubt, there is to be noted a double ſophiſtical argument. For appetite is not here called the proper manner of will, but a natural inclination: and good is called not as of virtue or juſtice, but of eſtate, as we ſay: This man is well or in good condition. Finally, although a man do never ſo much deſire to attain to what is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternal bleſſedneſs is not pleaſant, yet is there none that aſpireth unto it, but by the moving of the holy Ghoſt. Wherefore ſince the natural deſire in men to be well, maketh nothing to prove the freedom of will, no more than in metals and ſtones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their ſubſtance: let us conſider in other things, whether Will be ſo infected and corrupted in all parts that it engendereth nothing but evil; or whether it keepeth ſtill any portion unhurt, from whence do grow good deſires.

It is not ſufficient to confeſs that grace maketh the deſires of our will effectual, which otherwiſe would not be able to attain any good thing which is wiſhed for: but we muſt acknowlege that it is the grace of the holy Ghoſt which worketh in us the very firſt beginning to think of wiſhing well.

27. They that do attribute to the firſt grace of God, that we will effectually, ſeem on the other ſide to ſay ſecretly, that there is in the ſoul a power of itſelf to aſpire to good, but it is ſo weak, that it cannot grow to a perfect affection, or raiſe up any endevour. And there is no doubt that the ſchoolmen have commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certain of the antient writers: foraſmuch as they are wont to conſider man in pure natural things, (as they term it) ſuch a one as the apoſtle deſcribeth him in theſe words: (Rom. vii. 15.) "I do not the good "that I would, but the evil that "I would not, that I do. To will is preſent unto "me, but to perform it I find not." But after this manner is the diſcourſe that Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully perverted. For he treateth of the chriſtian wreſtling (which he ſhortly toucheth to the Galatians) which the faithful continually feel within themſelves, in the war between the fleſh and the ſpirit, Gal. v. 17. But the ſpirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the

the apoſtle doth there ſpeak of the regenerate, appeareth from this, that when he had ſaid, that there dwelleth no goodneſs in him, he addeth an expoſition, that he meaneth it of his fleſh. And therefore he ſaith, that it is not he that doth the evil, but ſin that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is my fleſh? Even as much as if he had ſaid thus: God dwelleth not in me of my ſelf, for there is no good to be found in my fleſh. Hereupon followeth that manner of excuſe: I my ſelf do not the evil, but ſin that dwelleth in me. Which excuſe belongeth only to the regenerate, who do with the chief part of their ſoul tend unto good. Now, the concluſion that is adjoined after, declareth all this matter evidently. I am delighted (ſaith he) with the law, according to the inward man, Rom. vii. 22.: but I ſee another law in my members, warring againſt the law of my mind. Who hath ſuch a ſtriving in himſelf, but he that being regenerate by the ſpirit of God, carrieth the leavings of his fleſh about with him? Therefore Auguſtin, (Ad Bonif. lib. 1. cap. 10. Et in Retract.) where as once he had thought, that that had been ſpeaking of the nature man, revoked his expoſition as falſe, and ill agreeing together. And truly, if we allow this, that men without grace have ſome motions to good, though they be but ſmall, what ſhall we anſwer to the apoſtle who ſaith, that we are not ſufficient ſo much as to think any good? 2 Cor. iii. 5. What ſhall we anſwer to the Lord who pronounceth by Moſes, that every invention of man's heart is only evil? Gen viii. 21. Wherefore ſince they have ſtumbled by falſe taking of one place, there is no cauſe why we ſhould ſtay upon their judgment. Let rather this ſaying of Chriſt prevail: He that doth ſin is the ſervant of ſin, John viii. 34. We are all ſinners by nature, therefore we be all holden under the yoke of ſin. Now if the whole man be ſubject to dominion of ſin, then muſt it needs be, that the will itſelf which is the chief ſeat thereof, be bound faſt with moſt ſtrait fetters. For otherwiſe the ſaying of Paul would not be conſiſtent that it is God who worketh in us to will, Phil. ii. 13. if any will did go before the grace of the holy Ghoſt. Away therefore with all that many have triflingly ſpoken concerning preparation. For although ſometimes the faithful do pray to have their heart formed to the obedience of the law, as David doth in many places: Pſal. li. 12. yet it is to be obſerved, that even that deſire of praying is from God. Which we may gather from his words, for when he wiſheth to have a clean heart created within him, ſurely he taketh not on himſelf the beginning of creation. Therefore let rather this ſaying of Auguſtin have place with us, De verbis Apoſt. Serm. 10. God will prevent thee in all things: And ſometimes prevent thou his wrath. How? Confeſs that thou haſt all theſe things of God, that whatſoever good thou haſt is of him: whatſoever evil, it is of thy ſelf. And a litle after: Nothing is ours but ſin.

CHAP. III.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but what is damnable.

The whole mind of man, and not the ſenſual part alone is corrupted.

BUT man cannot be any way better known in either part of his ſoul, than if he come forth with his titles wherewith the ſcripture doth ſet him out. If he be painted whole in theſe words of Chriſt, John iii. 6. That which is born of fleſh, is fleſh: as it is eaſy to prove, then is he proved to be a very miſerable creature. For the affection of the fleſh, as the apoſtle witneſſeth, is death, foraſmuch as it is enmity againſt God, Rom. viii. 6. and ſo is not, nor can be ſubject to the law of God. Is fleſh ſo perverſe, that with all its affection it continually uſeth enmity againſt God? that it cannot agree with the righteouſneſs of the law of God? Finally, that it can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Now, grant that in the nature of man is nothing but fleſh, and gather any good out of it if thou canſt. But (they ſay) the name of fleſh belongeth only to the ſenſual and not to the higher part of the ſoul. But that is ſufficiently confuted by the words of Chriſt, and of the apoſtle. It is the Lord's argument, that man muſt be born again, becauſe he is fleſh, John iii. 6. He commandeth not to be born again according to the body. But in mind he is not born again, if a part of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doth the compariſon, ſet in both places, confirm. For the ſpirit compared againſt the fleſh ſo is that there is left no mean thing between them. Therefore whatſoever is not ſpiritual in man, is after the ſame reaſon called fleſhly. But we have nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore fleſh whatſoever we have of nature. But of that matter, if otherwiſe we could have any doubt, that is taken away from us by Paul, where after he had deſcribed the old man, whom he had

ſaid to be corrupt with concupiſcences of error, he biddeth us to be renewed in the ſpirit of our mind: You ſee he doth not place unlawful and evil luſts only in the ſenſitive part, but alſo in the very mind, and therefore requireth, a renewing of it. And truly a little before he had painted out ſuch an image of man's nature, as did ſhew that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and perverted: for whereas he writeth that all nations do walk in the vanity of their mind, are darkened in underſtanding, eſtranged from the life of God, by reaſon of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindneſs of their heart, Eph. iv. 17.: it is no doubt that this is ſpoken of all them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the uprightneſs both of his wiſdom and juſtice: which is alſo made more plain by the compariſon by and by adjoined, where he putteth the faithful in mind, that they have not ſo learned Chriſt. For of theſe words we gather, that the grace of Chriſt, is the only remedy whereby we are delivered from that blindneſs, and the evils that follow upon it. For ſo had Iſaiah alſo prophecied of the kingdom of Chriſt, Iſa. lx. 2. when he promiſed that the Lord ſhould be an everlaſting light to his church, when yet darkneſs covered the earth, and a miſt the peoples. Whereas he teſtifieth, that the light of God ſhall ariſe only in the church, truly without the church he leaveth nothing but darkneſs and blindneſs. I will not rehearſe particularly ſuch things as are written every where, eſpecially in the Pſalms and in the prophets againſt the vanity of man. It is a great thing that David writeth, Pſal. lxii. 10. if he be weighed with vanity, that he ſhall be found lighter (or vainer) than vanity itſelf. His wit is wounded with a grievous weapon, when all the thoughts that come out of it, are ſcorned as fooliſh, trifling, mad and perverſe.

The manifold diſeaſes wherewith the ſoul either openly or covertly ſwarmeth, reckoned up by the apoſtle.

2. No eaſier is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guileful and perverſe above all things: but becauſe I ſtudy to be ſhort, I will be content with one place alone, but ſuch a one as ſhall be like a moſt bright looking glaſs, wherein we may behold the whole image of our nature. For the apoſtle when he goeth about to throw down the arrogance of mankind, doth it by theſe teſtimonies: That there is not one righteous man, there is not one man that underſtandeth or that ſeeketh after God; all are gone out of the way, they are altogether become unprofitable, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throat is an open ſepulchre, with their tongues they have uſed deceit, the poiſon of aſps is under their lips, whoſe mouth is full of curſing and bitterneſs; whoſe feet are ſwift to ſhed blood, in whoſe ways is deſtruction and miſery, who have not the fear of God before their eyes. Rom. iii. 10. Pſal. xiv. liii. With theſe thunder-bolts he inveigheth not againſt certain men, but againſt the whole nation of the ſons of Adam. Neither declaimeth he againſt the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuſeth the continual corruption of nature. For his purpoſe is in that place, not ſimply to chide men to make them amend, but to teach them rather that all men are oppreſſed with calamity, impoſſible to be overcome, from which they cannot get up again, unleſs they be plucked out by the mercy of God. And becauſe that could not be proved unleſs it had been by the overthrow and deſtruction of nature, he brought forth theſe teſtimonies whereby is proved that our nature is more than deſtroyed. Let this therefore remain agreed, that men are ſuch as they are here deſcribed, not only by fault of evil cuſtom, but alſo by corruptneſs of nature. For otherwiſe the apoſtle's argument cannot ſtand, that there is no ſalvation for men but by the mercy of God, becauſe he is in himſelf utterly loſt and paſt hope. I will not here buſy myſelf in proving the applying of theſe teſtimonies that no man ſhould think them unfitly uſed. I will ſo take them, as if they had been firſt ſpoken by Paul, and not taken out of the prophets. Firſt, he taketh away from man righteouſneſs, that is, integrity and pureneſs, and then underſtanding. The want of underſtanding, he proveth by apoſtacy or departing from God, whom to ſeek is the firſt degree of wiſdom. But that want muſt needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. He ſaith further, that all are gone out of the way and become as is were rotten, that there is none that doth good; and then he adjoineth the hainous faults wherewith they defile their members that are once let looſe into wickedneſs. Laſt of all he teſtifieth that they are void of the fear of God, after whoſe rule our ſteps ſhould have been directed. If theſe be the inheritable gifts of mankind, it is in vain to ſeek for any good thing in our nature. Indeed I grant that not all theſe faults do appear in every man: yet it cannot be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the hearts of all men. For as the body while it already nouriſheth within itſelf the cauſe and matter of diſeaſe, although the pain be not yet vehement ment, cannot be called healthy: no more can the ſoul be reckoned ſound, while it ſwarmeth full of ſuch diſeaſes and vices, although the ſimilitude doth not agree in all points. For in the body, be it never ſo much diſeaſed, there remaineth a quickneſs of life; but the ſoul being drowned in this gulph of deſtruction, is not only troubled with vices, but alſo altogether void of all goodneſs.

The moral honeſty of prophane men is no argument of purity in nature, becauſe it cometh not of them but of the grace of God working in them: not the grace that regenerateth the heart, but that bridleth only and reſtraineth the perverſeneſs of natural inclination.

3. The ſame queſtion in a manner which hath been before aſſoiled, now riſeth up again of new. For in all ages there have been ſome, who by the guidance of nature have been inclined to virtue in all their life. And I regard it not, though many failures may be noted in their manners: yet by the very ſtudy of honeſty they have ſhewed a proof that there was ſome pureneſs in their nature. What reward ſuch virtues have before God, although we will more fully declare when we ſhall ſpeak of the merits of works, yet we muſt ſomewhat ſpeak in this place: ſo far as is neceſſary for the illuſtration of this preſent argument. Theſe examples therefore ſeem to put us in mind, that we ſhould not think man's nature altogether corrupt, for that by her inſtruction, ſome men have not only excelled in ſome noble acts, but alſo in the whole courſe of their life have behaved themſelves moſt virtuouſly. But here we muſt think, how in this corruption of nature there is ſome place for the grace of God, not to cleanſe it, but inwardly to reſtrain it. For if the Lord would ſuffer the minds of all men as it were with looſe reigns to run wildly into all ſorts of luſts, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plain experience make us believe, that all thoſe evils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, Rom. iii. 10. are moſt truly ſaid of him. For what? Canſt thou exempt thy ſelf out of the number of them, whoſe feet are ſwift to ſhed blood, their hands defiled with robberies and manſlaughters, their throats like unto open ſepulchres, their tongues deceitful, their lips venemous, their works unprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whoſe mind is without God, whoſe inwards are perverſeneſs, whoſe eyes are bent to entrappings, their hearts lift up proudly to triumph over others, and all the parts of them applied to infinite miſchiefs. If every ſoul be ſubject to all ſuch monſters, as the apoſtle boldly pronounceth, truly we ſee what would come to paſs, if the Lord would ſuffer the luſt of man to wander after his own inclination. There is no mad beaſt that is ſo headlong carried away, there is no ſtream be it never ſo ſwift and ſtrong, whereof the overflowing is ſo violent. The Lord healeth theſe diſeaſes in his elect by this mean that we will by and by ſet forth. In ſome he only reſtraineth them with puting a bridle in their mouth, only that they break not out, ſo far as he foreſeeth to be expedient for preſerving the order of things in the univerſe. Hereby ſome are reſtrained by ſhame, ſome by fear of laws, that they burſt not forth into many ſorts of filthineſs, howbeit they do for a great part not hide their uncleanneſs. Some becauſe they think that an honeſt trade of life is good, do after a certain ſort aſpire towards it. Some riſe up above the common ſort, that by their majeſty they may keep others in their duty. So God by his providence bridleth the perverſeneſs of nature that it break not forth into doings, but he cleanſeth it not within.

The virtues of ungodly men do neither come of natural goodneſs and by natural corruption they are ſo polluted, that in the ſight of God they are lothſome.

4. But yet the doubt is not diſſolved. For either we muſt make Camillus like unto Catiline or elſe in Camillus we ſhall have an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodneſs. I grant indeed that thoſe godly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and ſeem worthy to be commended, if they be conſidered by themſelves, but how ſhall they be proofs of natural goodneſs in him? muſt we not return to the mind, and frame our argument in this ſort? If a natural man excelled in ſuch uprightneſs of manners, then nature is undoubtedly not without power towards the ſtudy of virtue. But what if the mind were perverſe and crooked, and following any thing rather than upright ſtraightneſs? And that it was ſuch, there is no doubt, if you grant that he was a natural man. Now what power of man's nature to goodneſs will you rehearſe unto me in this behalf, if in the greateſt ſhew of pureneſs it be found that he is always carried to corruption? Therefore, leaſt ye commend a man for virtue, whoſe vices deceive you under virtue's image, do not ſo give unto the will of man power to deſire goodneſs, ſo long as it remaineth faſt in her own perverſeneſs. Altho' this is a moſt ſure and eaſy ſolution of this queſtion, that theſe are not common gifts of nature, but eſpecial graces of God, which he diverſly and to a certain meaſure dealeth among men that are otherwiſe ungodly. For which reaſon we fear not in common ſpeech to call one man well-natured, and another of evil nature, and yet we ceaſe not to include them both under the univerſal ſtate of man's corruption, but we ſhew what ſpecial grace God hath beſtowed upon the one, which he hath not vouchſafed to give to the other. When his pleaſure was to make Saul king, he formed him as a new man. And that is the reaſon why Plato, alluding to the fable of Homer, ſaith, that kings ſons are created notable by ſome ſingular mark, becauſe God providing for mankind, furniſheth theſe with a princely nature whom he appointeth to bear government: and out of this ſtore-houſe came all the great captains that are renowned in hiſtories. The ſame is alſo to be thought of private men. But becauſe as every man hath moſt excelled, ſo his ambition hath moſt moved him forward (with which ſpot all virtues are defiled, ſo that they loſe all favour before God) it is to be accounted nothing worth, whatſoever ſeemeth praiſe-worthy in ungodly men, beſide that the chief part of uprightneſs faileth, where there is no ſtudy to advance the glory of God, which all they want whom he hath not regenerate with his Spirit. Neither is it vainly ſpoken in Iſaiah (Iſa. xi. 3.) that upon Chriſt reſteth the ſpirit of the fear of God, whereby we are taught, that ſo many as are ſtrangers to Chriſt, are without the fear of God, which is the beginning of wiſdom. As for the virtues that deceive us with vain ſhew, I grant they ſhall have praiſe in the court of policy, and in the common fame of men, but before the heavenly judgment-ſeat, they ſhall be of no value to deſerve righteouſneſs.

5. With ſuch bondage of ſin therefore as will is detained, it cannot once move itſelf to goodneſs, much leſs apply itſelf. For ſuch moving is the beginning of turning to God, which in ſcripture is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremiah prayeth to the Lord to turn him, if he will have him turned. Whereupon the prophet in the ſame chapter, deſcribing the ſpiritual redemption of the faithful people, ſaith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a ſtronger, meaning with how ſtrait fetters a ſinner is bound ſo long as being forſaken of the Lord, he liveth under the yoke of the devil. Yet will ſtill remaineth, which with moſt bent affection is both inclined and haſteth to ſin. For man was not deprived of will when he did caſt himſelf into this neceſſity, but of the ſoundneſs of will. And Bernard ſaith not unaptly, which teacheth that to will is in us all: but to will good is a profiting, to will ill is a defect: and therefore ſimply to will, is the work of man: to will evil of corrupt nature: to will well of grace. Now, whereas I ſay, that will put from liberty is by neceſſity drawn or led into evil, it is a wonder if that ſhould ſeem a hard ſpeech unto any man, which neither hath any abſurdity in it, nor varieth from the uſe of holy men: but it offendeth them that can make no difference between neceſſity and compulſion. But if a man aſk them, is not God of neceſſity good? is not the devil of neceſſity evil? what can they anſwer? For ſo is goodneſs knit with God's divinity, that it is no more neceſſary that he be God than that he be good. And the devil is by his fall ſo eſtranged from partaking of goodneſs, that he can do nothing but evil. But now if any robber of God do bark againſt this and ſay, that God deſerveth ſmall praiſe for his goodneſs, which he is compelled to keep: ſhall not this be a ready anſwer to him, that it cometh to paſs by his infinite goodneſs and not by violent impulſion, that he cannot do evil. Therefore if this, that it is of neceſſity that God do well, do not hinder the free-will of God in doing well, if the devil which cannot do but evil yet willingly ſinneth, who ſhall then ſay that a man doth therefore leſs willingly ſin for this that he is ſubject to neceſſity of ſininng? This neceſſity, whereas Auguſtine every where ſpeaketh of it, (Lib. de perf. juſt.) even then alſo when he was enviouſly preſſed with the cavillation of Celeſtinus, he ſticked not to affirm in theſe words, by liberty it came to paſs that man was with ſin, but now the corruption which flowed from puniſhment, hath of liberty made neceſſity. And ſo oft as he falleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to ſpeak in this manner of the neceſſary bondage of ſin. Therefore let this ſum of that diſtinction be kept, that man ſince he is corrupted, ſinneth in deed willingly and not againſt his will not compelled, by a moſt bent affection of mind, and not by violent compulſion, by motion of his own luſt, and not by foreign conſtraint; but yet of ſuch perverſeneſs of nature as he is, he cannot but be moved and driven to evil. If this be true, then ſurely it is plainly expreſſed that he is ſubject to neceſſity of ſinning. Bernard agreeing to Auguſtine writeth thus, (Sermone ſuper Cant. 81.) only man among all living creatures is free: and yet by mean of ſin, he alſo ſuffereth a certain violence, but of will and not of nature, that even thereby alſo he ſhould not be deprived prived of freedom, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will being changed in itſelf into worſe, by I know not what corrupt and marvellous manner, ſo maketh neceſſity that very neceſſity for as much as it is willing, cannot excuſe will, and will for as much as it is drawn by allurement, cannot exclude neceſſity, for this neceſſity is after a certain manner willing. Afterward he ſaith that we are preſſed down with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certain willing bondage, therefore by reaſon of our bondage we are miſerable, by reaſon of our will we are inexcuſable, becauſe will when it was free, made it ſelf the bondſervant of ſin. At length he concludeth, that the ſoul is ſo after a certain marvellous and evil manner holden both a bond ſervant and free, under this certain willing and ill free neceſſity: a bond ſervant by reaſon of neceſſity, free by reaſon of will, and that which is more marvellous and more miſerable, therein guilty wherein it is free, therein bound wherein it is guilty, and ſo therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truly the readers do perceive that I bring no new thing, which long ago Auguſtine brought forth out of the conſent of all godly men, and almoſt a thouſand years after was kept ſtill in monks cloyſters. But Lombard when he could not diſtinguiſh neceſſity from compulſion, gave matter to a pernicious error.

God is the only framer of the will unto good things, from the firſt motion to the laſt perfection of every good act, his hand worketh and worketh alone.

6. On the other ſide it is good to conſider what manner of remedy is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For whereas the Lord in helping us, giveth us that which we want, when we ſhall know what his work is in us, it will ſtraightway appear on the other ſide what is our needineſs. When the Apoſtle ſaith to the Philippians, that he truſteth that he who began a good work in them, will perform it unto the day of Jeſus Chriſt: it is not to be doubted, that by the beginning of a good work, he meaneth the very beginning of converſion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good work in us by ſtirring up in our hearts the love, deſire and endeavour of righteouſneſs, (to ſpeak more properly) in inclining framing and directing our hearts to righteouſneſs: he endeth it in confirming us to perſeverance. And that no man ſhould cavil that good is begun by the Lord, when will being of itſelf weak is aſſiſted; the holy Ghoſt in another place declareth what will is able to do being left unto itſelf. I will give you (ſaith he) a new heart. I will put a new ſpirit in the midſt of you. And I will take away the ſtony heart from your fleſh, and I will give you a heart of fleſh. Ezek. xxxvi. 16. And I will put my ſpirit in the midſt of you, and I will make you to walk in my commandments. Who ſhall ſay that the weakneſs of man's will is ſtrengthened with help, whereby it may effectually aſpire to the choice of that that is good, when it muſt be wholly tranſformed and renewed? If there be any ſoftneſs in a ſtone, which by ſome help being made tenderer will abide to be bowed every way, then will I grant that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, ſo that that which in it is perfect, be ſupplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to ſhew by this ſimilitude, that no goodneſs could ever be wrung out of our heart unleſs it be made throughly new: let us not part between him and us, that which he challengeth to himſelf alone. If therefore a ſtone be transformed into fleſh, when God turneth us to the deſire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our own will taken away, and that which cometh in place thereof is all of God. I ſay that will is taken away, not in that it is will, becauſe in the converſion of man, that which was of the firſt nature abideth whole: alſo I ſay that it is created new, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it turneth from an evil will into a good. And this I affirm to be wholly done by God, becauſe we are not able ſo much as to think, (2 Cor. viii. 6.) as the ſame apoſtle witneſſeth: therefore in another place he ſaith, that God doth not only help our weak will, or amend our perverſe will, but that he worketh in us to will. Phil. ii. 13. Whereupon is eaſily gathered, that which I ſaid before, that whatſoever good is in will, it is the work of only grace. In which ſenſe in another place he ſaith, that it is God who worketh all in all. 2 Cor. xii. 6. Neither doth he there treat of the univerſal government, but giveth unto God alone the praiſe of all good things that the faithful have. And in ſaying all, truly he maketh God the author of ſpiritual life, even from the beginning to the end. Which ſelf ſame thing he had taught before in other words, ſaying (1 Cor. viii. 6.) that the faithful are of God in Chriſt, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is deſtroyed. For there is to be underſtood a compariſon between Adam and Chriſt, which in another place he more plainly expreſſeth, where he teacheth that we are the work of God created in Chriſt to good works, which he hath prepared that we ſhould walk in them. For he goeth about by this reaſon to prove, that our ſalvation is of free gift, becauſe the beginning of all goodneſs, is at the ſecond creation, which we obtain in Chriſt. But if there were any power of ourſelves, were it never ſo ſmall, we ſhould alſo have ſome portion of merit. But he to prove us altogether nothing worth, reaſoneth that we have deſerved nothing becauſe we are created in Chriſt to good works, which God hath prepared. In which words he ſignifieth again, that all parts of good works even from the firſt motion, are proper to God only. For this reaſon, the prophet after he had ſaid in the pſalm that we are the workmanſhip of God, that there ſhould be no partition addeth by and by, we made not ourſelves. That he ſpeaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of ſpiritual life, appeareth from the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flock of his paſtures. We ſee now how he not contented ſimply to have given to God the praiſe of our ſalvation, doth expreſsly exclude us from all fellowſhip with him, as if he would ſay, that there reſteth no peace, be it never ſo little, for man to glory in, becauſe it is all of God.

It is not enough to make God the principal actor and leader of our will unto good things, but the whole proceſs muſt be aſcribed entirely unto him.

7. But there be ſome perhaps who will grant, that will being of her own nature, turned away from good, is converted by the only power of the Lord: but ſo that being prepared before, it hath alſo her own part in doing, as Auguſtine teacheth, that grace goeth before every good work, but ſo, that will doth accompany it and not lead it, as a waiting maid after it and not a foregoer. Which thing being not improperly ſpoken by the good man, Peter Lombard (Ad Bonif. Epi. 106.) doth diſorderly wreſt to this purpoſe. But I affirm, that as well in the words of the prophet which I have alleged, as in other places, theſe two things are plainly ſignified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather deſtroy it, and alſo of himſelf putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is prevented by grace, in that reſpect I give you leave to call it a waiting maid: but for that being reformed, it is the work of the Lord, that is wrongfully given to man that he doth with will coming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chryſoſtome, (Ser. de invent. S. Crucis.) that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can work any thing: as if grace did not work very well itſelf, as even now we have ſeen by Paul. Neither was it Auguſtine's purpoſe, when he called man's will the waiting maid of grace, to aſſign unto her a certain ſecond office in doing a good work, but becauſe this only was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, who did place the principal cauſe of ſalvation in man's deſerving: therefore he ſtood only upon this point, that grace was before all deſerving: which was ſufficient for the matter that he then had in hand: not meddling in the mean time with the other queſtion, concerning the perpetual effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handleth. For ſometimes when he ſaith, that the Lord doth prevent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vain, he maketh him altogether the whole author of the good work. Altho' his ſentences touching this matter, are too plain to need any long arguing upon them. Men (ſaith he) do labour to find in our will ſomething that is our own and not of God, but how it may be found I know not. And in his firſt book (Aug. li. 2. de remiſſ. pecca. ca. 18.) againſt Pelagius and Celeſtius, where he doth expound that ſaying of Chriſt, John vi. 45. Every one that hath heard of my Father cometh to me: he ſaith, free-will is ſo aſſiſted not only that it may know what is to be done, but alſo may do it when it hath known it. And ſo when God teacheth, not by the letter of the law, but by the grace of the ſpirit, he ſo teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not only ſee it knowing, but alſo deſire it in willing, and perform it in doing.

Since there is found a will bent to good in none but only in the elect, and the beginning to will well is faith of whom our election and faith cometh of him the converſion of our will muſt alſo of neceſſity proceed.

8. And becauſe we are now in hand with the chief point whereupon the matter depends, let us go forward and prove the ſum thereof to the readers, only with a few and the moſt plain teſtimonies of the ſcripture. And then, leaſt any man ſhould accuſe us of wrongfully wreſting the ſcripture, let us ſhew that the truth which we affirm being taken out of the ſcripture, wanteth not the teſtimony of this good man, I mean Auguſtine. For I think it not expedient, that all the things be rehearſedthat may be brought out of the ſcriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, ſo that by the moſt choſen that ſhall be brought forth, the way may be prepared to underſtand all the reſt that are here and there commonly read. And again I think it ſhall not be unfitly done, if I plainly plainly ſhew that I agree well with that man whom the conſent of godly men doth deſervedly much eſteem. Surely, it is evident by plain and certain proof, that the beginning of goodneſs is from no where elſe but only from God, for there cannot be found a will inclined to good, but in the elect. But the cauſe of election is to be ſought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himſelf, but it proceedeth from the ſame good pleaſure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is alſo another reaſon not unlike unto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be ſeen whence faith itſelf cometh. For as much as the whole ſcripture crieth out that it is a free-gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the mere grace of God, when we who are with all our mind naturally bent to evil, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lord, when he nameth theſe two things in the converſion of his people, to take away from them a ſtony heart, and to give them a heart of fleſh, plainly teſtifieth that that which is of ourſelves muſt be done away, that we may be converted to righteouſneſs: and that whatſoever cometh in place thereof, is from himſelf. And he uttereth not this in one place only. For he ſaith in Jeremiah, I will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me all their days. And a little after, I will give the fear of my name into their heart, that they depart not from me. Again in Ezekiel: I will give them one heart, and I will give a new ſpirit in their bowels. I will take away the ſtony heart out of their fleſh, and I will give them a heart of fleſh. He could not more evidently claim to himſelf, and take from us whatſoever is good and right in our will, than when he declareth that our converſion is a creation of a new ſpirit, and of a new heart. For it followeth always, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodneſs till it be reformed, and that after reformation, ſo much as it is good, is of God, and not of us.

The prayers of holy men to have their hearts framed unto good things: the teſtimony of Chriſt that without him we are like fruitleſs and dry branches of Paul and David aſcribing both the firſt and laſt in our wills to God as the author prove ſufficiently that our liking, deſiring, following, attaining good, our going forward and continuing in it, is of him.

9. And ſo read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as the Lord incline our heart to him (ſaith Solomon) that we may keep his commandments. He ſheweth the forwardneſs of our heart which naturally rejoiceth to rebel againſt the law of God if it be not bowed. And the ſame thing is in the Pſalm: Lord incline my heart to thy teſtimonies. For the compariſon of contrariety is always to be noted, which is between the perverſe motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obſtinacy, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When David feeling himſelf, for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new heart within him to renew a right ſpirit within his bowels; doth he not acknowlege that all the parts of his heart are full of uncleanneſs, and his ſpirit writhen with crooked perverſeneſs? and in calling the cleanneſs which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doth he not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and ſay, that the very prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our anſwer is ready, that though David were by that time ſomewhat come to amendment, yet doth he ſtill compare his firſt ſtate with that ſorrowful fall that he had felt. Therefore taking upon him the perſon of a man eſtranged from God, he for good cauſe prayeth to have given him all theſe things that God giveth to his elect in regeneration. And ſo being like a dead man, he wiſheth himſelf to be created of new, that of the bond ſlave of Sathan, he may be made the inſtrument of the holy Ghoſt. Strange and monſtrous ſurely is the luſt of our pride. God requireth nothing more earneſtly, than that we ſhould moſt religiouſly keep his ſabbath, that is in reſting from our own works, but of us nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our own works farewel, to give due place to the works of God. If ſluggiſhneſs hindereth not, Chriſt hath given teſtimony evident enough of his graces to make them not to be enviouſly ſuppreſſed. John xv. 1. I am (ſaith he) the vine, you are the branches: my Father is the huſbandman. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itſelf, unleſs it abide in the vine, no more can you, unleſs you abide in me. For without me you can do nothing. If we bear fruit no otherwiſe than a branch buddeth being plucked out of the ground and without moiſture: we need no more to ſeek what is the inclination of our nature to goodneſs. And this is a plain concluſion: without me ye can do nothing. He doth not ſay that we are too weak to be ſufficient for ourſelves: but in bringing us to nothing, he excludeth all opinion of power be it never ſo little. If we being graffed in Chriſt, bear fruit like a vine, which taketh her efficacy of livelineſs both from the moiſture of the earth, and from the dew of heaven, and from the cheriſhing of the ſun: I ſee nothing remain for us in doing a good work, if we keep whole for God that which is his. The fond ſubtle device is alleged in vain, that there is juice already incloſed within the branch, and a certain power to bring forth fruit, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the firſt root, becauſe it bringeth ſomewhat of her own. For Chriſt doth mean nothing elſe, but that we are a dry branch and nothing worth, when we are ſeparated from him, becauſe by ourſelves being ſeparate, we have no power to do well: as alſo in another place he ſaith: Mat. xv. 13. every tree that my Father hath not planted ſhall be rooted up. Wherefore the apoſtle aſcribeth the whole unto him in the place already quoted. Phil. ii. 13. It is God (ſaith he) that worketh in us both to will and to do. The firſt part of a good work is will: the ſecond is a ſtrong endeavour in performing it: the author of both theſe is God. Therefore we ſteal it from God, if we take to ourſelves any thing, either in will or in effectual working. If it were ſaid that God doth help our weak will, then ſomething were left for us. But when it is ſaid tha the maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is ſet out of us. And becauſe the good will is yet ſtill oppreſſed with weight of our fleſh that it cannot riſe up: He ſaid further, that to overcome the hardſhips of that battle, there is afforded us ſtedfaſtneſs of endeavour, even to the elect. For otherwiſe it could not ſtand together which he teacheth in another place, 1 Cor. xii. 6. that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein we have before taught that the whole courſe of ſpiritual life is comprehended. For which reaſon, David, after he had prayed to have the ways of the Lord opened unto him, that he might walk in his truth, by and by addeth, Pſal. lxxxvi. 11. 'Unite thou my heart to fear thy name.' In which words he ſignifieth, that even they who are well diſpoſed, are ſubject to ſo many withdrawings of mind, that they eaſily vaniſh or fall away if they be not conſtantly fixed and eſtabliſhed. For which reaſon in another place, after he had prayed, Pſal. cxix. 19. to have his ſteps directed to keep the word of God, he requireth alſo to have ſtrength given him to fight. Let no iniquity, (ſaith he) have dominion over me, ver. 33. After this ſort therefore doth the Lord both begin and end a good work in us: that it may all be his work, that will conceiveth a love of that which is right, that it is inclined to the deſire thereof, that it is ſtirred up and moved to endeavour of following it. And then that our choice, deſire, and endeavour faint not, but do proceed even to the effect: laſt of all, that man goeth forward conſtantly in them, and continueth to the end.

God doth not only make our will the offer to incline it, which if we accept it worketh, and not otherwiſe, but he ſetteth good before us, giveth us eyes to ſee it, and effectually incline th our minds unto it.

10. And he moveth the will, not in ſuch ſort as hath in many ages been taught and believed: that it is afterwards in our choice, either to obey or withſtand the motion, but with mightily ſtrengthening it. Therefore that muſt be rejected which Chryſoſtome ſo often repeateth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he ſecretly teacheth that God doth only reach out his hand to ſee if we will be holpen by his aid. We grant that ſuch was the ſtate of man while he yet ſtood, that he might incline to either part. But ſince he hath taught by his example how miſerable is free-will, unleſs God both will and work in us: what ſhall become of us, if he give us his grace according to that ſmall proportion? But rather we do obſcure and extenuate it with our unthankfulneſs. For the apoſtle doth not teach, that the grace of a good will is offered us, if we do accept it, but that he will perform it in us: which is nothing elſe, but that the Lord by his ſpirit doth direct, bow, and govern our heart, and reigneth in it as in his own poſſeſſion. Neither doth he promiſe by Ezekiel, Ezek. ix. 19. and xxxvi. 27. that he will give to the elect a new ſpirit only for this end, that they may be able to walk in his commandments, but to make them walk indeed. Neither can Chriſt's ſaying, John ix. 45. (Every one that hath heard of my Father cometh to me) be otherwiſe taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectual of itſelf: as Auguſtine (Lib. de prædeſt. Sanct.) alſo affirmeth. Which grace God vouchſafeth not to give to all men generally without regard, as that ſaying (as I think) of Occam, is commonly ſpoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what lieth in him. Men are indeed to be taught that God's goodneſs is laid open for all men, without exception that ſeek for it. But foraſmuch as they only begin to ſeek for it, whom the heavenly grace hath breathed upon, not ſo much as the ſmalleſt portion ought to be taken away from his praiſe. Truly this is the prerogative of the elect, that being regenerate by the Spirit of God, they are moved and governed by his direction. Therefore Auguſtine doth juſtly as well mock them, that claim any part of willing to themſelves, as he doth reprehend others who think, that that is generally given to all men, which is the ſpecial teſtimony of free election. Nature, ſaith he (Aug. de verbis. Apoſt. Ser. 11.) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a brittle ſubtilty of wit like glaſs, that gliſtereth with mere vanity, where it is generally extended to all which God giveth only to whom it pleaſeth him. And in another place: How cameſt thou? by believing. Fear thou, leſt while thou takeſt upon thee that thou haſt found the juſt way, thou periſh out of the juſt way; I came (ſayeſt thou) by free will, I came by mine own will, why boaſteſt thou? wilt thou hear that this alſo is given thee? Hear even him that calleth: John vi. 44. 'No man cometh to me unleſs my Father draw him.' And it is without controverſy gathered out of John's words, that the hearts of the godly are ſo effectually governed by God's working, that they follow with an unchangeable affection. 1 John iii. 9. 'He that is born of God (ſaith he) cannot ſin, becauſe the ſeed of God abideth in him. For we ſee that the mean motion which the ſophiſters imagine, which we at our liberty may either obey or refuſe, is openly excluded, where an effectual conſtancy to continue is affirmed.

As our firſt entrance into an inclination to good, ſo our continuance therein is alſo the work and free gift of God: they err who maintain either that the thankful uſe of the firſt grace doth deſerve the ſecond, or that the firſt only worketh alone, and with the ſecond we ourſelves are co-operators.

11. Of continuance there ſhould no more doubt have been made, but that it ſhould have been taken for the free gift of God unleſs the moſt wicked error had grown in force, that it is diſtributed according to the deſert of men, as every man hath ſhewed himſelf not unthankful to the firſt grace. But foraſmuch as this error hath grown upon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuſe or receive the grace of God offered, that opinion being driven away, this other doth alſo fall of itſelf. Although herein they do miſtake in two manner of ways. For beſides this, that they teach that our thankfulneſs for the firſt grace, and our lawful uſe thereof are rewarded with the latter gifts: they add alſo, that now grace alone doth not work in us, but that it is only a worker together with us. Of the firſt this we ought to believe, that the Lord while he daily enricheth and crowneth his ſervants with new gifts of his grace, becauſe he liketh and favoureth the work which he hath begun in them, findeth in them ſomewhat whereupon to beſtow greater graces. And hereto ſerve thoſe ſayings, Matth. xxv. 21. 'To him that hath ſhall be given.' Again, Luke xix. 17. 'Well done, good and faithful ſervant, becauſe thou haſt been faithful in few things, I will ſet thee over many.' But here two things are to be taken heed of, that neither the lawful uſe of the firſt grace be ſaid to be rewarded with the latter graces, nor it be ſo counted a rewarding, that it ceaſe to be reckoned the free grace of God. I grant therefore, that this bleſſing of God is to be looked for of the faithful, that how much the better they have uſed the firſt graces, they ſhall be encreaſed with ſo much the greater. But I ſay, that this uſe alſo is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good-will. And they uſe no leſs wrongfully than unhappily that old diſtinction of working and together-working grace. Auguſtine uſed the ſame indeed, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together-working with us, doth end that which in working he beginneth, and that it is ſtill the ſame grace, but changeth name acccording to the diverſe manner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it between God and us, as if there were a mutual meeting together by the motion of both, but only noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpoſe belongeth that which in another place he teacheth, that many gifts of God do go before the good will of man, among the which the ſelf ſame is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaveth nothing that it may claim to itſelf. Which thing Paul alſo hath namely expreſſed: Phil. ii. 13. For when he had ſaid that it is God, who worketh in us both to will and to do, he by and by addeth that he doth them both of his good-will, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodneſs. Whereas they are wont to ſay, that after we have once given place to the firſt grace, our own endeavours do now work together with the grace that followeth. To this I anſwer: if they mean that we, after we have been once by the power of the Lord broken to the obedience of righteouſneſs, do of our own accord go forward, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I ſpeak nothing againſt it. For it is moſt certain there is ſuch a readineſs of obeying where the grace of God reigneth. But whence cometh that, but from this, that the ſpirit of God always agreeing with itſelf, doth cheriſh and confirm to ſtedfaſtneſs of continuing the ſame affection of obeying, which itſelf begot at the beginning. But if they mean that man taketh of himſelf ſomewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are moſt miſchievouſly deceived.

12. And

The apoſtle Paul wreſted by ſophiſters to maintain the freedom of man's will as a joint worker with the grace of God.

12. And to this purpoſe is that ſaying of the apoſtle wrongfully wreſted by ignorance: 1 Cor. xv. 10. 'I have laboured more abundantly than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me.' For they take it ſo: that becauſe it might ſeem ſomewhat arrogantly ſpoken, that he preferred himſelf before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praiſe to the grace of God, but yet ſo, that he calleth himſelf a worker together with grace. It is ſtrange that ſo many who otherwiſe were not evil men, have ſtumbled at this ſtraw. For the apoſtle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himſelf partner of the labour, but rather by this correction he giveth away all the praiſe of the labour to grace only. It is not I (ſaith he) that have laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulneſs of the ſpeech deceived them: but ſpecially the wrong tranſlation wherein the force of the Greek article was left out. For if it be tranſlated word for word, he doth not ſay, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the ſame thing doth Auguſtine teach, not darkly, though ſhortly, where he thus ſaith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it ſelf is one, then followeth his reaſon: becauſe it is written: Pſal. lix. 11. His mercy hath prevented me: Pſal. xxiii. 6. And his mercy ſhall follow me. It preventeth man not willing, to make him will: and it followeth him willing, that he will not in vain. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church ſpeaking thus: (Ser. 2. in Cant.) Draw me in a manner unwilling, that thou mayeſt make me willing: draw me lying ſlothful, that thou mayeſt make me run.

St. Auguſtine's doctrine not that God doth offer his grace which man hath free election to receive or refuſe, but that the will and election of every receiver is by him thereunto framed.

13. Now let us hear Auguſtine ſpeaking in his own words, leſt the Pelagians of our age, that is to ſay, the ſophiſters of Sorbon, ſhould, as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquity is againſt us, wherein they follow their father Pelagius by whom long ago Auguſtine was drawn forth into the ſame contention. In his book of corruption and grace written to Valentine he treateth largely that which I will rehearſe ſhortly, but yet do it in his own words: that to Adam was given the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to us is given to will, and by will to overcome concupiſcence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to us is given both to will and to be able. That the firſt liberty was to be able not to ſin, ours is much greater, not to be able to ſin. And leaſt he ſhould be thought to ſpeak of the perfection to come after immortality (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a little after he removeth this doubt. For (ſaith he) the will of holy men is ſo much kindled by the holy Ghoſt, that they therefore are able, becauſe they ſo will; they therefore will, becauſe God worketh that they ſo will. For if in ſo great weakneſs, in which yet behoveth the power to be made perfect, for repreſſing of pride, their own will were left unto them, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doth not work in them to will: then among ſo many temptations will ſhould needs fall down for weakneſs, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is ſuccour given to the weakneſs of man's will, that it ſhould be moved without departing or ſevering by the grace of God, and therefore ſhould not faint how weak ſo ever it be. Then he (cap. 14.) treateth more largely how our hearts do of neceſſity follow the motion of God that worketh affection in them. And he ſaith, that the Lord doth draw men indeed with their own wills, but, with ſuch as he himſelf hath wrought. Now have we that thing teſtified by Auguſtine's mouth, which we principally deſire to obtain, that grace is not only offered by God to be received or refuſed at every man's free election, but alſo that grace is the ſame, that formeth the election and will in the heart: ſo that every good work that followeth after, is the fruit and effect thereof, and that it have no other will obeying it, but the ſame which it hath made. For theſe are alſo his words out of another place, (Epiſt. 105.) .that nothing but grace maketh every good in us.

By grace freely and undeſervedly given unto God's elect their will is converted unto good and therein ſtrengthened to continue.

14. But whereas he ſaith in another place, (Epiſt. 106.). that will is not taken away by grace, but from an evil will turned into a good, and aſſiſted when it is good: he meaneth only that man is not ſo drawn, that without any motion of heart he is carried as by an outward impulſion, but that he is inwardly wardly ſo affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is ſpecially and freely given to the elect, he writeth thus unto Boniface: We know that grace is not given to all men, and to them to whom it is given, it is not given according to the merits of works, nor according to the merits of will, but of free favour: and to them to whom it is not given, we know that it is by the juſt judgment of God that it is not given. And in the ſame epiſtle he ſtrongly fighteth againſt that opinion, that the grace following is given to the deſervings of men, becauſe in not refuſing the firſt grace, they ſhewed themſelves worthy. For he will have Pelagius grant, that grace is neceſſary to us for every of our doings, and is not given in recompence to works, that it may be grace indeed. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a ſhorter ſum, than out of the eighth chapter of his book to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where firſt he teacheth that man's will obtaineth not grace by liberty, but liberty by grace; and that by the ſame grace, by affection of delight printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is ſtrengthened with invincible force: that while grace governeth, it never falleth away: when grace forſaketh, it by and by tumbleth down. That by the free mercy of God it both is converted to good, and being converted abideth in it, that the direction of man's will to good, and ſtedfaſtneſs after direction, depends only upon the will of God, and not upon any merit of his own. And ſo to man is left ſuch a free will, if we pleaſe ſo to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

CHAP. IV.

How God worketh in the hearts of men.

Satan ſitteth and ruleth in the wills of wicked men, who of themſelves are moſt willing to be ſtirred, led and guided by him.

IT is ſufficiently proved, as I think, that man is ſo holden captive with the yoke of ſin, that of his own nature he can neither aſpire by deſire, nor travel by endeavour to goodneſs: beſide that we have rehearſed a diſtinction between compulſion and neceſſity whereby it might appear, that when he ſinneth of neceſſity, yet nevertheleſs he ſinneth willingly. But foraſmuch as while he is ſubject in bondage to the devil, he ſeemeth rather to be led by the devil's will than his own, it reſteth now to be declared of what ſort are both kinds of working. And then is this queſtion to be decided, whether in evil works there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the ſcripture ſheweth, that there is uſed ſome working of his. In one place Auguſtine compareth man's will to a horſe, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the devil he compareth to riders. If God (ſaith he) ſit upon it he like a ſober and cunning rider, governeth its will, ſpurreth it forward if it be ſlow, plucketh it back if too quick, reſtraineth the wantonneſs and wildneſs of it, tameth the ſtubbornneſs of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the devil have poſſeſſed it, he like a fooliſh and wanton rider, violently carrieth it through places where no way is, driveth it into ditches, rolleth it down ſteep places, ſpurreth it forward to ſtubbornneſs and fierceneſs: and which ſimilitude we will for this time be contented with ſince there cometh not a better in place. Where it is ſaid that the will of natural man is ſubject to the rule of the devil, to be ſtirred by him, it is not meant thereby that man as it were ſtriving againſt it, and reſiſting is compelled to obey, as we compel bond ſlaves againſt their will, by reaſon of being their lords, to do our commandments: but that being bewitched with the deceits of Satan, it of neceſſity yieldeth itſelf obedient to every one of his motions and directions. For whom the Lord vouchſafeth not to rule with his ſpirit, them by juſt judgment he ſendeth away to be moved of Satan. Wherefore the apoſtle ſaith, (2 Cor. iv. 4.) that the God of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers ordained to deſtruction, that they ſhould not ſee the light of the goſpel. And in another place: (Eph. ii. 2.) that he worketh in the children of diſobedience. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deeds that follow thereupon, are called the works of Satan, of which yet the cauſe is not to be ſought elſewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariſeth the root of evil, wherein reſteth the foundation of the kingdom of Satan, which is ſin.

God and Satan and man working one and the ſelf ſame act,

2. But far other is the order of God's working in ſuch things. And that the ſame may appear more evidently unto us: let the

hurt done to the holy man Job by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his herdmen, and like enemies in war, drove away his cattle for booties. Now is their wicked deed plainly ſeen, and in that work Satan is not idle, from whom the hiſtory ſaith, that all this did proceed. But Job himſelf did acknowledge the work of the Lord in it, whom he ſaith to have taken away from him thoſe things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. Job. i. How can we refer the ſelf ſame work to God, as author, to Satan as author, and to man as author of it, but that we muſt either excuſe Satan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of evil? Very eaſily: if firſt we look upon the end, why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpoſe of the Lord is by calamity to exerciſe the patience of his ſervant: The devil goeth about to drive him to deſpair. The Chaldees againſt right and law, ſeek gain of that which is another man's. Such diverſity in purpoſes, maketh great difference in the work. And in the manner of doing there is no leſs diverſity. The Lord leaveth his ſervant to Satan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chooſe for miniſters to execute it, he did leave and deliver to him to be driven to it. Satan with his venemous ſtings, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees who otherwiſe were perverſe of themſelves to do that miſchief; they furiouſly run to do wrong, and do bind and defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly ſaid, that Satan doth work in the reprobate, in whom he exerciſeth his kingdom, that is to ſay, the kingdom of wickedneſs. It is alſo ſaid that God worketh in them after his manner, becauſe Satan himſelf, foraſmuch as he is the inſtrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandment, turneth himſelf hither and thither to execute his juſt judgments. I ſpeak not here of God's univerſal moving, whereby as all creatures are ſuſtained, ſo from thence they take their effectual power of doing any thing. I ſpeak only of that ſpecial doing, which appeareth in every ſpecial act. We ſee therefore that it is no abſurdity, that one ſelf act be aſcribed to God, to Satan, and to man: but the diverſity in the end and manner of doing, cauſeth that therein appeareth the juſtice of God to be without fault, and alſo the wickedneſs of Satan and man diſcovereth itſelf to their reproach.

In the evil motions of wicked men God worketh after two ſorts, the one by withholding his grace, whereby they might be moved unto good, the other by uſing the miniſtry of Satan to ſtir, frame and incline their wills.

3. The antient writers in this point alſo, are ſometimes preciſely afraid, ſimply to confeſs the truth, becauſe they fear leſt they ſhould ſo open a window to wickedneſs, to ſpeak irreverently of the works of God. Which ſobriety as I embrace, ſo I think it nothing dangerous, if we ſimply hold what the ſcripture teacheth. Auguſtine himſelf ſometimes was not free from the ſuperſtition, as where he ſaith, (Lib. de prædeſt. & grat.) that hardening and blinding, pertain not to the work of God, but to fore-knowlege. But the phraſes of ſcripture allow not theſe ſubtilities, which phraſes do plainly ſhew, that there is therein ſomewhat elſe of God, beſides his foreknowlege. And Auguſtine himſelf in his fifth book againſt Julianus, goeth earneſtly about with a long proceſs to prove that ſins are not only of the permiſſion or ſufferance of God, but alſo of his power, that ſo former ſins might be puniſhed. Likewiſe, that which they bring forth, concerning permiſſion, is too weak to ſtand. It is oftentimes ſaid, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, and moveth their hearts as I have elſe where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is never expreſſed, if we flee to free foreknowlege or permiſſion. Therefore we anſwer that it is done after two manners. For firſt, whereas when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkneſs and blindneſs: whereas when his ſpirit is taken away, our hearts wax hard and become ſtones: whereas when his direction ceaſeth, they are wreſted into crookedneſs, it is well ſaid that he doth blind, harden and bow them from whom he taketh away the power to ſee, obey and do rightly. The ſecond manner, which cometh near to the property of the words, is that for the executing of his judgments by ſatan the miniſter of his wrath, he both appointeth their purpoſes to what end it pleaſeth him, and ſtirreth up their wills, and ſtrengtheneth their endeavours. So when Moſes (Deut. ii. 30.) rehearſeth that king Sihon did not give paſſage to the people, becauſe God had hardened his ſpirit, and made his heart obſtinate, he preſently adjoineth the end of his purpoſe: that he might (ſaith he) give him into our hands. Therefore becauſe it was God's will to have him deſtroyed, the making of his heart obſtinate, was God's preparation to his deſtruction.

4. After the firſt manner this ſeemeth to be ſpoken. He tak-

Proofs that God

worketh both the foreſaid ways in the hearts of wicked men.

eth away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and cauſeth them to wander in a wilderneſs where there is no way. Job xii. 10, and 24. Again, Iſa. lxiii. 17. O Lord, why haſt thou made us to err from thy ways? And hardned our heart from thy fear? Becauſe they judge rather of what ſort God maketh men by forſaking them, than how he performeth his work in them. But there are other teſtimonies that go further: as are theſe of the hardening of Pharaoh, Exod. iv. 21. and vii. 3. and x. 1. I will harden the heart of Pharaoh, that he do not hear you, and let the people go. Afterward he ſaith, that he hath made heavy and hardened his heart. Did he harden it in not ſuſtaining it? That is true indeed: but he did ſomewhat more, that he committed his heart to Satan to be confirmed with obſtinacy. Whereupon he had before ſaid, Exod. iii. 19. I will hold his heart. The people went out of Egypt, the inhabitants of that country came forth and met them like enemies. By whom were they ſtirred up? Truly Moſes affirmeth to the people, Deut. ii. 30. that it was the Lord that had hardened their hearts. And the prophet reciting the ſame hiſtory, ſaith, Pſal. cv. 25. that he turned their hearts, that they ſhould hate his people. Now can you not ſay, that they ſtumbled being left without the counſel of God? For if they be hardened and turned, then they are of purpoſe inclined to that ſelf thing. Moreover, ſo oft as it pleaſed him to puniſh the tranſgreſſors of the people, how did he perform his work in the reprobate? ſo as a man may ſee that the effectualneſs of working was in him, and they only did ſervice as miniſters. Wherefore, ſometimes he threatned, Iſa. v. 26. and vii. 18. that he would call them out with his whiſtle; ſometimes (Ezek. xii. 13. and xvii. 20. that they ſhould be like a net for him to entangle them; and ſometimes, Jer. l. 23. like a mallet to ſtrike the Iſraelites. But eſpecially he then declared how he is not idle then, when he called Sennacherib an ax, Iſa. x. 15. which was both directed and driven with his own hand to cut. Auguſtine (De prædeſt. ſanct.) in one place doth not amiſs appoint it after this ſort: that in as much as they ſin, it is their own: in as much as in ſinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that divided the darkneſs as pleaſeth him.

5. Now that the miniſtry of Satan is uſed to urge forward the reprobate, ſo oft as the Lord by his providence appointeth them to this or to that, may ſufficiently be proved, though it were but by one place only. For it is oftentimes ſaid in Samuel, that the evil ſpirit of the Lord, and an evil ſpirit from the Lord, did either violently carry or leave Saul. 1 Sam. xvi. and xviii. x. and xxix. To ſay that this ſpirit was the holy Ghoſt, is blaſphemous. Therefore the unclean ſpirit is called the ſpirit of God, becauſe it anſwereth at his commandment and power, being rather his inſtrument in doing, than an author of itſelf. This is alſo to be added withal, which Paul teacheth, 2 Theſſ. ii. that the efficacy of error and deceiving is ſent by God, that they who have not obeyed the truth, may believe lies. But there is always a wide difference in one ſelf ſame work, between that which the Lord doth, and that which Satan and the wicked go about. He maketh the evil inſtruments that he hath under his hand, and may turn them whither he pleaſes to ſerve his juſtice. They, in as much as they are evil, do produce in effect the wickedneſs that they have conceived by corruptneſs of nature. The reſt of ſuch things as ſerve for to vindicate the majeſty of God from ſlander, and to cut off all ſhifting from the wicked, are already ſet forth in the chapter concerning providence. For in this place my purpoſe was only to ſhew how Satan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

Not only in ſpiritual, but in the adminiſtration even of outward things, it is the ſpecial moving of God, that maketh his creatures anſwer unto our deſires in doing us good, or turning evil away from us.

6. Although we have before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what liberty man hath in thoſe actions which are neither juſt nor faulty in themſelves, and belong rather to the bodily than the ſpiritual life. Some in ſuch things have granted him free election, rather as I think becauſe they would not ſtrive about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainly to prove the ſame thing that they grant. As for me, although I confeſs that they who do hold that they have no power to righteouſneſs, do hold the ſame thing that is principally requiſite to ſalvation: yet I do think that this point alſo is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the ſpecial grace of the Lord, ſo oft as it cometh into our mind to chuſe that which is for our profit, ſo oft as our will inclineth unto it: again, ſo oft as our wit and mind avoideth that which otherwiſe would have hurt us. And the force of God's providence extendeth thus far, not only to make the ſucceſſes of things to come to paſs, as he ſhall foreſee to be expedient, but alſo to make the wills of men to tend to the accompliſhment of theſe. Truly, if we conſider in our underſtanding the adminiſtration of outward things, we ſhall think that they are ſo far under the will of man: but if we ſhall give credit to ſo many teſtimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in theſe things alſo rule the hearts of men, they ſhall compel us to yield our will ſubject to the ſpecial moving of God. Who did procure the good wills of the Egyptians to the Iſraelites, Exod xi. 3. to lend them all their moſt precious jewels? They would never have found in their hearts to have ſo done of their own accord. Therefore their hearts were more ſubject to the Lord, than ruled by themſelves. And truly if Jacob, Gen. xliii.. 14. had not been perſuaded that God put into men divers affections as pleaſeth him, he would not have ſaid of his ſon Joſeph, whom he thought to be ſome heathen Egyptian: 'God grant you to find mercy before this man.' As alſo the whole church confeſſeth in the Pſalm, Pſal. cvi. 46. that when it pleaſed God to have mercy upon it, he ſoftened the hearts of the cruel nations. Again, when Saul ſo waxed hot with anger, that he prepared him to war, the cauſe is expreſſed, 1 Sam. xi. 6. for that the Spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Abſalom's mind from embracing the counſel of Ahitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle, 2 Sam. xvii. 10. Who inclined Rehoboam to be perſuaded with the young mens advice? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the coming of Iſrael? Joſ. ii. 9. Truly, the harlot Rahab confeſſed, that it was done by God. Again, who threw down the hearts of Iſrael with dread, (Lev. xxvi. 36.) and fearfulneſs, but he that in the law (Deut. xxviii. 63.) threatened that he would give them a fearful heart.

Daily experience may incline man to confeſs that in common outward things the freedom of our choice is ruled and guided by the hand of God without which we could not of ourſelves ſee and attain that which is good, diſcern and avoid that which is evil.

7. Some man will take exception and ſay, that theſe are ſingular examples, to the meaſure whereof all things univerſally ought not to be reduced. But I ſay, that by theſe is ſufficiently proved that which I affirm, that God ſo oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his providence, even in outward things doth bow and turn the wills of men, and that their choice is not ſo free, but that God's will beareth rule over the freedom thereof. That thy mind hangeth rather upon the moving of God, than upon the freedom of thine own choice, this daily experience ſhall compel thee to think whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexity thy judgment and wit often faileth thee, in things not hard to be done thy courage fainteth: again, in things moſt obſcure by and by preſent advice is offered thee: in things great and perilous, thou haſt a courage overcoming all difficulty. And ſo do I expound that which Solomon ſaith: Prov. xx. 12. That the ear may hear, that the eye may ſee, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that he ſpeaketh not of the creation, but of the ſpecial grace of uſing them. And when he writeth, Prov. xxi. 1. that the Lord holdeth in his hand, and boweth whither he will, the heart of the the king as the ſtreams of waters: Truly under the example of one ſpecial ſort, he comprehendeth the whole generality. For if the will of any man be free from ſubjection, that pre-eminence principally belongeth to the will of a king, which uſeth as it were a kingdom upon the wills of others: but if the will of the king be ruled with the hand of God, no more ſhall our will be exempted from the ſame eſtate. Upon this point there is a notable ſaying of Auguſtine, (Lib de gratia & libero arb. ad Valent. cap. 20.) The ſcripture if it be diligently looked upon doth ſhew, that not only the good wills of men which he of evil maketh good, and ſo being made by himſelf doth direct to good actions and to eternal life, but alſo theſe wills that preſerve the creatures of the world, are ſo in the power of God, that he maketh them to be inclined whither he will and when he will, either to do ſervice, or to execute puniſhments, by a judgment moſt ſecret indeed, but the ſame moſt righteous.

The meaning of the queſtion that concerneth the freedom of man's will, is not whether he be often hindered or no from obtaining the things he wiſheth for, but whether his judgment and affection be ſo addicted unto evil that he cannot of himſelf

8. Here let the readers remember, that the power of man's will is not to be weighed by the ſucceſs of things, which ſome unſkilful men are prepoſterouſly wont to do. For they ſeem to themſelves to prove trimly and wittily that man's will is in bondage becauſe even the higheſt monarchs have not all things flowing after their own deſire. But this power whereof we ſpeak, is to be conſidered within man and not be meaſured by outward ſucceſs. For in the diſputation of free discern or desire that which is good.

free will, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impediments, perform and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in mind: but whether he have in every thing both a free election of judgment, and a free affection of will, which both if man have, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrowness of a ton, set full of sharp pricks, shall no less have free will than Augustus Cæsar, governing a great part of the world with the beck of his countenance.

CHAP. V.

A confutation of the objections that are went to be brought for defence of free-will.

The necessity of sinning doth not excuse us when we sin, both because Adam of his own accord made himself and his subject thereunto, and also for that he which necessarily sinneth, doth nevertheless sin voluntarily: which answereth their reason which argue in defence of free will. If sin be necessary, it ceaseth to be sin: if voluntary, then it may be avoided, and is not necessary.

IT might seem that we have said enough already, concerning the bondage of man's will, if they that with false opinion of liberty, labour to throw it down headlong, did not on the other side pretend certain reasons to attack our meaning. First, they heap up together divers absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing contrary to common reason: afterwards they set upon it with testimonies of scripture. But both these engines we shall beat back in order. If (say they) sin be of necessity, then ceaseth it to be sin: if it be voluntary, then may it be avoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to attack Augustine, with whose name we will not have them oppressed, till we have satisfied them concerning the matter itself. I deny therefore that sin ought the less to be imputed because it is necessary. I deny again that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be avoided, because it is voluntary. For if any man will dispute with God, and seek to escape from his judgment by this pretence, because he could not otherwise do. God hath that answer ready which we another place have spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bond-slaves to sin, can will nothing but evil. From whence cometh this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretend, but upon this, that Adam of his own accord made himself subject to the tyranny of the devil? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tied, for that the first man fell from his Creator. If all men be justly holden guilty of his falling away, let them not think themselves excused by necessity, in which it self they have a most evident cause of their damnation. And this I have above plainly set forth, and I have given an example in the devil himself, whereby it might appear, that he who necessarily sinneth, doth nevertheless willingly sin: as again in the elect angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also aptly teacheth, Ser. 81. in Cant. that we are therefore the more miserable because our necessity is voluntary: which yet holdeth us so subject unto it, that we are the bond-slaves of sin, as we have before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faulty, because from voluntary it straightway advanceth to free: but we have before proved, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subject to free election.

A second argument in defence of free will, wherein it is objected, that the denial thereof is repugnant to Gods punishing or rewarding men. But he punisheth them for their desert, though they sin of necessity, because they are voluntary in those bonds: and he rewardeth them of his own mercy, though, because their doing well is merely by grace they cannot deserve to be rewarded.

2. They further say, that if both virtues and vices proceed not of free choice of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laid upon man or reward given to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, In Epist. ad Ctesiphon. and Diacon. 1. yet I grant is in some places used by Chrysostom and Jerom. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Jerom himself hideth not, and also rehearseth it in their own words: if the grace of God work in us: then it, not we that labour, shall be crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are justly inflicted upon us, from whom the guiltiness of sin proceedeth. For what matters it, whether sin be done by free or bond judgment, so it be done by voluntary lust: specially since man is hereby proved a sinner, for that he is under the bondage of ſin? As to the rewards of righteouſneſs: a great abſurdity forſooth it is, if we confeſs that they depend rather upon God's goodneſs, than upon our own merits. How oft find we this thing repeated in Auguſtine: that God crowneth not our merit, but his own gifts: and that they are called rewards, not as due to our deſervings, but ſuch as are rendered to the graces already beſtowed upon us? Wiſely indeed they obſerve this, that now there remaineth no place for deſervings, if they come not out of the fountain of free-will: but where they reckon that which we ſay ſo far differing from truth, they are much deceived. For Auguſtine doubteth not, commonly to teach for neceſſary, that which they think ſo unlawful to confeſs, as where he ſaith, What be the merits of any men whatſoever they be? When he cometh, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from ſin? He findeth all men ſinners. Again, if that ſhall be rendered to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be puniſhed: what is done then? God hath not given thee puniſhment which is due, but giveth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be eſtranged from grace, boaſt of thy deſervings. Again: Thou art nothing of thyſelf, ſins are thine, but deſervings are God's, puniſhment is due to thee: and when reward cometh, he ſhall crown his own gifts and not thy deſervings. And in the ſame meaning in another place, he teacheth that grace is not of deſerving, but deſerving of grace. And a little after he concludeth, that God with his gifts goeth before all deſervings, that out of the ſame he may collect his own deſervings, and doth give altogether freely, becauſe he findeth nothing whereupon to ſave. But what need is there to make a long regiſter, when ſuch ſentences are often found in his writings? But the Apoſtle, 1 Cor. iv. 7. ſhall yet better deliver them from this error, if they hear what beginning he conveyeth the glory of the ſaints: whom he hath choſen, them he hath called; whom he hath called, them he hath juſtified; whom he hath juſtified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as witneſſeth the apoſtle, are the faithful crowned? becauſe by the Lord's mercy and not by their own endeavour they are both choſen and called and juſtified. Away therefore with this vain fear, that there ſhall no more be any deſervings, if free will ſhall not ſtand. For it is moſt fooliſh to be frighted away, and to flee from that to which the ſcripture calleth us. If (ſaith he) thou haſt received all things, why boaſteſt thou, as if thou hadſt not received them? 1 Cor. iv. 7. Thou ſeeſt that for the ſame cauſe he taketh all things from free will, to leave no place for deſervings: but as the goodneſs and liberality of God is manifold, and impoſſible to be exhauſted, thoſe graces which he beſtowed on us, becauſe he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our own virtues.

A third reaſon arguing that if man's will were not naturally free unto good & evil, but neceſſarily ſubject to the one or the othor, either all men ſhould be good or all men evil. As in truth all men are by nature evil, that ſome are made good, it is by grace and not through the freedom of their will.

3. Moreover they bring forth that which may ſeem to be taken out of Chryſoſtome: if this be not the power of our will, to chuſe good or evil, then they that are partakers of the ſame nature, muſt either all be evil or all be good. And not far from that is he, Ho. 22. in Gen. Lib. 2. cap. 4. Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about under the name of Ambroſe, when he maketh this argument, that no man ſhould ever depart from the faith, unleſs the grace of God did leave unto us the ſtate of mutability: wherein it is ſtrange that ſo excellent men fell beſide themſelves. For how chanceth it came not in Chryſoſtome's mind, that it is God's election that ſo maketh difference between men? As for us, we fear not to grant that which Paul, Rom. iii. 10. with great eagerneſs affirmeth, that all together are perverſe and given to wickedneſs: but with him we adjoin this that by God's mercy it cometh to paſs that all abide not in perverſeneſs. Therefore whereas naturally we are ſick of one diſeaſe, they only recover health upon whom it hath pleaſed God to lay his healing hand. The reſt whom by juſt judgment he paſſeth over, pine away in their own rottenneſs till they be conſumed. Neither is it of any other cauſe that ſome continue to the end, and ſome fall in their courſe begun. For continuance itſelf is the gift of God, which he giveth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaſeth himſelf. If a man aſk for a cauſe of the difference, why ſome continue conſtantly, and ſome fail by unſtedfaſtneſs, we know none other cauſe, but that God ſuſtaineth the one ſort ſtrengthened by his power that they periſh not, and doth not give the ſame ſtrength to the other ſort, that they may be examples of inconſtancy.

A fourth argument for free-will to prove that exhorting and threatening

4. Further they preſs us, ſaying, that exhortations are vainly taken in hand, that the uſe of admonitions is ſuperfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of

of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine he was compelled to write the book of Correption and grace. Where although he largely wipes them away, yet he bringeth his adversaries to this sum: O man, in the commandment learn what thou oughtest to do; in correction learn that by thine own fault thou hast it not: in prayer learn whence thou mayest receive that which thou wouldest have. Of the same argument in a manner is the book of the Spirit and Letter, where he teacheth that God measureth not the commandments of his law by the strength of man, but when he hath commanded that which is right, he freely giveth to his elect power to fulfil it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First we are not only in this cause, but also Christ and all the apostles. Now let the other look how they will get the mastery in striving, that match themselves with such adversaries. Doth Christ, who testifieth (John xv. 5.) that we can do nothing without him, any thing the less rebuke and chastise them, that without him did evil? Doth he less exhort every man to apply himself to good works? How severely doth Paul (2 Cor. iii. 3.) inveigh against the Corinthians for neglecting of charity? and yet he prayeth for charity to be given to the same men from God. He testifieth in the epistle to the Romans, (Rom. ix. 16.) that it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy, and yet he ceaseth not afterwards to admonish, to exhort, and to rebuke. Why do they not therefore speak to the Lord, that he do not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things which he himself alone can give, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to run, but in the mercy of God, going before them which now hath forsaken them? As if the Lord had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offereth itself readily to be found of them that reverently seek it, but how much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking do work of themselves, to the changing of the mind, Paul declareth, when he writeth, (1 Cor. iii. 7.) that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but the Lord that giveth the increase only, effectually worketh. So we see that Moses severally stablisheth the commandments of the law, and the prophets do sharply call upon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confess, that men do then only wax wise, when a heart is given them to understand, that it is the proper work of God to circumcise the hearts, and instead of stony hearts to give hearts of flesh, to write his law in the bowels of men: finally in renewing of souls to make that his doctrine may be effectual.

The use of exhortations both unto wicked and to godly men.

5. Wherefore then serve exhortations? For this purpose, if they be despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shall be for a witness unto them when they shall come to the judgment seat of the Lord, yea and even now already they beat and strike their conscience; for howsoever the most froward man laugheth them to scorn, yet can he not disprove them; but thou wilt say, what may silly miserable man do, if the softness of heart, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doth he excuse himself, when he can impute the hardness of heart to none but to himself? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mock them out if they might, are thrown down with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chief profit towards the faithful is to be considered: in whom as the Lord worketh all things by his spirit, so he leaveth not the instruments of his word, and useth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stand which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the prophet: (Ezek. xi. 19.) I will give them a new heart, that they may walk in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duty, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? Why are they moved with exhortation, since they can make no more haste than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? Why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, since they fell by the necessary weakness of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receive the self same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carp at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godly, but to reprove them of sin, they were even for that thing only to be counted not altogether unprofitable. Now forasmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they must avail to enflame the desire of goodness, to ſhake off ſluggiſhneſs, to take away the pleaſure and venemous ſweetneſs of wickedneſs, and on the other ſide to beget a hatred of the troubleſomeneſs thereof: who dare cavil that they are ſuperfluous? If any man require a plainer anſwer, let him take this: God worketh after two ſorts in his elect, inwardly by his ſpirit, outwardly by his word: By his ſpirit, by enlightening their minds, by framing their hearts to the love and keeping of juſtice, he maketh them a new creature; by his word, he ſtirreth them to deſire, to ſeek and attain the ſame renewing, by them both he ſheweth forth the effectual working of his hand, according to the proportion of his diſtribution. When he ſendeth the ſame word to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to ſerve for another uſe: that both for the preſent time they may be preſſed with witneſs of conſcience, and may againſt the day of judgment be made more inexcuſable. So though Chriſt pronounce (John vi. 44.) that no man cometh to him, but whom the Father draweth, and that the elect do come when they have heard and learned of the Father: yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whom it neceſſarily behoveth to be inwardly taught by the holy Ghoſt, that they may any thing profit. And Paul teacheth, (2 Cor. ii. 16.) that teaching is not in vain with the reprobate, becauſe it is to them the ſavour of death to death, but a ſweet ſavour to God.

The want of free will in man and of ability to perform the law doth not prove the law to be given in vain.

6. They are very laborious in heaping together of teſtimonies of ſcripture: and that they do of purpoſe, that when they cannot oppreſs us with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battles, when it cometh to hand ſtrokes, the weaker multitude how much pomp and ſhew ſoever it hath, is with a few ſtripes diſcomfited and put to flight: ſo ſhall it be very eaſy for us to overthrow them with all their rout. For, becauſe the places that they abuſe againſt us, when they are once divided into their orders, do meet upon a few ſpecial points, we ſhall with one anſwer ſatisfy many of them: therefore it ſhall not be needful to tarry upon diſſolving every one of them particularly. Their chief force they ſet in the commandments, which they think to be ſo tempered to our ſtrengths, that whatſoever is proved to be required by the one, it neceſſarily followeth, that it may be performed by the other. And therefore they run through every of the commandments, and by them do meaſure the proportion of our ſtrength. For (ſay they) either God mocketh us when he chargeth us with holineſs, godlineſs, obedience, chaſtity, love and meekneſs; and when he forbiddeth us uncleanneſs, idolatry, unchaſteneſs, wrath, robbery, pride, and ſuch like; or he requireth only thoſe things that are in our power. Now we may divide into three ſorts in manner all the commandments that they heap together. Some require our firſt converſion to God, ſome ſpeak ſimply of the keeping of the law; ſome command us to continue in the grace of God that we have received. Firſt let us ſpeak of them all in general, and then deſcend to the ſpecial ſorts. To extend the power of man to the commandments of the law, hath indeed long ago begun to be common, and hath ſome ſhew: but it proceeded from moſt rude ignorance of the law. For they that think it a hainous offence, if it be ſaid that the keeping of the law is impoſſible, do reſt forſooth upon this moſt ſtrong argument, that elſe the law was given in vain. For they ſpeak in ſuch ſort, as if Paul had no where ſpoken of the law. For, I beſeech them, what mean theſe ſayings, (Gal. iii. 10.) that the law was given becauſe of tranſgreſſions; (Rom. iii. 20.) That by the law is the knowlege of ſin: (Rom. vii. 7.) that the law maketh ſin: (1 Tim. i. 5.) that the law entered, that ſin might abound: was it meant that the law was to be limited to our ſtrength, leſt it ſhould be given in vain? or rather that it was ſet far above us, to convince our weakneſs? Truly by the ſame man's definition, (1 Theſ. iii. 12.) the end and fulfilling of the law is charity. But when he wiſheth the minds of the Theſſalonians to be filled with charity, he doth ſufficiently confeſs, that the law ſoundeth in our ears without profit, unleſs God inſpire the whole ſum thereof in our hearts.

The uſe which the law of God ſtandeth us in, although our weakneſs do not ſerve to fulfil it.

7. Truly, if the ſcripture did teach nothing elſe, but that the law is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeavours, I would alſo without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare unto us the manifold uſe of the law; it is convenient rather to conſider by that interpretation, what the law may do in man. For ſo much as concerneth this preſent cauſe: it teacheth that ſo ſoon as it hath appointed what we ought to do, the power to obey cometh of the goodneſs of God, and therefore moveth us to prayer, whereby we may require to have it given us. If there were only the commandment and no propromiſe, then were our ſtrengths to be tried whether they were ſufficient to anſwer the commandment, but ſince there are promiſes joined withal, which cry out, that not only our aid, but alſo all our whole power conſiſteth in the help of God's grace, they do teſtify enough and more, that we are altogether unfit, much more inſufficient to keep the law. Wherefore let this proportion of our ſtrength with the commandments of God's law be no more enforced, as if the Lord had meaſured the rule of juſtice, which he purpoſed to give in his law, according to the rate of our weakneſs. Rather by his promiſes we ought to conſider, how unready we are of ourſelves, who in every reſpect do ſo much need his grace. But who (ſay they) ſhall be perſuaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his law to ſtocks and ſtones? neither doth any man go about to perſuade it. For the wicked are neither ſtocks nor ſtones, when being taught by the law that their luſts do ſtrive againſt God, they are proved guilty by their own witneſs. Nor yet the godly, when being put in mind of their weakneſs, they fly unto grace. For which purpoſe ſerve theſe ſayings of Auguſtine. (In Enchir. ad Laur. de grat. & arb. cap. 16. Ho. 29. in Jo.) The Lord commandeth thoſe things that we cannot do, that we may know what we ought to aſk of him. Great is the profit of the commandments, if ſo much be given to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured Eph. ii. 4. Faith obtaineth that which the law commandeth, yea the law therefore commandeth, that faith may obtain that which was commanded by the law; yea, God requireth faith itſelf of us, and findeth not what to require unleſs he give what to find. Again, let God give what he commandeth, and command what he will.

Our firſt converſion unto God, our obedience when we are converted, and our continuance in obeying, commanded in the law, and yet his gift which doth command them.

8. That ſhall more plainly be ſeen in rehearſing the three ſorts of commandments which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commandeth both in the law and in the prophets, that we be converted unto him. Joel ii. 12. But on the other ſide the prophet anſwereth, Jer. xxxi. 18. convert me Lord, and I ſhall be converted; for after that thou didſt convert me, I repented, &c. He commandeth us to circumciſe the uncircumciſed ſkin of our heart; and by Moſes Deut. x. 16. he declareth that this circumciſion is done by his own hand. He every where requireth newneſs of heart, but in another place he teſtifieth that it is given by himſelf. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. That which God promiſeth (ſaith Auguſtine Lib. de Doct. Chriſt. 3.) we do not by free will or by nature, but he himſelf doth it by grace. And this is the ſame note, that he himſelf rehearſeth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we do juſtly make difference between the law and the promiſes, or between the commandments and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commandments whether man be able to do any thing toward obedience in ſuch ſort that they deſtroy the grace of God, by which the commandments themſelves are fulfilled. The commandments of the ſecond ſort are ſimple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to ſerve and cleave unto his will; to keep his commandments, to follow his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that do teſtify that it is his gift whatſoever righteouſneſs, holineſs, godlineſs, or purity may be had. Of the third ſort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithful, which is rehearſed by Luke, that they ſhould abide in the grace of God. But from whence that ſtrength of conſtancy is to be had, the ſame Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, ſaith he, brethren, (Eph. vi. 16.) be ye ſtrong through the Lord. In another place he forbiddeth us to grieve the ſpirit of God, (Eph. iv. 30.) wherewith we are ſealed up unto the day of our redemption. But becauſe the thing that he there requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wiſheth it to the Theſſalonians 1 Theſſ. ii. from God, namely that he would reckon them worthy of his holy calling: and fulfil the purpoſe of his goodneſs, and the work of faith in them. Likewiſe in the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. viii. 11. ſpeaking of alms, he frequently commendeth their pious and charitable diſpoſition, yet a little after, he thanketh God who put it in the heart of Titus to take upon him to give exhortation. If Titus could not ſo much as uſe the office of his mouth, to exhort others, but only ſo far as God did put unto him, how ſhould others have been willing to do, unleſs God himſelf had directed their hearts?

The ſhifts which defenders of free-will uſe to evade the foreſaid teſtimonies of ſcripture.

9. The craftier ſort of them do cavil at all theſe teſtimonies: becauſe there is nothing, ſay they, to hinder us from joining our endeavours or to hinder God from aſſiſting our weak and feeble efforts. They cite alſo places out of the prophets, where the effect of our converſion ſeemeth to be divided between God and ourſelves. Turn ye to me, and I will turn to you. What manner of aſſiſtance the Lord bringeth us, we have above ſhewed, and it is not needful here to repeat it. This one thing I would have granted to me, that it is vainly gathered, that there is required in us a power to fulfil the law, becauſe God doth command the obedience of it: For as much as it is evident, that for the fulfilling of all the commandments of God, the grace of the lawgiver is both neceſſary for us and promiſed unto us. Thereby then it appeareth that at the leaſt there is more required of us than we are able to pay. And that ſaying of Jeremiah, (Jer. xiii. 3.) cannot be wiped away with any cavil; that the covenant of God made with the ancient people was void, becauſe it was only literal, and that it could no otherwiſe be ſtabliſhed, than when the ſpirit cometh unto it, who frameth the heart to obedience. Neither doth that ſaying, turn ye to me, and I will turn unto you, favour their error. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he reneweth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by proſperity of things doth declare himſelf favourable and merciful; as by adverſity he ſometimes ſheweth his diſpleaſure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many ſorts of miſeries, and calamities, did complain that God was turned away from them; he anſwereth, that they ſhall not be deſtitute of his favour, if they return to uprightneſs of life, and to himſelf who is the pattern of righteouſneſs: therefore the place is wrongfully wreſted, and it is drawn to this purpoſe, that the work of our converſion ſhould ſeem to be divided between God and man. Theſe things we have comprehended ſo much the more briefly becauſe the proper place for this matter ſhall be where we treat of the law.

The uſe of conditional promiſes although it be not in our own power to fulfil the condition whereon they depend.

10. The ſecond ſort of their arguments is much like unto the firſt. They alledge the promiſes whereby God doth covenant with our will, of which ſort are, Amos v. 14. Seek good and not evil, and ye ſhall live. If ye will and do hear, ye ſhall eat the good things of the earth; but if ye will not, the ſword ſhall devour you, becauſe the Lord's mouth hath ſpoken it. Again, Iſa. v. 16. if thou put away thine abominations out of my ſight, then ſhalt thou not be driven out; (Jer. iv. 1.) If thou ſhalt obey diligently the voice of the Lord thy God, and obſerve and do all his commandments which I command thee this day, then the Lord thy God will ſet thee on high above all the nations of the earth. Deut. xxviii. 1. Lev. xxvi. 3. And on others the like. They do inconveniently and as it were in mockery think, that theſe benefits which the Lord doth offer in his promiſes, are aſſigned to our own will; unleſs it were in us to ſtabliſh them or make them void. And very eaſy it is to amplify this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lord doth cruelly mock us, when he pronounceth that his favour depends upon our will, if the ſame will be not in our own power: And that this liberality of God ſhould be a goodly thing forſooth, if he ſo ſet his benefits before us, that we have no power to uſe them; and a marvellous aſſuredneſs of his promiſes, which depend upon a thing impoſſible, ſo as they might never be fulfilled. But of ſuch promiſes as have a condition adjoined, we will ſpeak in another place: ſo that it ſhall be plain, that there is no abſurdity in the impoſſible fulfilling of them. And for ſo much as concerneth this place: I deny that God doth unkindly mock us, when he moveth us to deſerve his benefits, whom he knoweth to be utterly incapable of doing it. For whereas the promiſes are offered both to the faithful and to the wicked, they have their uſe with both ſorts. As God with his commandments pricketh the conſciences of the wicked, that they ſhould not too ſweetly take pleaſure in their ſins, without any remembrance of his judgments: ſo in his promiſes he doth in a manner take them to witneſs, how unworthy they are of his goodneſs. For who can deny that it is moſt rightful and convenient, that the Lord do good to them of whom he is honoured, and puniſh the deſpiſers of his majeſty, according to his ſeverity? Therefore God doth well and orderly when in his promiſes he adjoineth this condition to the wicked that are bound with the fetters of ſin, that they ſhall then only enjoy his benefits, if they depart from their wickedneſs: or for this purpoſe only, that they may underſtand that they are worthily excluded from theſe things, that are due to the true worſhippers of God. Again, becauſe he ſeeketh by all means to ſtir up the faithful to call upon his grace, it ſhall not be inconvenient, if he attempt the ſame thing alſo by promiſes, which we have ſhewed that he hath done to great profit with commandments towards them. Being informed of the will of God, by his commandments, we are put in mind of our miſery, which do with all our heart too far diſſent from the

ſame, and we are with all incited to call upon his ſpirit, by which we may be directed into the right path. But becauſe our ſluggiſhneſs is not ſufficiently ſharpened with commandments, there are added promiſes which with a certain ſweetneſs may allure us to the love of them. And that the more deſire that we have of righteouſneſs, we may be the more fervent to ſeek the favour of God. Lo how in theſe requeſts (if you will; If you ſhall hear,) the Lord neither giveth us power to will nor to hear, and yet mocketh us not for our want of power.

The unthankful may juſtly be upbraided with refuſing the offer that God doth make of all good things, though without his grace which offereth they have no power to attain the things that are offered.

11. The third ſort of their arguments, hath alſo great affinity with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reproacheth the unthankful people, and ſaith that they themſelves only were the cauſe that they received not of his tender love all kind of good things. Of which ſort are the places (Num. xiv. 43.) The Amalekites and the Canaanites are before you, with whoſe ſword you ſhall fall, becauſe ye would not obey the Lord, becauſe I called and ye anſwered not, I will do to this houſe as I did to Silo. Again, (Jer. xxxii. 13.) this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lord their God, nor hath received diſcipline, therefore it is caſt away from the Lord. Again, (Jer. xxxii.) becauſe ye have hardened your heart and would not obey the Lord, all theſe evils are happened unto you. How (ſay they) could ſuch reproaches be laid againſt them who might readily anſwer? As for us we loved proſperity, and feared adverſity. But whereas for to obtain the one and avoid the other we obeyed not the Lord, nor hearkened to his voice; this was the cauſe thereof, for that it was not at our liberty ſo to do, becauſe we were ſubject to the dominion of ſin. Vainly therefore are theſe evils laid to our charge, which it was not in our power to avoid. But leaving the pretence of neceſſity, wherein they have but a weak and poor defence, I aſk of them whether they can purge themſelves of all fault, For if they be found guilty of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cauſe reproach them, that it came to paſs, by their perverſeneſs, that they felt not the effects of his clemency. Let them anſwer therefore, whether they can deny, that their froward will was the cauſe of their ſtubbornneſs. If they find the ſource of the evil within themſelves, why gape they to find out foreign cauſes, that they might ſeem not to have been authors of their own deſtruction? But if it be true that by their own fault and none others, ſinners are both deprived of the benefits of God, and chaſtiſed with puniſhments, then is there great reaſon why they ſhould hear theſe reproaches at the mouth of God; that if they go obſtinately forward in their faults, they may learn in their miſeries rather to accuſe and abhor their own wickedneſs, than to blame God of unjuſt cruelty: that if they have not caſt off all willingneſs to learn, they may be weary of their ſins, by the deſervings whereof they ſee themſelves miſerable and undone, and may return into the way, and acknowledge the ſame with earneſt confeſſion which the Lord rehearſeth in chiding them. For which purpoſe it appeareth by the ſolemn prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth chapter, that thoſe chidings of the prophets which are alledged, did avail with the godly. Of the firſt uſe we ſee an example in the Jews, to whom Jeremiah is commanded to declare the cauſe of their miſeries, whereas yet it ſhould not have fallen otherwiſe than the Lord had foretold. (Jer. vii. 27.) Thou ſhalt ſpeak all theſe words unto them, but they will not hearken to thee: thou ſhalt alſo call unto them, but they will not anſwer thee. To what end then did they ſing to deaf men? that being even loath and unwilling, yet they ſhould underſtand that it was true that they heard, that it were wicked ſacrilege if they ſhould lay upon God the blame of their evils which were to be found in themſelves. By theſe few ſolutions thou mayeſt eaſily deliver thyſelf from the infinite heap of teſtimonies, which in order to erect an image of free-will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commandments as out of the proteſtations againſt the profeſſors of the law. It is to their reproach ſpoken in one of the pſalms concerning the Jews: (Pſal. lxxviii. 8.) A froward generation that have not made their heart ſtraight. Alſo in another pſalm (Pſal. lv. 8.) the prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that becauſe all the fault of obſtinacy remaineth in the perverſeneſs of men. But it is fooliſhly collected from hence, that the heart is pliable to either ſide, the preparing whereof is only of God. The prophet ſaith; cix. 112. I have inclined my heart to keep thy mandments, becauſe he had willingly and with a chearful earneſt affection of mind addicted himſelf to God, and yet he doth not boaſt himſelf to be the author of his own inclination, which he confeſſeth in the ſame pſalm to be the gift of God. Therefore we muſt bear in mind the admonition of Paul, (Phil. ii. 12.) where he biddeth the faithful to work out their own ſalvation with fear and trembling, becauſe it is the Lord that worketh both to will and to do. Indeed he aſſigneth them offices, to be doing, that they ſhould not give themſelves to ſluggiſhneſs of the fleſh; but in that he commandeth them to have fear and carefulneſs, he ſo humbleth them, that they may remember that the ſame thing which they are commanded to do, is the proper work of God, wherein plainly he expreſſeth, that the faithful work paſſively, as I may ſo call it, in ſo much as power is miniſtred them from heaven, that they ſhould claim nothing at all to themſelves. Wherefore when Peter (2 Pet. i. 5.) exhorteth us that we ſhould add power in faith, he granteth not unto us a ſecond office, as if we ſhould do any thing ſeparately by ourſelves, but only he awaketh the ſlothfulneſs of the fleſh, wherewith commonly faith it ſelf is choaked. To the ſame purpoſe ſeemeth that ſaying of Paul (2 Theſſ. i. 9.) Quench not the ſpirit; for ſlothfulneſs doth frequently creep upon the faithful, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their own choice to cheriſh the light being offered them, his ignorance ſhall be eaſily confuted; becauſe the ſelf-ſame diligence that Paul requireth, (2 Cor. vii.) proceeds only from God. For we are alſo frequently enjoined to cleanſe ourſelves from all filthineſs; whereas the holy Ghoſt doth claim to himſelf alone the office of making holy. Finally that by way of granting, the ſamething is conveyed to us that properly belongeth to God, is manifeſt from the words of John; (John xvii. 15.) whoſoever is of God, ſaveth himſelf. The advancers of free-will take hold of this ſaying, as if we were ſaved partly by the power of God, and partly by our own: as though we had not from heaven the very ſame ſafe keeping, whereof the Apoſtle maketh mention. For which cauſe, Chriſt alſo prayeth his Father, (John xvii. 15.) to ſave us from evil, and we know that the godly, while they war againſt Satan, do get the victory by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commanded us, to purify our ſouls in the obedience of truth, he ſoon after adds as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghoſt.) 1 Pet. i. 22. Finally, how all mans ſtrength is of no force in the ſpiritual combat, John briefly ſheweth, when he ſaith, (1 John iii. 9.) that they who are begotten of God, cannot ſin, becauſe the ſeed of God abideth in them. And in another place, (1 John v. 4.) he rendereth a reaſon why: for that our faith is the victory that overcometh the world.

12. Yet there is alledged a teſtimony out of the law of Moſes, which ſeemeth to be much againſt our ſalvation. For after the publiſhing of the law, he proteſteth unto the people in this manner. (Deut. xxx. 11.) The commandment that I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither far off: it is not in heaven, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou ſhouldſt do it. Truly, if this be taken to be ſpoken of the bare commandments, I grant they be of no ſmall weight to this preſent matter. For though it were eaſy to mock it out with ſaying, that here is ſpoken not of the eaſineſs and readineſs of obſervation, but of knowlege; yet even ſo, peradventure it would alſo leave ſome doubt. But the apoſtle who is no doubtful expoſitor, taketh away all doubt from us, who affirmeth that Moſes here ſpake of the doctrine of the goſpel. (Rom. x. 8.) But if any obſtinate man will ſay, that Paul violently wreſted thoſe words, that they might be drawn to the goſpel, although his boldneſs ſo to ſay ſhall not be without impiety, yet is there ſufficient matter beſide the authority of the apoſtle to convince him withal. For if Moſes ſpake of the commandments only, then he puffed up the people with a moſt vain confidence. For what ſhould they elſe have done, but thrown themſelves down headlong, if they had taken upon them the keeping of the law by their own ſtrength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that ſo ready eaſineſs to keep the law, where there is no acceſs unto it, but by a headlong fall to deſtruction? Wherefore there is nothing more certain, than that Moſes in theſe words did mean the covenant of mercy, which he had publiſhed together with the ſtrict demand of the law. For in a few verſes before (Deut. xxx. 8.) he had taught, that our hearts muſt be circumciſed by the hand of God, that we may love him. Therefore he placed that eaſineſs, whereof he ſoon after ſpeaketh, not in the ſtrength of man, but in the help and ſuccour of the holy Ghoſt, who performeth his work mightily in our weakneſs. Although the place is not ſimply to be underſtood of the com-

When Moſes doth ſeem to intimate a kind of readineſs in man to fulfil the law of God: he meaneth by the law the promiſes of the goſpel, which are eaſily received not in reſpect of our hability but of God's mercy which worketh mightily in framing our hearts.

commandments, but rather of the promiſes of the goſpel, which are ſo far from ſtabliſhing a power in us to obtain righteouſneſs, that they utterly overthrow it. Paul conſidering that ſame, proveth by this teſtimony, that ſalvation is offered us in the goſpel, not under that hard and impoſſible condition, wherewith the law dealeth with us, that is, that they only ſhall attain it who have fulfilled all the commandments, but under a condition that is eaſy, ready, and plain to come unto. Therefore this teſtimony maketh nothing to challenge freedom to the will of man.

That God is ſaid to withdraw himſelf, and to try wehther men will ſeek after him, is no argument that of themſelves they can ſeek unto him: but that he by hiding his face doth bring them to ſee that without his grace they are nothing.

13. There are alſo certain other places wont to be objected, whereby is ſhewed that God ſometime, withdrawing the ſuccour of his grace, trieth men, and waiteth to ſee to what end they will apply their endeavours, as is that place in Hoſea (Hoſ. v. 14.) I will go to my place till they put it in their heart and ſeek my face. It were a fond thing (ſay they) if the Lord ſhould conſider whether Iſrael would ſeek his face, unleſs their minds were pliable that they might after their own will incline themſelves to the one ſide or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly uſed with God in the prophets, to make a ſhew as if he did deſpiſe and caſt away his people, till they have amended their life. But what will the adverſaries gather out of ſuch threatenings? If they mean to gather, that the people being forſaken of God, may purpoſe their own ſalvation: all the ſcripture ſhall cry out againſt them in ſo doing. If they confeſs that the grace of God is neceſſary to converſion, why ſtrive they with us? But they ſo grant it neceſſary, that ſtill they will have man's power preſerved unto him. How prove they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aſide from man, and to look what he will do being given over and left to himſelf, and another thing to help his little ſtrength after the meaſure of his weakneſs. What then (will ſome man ſay) do theſe manners of ſpeaking mean? I anſwer that they are as much in effect, as if God had ſaid; Foraſmuch as I prevail nothing with this ſtubborn people by admoniſhing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw myſelf a while: and ſit ſtill and ſuffer them to be afflicted: I will ſee if at length, after long miſeries, they will begin to remember me, to ſeek my face. The Lord's going far away, ſignifieth the taking away of prophecy: his looking what men will do, ſignifieth that he keeping ſilence, and as it were hiding himſelf, doth for a time exerciſe them with diverſe afflictions. Both theſe things he doth to humble us the more. For we ſhould ſooner be dulled than amended with the ſcourges of adverſity, unleſs he did frame us to that tractableneſs by his ſpirit. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obſtinate ſtubborneſs, doth for a time leave us (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to give us a certain preſence of himſelf) and doth make a proof what we would do in his abſence, it is falſely gathered from hence that there is any ſtrength of free will that he ſhould behold and try, foraſmuch as he doth it to no other end, but to drive us to acknowlege our own being nothing.

As the evil works which we do are ours, ſo the good works which are termed ours we do however, ſo that to do is ours by nature, but to do well by grace, which is given us from above.

14. They bring alſo for their defence the continual manner of ſpeaking, that is uſed both in the ſcriptures and in the converſation of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no leſs ſaid that we do the thing that is holy and pleaſing to God, than that we commit ſins. But if ſins be juſtly imputed to us, as proceeding from us, truly in righteous actions alſo ſomewhat by the ſame reaſon ought to be aſſigned unto us. For it were abſurd to ſay that we do thoſe things, to the doing of which, being utterly incapable of our own inclination, we are moved by God like ſtones. Therefore though we aſcribe the principal part to the grace of God, yet theſe ways of ſpeaking do ſhew that our endeavour hath alſo yet a ſecond part. If that thing only were ſtill enforced, that good works are called ours, I would object again, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to have given us of God. What will they get by the title of poſſeſſion, but that by the bountifulneſs and free gift of God, the ſame thing becometh ours, which otherwiſe is not due unto us? Therefore either let them laugh at the ſame abſurdity in the Lord's prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good works are called ours, in which we have no property, but by the liberality of God. But this is ſomewhat ſtronger, that the ſcripture frequently affirms that we our ſelves do worſhip God, obey the law and apply good works. Since theſe are the duties properly belonging to the mind and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to us, unless there were a certain communicating of our endeavour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily unwind ourselves, if we well consider the manner how the spirit of the Lord worketh in the godly. The similitude wherewith they enviously press us is from the purpose, for who is so fond to think that the moving of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing follow from our doctrine. We reckon among the natural powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will and not to will, to endeavour and to resist, that is to allow vanity and to refuse perfect goodness, to will evil and to be unwilling to good, to endeavour ourselves to wickedness, and to resist righteousness. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to use that perverseness as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that he by an evil hand may execute his good work. Shall we then compare a wicked man that serveth the power of God, when he laboureth only to obey his own lust, to a stone that being thrown by the violence of another, is carried neither with moving nor sense nor will of his own? We see how much difference there is. But what doth he in good things, of which is our principal question? when he erecteth his kingom in them, he by his spirit restraineth man's will, that it be not carried up and down with wandering lusts, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be inclined to holiness and righteousness, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth aud directeth it to the rule of his righteousness; and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth stablish and confirm it with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine saith: Thou wilt say unto me: then are we wrought upon and do not work. Yea, thou both workest and art wrought, and thou workest well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirit of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that work, and giveth himself the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that man's working is not taken away by the moving of the holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodness. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of help, may be gathered that we also do work somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did give any thing separately to us: but because he would not cherish slothfulness in us, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he said a little before, unless God help us, we shall not be able to overcome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15. Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speak of regeneration) is the rule of the spirit, to direct and govern the will of man. And it cannot govern it, unless it correct it, reform it, and renew it (from whence we say that the beginning of regeneration is that that which is ours might be destroyed) and unless it move it, stir it, drive it forward, carry it, and hold it. Whereupon we do truly say, that all the actions that proceed from it, are wholly the only work of the same grace. In the mean time we deny not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things do stand very well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultiness and perverseness thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of justice: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth utterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrary, but that we may well be said to do the same thing that the Spirit of God doth in us, although our own will do of itself give us toward it nothing at all that may be separated from his grace. And therefore we must keep that in mind which we have elsewhere alleged out of Augustine, that some do in vain labour to find in the will of man some good thing that is properly his own. For whatsoever mixture men study to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would mingle wine with dirty and bitter water. But although whatsoever good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the mere inspiration of the Holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in us to will, it is not without cause said, that we do those things whereof God challengeth the praise to himself. First, because it is ours whatsoever by his goodness he worketh in us, so that we understand it to be not of ourselves: and then because the mind is ours the will is ours, the endeavour is ours, which are by him directed to good.

Those things which the grace of the Spirit worketh in us we our selves are said to do, because the faculties whereby we work and the very act of working are ours, although the moving and the framing them to good be wholly and merely his.

beſide theſe, that they ſcrape together here and there, ſhall not much trouble even mean wits that have well conceived only the ſolutions above ſaid. They allege that ſaying out of Geneſis, Gen. iv. 7. Thine appetite ſhall be under thee, and thou ſhalt bear rule over it. Which they expound of ſin, as if the Lord did promiſe to Cain, that the force of ſin ſhould not get the upper hand in his mind, if he would labour in ſubduing of it. But we ſay, that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be ſpoken of Abel. For there God's purpoſe was to reprove the wickedneſs of the envy that Cain had conceived againſt his brother. And that he doth two ways. One, that in vain he imagined miſchief to excel his brother in God's ſight, before whom no honour is given but unto righteouſneſs: the other, that he was too much unthankful for the benefit of God which he had already received, who could not endure his brother, although he had him ſubject under his authority. But leſt we ſhould ſeem therefore to embrace this expoſition, becauſe the other is againſt us: let us admit that God ſpake of ſin. If it be ſo, then God either promiſeth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he command, then have we already ſhewed, that thereby followeth no proof of the power of man. If he promiſe, where is the fulfilling of the promiſe? For Cain became ſubject to ſin, over which he ſhould have had dominion. They will ſay, that in the promiſe was included a ſecret condition, as if it had been ſaid, that he ſhould have the victory if he would ſtrive for it. But who will receive theſe crooked compaſſes? For if this dominion be meant of ſin, then no man can doubt that it is ſpoken by way of commandment, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be above our power. Although both the matter itſelf and the order of grammar do require, that there be a compariſon made of Cain and Abel, becauſe the elder brother ſhould not have been ſet behind the younger, unleſs he had become worſe by his own wicked doing.

St. Paul's words ſpeaking in one place of man's will and God's mercy, in another of their labour with God

17. They uſe alſo the teſtimony of the apoſtle, who ſaith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Rom. ix. 16. Whereby they gather that there is ſomewhat by man's will and endeavour, which of itſelf though it be weak, being aſſiſted by the mercy of God is not without proſperous ſucceſs. But if they did ſoberly weigh what matter Paul there treateth of, they would not ſo unadviſedly abuſe this ſentence.

whoſe ſervice God uſeth, foully abuſed by maintainers of free will.

I know that they may bring forth Origin and Jerom for maintainers of their expoſition: and I could on the other ſide ſet Auguſtin againſt them, (Lib. 7. in Epiſt. ad Rom.) But what they have thought it maketh no matter to us, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth (Jerom dial. in Pela.) that ſalvation is prepared only for them, to whom the Lord vouchſafeth to grant his mercy: and that ruin and deſtruction is prepared for all thoſe that he hath not choſen. He had under the example of Pharaoh declared the ſtate of the reprobate, and had alſo confirmed the certainty of free election by the teſtimony of Moſes, I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. If it be thus underſtood, that will or endeavour are not ſufficient, becauſe they are too weak for ſo great a weight, that which Paul ſaith, had not been aptly ſpoken: therefore away with theſe ſubtilties: to ſay, It is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, therefore there is ſome will, there is ſome running. For Paul's meaning is more ſimply, thus. It is not will, it is not running that gets us the way to ſalvation, herein is only the mercy of God. For he ſpeaketh no otherwiſe in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, Tit. iii. 4. that the goodneſs and kindneſs of God appeareth, not by works of righteouſneſs which we have done, but for his infinite mercy. They themſelves that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is ſome will and ſome running, becauſe he ſaid, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not give me leave to reaſon after the ſame faſhion, that we have done ſome good works, becauſe Paul ſaith, that we have not attained the goodneſs of God by the good works that we have done. If they ſee a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they ſhall perceive that their own is not without the like deceit. For that is a ſure reaſon that Auguſtine, (Epiſt. 107. ad Vitalem) reſteth upon, if it were therefore ſaid, that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, becauſe neither the will nor the running is ſufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrary part that it is not of the mercy of God, becauſe it alone worketh not. Since this ſecond is an abſurdity, Auguſtine doth juſtly conclude, clude, that this is ſpoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, unleſs it be prepared of the Lord, not that but we ought both to will and to run, but becauſe God worketh both in us. No leſs unaptly do ſome wreſt that ſaying of Paul: 1 Cor. iii. 9. We are workers with God, which without doubt ought to be reſtrained only to the miniſters: and that they are called workers with him, nor that they bring any thing of themſelves, but becauſe God uſeth their ſervice, after that he hath made them meet and furniſhed with neceſſary gifts.

18. They bring forth Eccleſiaſticus, who, as it is not unknown is a writer whoſe authority is doubted. But although we refuſe it not (which yet we may lawfully do) what doth he teſtify for free will? He ſaith, Eccl. xv. 14. that man ſo ſoon as he was created, was left in the hand of his own counſel: that commandments were given him, which if he obſerved, he ſhould again be preſerved by them: that before man was ſet life and death, good and evil: that whatſoever he would, ſhould be given him. Be it ſo, that man received from his creation power to obtain either life or death. What if on the other ſide we anſwer that he loſt it? Truly my mind is not to ſpeak againſt Solomon, Eccl. vii. 29. who affirmeth that man at the beginning was created upright, and he ſought unto himſelf many inventions. But becauſe man in ſwerving loſt as it were by ſhipwreck both himſelf and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is given to his firſt creation belongeth to his nature when corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I anſwer not to them only, but alſo to Eccleſiaſticus himſelf, whatſoever he be, If thou mean to inſtruct man, to ſeek within himſelf power to attain ſalvation, thy authority is not of ſo great force with us, that it may be any prejudice, be it never ſo ſmall, againſt the undoubted word of God. But if thou only ſtudy to reſtrain the malice of the fleſh, which in laying the blame of her own evils upon God, uſeth to ſeek a vain defence for itſelf, and therefore thou anſwereſt, that uprightneſs was given unto men, whereby it may appear that himſelf was cauſe of his own deſtruction, I willingly agree unto it: ſo that again thou agree in this with me, that now by his own fault he is ſpoiled of thoſe ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that we confeſs together, that now he more needeth a phyſician than a defender.

The will of man through the wound of original ſin was not left half dead and half alive, as ſome would gather by the parable of the wayfaring man, whom thieves left lying in the high-way.

19. Yet they have nothing oftner in their mouth than the parable of Chriſt (Luke x. 30.) of the wayfaring man, whom thieves laid abroad half dead in the way. I know that it is commonly thought almoſt by all writers, that the calamity of mankind is repreſented under the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon do our adverſaries gather an argument, that man is not ſo maimed with the robbery of ſin and the devil, but that he keepeth ſtill remaining the leavings of his former good things, foraſmuch as it is ſaid, that he was left half alive. For where is that half life, unleſs ſome portion both of right reaſon and will remained? Firſt, if I would not give place to their allegory, I beſeech you, what would they do? For there is no doubt that it was deviſed by the fathers beſide the natural ſenſe of the Lord's words. Allegories ought to go no further than they have the rule of ſcripture going before them: ſo far is it off that they be by themſelves ſufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reaſons whereby I can, if I pleaſe, overthrow this device, for the word of God leaveth not to man half a life, but teacheth that he is utterly dead, foraſmuch as concerneth bleſſed life. And Paul, Eph. ii. 5. when he ſpeaketh of our redemption, doth not ſay that we were healed when we were half dead and half alive, but that we were raiſed up again, when we were dead. He calleth not upon them that are half alive, to receive the light of Chriſt, but them that ſleep and are buried. And in like manner ſpeaketh the Lord himſelf, John v. 25. when he ſaith, that the hour is come when the dead ſhall riſe again at his voice. With what face would they ſet this light alluſion againſt ſo many plain ſentences? But let this allegory have the force of a certain teſtimony, yet what ſhall they wring out of us thereby? Man is half alive, therefore he hath ſomewhat left ſafe. I grant he hath a wit capable of underſtanding, although it pierce not to the heavenly and ſpiritual wiſdom: he hath true judgment of honeſty: he hath ſome feeling of the Godhead, howbeit that he attain not the true knowlege of God. But to what purpoſe come all theſe things? Truly they bring not to paſs that the ſame ſaying of Auguſtine be taken from us, which is alſo approved by common conſent of the ſchools: that after man's fall the freely given good things, whereupon ſalvation dependeth, are taken away from him, and that his natural gifts are corrupted and defiled. Let therefore this truth remain with us undoubted, which which can be ſhaken by no engines, that the mind of man is ſo eſtranged from the righteouſneſs of God, that it conceiveth, coveteth, and enterpriſeth all wickedneſs, filthineſs, uncleanneſs, and miſchief: that his heart is ſo thoroughly ſoaked in poiſon of ſin, that it can breathe out nothing but corrupt ſtink: But if at any time they do utter any goodneſs in ſhew, yet ſtill the mind remaineth always wrapped in hypocriſy and deceitful crookedneſs, and the heart entangled with inward perverſeneſs.

CHAP. VI.

That man being loſt, muſt ſeek for redemption in Chriſt.

Except we know the fatherly goodneſs of God ſhining in the face of Jeſus Chriſt, which knowlege is attained unto by the goſpel, other knowing of God, ſo far forth as he may be known by his creatures, neither hath been to any one's ſalvation ſince the fall of Adam, neither can be to ours ſufficiently available.

SINCE all mankind hath periſhed in the perſon of Adam, that excellency and nobility of beginning which we have ſpoken of, would ſo little profit us, that it would rather turn to our greater ſhame, till God appear the redeemer in the perſon of his only begotten Son, which acknowlegeth not men defiled and corrupted with ſin to be his work. Therefore ſince we are fallen from life into death, all that knowlege of God the creator whereof we have treated, were unprofitable, unleſs there followed alſo faith, ſetting forth God a father unto us in Chriſt. Truly this was the natural order that the frame of the world ſhould be a ſchool unto us to learn godlineſs, from whence might be made a paſſage for us to eternal life and perfect felicity: but ſince our apoſtacy, whitherſoever we turn our eyes upward and downward, the curſe of God ſtill preſenteth itſelf unto our ſight, which while it poſſeſſeth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, muſt needs overwhelm our own ſouls with deſperation. For although God's will is that his fatherly favour toward us do ſtill many ways appear: yet by beholding of the world we cannot gather that he is our father when our conſcience inwardly pricketh us, and ſheweth that there is in ſin juſt cauſe of forſaking, why God ſhould not account or reckon us for his children. Beſide that there is in us both ſlothfulneſs and unthankfulneſs: becauſe both our minds, as they be blinded, do not ſee the truth, and alſo as all our ſenſes be perverſe, we maliciouſly defraud God of his glory. Therefore we muſt come to that ſaying of Paul, 1 Cor. i. 22. becauſe in the wiſdom of God the world knew not God by wiſdom, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſs of preaching to ſave them that believe. The wiſdom of God he calleth this honourable ſtage of heaven and earth, furniſhed with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof we ought wiſely to have known God. But becauſe we ſo ill profited therein, he calleth us back to the faith of Chriſt, which for that it ſeemeth fooliſh, the unbelievers do diſdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the croſs do not agree with man's wit, yet ought we humbly to embrace it, if we deſire to return to God our Creator and maker, that he may begin again to be our father. Truly ſince the fall of the firſt man, no knowlege of God availed to ſalvation, without the mediator. For Chriſt ſpeaketh not of his own age only, but comprehendeth all ages, when he ſaith, John xvii. 3. that this is the eternal life, to know the father the one true God, and him whom he hath ſent Jeſus Chriſt. And ſo much the fouler is their ſluggiſhneſs, who take upon them to ſet open heaven to all prophane and unbelieving men, without his grace, whom the ſcripture every where teacheth to be the only gate whereby we enter into ſalvation. But if any will reſtrain that ſaying of Chriſt only to the publiſhing of the goſpel, we have in readineſs wherewith to confute him. For this hath been a common ſentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are eſtranged from God, and pronounced accurſed, and the children of wrath, cannot pleaſe God. And here may be alſo alleged that which Chriſt anſwered to the woman of Samaria, John iv. 21. Ye worſhip ye know not what, but we worſhip that which we know; becauſe ſalvation is from the Jews. In which words he both condemneth of falſhood all the religions of the Gentiles, and alſo aſſigneth a reaſon why, for that the redeemer was promiſed under the law only to the choſen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worſhip ever pleaſed God, but that which had reſpect unto Chriſt. For which cauſe alſo Paul affirmeth, Eph. ii. 12. that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and void of the hope of life. Now whereas John teacheth that life was from the be-beginning in Christ, and that all the world fell from it, we must return to the same fountain Christ. And therefore Christ, insomuch as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himself to be the life. And truly the entrance of heaven belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meet that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the only begotton son. And John plainly testifieth, that they who believe in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of faith in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to have touched it by the way.

That the fathers under the law never promised any happiness to the church otherwise than by Christ.

2. And therefore God never shewed himself merciful to his ancient people, nor ever did put them in any hope of grace without the mediator. I omit to speak of the sacrifices of the law, wherein the faithful were openly and plainly taught, that salvation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was performed by Christ alone. Only this I say, that the blessed and happy state of the church hath been always grounded upon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his covenant, yet doth Paul, Gal. iii. 16. wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seed in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we know that not all they were reckoned his seed, that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speak nothing of Ishmael and others) how came it to pass that of the two sons of Isaac, that is, Esau and Jacob, brethren born at one birth, while they were yet together in their mother's womb, that one was chosen, the other refused? Yea, how came it to pass that the elder was rejected and the younger only took place? And how also came it to pass, that the greater part should be forsaken? It appeareth therefore that the seed of Abraham was principally reckoned in one person, and that the promised salvation did never stand sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did depend upon the grace of the mediator. Which though it be not in so plain words expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly known to all the godly For before that there was any king created among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel, speaking of the felicity of the godly, even then said thus in her song: 1 Sam. ii. 10. God shall give strength to his king, and shall exalt the horn of his anointed. In which words she meaneth that God shall bless his church. Wherewith also agreeth the oracle that is within a little after adjoined: the priest whom I shall appoint shall walk before mine anointed. Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly Father was to have the lively image of Christ to be seen in David and his posterity. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the fear of God, he biddeth them to kiss the son. Psal. ii. 12. Wherewith this saying of the gospel also agreeth: He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father. John v. 23. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdom decayed: yet it behoved the covenant to stand which God had made in David and his successors: as also he said by the prophets: 1 Kings xi. and xii. 24. I will, not altogether cut off the kingdom, for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake whom I have chosen: but there shall remain one tribe to thy son. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expresly added: 1 Kings xi. 29. I will afflict the seed of David, but not forever. Within a little space of time after, it is said: 1 King. xv. 4. For David his servant's sake God hath given a light in Jerusalem, to raise up a son, and to keep Jerusalem in safety. Now when the state grew toward destruction, it was said again: 1 King xi. 34. God would not scatter Judah for David his servant's sake, because he had spoken that he would give a light to him and his sons for ever. Finally, this is the sum, that all other being passed over, only David was chosen, upon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in another place it is said, Psal. lxxvii. 60, 67. He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Joseph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim; but he hath chosen the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he hath loved. He hath chosen his servant David to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to save his church, that the safety and preservation thereof should hang upon that one head, and therefore David crieth out, The Lord the strength of his people, the strength of the salvations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a prayer: Save thy people and bless thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the church is by an inseparable knot joined to the government of Christ. And in the same meaning in another place: Psal. xx. 10. Lord save us: Let the king hear us in the day that we shall call upon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithful did upon none other confidence flee to the help of God, but because they were hidden under the succour of the king. Which is gathered by another another Pſalm. Pſal. cxviii. 25, 26. Lord ſave us: Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Where it is plain enough that the faithful are called back unto Chriſt, that they may hope that they ſhall be ſaved by the hand of God. The ſame reſpect hath the other prayer, where all the church calleth upon the mercy of God: Pſal. lxxx. 18. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the ſon of man, whom thou haſt preſerved (or appointed) to thyſelf. For though the author of the Pſalm bewaileth the ſcattering abroad of the whole people, yet he prayeth for their reſtitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land waſted, and all things to human appearance deſtroyed, Lam. iv. 20. Jeremiah lamenteth the overthrow of the church, he doth principally complain that by deſtruction of the kingdom all hope was cut off from the faithful. Chriſt (ſaith he) the ſpirit of our mouth is taken in our ſins, to whom we ſaid: in thy ſhadow we ſhall live among the nations. Hereby now it ſufficiently appeareth that becauſe God cannot be merciful to mankind without the mediator, therefore Chriſt was always ſet before the holy fathers in time of the law, to whom they might direct their faith.

The ancient prophets never ſpake of the churches deliverance out of miſery, but they taught withal, that through Chriſt they were delivered.

3. Now, where comfort is promiſed in affliction, ſpecially where the deliverance of the church is deſcribed, there the banner of confidence and hope is advanced in Chriſt alone. God went out to the ſaving of his people with his Meſſiah, ſaith Habakkuk, (Hab. iii. 13.) And ſo oft as the prophets make mention of the reſtoring of the church, they call back the people to the promiſe made to David, concerning the everlaſting continuance of the kingdom. And no wonder. For otherwiſe there had been no aſſurance of the covenant. For which purpoſe ſerveth that remarkable anſwer of Iſaiah, (Iſa. vii. 14.) For when he ſaw that the unbelieving king Ahaz refuſed that which he had declared to him of the raiſing of the ſiege of Jeruſalem and of preſent ſafety, as it were ſuddenly, he paſſed over to Meſſias. Behold a virgin ſhall conceive and bring forth a ſon, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardneſs refuſed the promiſe offered unto them, as though they did of purpoſe bend themſelves to diſcredit the truth of God, yet the covenant ſhould not be void, but that the redeemer ſhould come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the prophets, to the end they might ſhew that God would be merciful, always to ſet out that kingdom of David, whereupon depended redemption and everlaſting ſalvation. So Iſaiah ſaith; (Iſa. lv. 3.) I will make a covenant with you, even the ſure mercies of David. Behold I have given him for a witneſs unto the people, that is, becauſe the faithful when their ſtate is at the worſt, could not otherwiſe have any hope, but by the means of him being witneſs, that God would be appeaſable toward them. Likewiſe Jeremiah to raiſe them up being in deſpair, ſaith: (Jer. xxiii. 6.) Behold the days come, wherein I will raiſe up unto David a righteous branch, and then ſhall Judah be ſaved, and Iſrael ſhall dwell in ſafety. And Ezekiel ſaith, (Ezek. xxxiv. 23.) I will raiſe up one ſhepherd over my ſheep, even David my ſervant. I the Lord will be a God to them, and my ſervant David for a ſhepherd. And I will make a covenant of peace with them. Alſo in another place, (Ezek. xxxvii. 25.) after he had ſpoken of the incredible renewing, he ſaith; my ſervant David ſhall be their king, and there ſhall be one ſhepherd over all, and I will make an everlaſting covenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a few places out of many, becauſe I only mean, to have the readers put in mind, that the hope of all the godly hath always been repoſed no where elſe but in Chriſt. And all the other prophets alſo ſpeak agreeably to this, as it is ſaid in Hoſea. (Hoſ. i. 12.) The children of Judah and the children of Iſrael ſhall be gathered together, and ſhall appoint to themſelves one head. Which he afterward more plainly expoundeth, (Hoſ. iii. 5.) The children of Iſrael ſhall return, and ſhall ſeek for the Lord their God, and David their king. And Micah (Micah ii. 13.) ſpeaking of the return of the people expreſly ſaith, the king ſhall go before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos, (Amos ix. 16.) meaning to praiſe the renewing of the people, ſaith: I will in that day raiſe up the tabernacle of David that is fallen down, and I will hedge up the gaps, and raiſe up the places overthrown, even becauſe that was the only ſtandard of ſalvation, to have the royal glory to riſe up again on high in the ſtock of David, which is fulfilled in Chriſt. Therefore Zechariah, as his age was nearer to the appearing of Chriſt, ſo doth he more plainly cry out: (Zech. ix. 9.) Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Jeruſalem: ſhout, O daughter of Jeruſalem: behold thy king cometh unto thee: he is juſt, and having ſalvation. Which agreeth with the place of the Pſalm before alleged: (Pſal. xxviii. 8.)

The Lord is their ſtrength and he is the ſaving ſtrength of his anointed. Lord ſave us. Where ſalvation, is derived from the head to the whole body.

It was a common principle generally received amongſt the Jews, though not ſo perfectly underſtood as behoved, that their deliverer ſhould be Chriſt, without whoſe knowlege all other nations vainly worſhipped God.

4. It was God's will to have the Jews inſtructed with theſe prophecies, that to ſeek for their deliverance, they ſhould bend their eyes directly to Chriſt. And though they had ſhamefully revolted, yet could not the remembrance of the general principle be aboliſhed, that God by the hand of Chriſt, as he had promiſed to David, would be the deliverer of the church, and ſo the covenant ſhould be of his own free grant, whereby God hath adopted his choſen. Hereby it came to paſs, that this ſong ſounded in the mouth of the children when Chriſt a little before his death entered into Jeruſalem, Hoſanna to the ſon of David. For it appeareth that it was commonly known and ſpoken of, and according to common uſe that they ſung that the only pledge of God's mercy remained unto them, in the coming of the redeemer. For this cauſe Chriſt himſelf, to make his diſciples plainly and perfectly believe in God, biddeth them to believe on himſelf, (John. xiv. 1.) Believe ye in God (ſaith he) then believe alſo in me. For though (to ſpeak properly) faith aſcends up from Chriſt to the Father, yet he meaneth that the ſame faith although it reſt upon God, doth by little and little vaniſh away unleſs he become a mean to hold it in aſſured ſtedfaſtneſs. Otherwiſe the majeſty of God is too high for mortal men, which creep upon the ground like worms, to attain unto it. Wherefore I allow that common ſaying, that God is the object of faith, but in ſuch ſort that it needeth correction. Becauſe Chriſt is not in vain called (Col. i. 15.) the inviſible image of God, but by this title we are put in mind, that if we find not God in Chriſt, ſalvation cannot be known unto us. For although among the Jews, the Scribes and Phariſees had darkened with falſe inventions, that which the prophets had ſpoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Chriſt took it for a thing confeſſed as received by common conſent, that there was none other remedy in a diſpaired caſe, and none other mean of delivering the church, but by giving the Mediator. Indeed that was not commonly known among the people as it ought to have been, which Paul teacheth, (Rom. x. 4.) that Chriſt is, the end of the law. But how true and aſſured it is doth plainly appear by the law and the prophets. I ſpeak not yet of faith, becauſe there ſhall be elſewhere a more convenient place for it. Only let the readers hold this as faſt ſtabliſhed, that the firſt degree of godlineſs be, to acknowlege God to be a father unto us, to defend, govern, and cheriſh us, till he gather us together into the everlaſting inheritance of his kingdom: and that hereby it plainly appeareth which we ſaid even now, that the knowlege of God which bringeth ſalvation, ſtandeth not without Chriſt, and that therefore from the beginning he hath been ſet forth unto all the elect, that they ſhould look upon him, and that in him ſhould reſt all their truſt. According to this meaning writeth Irenæus, that the Father who is unmeaſurable, is in his Son meaſured, becauſe he hath applied himſelf to the meaſure of our capacity, leaſt he ſhould drown our minds with the unmeaſurableneſs of his glory. Which thing the mad men not conſidering, do wreſt a profitable ſentence to a wicked fancy, as though there were in Chriſt but a portion of the Godhead derived from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing elſe, but that God is comprehended in Chriſt alone. That ſaying of John hath always been true. (1 John ii. 31.) He that hath not the Son, neither hath he the Father. For though in old time many did boaſt that they worſhipped the ſovereign God, the maker of heaven and earth: yet becauſe they had no mediator, it was impoſſible that they ſhould truly taſte of the mercy of God, and ſo be perſuaded that he was their father. Therefore becauſe they knew not the head that is Chriſt, the knowlege of God was but vain among them, whereby alſo it came to paſs, that at length falling into groſs and filthy ſuperſtitions, they betrayed their own ignorance. As at this day the Turks although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heaven and earth is their God, yet do they thruſt an idol in the place of the true God while they depart from Chriſt.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

That the law was given, not to hold ſtill the people in it, but to nouriſh the hope of ſalvation in Chriſt, until his coming.

The law was given by Moſes to nouriſh men in hope of ſalvation by Chriſt, as appeareth by the often mention which he maketh of the covenant, and by the whole form of ceremonies and ſervice therein preſcribed, which without ſpiritual relation unto this were vain and idle.

BY this continual proceſs that we have rehearſed, may be gathered, that the law was added about four hundered years after the death of Abraham, not for this intent to lead away the choſen people from Chriſt: but rather to keep their minds in expectation until his coming, to kindle a deſire of him, and to confirm them in looking for him, that they ſhould not wax faint with long tarrying. I mean by this word law, not only the ten commandments, which preſcribe a rule how to live godlily and righteouſly, but alſo the form of religion delivered by the hand of Moſes. For Moſes was not made a lawgiver to aboliſh the bleſſing promiſed to the kindered of Abraham: but rather we ſee how every where he putteth the Jews in remembrance of the free covenant made with their fathers whoſe heirs they were, as if he had been ſent to renew the ſame. That was moſt plainly ſet forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vain and fond, than for men to offer up loathſome ſtink of the fat of cattle, to reconcile themſelves to God thereby? to flee to the ſprinkling of water or blood to waſh away their filthineſs? Finally, all the ſervice of God appointed in the law (if it be conſidered by itſelf, and do not contain ſhadows and figures, which the truth ſhould anſwer unto) ſhall be but downright mockery. Wherefore not without cauſe both in Stephen's (Acts v. 44.) ſermon, and in the epiſtle to the Hebrews, (Heb. viii. 5.) is that place ſo diligently weighed. Where God commandeth (Exod. xxv. 40.) Moſes to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the pattern that had been ſhewed him in the mount. For if there had not been ſome ſpiritual thing appointed that they ſhould tend unto, the Jews ſhould no leſs have fondly ſpent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men that never earneſtly applied to the ſtudy of godlineſs, cannot without lothſome tediouſneſs abide to hear ſo many ſundry faſhions of uſages: and they not only wonder why God wearieth his people with ſuch a heap of ceremonies, but alſo they deſpiſe and ſcorn them as childrens plays. And the cauſe is, for that they conſider not the end, from which if the figures of the law be ſeparated, they muſt needs be condemned of vanity. But that ſame figure ſheweth that God did not therefore command ſacrifices becauſe he would occupy them that worſhipped him with earthly exerciſes, but rather to raiſe up their minds higher. Which may alſo plainly appear by his nature: for as he is ſpiritual, ſo he is delighted with no other worſhipping but what is ſpiritual. This do the ſayings of the prophets teſtify, wherein they rebuke the Jews of ſluggiſhneſs, for that they thought that any ſacrifices were of any value with God. Is that becauſe their purpoſe is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expoſitors of the law, ſo they would by this mean have mens eyes directed to the mark from which the common people ſtrayed. Now by the grace offered to the Jews it is certainly gathered, that the law was not void of Chriſt. For Moſes did ſet forth unto them this end of the adoption, (Exod. x. 6.) that they ſhould become a prieſtly kingdom to God. Which they could not obtain unleſs there were had for the mean thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation than by the blood of beaſts. For what is more improbable than Adam's children, who by inheritably deſcending infection are all born the bond ſlaves of ſin, to be advanced to royal dignity, and ſo to become partakers of the glory of God, unleſs that ſo excellent a benefit ſhould come unto them from ſome other than from themſelves? Alſo how could the right of prieſthood remain in force among them, who by reaſon of the pollution of ſin were abominable to God, unleſs they had been conſecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turn that ſaying of Moſes, where he teacheth, that the fulneſs of grace, the taſte whereof the Jews had taken under the law, was given in Chriſt: (1 Pet. ii. 9.) Ye are (ſaith he) a choſen kindred, a kingly prieſthood. For to this end tendeth that turning of the words, to ſhew that they, to whom Chriſt appeared by the goſpel, have obtained more than their fathers, becauſe they are all endued both with prieſtly and kingly honour, that truſting upon their mediator they may freely be bold to come forth into the ſight of God.

How the law both ceremonial and moral led the people of God unto Chriſt.

2. And here by the way it is to be obſerved, that the kingdom which at length was erected in the houſe of David, is part of the law, and contained under the miniſtry of Moſes. Whereupon followeth, that as well in all the kindred of the Levites as in the poſterity of David Chriſt was ſet before the eyes of the old people as in a double looking-glaſs. For, as I ſaid juſt now, they could not otherwiſe be before God either kings or prieſts, who were both the bond-ſlaves of ſin and death, and defiled by their own corruption. Hereby appeareth that that ſaying of Paul, (Gal. iii. 24.) is moſt true, that the Jews were holden as under the keeping of a ſchoolmaſter, till the ſeed came for whoſe ſake the promiſe was given. For, becauſe Chriſt was not yet familiarly known, they were like unto children, whoſe weakneſs could not yet bear a full knowlege of heavenly things, but how they were by ceremonies as it were led by the hand to Chriſt, is ſpoken before, and may be better underſtood by many teſtimonies of the prophets. For although it was commanded them to come daily with new ſacrifices to appeaſe God: yet Iſaiah promiſeth that all their ſins ſhall be cleanſed with one only ſacrifice. Wherewith Daniel accordingly ſaith: (Dan. ix.) The prieſts appointed of the tribe of Levi, did enter into the ſanctuary: but of the only prieſt it was once ſaid, (Pſal. cx. 4.) that by an oath he was choſen of God to be a prieſt for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec. At that time the anointing with oil was viſible: but Daniel by his viſion pronounceth that there ſhall be another manner of anointing. And becauſe I will not dwell upon many examples, the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews even from the fourth chapter to the eleventh doth largely and plainly enough ſhew, that the ceremonies are nothing worth and vain till we come to Chriſt. As concerning the ten commandments: that leſſon of Paul, (Rom. x. 4.) is likewiſe to be kept in mind, that Chriſt is the end of the law unto ſalvation, to every one that believeth. And another leſſen, (2 Cor. iii. 6.) that Chriſt is the ſpirit that quickeneth the letter which of it ſelf ſlayeth. For in the firſt of theſe two, he meaneth that righteouſneſs is vainly taught by commandments until Chriſt do give it both by free imputation and by the ſpirit of regeneration. Wherefore he juſtly calleth Chriſt the fulfilling or end of the law. Becauſe it ſhould avail us nothing to know what God requireth of us, unleſs he did ſuccour us fainting and oppreſſed under the yoke and intollerable burden. In another place (Gal. iii. 19.) he teacheth, that the law was made for tranſgreſſions, that is to bring men to humility being proved guilty of their own damnation. And, becauſe this is the true and only preparation to ſeek Chriſt, whatſoever he teacheth in divers words do all very well agree together. But becauſe he then was debating with perverſe teachers, who fancied that we do deſerve righteouſneſs by the works of the law, to confute their error, he was forced ſometimes to ſpeak preciſely of the bare law, which yet otherwiſe is clothed with the covenant of free adoption.

Although the law do promiſe and would no doubt perform life unto them that keep the law, yet can we look for no fruit at all by thoſe promiſes, but feel our own miſery thereby the more increaſed becauſe of our weakneſs which anſwereth not the righteouſneſs preſcribed by the law.

3. But now it is good to know, how being taught by the moral law, we are made more inexcuſable, that our own guiltineſs may move us to crave pardon. If it be true that we are taught perfection of righteouſneſs in the law: then this alſo followeth, that the abſolute keeping thereof is perfect righteouſneſs before God, that is whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heavenly throne of judgment. Wherefore Moſes when he had publiſhed the law, doubted not to proteſt before heaven and earth, that he had ſet before Iſrael life and death, good and evil. And we may not deny, but that the reward of eternal ſalvation belongeth to the upright obedience of the law, as the Lord hath promiſed it. Again, yet it is good to examine, whether we perform that obedience, upon deſert whereof we may conceive a truſt of that reward. For to what ſmall purpoſe is it, to ſee the reward of eternal life ſet in keeping of the law, unleſs we further know whether we may by that way attain to eternal life? But herein the weakneſs of the law doth ſhew it ſelf. For becauſe that keeping of the law is found in none of us all, we are excluded from the promiſes of life, and do fall into curſe only. I do not now tell what doth come to paſs, but what needs muſt come to paſs. For whereas the doctrine of the law is far above the power of man, he may indeed afar off, look at the promiſes, but yet not gather any fruit of them. Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodneſs of them he may the better conſider his own miſery, while he conſidereth, that all hope of ſalvation being cut off, death doth certainly hang over him. On the other ſide terrible penal laws do preſs us, which do hold entangled and faſt bound, not only a few of us, but every one without exception; they preſs us, I ſay, and do purſue us, with an unrelenting rigour, ſo that we may ſee death juſt preſent in the law.

The promiſes of the law being conditional, are not of none effect unto us, though we be unable to perform the condition, becauſe our not performing it through mercy pardoned, and our weak obedience accepted and rewarded, as if it were full performance.

4. Therefore if we look only upon the law, we can do nothing but be diſcouraged, be confounded, and deſpair, foraſmuch as by it we are all damned and curſed, and kept far off from the bleſſedneſs that he offereth to them that worſhip him. Wilt thou ſay then, doth the Lord ſo mock us? For how little doth it differ from mocking, to ſhew forth a hope of felicity, to allure and exhort men unto it, to proteſt that it is laid open for us, when in the mean time the entry unto it is ſhut up and inacceſſible? I anſwer; although the promiſes of the law, in ſo much as they are conditional, are ſuſpended upon the perfect obedience of the law, which can no where be found, yet are they not given in vain. For when we have learned that they ſhall be void and of no effect unto us, unleſs God embrace us with his free goodneſs without regard of our works, and unleſs we do embrace by faith the ſame goodneſs given us by the goſpel, then want they not their efficacy, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth ſo freely give all things unto us, that he addeth this alſo to the heap of his bountifulneſs, that not refuſing our half full obedience, and remitting ſo much as it wanteth of full performance, he ſo maketh us to enjoy the fruit of the promiſes of the law, as if we ourſelves had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this preſent proceed no further in this matter, becauſe we ſhall come more largely to treat of it, when we ſhall ſpeak of the juſtification of faith.

The law is therefore ſaid to be impoſſible for man to perform becauſe no man ever hitherto hath been, and the ſcripture teacheth, that no man ſhall be ſo perfect.

5. Whereas we ſaid that it is impoſſible to keep the law, that is in few words to be both explained and proved. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accounted an opinion of great abſurdity, ſo far that Jerom doubteth not to pronounce it accurſed; what Jerom thought, I do not ſtay upon; as for us, let us ſearch what is truth. I will not here make long circumſtances of divers ſorts of poſſibilities. I call that impoſſible, which both never hath been, and alſo is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it never hereafter may be. If we record from the fartheſt time of memory, I ſay that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the body of death, hath ever attained to that full perfection of love, to love God with all his heart, with all his mind, with all his ſoul, with all his ſtrength: Again, that there hath been none that hath not been troubled with concupiſcence. Who can ſay nay? I ſee indeed what manner holy men fooliſh ſuperſtition doth imagine unto us, even ſuch whoſe pureneſs the heavenly angels do ſcarcely ſurpaſs: but againſt both the ſcripture and proof of experience. I ſay alſo, that there ſhall none hereafter be, that ſhall come to the mark of true perfection, unleſs he be looſed from the burden of his body. For this point there are clear teſtimonies of ſcripture. Solomon ſaid, 1 Kings viii. 6. that there is not a righteous man upon the earth that ſinneth not. And David ſaid, Pſal. cxliii. Every living man ſhall not be juſtified in thy ſight. Job in many places affirmeth the ſame. But Paul moſt plainly of all: Gal. iii. 10. that the fleſh luſteth againſt the ſpirit, and the ſpirit againſt the fleſh. And by no other reaſon he proveth that all that are under the law are ſubject to the curſe, but becauſe it is written that curſed are all they that do not abide in all the commandments thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confeſſed, that no man can abide in them. And whatſoever is before ſpoken in the ſcriptures, that muſt be holden for perpetual, yea and neceſſary. With ſuch ſubtilty did the Pelagians trouble Auguſtine, ſaying, that there is wrong done to God to ſay that he doth command more than the faithful are able by his grace to perform. Auguſtine, (Lib. de not. & gratia.) to avoid their cavillation confeſſed, that the Lord might indeed, if he would, advance a mortal man to the pureneſs of angels: but that he neither hath done ſo at any time, nor will do, becauſe he hath otherwiſe affirmed in the ſcriptures. And that do I alſo not deny. But I add further, that it is inconvenient to diſpute of his power againſt his truth, and that therefore this ſentence is not ſubject to cavillations if a man ſhould ſay that that thing is impoſſible to be, whereof the ſcriptures do pronounce that it ſhall not be. But if they diſpute of the word: when the diſciples aſked the Lord who may be ſaved, he anſwered: with men indeed it is impoſſible, but with God all things are poſſible. Matth. xix. 25. Alſo Auguſtine, (Lib de ſpiritu. & litera.) with a moſt ſtrong reaſon ſtrenuouſly defendeth, that in this fleſh we never yield to God the due love that we owe him. Love (ſays he) ſo followeth knowlege, that no man can perfectly love God, but he that hath firſt fully known his goodneſs. We, while we wander in this world, ſee by a glaſs and in a dark ſpeech: it followeth therefore, that our love is unperfect. Let this therefore remain out of controverſy, that in this fleſh it is impoſſible to fulfil the law, if we behold the weakneſs of our own nature, as it ſhall yet alſo in another place, Rom. viii. 3. be proved by Paul.

The firſt uſe of the moral law to make men know their own unrighteouſneſs, that they be not beſotted through ſelf-complacence, nor deceived with a vain ſhadow of holineſs inſtead of that which is ſound and perfect.

6. But that the whole matter may be more plainly ſet forth: let us in a compendious order gather up together the office and uſe of the law which they called Moral. Now, as far as I underſtand, it is contained in theſe three parts. The firſt is, that while it ſheweth to every man the righteouſneſs of God, that is, the righteouſneſs which only is acceptable to God, it admoniſh, certify, prove guilty, yea, and condemn every man of his own unrighteouſneſs. For ſo is it needful that man blinded and intoxicated with the love of himſelf, be driven both to the knowlege and confeſſion of his own weakneſs, and uncleanneſs: foraſmuch as if his vanity he not evidently convinced, he ſwelleth with mad confidence of his own ſtrength, and can never be brought to think of the ſlenderneſs thereof, ſo long as he meaſureth it by the proportion of his own will. But ſo ſoon as he beginneth to compare his ſtrength to the ſtrictneſs of the law, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For however he before conceived a great opinion of it, yet by and by he feeleth it to pant under ſo great a burden, and then to ſhake and faulter, at laſt even to fall down and faint. So being taught by the diſcipline of the law, he putteth off that arrogancy wherewith before he was blinded. Likewiſe he is to be healed of another diſeaſe of pride, whereof we have ſaid that he is ſick. So long as he is ſuffered to ſtand in his own judgment, he deviſeth hypocriſy inſtead of righteouſneſs, wherewith being contented, he riſeth up in courage by I know not what imaginary righteouſneſs, againſt the grace of God. But ſo ſoon as he is compelled to try his life by the balance of the law, then leaving the preſumption of the counterfeit righteouſneſs, he ſeeth himſelf to be an infinite ſpace diſtant from holineſs: Again that he floweth full of infinite vices whereof before he ſeemed clean. For the evils of luſt are hidden in ſo deep and crooked private corners, that they eaſily deceive the ſight of man. And not without cauſe the apoſtle ſaith, Rom. vii. 7. that he knew not luſt, except the law had ſaid: Thou ſhalt not luſt: becauſe except it be by the law diſcloſed out of her lurking holes, it deſtroyeth miſerable man ſo ſecretly, that he feeleth not the deadly dart thereof.

It is no diſhonour to the law of God to ſay that it doth but repreſent unto us our indiſpoſitions to obey, our diſobeying, and our curſed eſtate through diſobedience: becauſe in this we are taught both how our own wickedneſs hindereth us from enjoying the bleſſedneſs of the law, and how the mercy of God aboundeth in giving us that bleſſedneſs from which our own wickedneſs doth in itſelf exclude us.

7. So the law is like a certain looking glaſs wherein we behold, firſt our weakneſs, and by that our wickedneſs, and laſt of all by them both our accurſedneſs, even as a glaſs repreſenteth unto us the ſpots of our face. For when power faileth man to follow righteouſneſs, then muſt he needs ſtick faſt in the mire of ſins. And after ſin by and by followeth condemnation. And of how much the greater tranſgreſſion the law holdeth us guilty and convict, with ſo much the more grievous judgment it condemneth us. For this purpoſe maketh the ſaying of the apoſtle, Rom. iii. 23. that by the law is the knowlege of ſin. For there he ſpeaketh only of the firſt office of the law, the proof whereof is in ſinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are theſe two ſayings, Rom. v. 20. that the law entered that ſin might abound, and therefore 2 Cor. iii. that it is the miniſtration of death that worketh wrath and ſlayeth. For without doubt ſo much more groweth iniquity with how much more underſtanding of ſin the conſcience is ſtriken, becauſe unto breach of law is added obſtinacy againſt the maker of the law. It followeth therefore that the law armeth the wrath of God to the deſtruction of the ſinner, becauſe of itſelf it can do nothing but accuſe, condemn and deſtroy. And as Auguſtine writeth, (De correp. & grat. vide Ambroſ. cap. 1. de Jac. & vita bea. cap. 6.) if the

ſpirit of grace be abſent, the law is preſent with us, only to this end, to accuſe and kill us. And yet when this is ſaid, neither is the law diſhonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellency thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and diſpoſed to the obedience of the law, then plainly the only knowlege of it were ſufficient to ſalvation. But forasmuch as our carnal and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemy with the ſpiritual law of God, and is no way amended by the diſcipline thereof, this followeth that the law was given for ſalvation, (if it had found fit hearers) turneth to the occaſion of ſin and death. For ſince we are all proved to be tranſgreſſors of it, the more plainly that it revealeth the righteouſneſs of God, ſo much the more on the other ſide it diſcovereth our iniquity: the more ſurely that it confirmeth the reward of life and ſalvation laid up for righteouſneſs, ſo much the more certain it maketh the deſtruction of the wicked. So far is it off therefore that theſe ſayings ſhould be to the diſhonour of the law, that they much avail to the more glorious commendations of God's goodneſs. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our own wickedneſs, and perverſeneſs, that we enjoy not the bleſſedneſs of life ſet openly abroad for us by the law. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth us without the ſuccour of the law, is made ſo much the ſweeter, and the mercy more lovely that giveth it unto us, whereby we learn that he is never wearied with often doing us good and heaping new gifts upon us.

The end why the law doth bring men to the ſight of their own miſery is not that they might deſpair, but that forſaking all confidence in themſelves, they might rely upon the mercy of God in Jeſus Chriſt alone.

8. And whereas the iniquity and condemnation of us all is ſealed by the teſtimony of the law, it is not done for this purpoſe (if at leaſt we well profit in it) to make us fall down with deſpair, or with diſcouraged minds to tumble down head long. Indeed the reprobate are amazed after that manner, but that is by reaſon of their obſtinacy, but with the children of God there behoved to be another end of inſtruction. I grant the apoſtle teſtifieth that we are all condemned by the judgment of the law, Rom. iii. 19. that every mouth may be ſtopped, and that all the world may become guilty before God. But yet the apoſtle in another place teacheth, Rom. xi. 32. that God hath concluded all under unbelief, not to deſtroy all, or to ſuffer all to periſh, but that he might have mercy on all, that leaving the fooliſh opinion of their own ſtrength, they might underſtand, that they ſtand and are holden up by the alone hand of God; that they being naked and empty, may flee to his mercy, that they may rely wholly upon it, hide themſelves wholly in it, take hold of it alone inſtead of righteouſneſs and merits, which is laid open in Chriſt for all men whoſoever they be that with true faith do deſire and look for it. For God in the commandments of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteouſneſs, whereof we are all deſtitute, and on the other ſide a rigorous judge of wicked doings. But in Chriſt his face ſhineth full of grace and lenity, even towards the wretched and unworthy ſinners.

9. Of the uſe and advantage of imploring the grace of his help, Auguſtine, Epiſt. 89. doth frequently ſpeak, as when he writeth to Hilary, The law commandeth that endeavouring to do the things commanded, and being wearied with our weakneſs under the law, we ſhould learn to aſk the help of grace. Again to Aſelius: Epiſt. 200. The uſe of the law is to convince man of his own weakneſs, and compel him to crave the phyſic of grace that is in Chriſt. Again, to Innocent of Rome, Epiſtle 95. The law commandeth, and grace miniſtreth ſtrength to perform. Again to Valentine, God commandeth thoſe things that we cannot do, that we may learn to know what to aſk of him. Again: The law was given to accuſe you, that, being accuſed, you ſhould fear, that, fearing, you ſhould crave pardon, and not preſume in your own ſtrength. Again, (Lib. de correp. & gratia) The law was given for this purpoſe, of great to make little, to ſhew that thou haſt no ſtrength of thine own to righteouſneſs, that thou as poor, unworthy and needy, ſhouldſt flee unto grace. After he turneth his ſpeech to God, and ſaith: Do ſo, Lord, do ſo, merciful Lord, command that which cannot be fulfilled; yea, command that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfil it by their own ſtrength, every mouth may be ſtopped, and no man may think himſelf great. Let all be little ones, and let all the world be guilty before thee. But I am not wiſe to heap ſo many teſtimonies, ſince that holy man hath written a book properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the ſpirit and letter. The ſecond uſe he doth not ſo lively deſcribe, either becauſe he knew that it did depend upon the former, or becauſe he did not ſo well underſtand it, or becauſe he wanted ted words with which distinctly and plainly to express his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceived: but this first office of the law is not idle even in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus far forward with the children of God, that after the subduing of their flesh, they be renewed and flourish again in the inward man, but amazed with the first terror do lie still in despair; yet it serveth to shew forth the equity of God's judgment, that their consciences are tossed with such ways. For they ever willingly desire to make shift against the judgment of God. Now while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonished with the testimonies of the law and their conscience do discover in themselves what they have deserved.

The second office of the law is the bridling of their unrulinesse thro' fear of punishment, whom the spirit of sanctification hath not yet endued with an inward hearty desire otherwise to serve God.

10. The second office of the law, is that they who are touched with no care of that which is just and right, unless they be compelled, when they hear the terrible penal ordinances therein may be restrained at least with fear of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward mind is moved or affected withal, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward work, and do keep in their perverseness within them, which otherways they would have outragiously poured out. Thereby they become truly neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being hindered either by fear or shame, they dare not put that in practice which they have conceived in their mind, nor openly blow abroad the rage of their lust: yet have they not a heart framed to the fear and obedience of God, yea, the more that they restrain themselves, so much the more ardently are they kindled within, they burn, they boil, ready to do any thing, and to break forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that only, but also they most spitefully hate the law, and do detest God the lawmaker, so that if they could, they would very fain take him away, whom they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth righteous things, nor when he revengeth himself on the despisers of his majesty. In some indeed more darkly, and in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the law not by willing submission, but resisting and against their wills, only by violence of fear. But this constrained and enforced righteousness is necessary for the public common state of men, the quiet whereof is herein provided for, while care is taken that all things be not confounded with uproar, which would come to pass, if all things were lawful for all men. Yea, it is not unprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this discipline, so long as they before their calling being yet destitute of the spirit of sanctification, are still wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn back, though it be but from outward licentiousness, by the terror of God's vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in mind, they go for the present time but a little forward, yet they partly grow in use to bear the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they are not altogether rude and undisciplined, as to a thing unknown. This office the apostle (1 Tim. i. 9.) seemeth properly to have touched, when he saith that the law was not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly, and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, for whoremongers, sodomites, robbers of children, liars and perjured men, and whatsoever else is against sound doctrine. For he saith, that it is a stay to the wild outraging lusts of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

Both sorts of men disciplined by the terror of the law as well they that would otherwise think too highly of their own righteousness, as they who too boldly would follow the sway of their own lust.

11. But to both may that be applied which he saith in another place, Gal. iii. 24. that the law was to the Jews a schoolmaster to Christ, for there are two sorts of men, whom with her discipline she leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort, of whom we first spake, because they are too full of reliance on their own strength or righteousness, are not meet to receive the grace of Christ, unless they be first emptied: therefore the law bringeth them down to humility by knowlege of themselves, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort need a bridle to be holden back, lest they so give loose the reins to the wantonness of their flesh, that they fall off altogether from all study of righteousness. For where the spirit of God doth not yet govern, there sometimes lusts do so boil, that it is in great peril lest they throw down the soul that is subject to them into the forgetfulness and despising of God: and so would it come come to pass if God did not with this remedy provide for it. Therefore those whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdom, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the works of the law under fear, until the time of his visitation, not that chaste and pure fear such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable fear for this that they may according to their capacity be taught by introduction to true godliness. Of this we have so many proofs, that it needeth no example. For whosoever hath any time continued in not knowing of God, will confess that this happened unto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some fear and obedience of God, until the time that being regenerate by his spirit, they began heartily to love him.

The third office of the law respecting properly them that are regenerated by the spirit of grace, is first to instruct them what the will of God is, and secondly to beget in them an eager desire still more and more to go forward in observing it.

12. The third use, which is also the principal use, and more nearly respects the proper end of the law, concerneth the faithful, in whose hearts the spirit of God doth already live and reign. For although they have the law written and engraven in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, are so disposed and inclined by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two ways profit in the law. For it is to them a very good mean, whereby they may daily better and more assuredly learn what is the will of the Lord which they aspire unto, and may be confirmed in the understanding thereof. As if a servant be already bent with all the affection of his heart, to please his master: yet hath he need diligently to search out and mark the manners of his master, that he may frame and apply himself unto them. And let none of us exempt himself from this need. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by daily instruction of the law get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowlege of God's will. Then because we need not only doctrine but also exhortation: this other advantage shall the servant of God take by the law, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred up to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden back from the slippery way of offending. For after this manner must these holy ones drive forward themselves, which with how great chearfulness so ever they travel Godward according to the spirit, yet they are always loaden with the sluggishness of the flesh, that they proceed not with such full readiness as they ought. To this flesh is the law given as a whip, that like a slow and dull ass it may be pricked forward to work. Yea to the spiritual man, because he is not yet rid of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continual incitement that suffereth him not to stand still. Even to this use David had respect, when he did extol the law of God with those notable praises, (Psal. xix. 8.) The law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure enlightening the eyes, &c. Again, Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. Psal. cxix. 105. with numberless others which he rehearseth throughout the whole of that Psalm. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what use the law ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to give to man of itself. But here the prophet reporteth with how great profit the Lord doth instruct them by reading of his law, to whom inwardly in inspireth a readiness to obey. And he taketh hold not of the commandments only, but also the promises of grace annexed to the things which only maketh the bitterness to wax sweet. For what were less amiable than the law, if it should only with requiring and threatning trouble souls carefully with fear, and vex them with terror? But specially David sheweth, that he in the law conceived the mediator, without whom there is no delight or sweetness.

The Law because it engendereth death, is not therefore to be shaken off, but must be followed as a rule which serveth to direct all the actions of our life.

13. Which while some unskilful men cannot discern, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bid the two tables of the law farewel, because they think it is not proper for christians to cleave to that doctrine that containeth the ministration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart far out of our minds. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same law which with sinners can beget nothing but death, ought in the holy to have a better and more excellent use. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly said to the people: (Deut. xxxi. 6.) Lay your hearts upon all the words that I do testify to you this day, that ye may commit them to your children, that ye may teach them to keep, to do, and to fulfil all the things that are written in the volume of this law, becauſe they are not vainly commanded you, but that every one ſhould live in them. But if no man can deny that there appeareth in it an abſolute pattern of righteouſneſs, then either we muſt have no rule at all, by which to live juſtly and uprightly, or elſe it is not lawful for us to depart from it. For there are not many rules of life, but one rule of life, which is perpetual and cannot be altered. Therefore, (Pſal. i. 2.) whereas David maketh the life of a righteous man continually employed in the meditation of the law, let us not refer that to one age only, becauſe it is moſt meet for all ages to the end of the world: and let us not therefore be frightened away, or flee from being inſtructed by it, becauſe it appointeth a much more exact holineſs than we ſhall perform, while ſhall carry about the perſon of our body. For now it executeth not againſt us the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be ſatisfied, but with his full taſk performed: but in this perfection to which it exhorteth us, it ſheweth us a mark, toward which in all our life to aim, is no leſs profitable for us, than agreeable with our duty. In which endeavour if we fail not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the ſpace whereof being run out, the Lord will grant us to attain to that mark, toward which our endeavours are directed a far off.

The abrogating of the law of God, to the faithful is their deliverance from the curſe threatened in the law, not from the duty of continual endeavouring to fulfil that which the law injoineth.

14. Now therefore, whereas the law hath toward the faithful a power to exhort, not ſuch a power as may bind their conſciences with a curſe, but ſuch as with often calling on, may ſhake off ſluggiſhneſs and urge imperfection to awaken it: many when they mean to expreſs this deliverance from the curſe thereof, do ſay, that the law is abrogate to the faithful. (I ſpeak yet of the moral law) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but only that it be no more unto them that which it was before, that is, that it do no more, by making afraid and confounding their conſciences, damn and deſtroy them. And truly ſuch an abrogation of the law, Paul doth plainly teach, and alſo that the Lord himſelf ſpake of it, appeareth by this that he would not have confuted that opinion that he ſhould diſſolve the law, unleſs it had been commonly received among the Jews. But foraſmuch as it could not riſe cauſeleſly and without any colour, it is likely that it proceeded from a falſe underſtanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errors are wont to take occaſion of truth but leſt we ſhould alſo ſtumble at the ſame ſtone, let us diligently make diſtinction, what is abrogate in the law, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord proteſteth (Mat. v. 17.) that he came not to deſtroy the law but to fulfil it: and that till heaven and earth paſs away, not one jot of the law ſhould paſs away till all ſhould be fulfilled; he ſufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing ſhould be taken away from the due obſervance of the law. And for good cauſe: ſince he came rather for this end, to heal offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the law remaineth for all chriſtians, inviolable, which by teaching, admoniſhing, rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare us to every good work.

The bonds of the law from which we are looſed are thoſe exactions, the rigour and extremity whereof, if it were not mitigated, would cauſe deſpair, and not thoſe injunctions of obedience, the authority whereof doth and muſt ſtand in force for ever.

15. As for thoſe things that Paul ſpeaketh of the curſe, it is evident that they belong not to the very inſtruction, but only to the force of binding the conſcience. For the law not only teacheth, but alſo with authority requireth that which it commandeth. If it be not performed, yea if duty be ſlackened in any part, it bendeth her thunder bolt of a curſe. For this cauſe the apoſtle ſaith, (Gal. iii. 10.) that all they that are of the works of the law, are ſubject to the curſe, becauſe it is written: (Deut. xxvii. 26.) curſed is every one, that fulfilleth not all. And he ſaith, that they are under the works of the law, that do not ſet righteouſneſs in the forgiveneſs of ſins, by which we are looſed from the rigour of the law. He teacheth therefore that we muſt be looſed from the bonds of the law, unleſs we will miſerably periſh under them. But from what bonds? the bonds of that rigorous and ſharp exacting, that releaſeth nothing of the extremity of the law, and ſuffereth not any offence to paſs unpuniſhed. From this curſe (I ſay) that Chriſt might redeem us, he was made a curſe for us. For it is written: (Gal. iii. 13.) Curſed is every one that hangeth upon a tree. In the chapter following indeed he ſaith, (Gal. v. 4.) that Chriſt was made ſubject to the law, to redeem them that were under the law, but all in one meaning, for he ſoon after adds, that by adoption we might receive the right of children.

What

What is that? that we ſhould not be oppreſſed with perpetual bondage, that ſhould hold our conſcience faſt ſtrained with anguiſh of death. In the mean time this always remaineth unſhaken, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authority of the law, but that it ought ſtill to be received of us with the ſame reverence and obedience.

The exerciſe of the ceremonial law taken away yet the holineſs thereof confirmed by the performance of that which was therein ſhadowed.

16. Of ceremonies it is otherwiſe, which we abrogate not in effect, but in uſe only. And this, that Chriſt by his coming hath made an end of them, is ſo far from diminiſhing in the leaſt from their holineſs, that it rather ſetteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they ſhould have given but a vain ſhew to the people, unleſs the power of the death and reſurrection of Chriſt had been ſhewed therein, ſo if they had not ceaſed, we could not at this day diſcern to what purpoſe they were ordained. Therefore Paul to prove that the obſervation of them now is not only ſuperfluous, but alſo hurtful, (Col. ii. 17.) teacheth that they were ſhadows whereof we have the body in Chriſt. We ſee therefore how in the aboliſhing of them, the truth ſhineth better than if they did ſtill afar off, and as it were with a vail ſpread before, ſhew a figure of Chriſt that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore (Mat. xxvii. 51.) the vail of the temple at the death of Chriſt was torn in two pieces and fell down: becauſe now the true and expreſs image of the heavenly good things was come to light, which before had been but imperfectly begun with dark rude draughts, as the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews ſaith (Heb. x. 1.) To this end ſerveth that ſaying of Chriſt, (Luke xvi. 26.) that the law and the prophets were unto the time of John, and that from that time forward, the kingdom of God began to be joyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of ſalvation, and of eternal life, but becauſe a far off, and under ſhadows only they did behold that which we at this day ſee in the full light. But why it behoveth that the church of God ſhould climb up higher from thoſe firſt inſtructions, John the Baptiſt declareth, (John i. 15.) for that the law is given by Moſes, but grace and truth came by Jeſus Chriſt. For although the purging of ſins was truly promiſed in the antient ſacrifices, and the ark of the covenant was a ſure pledge of the fatherly favour of God, yet all this had been but a ſhadow, if it had not been grounded upon the grace of Chriſt, wherein is found, perfect and eternal ſtedfaſtneſs. Let this then remain ſure, that although the ceremonial uſages of the law have ceaſed to be obſerved, yet by the end of them it is the better known how great was the profit of them before Chriſt's coming, which in taking away the uſe of them hath ſealed the force and effect of them with his death.

In what ſenſe the ceremonial law is termed a hand writing againſt them who did obſerve it.

17. Somewhat more difficult is this point that Paul takes notice of. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by ſins, and the uncircumciſion of your fleſh, forgiving you all your offences, blotting out the hand writing that remained in the decrees againſt us, which was contrary unto us, and he hath taken it away, faſtening it to the croſs, &c. For it ſeemeth to ſtretch the aboliſhing of the law ſomewhat further that now we have nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they err who expound it of the moral law whoſe unappeaſed rigour or rather the doctrine thereof they think to be taken away. Some conſidering the words of Paul more deeply do think that it is properly ſpoken of the ceremonial law, and do ſhew that this word decree, doth more than once ſignifie ſo in Paul. For to the Epheſians (Eph. ii. 14.) he ſayeth thus: he is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh void the law of commandments conſiſting in the decrees, that he might make two in himſelf into one new man. Without queſtion he is there ſpeaking of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition by which the Jews were ſeparated from the Gentiles: wherefore I grant that thoſe firſt expoſitors are juſtly reproved by theſe: but yet methinks that theſe do not ſufficiently well ſet forth the mind of the apoſtle. For I like not at all, to have theſe two places compared together in all points, when his purpoſe was to advertiſe the Epheſians of their adoption into the fellowſhip of Iſrael, he teacheth that the impediment is removed by which they were formerly kept aſunder, that was in ceremonies. For the uſages of waſhings and ſacrifices, wherewith the Jews were made holy unto the Lord, do ſeparate them from the Gentiles. But in the epiſtle to the Coloſſians, who ſeeth not that he toucheth a higher myſtery? Indeed the point of diſpute there is about Moſaical obſervations to which the falſe apoſtles did labour to bring the chriſtian people. But, as in the e-piſtle to the Galatians he ſearcheth that controverſy further off, and as it were bringeth it back to the firſt head thereof, ſo doth he alſo in this place. For if in the ceremonies you conſider nothing elſe but a neceſſity of the uſe of them, to what purpoſe was it, to call it a hand writing againſt us? moreover to ſet the whole ſum in a manner of our redemption in this, that it ſhould be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it ſelf crieth out, that here is ſome more ſecret thing to be conſidered. And I truſt that I have attained the natural underſtanding of it if at leaſt this be granted me to be true, which in one place is moſt truly written by Auguſtine, yea that he hath taken out of the plain words of the apoſtle, (Heb. vii. 9, 10.) that in the Jewiſh ceremonies was rather a confeſſion than a cleanſing of ſins. For what did they elſe by ſacrifices, but confeſs themſelves in their conſcience guilty of death, that did put cleanſings in their place? What did they with their cleanſings, but teſtify themſelves to be unclean? And ſo was the hand writing of their ſin and uncleanneſs oft renewed by them, but there was no diſcharge in that teſtifying thereof. For which cauſe the apoſtle writeth that at length by mean of the death of Chriſt, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained under the old teſtament. Therefore the apoſtle (Heb. ix. 15.) doth worthily call the ceremonies hand-writings againſt thoſe that obſerve them: foraſmuch as by them they did openly ſeal to their own damnation and uncleanneſs. And it hindereth not, that they were alſo partakers of the ſame grace with us. For this they obeyed in Chriſt, not in the ceremonies, which there the apoſtle doth diſtinguiſh from Chriſt, becauſe being at that time uſed, they did obſcure the glory of Chriſt. Thus learn we, that the ceremonies, if they be conſidered by themſelves, are well and fitly called hand-writings againſt the ſalvation of men, becauſe they were as ſolemn inſtruments that teſtified their being bound. When the falſe apoſtles went about to bind the chriſtian church to them again: Paul did not without cauſe admoniſh the Coloſſians, by fetching the ſignification of them further off, to what point they ſhould fall back again, if they ſuffered themſelves in ſuch ſort to be entangled by them. For therewithal was was the benefit of Chriſt wreſted away from them, in as much as he having once performed the eternal cleanſing, hath utterly aboliſhed thoſe daily obſervations which were only of force to ſeal ſinners, but could do nothing to the putting away of them.

CHAP. VIII.

An expoſition of the moral law.

The worſhip due to God, and the unrighteouſneſs which is in us, becauſe the inward law naturally written in our hearts cannot ſufficiently teach, therefore God himſelf hath given a law which doth.

HERE I think it ſhall not be from the purpoſe, to inſert the ten commandments of the law with a ſhort expoſition of them, becauſe thereby both that ſhall better appear which I have touched, that the ſame obſervation of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then alſo we ſhall have beſides that a proof of the ſecond point, that the Jews did not only learn by it what was the true force of godlineſs, but alſo by the terror of the judgment ſince they ſaw themſelves unable to keep it, they were compelled whether they would or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Now in ſetting forth the ſum of thoſe things that are required in the true knowlege of God, we have already taught, that we cannot conceive him according to his greatneſs, but that by and by his majeſty preſenteth itſelf unto us, to bind us to the worſhip of him. In the knowlege of our ſelves we have ſet this for the chief point, that being void of the opinion of our own ſtrength, and clean ſtripped of the truſt of our own righteouſneſs, and on the other ſide diſcouraged and beaten down with conſcience of our own needineſs, we ſhould learn perfect humility and abaſement of ourſelves. The Lord ſetteth forth both theſe points in the law, where firſt challenging to himſelf due power to govern, he calleth us to the reverence of his divine majeſty, and appointeth out unto us wherein it ſtandeth and conſiſteth: and then publiſhing a rule of his righteouſneſs, (againſt the righteouſneſs whereof our nature as it is perverſe and crooked, doth always ſtrive, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of itſelf it is weak and feeble to do good, lieth a great way below) he reproveth us both of weakneſs and unrighteouſneſs. Moreover, that inward law which we have already ſaid is engraven and as it were imprinted in the hearts of all men, doth after a certain a certain manner inform us of the ſame things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conſcience doth not ſuffer us to ſleep a perpetual ſleep without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witneſs and admoniſher of thoſe things that we owe to God and layeth before us the difference of good and evil, and ſo accuſeth us when we depart from our duty. But man being wrapped in ſuch darkneſs of errors as he is, ſcarce even ſlenderly taſteth by that law of nature, what worſhip pleaſeth God: but truly he is very far diſtant from the right knowlege thereof. Beſide that, he is ſo ſwollen with arrogancy and ambition, and ſo blinded with ſelf love, that he cannot yet look upon, and as it were, deſcend into him ſelf to learn to ſubmit and humble himſelf, and confeſs his own miſery. Therefore (as it was neceſſary both for our dulneſs and ſtubborneſs) the Lord hath ſet us a law written, which ſhould both more certainly teſtify that which in the law natural was too obſcure, and alſo ſhould ſhake away our drouſineſs, and more lively touch our mind and remembrance.

By the law we underſtand that we owe God obedience and that he loveth righteouſneſs which we muſt ſeek after, not excuſing our ſelves by our incapacity which is no excuſe.

2. Now it is eaſy to underſtand what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our creator ſo of right he hath the place of our father and Lord, and that by this reaſon we owe to him glory reverence, love, and fear. Yea, and alſo that we are not at our own liberty, to follow whither ſoever that luſt of our mind doth move us, but that we ought to depend upon his beck, and to reſt only upon that which pleaſeth him. Then we learn, that he delighteth in righteouſneſs, that he abhorreth wickedneſs, and therefore that unleſs we will with wicked unthankfulneſs fall away from our creator, we muſt neceſſarily obſerve righteouſneſs all our life long. For if then only we yield unto him the reverence that we owe, when we prefer his will before our own, it followeth, that there is no other due worſhip of him, but the obſervation of righteouſneſs, holineſs and purity. Neither may we pretend this excuſe that we want power, and like waſted debtors are not able to pay. For it is not convenient that we ſhould meaſure the glory of God by our own power: for whatſoever we be, he always remains like to himſelf a lover of righteouſneſs, a hater of wickedneſs. Whatſoever he requireth of us (becauſe he can require nothing but that which is right) by bond of nature we muſt of neceſſity obey: but that we are not able, is our own fault. For if we be holden bound of our own luſt wherein ſin reigneth, ſo that we are not looſe at liberty to obey our father, there is no cauſe why we ſhould alledge neceſſity for our defence, the evil whereof is both within us, and to be imputed unto our ſelves.

The law bringeth men by ſhip wreck to the haven.

3. When we have thus far profited by the teaching of the law, then muſt we by the teaching of the ſame law alſo deſcend unto our ſelves: whereby at length we may carry away two things. The firſt is, by comparing the righteouſneſs of the law with our life, to learn, that we are far off from being able to ſatisfy the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthy to have place among his creatures, much leſs to be reckoned among his children. The ſecond is, in conſidering our ſtrength, to learn that it is not only ſufficient to fulfil the law, but alſo utterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a diſtruſt of our own ſtrength, and a care and fearfulneſs of mind. For conſcience cannot bear the burthen of iniquity, but that by and by the judgment of God is preſent before it: and the judgment of God cannot be felt, but that it ſtriketh unto us a dreadful horror of death. And likewiſe being conſtrained with proofs of her own weakneſs, it cannot chooſe but by and by fall into deſpair of her own ſtrength. Both theſe affections do beget humility and ſelf diffidence ſome where elſe. So at length it cometh to paſs, that man made afraid with feeling of eternal death, which he ſeeth to hang over him by the deſerving of his own righteouſneſs, turneth himſelf to the only mercy of God, as to the only haven of ſalvation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth unto the law, deſpairing in himſelf, he may take breath again and begin to crave and look for help.

The uſe of the promiſes and threatnings of the law.

4. But the Lord not contented to have procured a reverence of his righteouſneſs hath alſo added promiſes and threatnings to fill our hearts with love of him, and with hatred of wickedneſs. For, becauſe our minds is too blind, to be moved with the only beauty of goodneſs, it pleaſed the moſt merciful father of his tender kindneſs to allure us with ſweetneſs of rewards to love and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewards laid up for virtue, and that he ſhall not ſpend his labour in vain, whoſoever he be, that ſhall obey his commandments. He proclaimeth on the other ſide, that he not only abhorreth unrighteouſneſs, but alſo alſo that it ſhall not eſcape unpuniſhed, for that he will be a revenger of the contempt of his majeſty. And to exhort us by all means he promiſeth as well the bleſſings of this preſent life as alſo eternal bleſſedneſs to their obedience that keep his commandments. and to the tranſgreſſors thereof, he threateneth both preſent miſeries and the puniſhment of eternal death. For the ſame promiſe, (Lev. xviii. 4.) he that doth theſe things ſhall live in them; and alſo the threatening that anſwereth it, (Ezek. xviii. 4. 20.) the ſoul that ſinneth, that ſame ſhall die, do without doubt belong to the immortality or death that is to come, and which ſhall never have an end: whereſoever is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, under the one is contained the eternity of life, under the other eternal deſtruction. Of preſent (Lev. xxvi. 4.) bleſſings and (Deut. xxviii. 1.) curſes there is a longer catalogue recited in the law. And in the penal ordinances appeareth the ſovereign purity of God, that can ſuffer no iniquity: but beſides that in his promiſes his great love of righteouſneſs appears, (which he cannot find in his heart to deprive of it's reward) there is in the ſame promiſes manifeſted alſo his marvellous goodneſs. For whereas we and all ours are indebted unto his majeſty, by good right whatſoever he requireth of us, he demandeth it as due debt, but the payment of debt is not worthy of reward. Therefore he departeth with his own right, when he offereth reward to our obedience, which we do not yield of ourſelves as things that were not due: but what thoſe promiſes do bring unto us, is partly ſaid already, and partly ſhall appear more plainly in place fit for it. It ſufficeth for this preſent if we remember and conſider, that there is in the promiſes of the law, no ſmall commendations of righteouſneſs, that it may the more certainly appear how much the obſervation of it is pleaſing in the ſight of God: that the penal ordinances are made to ſhew God's greater deteſtation of unrighteouſneſs, leaſt the ſinner delighted with the ſweet flatterings of vices, ſhould forget that the judgment of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

God by making his will and commandment the only rule of our obedience excludeth all our own additional inventions of pleaſing him as unpleaſant and unacceptable

5. Now whereas the Lord giving a rule of perfect righteouſneſs, hath applied all the parts thereof to his own will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is ſo much more diligently to be obſerved as the wantonneſs of man's mind is more ready to deviſe now and then divers ſorts of worſhipping to gain his favour withal. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, becauſe it is naturally planted in the wit of man, hath ſhewed and yet doth ſhew forth itſelf, that men do always delight to invent a way to obtain righteouſneſs beſide the word of God; whereby it cometh to paſs that the commandments of the law have but ſmall place among the works that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable rout of men's works occupieth almoſt all the room. But what other thing meant Moſes than to reſtrain ſuch licentiouſneſs when after the publiſhing of the law he ſpake thus to the people: (Deut. xii. 28.) give heed, and hear all the things that I command thee, that it may go well with thee and to thy children after thee for ever, when thou ſhalt do that which is good and pleaſant before thy God. What I command thee, that only do: add not unto it, nor diminiſh it. And before, Deut. iv. 9. when he had proteſted that this was his wiſdom and underſtanding before other nations, that he had received judgments, righteouſneſs, and ceremonies of the Lord, he ſaid further, keep therefore thy ſelf and thy ſoul carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes have ſeen, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, becauſe God did foreſee, that the Iſraelites would not reſt, but that after they had received the law, they would beſide it travel in bringing forth new righteouſneſs, if they were not ſeverely holden back: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteouſneſs, which ſhould have been the ſtrongeſt ſtay to hold them back, and yet they did not ceaſe from that boldneſs ſo much forbidden them. But what of us? we are ſurely comprehended within the ſame charge: for doubtleſs that continueth ſtill whereby the Lord hath challenged to his law the abſolute doctrine of righteouſneſs, yet we not contented therewith, do monſtrouſly labour with inventing and deviſing new good works one upon another. For the healing of this fault, the beſt remedy ſhall be, if this thought ſhall be ſtedfaſtly ſettled in us, that the law is given us from God to teach us a perfect righteouſneſs: that therein is taught no righteouſneſs, but the ſame that is examined, by the appointed rule of God's will; that therefore new forms of works are vainly attempted to gain the favour of God, the true worſhip of whom conſiſts only in obedience, but rather that ſuch ſtudy of good works as wandereth out of the law of God, is an insufferable defiling of God's righteousness and of the true righteousness. Augustine, (Lib. 4. de civit. Dei cap. 12. de bono conjugali cont. adver. Legis & proph. 6.) also saith most truly, who calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometimes the mother and keeper, sometimes the original of all virtues.

The first rule for the right understanding of the law is, that it requireth not only outward but inward holiness: which is plain to him that marks the difference between God and mortal law-makers.

6. But when we have expounded the law of the Lord, then more fitly and with more profit shall that be confirmed which I have before spoken of the office and use of the law. But before that I begin to speak to every particular commandment distinctly by itself, it will be of use now to give such lessons as serve to the universal knowlege thereof. First let us hold for determined, that the life of man is instructed in the law not only to outward honesty, but also to inward and spiritual righteousness. Which thing whereas no man can deny, yet there are few who do rightly observe it. That cometh to pass, because they look not upon the law-maker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weighed. If any king do by proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill or to steal: in this case I grant that if a man do only conceive in his mind a lust to commit fornication, to sin, or to steal, and do not commit any of these things indeed, he is out of the compass of this prohibition. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortal law-maker, could not extend but to outward civility: his commandments are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eye nothing escapeth, and who regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleanness of the heart) under the prohibition of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, coveting, what is another's, guile, and whatsoever is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spiritual law-maker, he speaketh no less to the soul than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soul, are wrath and hatred; the thief of the soul, is evil desire and covetousness; the fornication of the soul, is lust. But human laws also (perhaps some will say) have regard to intention and inclination, and not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet are such intention and inclination, as have outwardly broken out. They consider with what intent every outward act hath been done, but they search not the secret thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man only withholdeth his hands from offending. On the other side, because the heavenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of the mind is principally needful to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, even when they mightily dissemble their contempt of the law, do frame their eyes, their feet, their hands, and all the parts of their bodies to some observation of the law, in the mean time they hold their heart most far off from all obedience, and think themselves well discharged, if they conceal from men that which they do in the sight of God. They hear it said: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adultery: Thou shalt not steal: they draw not out their sword to kill: they join not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their hands upon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole hearts they breath, out murders, they boil in lust, they cast their eyes aside at all mens goods, and devour them with coveting. Now wanteth that which was the chief point of the law. Whence, I pray you, cometh so gross dulness, but that leaving the law-maker, they rather measure righteousness by their own wit? Against these doth Paul mightily cry out, affirming (Rom. vii, 14.) that the law is spiritual, whereby he meaneth, that it not only demandeth an obedience of the soul, mind and will, but also requireth an angelic pureness, which having all the filthiness of the flesh clean wiped away, may savour nothing but of the spirit.

This Christ sheweth by expounding the law, not by teaching a new and another law perfecter and better as some perniciously imagine.

7. When we say that this is the meaning of the law, we thrust not in a new exposition of our own, but we follow Christ the best expositor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law that hath with outward work committed nothing against the law, he reproveth this most pernicious error, and pronounced that unchaste looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are murderers who hate their brother, for he maketh them guilty of judgment that have but conceived wrath in their mind, and them guilty of the counsel that in murmuring or grudging have uttered any token of a displeased mind: and them guilty of hell fire, that with taunts and railing break forth into open anger. They that have not discerned these things, have imagined Christ to be another Moſes, the giver of the law of the goſpel which ſupplied the imperfection of the law of Moſes. Whereupon cometh that common principle of perfection of the law of the goſpel, which ſurpaſſeth the old law, which is a moſt pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we ſhall gather a ſum of the commandments, it ſhall appear by Moſes himſelf, how reproachfully they diſhonour the law of God. Truly it ſheweth that all the holineſs of the fathers did not much differ from hypocriſy, and it leadeth us away from that only and perfect rule of righteouſneſs. But it is very eaſy to confute that error: for that they thought that Chriſt did add unto the law, whereas he did but reſtore the law to her integrity, while he made it free, and cleanſed it being obſcured with lies, and defiled with the leaven of the Phariſees.

The ſecond rule to underſtand the law by, is that in every commandment, more is meant than the naked words do literally import, and how much more, the ſcope of each commandment compared with the matter thereof together with the contrary will ſhew.

8. Let this be our ſecond obſervation, that there is always more contained in the commandments and prohibitions, than is literally expreſſed, which yet is ſo to be tempered, that it be not like a Leſbian rule, whereby licentiouſly wreſting the ſcriptures we may make of every thing what we pleaſe. For many bring to paſs by this unmeaſured liberty of running at large, that with ſome the authority of the ſcripture groweth in contempt, and others deſpair of underſtanding it. Therefore if it be poſſible, we muſt take ſome ſuch way, that may by right and perfect path lead us to the will of God, we muſt I ſay ſearch how far our expoſition may exceed the bounds of the words, that it may appear that it is not an addition of mens invention added to the word of God, but rather that the pure and natural meaning of the lawgiver is faithfully rendered. Truly in a manner in all the commandments it is ſo manifeſt; that there are figurative ſpeeches, meaning more in expreſſing part that he may worthily be laughed at that will reſtrain the meaning of the law to the narrowneſs of the words. It is evident therefore, that ſober expoſition doth paſs beyond the words: but how far, that remaineth hard to judge, unleſs there be ſome meaſure appointed: wherefore I think this to be the beſt meaſure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandment, that is, that in every commandment be conſidered, why it was given us. As for example: every commandment is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truth of both ſorts ſhall forthwith be found, if we conſider the intent or the end thereof. As the end of the fifth commandment is, that honour is to be given to them to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the ſum of the commandment, that it is right and pleaſeth God, that we honour them to whom he hath given any excellency, and that he abhorreth contempt and ſtubbornneſs againſt them. The intent of the firſt commandment is, that God alone be honoured. The ſum therefore of the commandment ſhall be, that true godlineſs, that is to ſay, true worſhip of his majeſty pleaſeth God, and that he abhorreth ungodlineſs. So in every commandment we muſt look upon what matter it treateth: then muſt we ſearch out the end, till we find what the law-maker doth teſtify therein properly to pleaſe or diſpleaſe him: and laſt of all muſt we draw an argument from the ſame to the contrary, after this manner: if this pleaſeth God, then the contrary diſpleaſeth him: if this diſpleaſe him, then the contrary pleaſeth him: if he command this, then he forbiddeth the contrary: if he forbid this, then he commandeth the contrary.

That the forbidding of evil in the law, implieth a commanding of the contrary duties which are good.

9. That which is now ſomewhat darkly touched, ſhall in expounding of the commandments become very plain by practice, wherefore it ſufficeth to have touched it, ſaving that this laſt point, is to be ſhortly confirmed with ſome proof thereof, becauſe otherways either it ſhould not be underſtood, or, being underſtood, it might perhaps at the beginning ſeem to ſound like an abſurdity. This needeth no proof, that when a good thing is commanded, the evil is forbidden that is contrary to it: for there is no man but he will grant it me. And every one of common judgment will not much ſcruple to admit, that when evil things are forbidden, the contrary duties are commanded. It is an univerſal opinion that virtues are commended, when the contrary vices are condemned. But we require ſomewhat more than thoſe forms of ſpeech do ſignify commonly among the people. For they for the moſt part take the virtue contrary to any vice, to be the abſtaining from the ſame vice: we ſay that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrary duties and actions. Therefore in this commandment, Thou ſhalt not kill, the common ſenſe of men will conſider nothing elſe, but that we muſt abſtain from all all doing of hurt, or inclination to do hurt. I ſay that there is further contained, that we ſhould by all the means in our power, ſuccour the life of our neighbour. And, leaſt I ſpeak without a reaſon, I prove it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or ill uſed, becauſe he willeth that our neighbour's life be dear and precious unto us: he doth therefore require withal thoſe duties of love that may be done by us for the preſervation of it. And ſo may we ſee how the end of the commandment doth always diſcover unto us all that we are therein commanded or forbidden to do,

The cauſe why God hath forbidden the very ſecret motion unto ſin by the name of the groſs and actual deed, is that the foulneſs of ſuch terms might make us the better to underſtand the uglineſs of thoſe faults which being expreſt by more proper and ſoft names we would make leſs account of.

10. But why God, in ſuch as it were half commandments, hath by figures rather ſecretly ſignified, than expreſſed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reaſons rendered thereof, this one reaſon pleaſeth me above the reſt. Becauſe the fleſh always endeavoureth to extenuate the filthineſs of ſin and to coulour it with fair pretences, ſaving where it is even palpable for groſſneſs, he hath ſet forth for an example in every kind of offence that which was moſt wicked and abominable, at the hearing whereof our very ſenſes might be moved with horror thereby to imprint in our minds a more hainous deteſtation of every ſort of ſin. This many times deceiveth us in conſidering of vices, that if they be any thing ſecret we make them ſeem ſmall. Theſe deceits the Lord doth diſcloſe, when he accuſtometh us to refer all the whole multitude of vices to theſe principal heads which do beſt of all ſhew, how much every kind is abominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought ſo hainous evils, when they are called by their own names, but when they are forbidden us under the name of man-ſlaughter, we better underſtand how abominable they are before God, by whoſe word they are ſet in the degree of ſo horrible an offence: and we moved by his judgement, do accuſtom our ſelves better to conſider the hainouſneſs of thoſe faults that before ſeemed but light unto us.

The reaſon of dividing the law into two parts or tables, whereof the former conteineth the duty which we owe properly unto God, is becauſe his worſhip is the fountain, head and foundation without which there can no good or acceptable duty paſs from man to man.

11. Thirdly is to be conſidered, what meaneth the dividing of the law of God into two tables whereof all wiſe men will judge that there is ſometimes mention made not unfitly from the purpoſe nor without cauſe. And we have a cauſe ready, that doth not ſuffer us to remain in doubt of this matter. For God ſo divided his law into two parts, in which is contained the whole righteouſneſs, that he hath aſſigned the firſt to the duties of religion that do peculiarly pertain to the worſhipping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of charity which belong unto men. The firſt foundation of righteouſneſs is the worſhip of God: which being once overthrown, all the other members of righteouſneſs are torn in ſunder and diſſolved, like to the parts of an houſe unjointed and fallen down. For what manner of righteouſneſs wilt thou call it, that thou vexeſt not men with robbery and extortions, if in the mean time by wicked ſacrilege thou ſpoileſt God's majeſty of his glory? that thou defileſt not thy body with furnication, if with thy blaſphemies thou prophanely abuſes the ſacred name of God? that thou murdereſt no man, if thou laboureſt to deſtroy and extinguiſh the memory of God. Wherefore righteouſneſs is vainly boaſted of without religion, and maketh no better ſhow than if a mangled body with the head cut of ſhould be brought forth for a beautiful ſight. And religion is not only the principal part of righteouſneſs but alſo the very ſoul wherewith it breatheth, and is quickned. For men keep not equity and love among themſelves without the fear of God. Therefore we ſay, that the worſhip of God is the beginning and foundation of righteouſneſs, becauſe when it is taken away, all the equity continence and temperance that men uſe among themſelves, is vain and trifling before God. We ſay alſo that it is the ſource and ſoul of righteouſneſs, becauſe hereby men do learn to live among themſelves ſoberly and without injuring one another if they reverence God as judge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the firſt table he inſtructeth us to godlineſs and the proper duties of religion, wherewith his majeſty is to be worſhipped: in the other he perſcribeth how for the fears ſake of his name, we ought to behave ourſelves in the ſociety of men. And for this reaſon our Lord (as the Evangeliſts, Matth. xxii. 27. Luk. xix. 27. rehearſe it) did in a ſum gather the whole law into two principal points, the one that we ſhould love God with all our heart, with all our ſoul, with all our ſtrength: the other that we love our neighbour as our ſelves. Thus thou ſeeſt how of the two parts under which he comprehends the whole law, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward man.

12. But although the whole law be contained in two principal points, yet to the end to take away all pretence of excuse, it pleased our God to declare in the ten commandments more largely and plainly all things that belong both to the honour, fear and love of himself, and also to that charity which he commandeth us to bear to men for his sake. And thy study is not ill spent to know the division of the commandments, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein every man ought to have his judgment free, for which we ought not contentiously to strive with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, least the readers should either laugh or wonder at the division that we shall use, as new and lately devised. That the law is divided in ten words, because it is oft approved by the authority of God himself, it is out of controversy, wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the manner of dividing. They that so divide them, that they give three commandments to the first table, and put other seven into the second, do wipe out of the number the commandment concerning images, or at least they hide it under the first: whereas without doubt it is distinctly given by the Lord for a commandment, and the tenth commandment of not coveting the things of our neighbour, they do fondly divide into two. Besides that it shall be presently given to understand, that such manner of dividing was unknown in the pure age. Others do reckon as we do, four several commandments in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commandment. As for me, because unless I be convinced by evident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandments, methinks I see so many divided in very fit order. Therefore, leaving to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allow, that is, that the same which these latter sort make the first commandment, shall be instead of a preface to the whole law, and then shall follow the commandments, four of the first table, and six of the second, in such order as they shall be rehearsed. Augustine (Lib. 2 quæst. vet. Test.) also to Boniface agreeth with us, who in reciting them observes this order: that God only be served with obedience of religion, that no idol be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vain, when he had before distinctly spoken of the shadowish commandment of the Sabbath In another place indeed that first division pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandments, the mystery of the Trinity more plainly appeareth. Altho' in the same place he scruples not to confess that otherwise he rather liketh our division. Besides these, the author of the unperfect work upon Matthew is of our side. Josephus, undoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table five commandments. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charity, and also is confuted by the authority of the Lord himself, who in Matthew rekoneth the commandment (Matth. xix. 19.) of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Now let us hear God himself speaking in his own words.

The First Commandment.

"I am the Lord thy God, who hath brought thee "out of the land of Ægypt, out of the house of "bondage. Thou shalt have no strange gods be- "fore my face."

To keep the law from growing into contempt the law-maker in the preface thereunto, useth three means; the first is a declaration of his greatness which to shew he termeth himself the Lord.

13. Whether you make the first sentence a part of the first commandment, or read it separately, it is indifferent unto me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth instead of a preface to the whole law. First in making of laws care is to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all provideth, that the majesty of the law that he shall make, may never at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he useth three manner of arguments. First, he challengeth to himself power and right of dominion, whereby he may constrain his chosen people, that they must of necessity obey him: then he setteth forth a promise of grace with the sweetness thereof to allure them to the study of holiness. Thirdly, he reciteth the benefit that he did for them, to reprove the Jews of unthankfulness, if they do not with obedience requite his kindness. Under the name of Jehovah, the Lord, is meant his authority and lawful dominion. And if all things be of him, and do abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, (Rom. xi. 36.) as Paul saith, ſaith. Therefore we are with this word alone ſufficiently brought under the yoke of God's majeſty, becauſe it were monſtrous for us to ſeek to withdraw our ſelves from under his government, out of whom we cannot be.

The ſecond, a manifeſtation of his love towards them unto whom he gave the law, ſignifying in gracious words that he had betaken himſelf to be wholly theirs.

14. After that he hath ſhewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, leaſt he ſhould ſeem to draw by neceſſity only, he alſo allureth with ſweetneſs in pronouncing, that he is the God of the church. For there is hidden in this ſpeech a mutual relation, which is contained in the promiſe: I will be to them a God, and they ſhall be to me a people. (Jer. xxxi. 8.) Whereupon Chriſt (Matth. xxii. 32.) proveth that Abraham Iſaac, and Jacob have immortal life, by this that God teſtifieth that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he ſhould ſay thus: I have choſen you to be my people, not only to do you good in this preſent life, but alſo to give you the bleſſedneſs of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is obſerved in divers places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchſafe to deal thus mercifully with us, to call us into the company of his people, he chuſeth us (ſaith Moſes) Deut. vii. 6. and xiv. 2. that we ſhould be a peculiar people unto himſelf, a holy people, and ſhould keep his commandments. From whence alſo cometh this exhortation: (Levit. xix. 2.) Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of theſe two is derived that proteſtation that is in the prophet: A ſon honoureth his father, and a ſervant honoureth his maſter. If I be a maſter where is my fear? If I be a father, where is my love?

The third, a rehearſal of ſuch a benefit as could not but be unto them that received it, an everlaſting bond of dutiful obedience,

15. Now followeth the rehearſal of his benefit, which ought to be of ſo much more force to move us, as the fault of unthankfulneſs is more deteſtable even among men. He then did put Iſrael in remembrance of a benefit lately done, but ſuch a one as for the miraculous greatneſs thereof being worthy to be had in remembrance for ever, ſhould remain in force with their poſterity. Moreover it is moſt agreeable for this preſent matter. For the Lord ſeemeth to ſay that they were delivered out of miſerable bondage for this purpoſe, that they ſhould with obedience and readineſs of ſervice honour him, the author of their deliverance. He uſeth alſo, (to the end to hold us faſt in the true worſhipping of him alone) to ſet out himſelf with certain titles, whereby he maketh his ſacred majeſty to be diſtinctly known from all idols and falſe gods. For, as I ſaid before, ſuch is our ready inclination to vanity, joined with raſh boldneſs, that ſo ſoon as God is named, our mind cannot take heed to itſelf, but that it by and by falleth away to ſome vain invention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this miſchief, he ſetteth out his own Godhead with certain titles and ſo doth compaſs us in, as it were within certain grates, leaſt we ſhould wander hither and thither and raſhly forge ourſelves ſome new god, if forſaking the living God, we ſhould erect an idol. For this cauſe ſo oft as the prophets mean properly to point him out, they clothe him and as it were incloſe him, within thoſe marks, whereby he had revealed himſelf to the people of Iſrael. And yet when he is called (Exod. iii. 6.) the God of Abraham, or (Amos i. 2.) the God of Iſrael, when he is ſet in the temple of Jeruſalem among the cherubims, theſe and the like forms of ſpeech do not bind him to one place or to one people, but are ſet only for this purpoſe, to ſtay the thoughts of the godly on that God, who by his covenant, that he hath made with Iſrael, hath ſo repreſented himſelf, that it is no way lawful to vary from ſuch a pattern. But let this remain ſtedfaſtly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliverance to this end, that the Jews might the more cheerfully give themſelves to the God that doth by right claim them unto him. And we (leaſt we ſhould think that the ſame does not at all belong to us,) ought to conſider, that the bondage of Ægypt is a figure of the ſpiritual captivity, wherein we are all holden bound, until our heavenly deliverer do make us free by the power of his arm, and convey us into the kingdom of liberty. As therefore when in the old time he minded to gather together the Iſraelites that were ſcattered abroad, to the worſhipping of his name, he delivered them out of the intolerable dominion of Pharaoh, wherewith they were oppreſſed: ſo all thoſe to whom at this day he profeſſeth himſelf a God, he doth now deliver from the deadly power of the devil, which was in a ſhadow ſignified by that corporeal bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his mind ought to be inflamed to hearken to the law which he heareth to have proceeded from the ſovereign king. From whom as all things take their beginning, ſo is it meet that they have alſo their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I ſay) but he ought to be raviſhed to embrace the law-maker, to the keeping of whoſe commandments, he is taught that he is peculiarly choſen: from whoſe bounty he looketh both for a plentiful ſtore of all good things, and alſo the glory of immortal life: by whoſe marvellous power and mercy, he knoweth himſelf to be delivered out of the jaws of death.

The firſt commandment where in to eſtabliſh his ſole pre-eminence over his people, he requireth that which is due to be given him, and him alone, as adoration, affiance, invocation, and thankſgiving; which if we do not yield unto him or do unto others with him, either in whole or in part, he hath a revenging eye to behold it, be it never ſo ſmall or ſecret.

16. After that he hath grounded and ſtabliſhed the authority of his law, he ſetteth forth the firſt commandment, "That we "have no ſtrange gods before "him." The end of this commandment is, that God will only have pre-eminence, and wholly enjoy his own authority among his people. And that it may be ſo, he commandeth that there be far from us all ungodlineſs and ſuperſtition, whereby the glory of his Godhead is either diminiſhed or obſcured: and for the ſame reaſon he commandeth, that we worſhip and honour him with true endeavour of godlineſs. And the very ſimplicity of the words themſelves do in a manner expreſs the ſame. For we cannot have God, but we muſt alſo comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth us to have other gods, he meaneth thereby, that we ſhould not give away elſewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe unto God be innumerable, yet not unfitly they may be brought unto four principal points. Adoration, whereunto, as a thing depending upon it, is adjoined ſpiritual obedience of conſcience: truſt, invocation and thankſgiving. Adoration I call the reverence and worſhip which every one of us yieldeth unto him, when he ſubmitteth himſelf unto his greatneſs: wherefore I do not without cauſe make this a part thereof, that we yield our conſciences in ſubjection to his law. Truſt is an aſſuredneſs of reſting in him by acknowledging of his attributes, when repoſing all wiſdom, righteouſneſs, power, truth and goodneſs in him, we think ourſelves bleſſed with only partaking of him. Invocation, is a reſorting of our mind to his faith and help as to our only ſuccour, ſo oft as any neceſſity preſſeth us. Thankſgiving is a certain thankfulneſs whereby the praiſe of all good things is given unto him. Of theſe, as God ſuffereth nothing to be conveyed away elſewhere, ſo he commanded all to be wholly given to himſelf. Neither ſhall it be enough to abſtain from having any ſtrange God, unleſs thou reſtrain thy ſelf in this, that many wicked contemners are wont, who think the readieſt way, to ſcorn all religions: but true religion muſt go before, whereby our minds may be directed to the living God, with knowlege whereof they being endued may aſpire to reverence, fear and worſhip his majeſty, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, every where to ſeek for his help, to acknowlege and extol with confeſſion of praiſe the magnificence of his works, as to the only mark in all the doings of our life. Then that we beware of perverſe ſuperſtition, whereby our minds departing from the true God, are drawn hither and thither as it were unto divers gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let us call to remembrance that which is before ſaid, that all falſe gods are to be driven far away, and that the worſhip is not to be torn in ſunder, which he alone claimeth to himſelf. For it is not lawful to take away any thing from his glory, be it never ſo little, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remain with him. The little clauſe that followeth (before my face) encreaſeth the hainouſneſs: for that God is provoked to jealouſy, ſo oft as we thruſt our own inventions in his place, as if an unchaſte woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her huſband's eyes ſhould the more vex his mind. Therefore when God teſtified that with his preſent power and grace he looked upon the people that he had choſen, the more to deter them from the wicked act of revolting from him, he giveth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witneſs and beholder of their ſacrilege. For this boldneſs is encreaſed with much wickedneſs, that man thinketh that in his flying away he can beguile the eyes of God. On the other ſide, God cryeth out that whatſoever we purpoſe, whatſoever we go about, whatſoever we practiſe, it cometh in his ſight. Let therefore our conſcience be pure even from the moſt ſecret thoughts of departing from him, if we will have our religion to pleaſe the Lord. For he requireth to have the glory of his Godhead whole and uncorrupted not only in outward confeſſion, but alſo in his eyes, which do behold the moſt ſecret corners of hearts.

"Thou ſhalt not make to thee any graven image, "nor any likeneſs of thoſe things that are in "heaven above or in earth beneath, or in the "water under the earth. Thou ſhalt not wor-"ſhip them, nor ſerve them."

The end of the ſecond commandment being to keep the worſhip of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddeth firſt to make any image for repreſentation of God, and, ſecondly, to worſhip any image made.

17. As in the firſt commandment he pronounceth that he is the one God beſide whom there are no other gods to be deviſed or had, ſo now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kind of worſhip he is to be honoured: that we may not preſume to forge any carnal thing for him. The end therefore of this commandment is, that he will not have the lawful worſhip of him, to be prophaned with ſuperſtitious uſages. Wherefore in ſum, he calleth and draweth us away from the carnal obſervations, which our fooliſh mind is wont to invent, when it conceiveth God according to her own groſſneſs. And therefore he frameth us to the lawful worſhip of him, that is the ſpiritual worſhip and which is appointed by him. He ſpeaketh of the groſſeſt fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there are two parts of this commandment. The firſt reſtraineth our liberty, that we do not preſume to make ſubject to our ſenſes or by any form to repreſent God, which is incomprehenſible. The ſecond part forbiddeth us to honour any images for religion's ſake. Moreover he ſhortly reciteth all the forms wherewith he was wont to be expreſſed in ſhape, by the profane and ſuperſtitious nations. By thoſe things that are in heaven, he meaneth the ſun, the moon, and other ſtars, and perhaps likewiſe birds, as expreſſing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomy, Deut. iv. 15. he meaneth as well birds as ſtars. Which note I would not have ſpoken of, but that I ſaw ſome unſkifully to apply it to angels. Therefore I omit the other parts becauſe they are ſufficiently known of themſelves. And we have already in the firſt book taught plainly enough, that whatſoever viſible forms of God man doth invent, they are directly contrary to his nature, and that therefore ſo ſoon as images come forth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18. The penal ordinance that followeth ought not a little to avail to ſhake of our ſlothfulneſs. For he threatneth: That he is the Lord our God, a mighty and jealous God, that viſiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and ſheweth mercy unto thouſands of them that love him and keep his commandments. This is as much in effect, as if he ſhould have ſaid, that is he only to whom he ought to adhere. And to induce us to this, he ſpeaketh of his power, that doth not without puniſhment ſuffer itſelf to be contemned or diminiſh. Here is indeed ſet the name El, which ſignifieth God. But becauſe it is derived of power to expreſs the ſenſe the better, I did not ſcruple ſo to tranſlate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himſelf jealous that can abide no rival. Thirdly, he affirmeth, that he will be a revenger of his majeſty and glory if any do tranſfer it to creatures or to graven images, and that not with a ſhort or ſlender revenge, but ſuch as ſhall extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is, ſuch as ſhall be followers of their fathers ungodlineſs: as alſo he ſheweth a perpetual mercy and bountifulneſs unto long continuance of poſterity, to thoſe that love him and keep his law: it is a common manner with God to take upon him the perſon of a huſband towards us. For the conjunction wherewith he bindeth himſelf unto us, when he receiveth us into the boſom of his church, is like unto a certain holy wedlock, that muſt ſtand by mutual faithfulneſs. As he doth all the duties of a faithful and true huſband, ſo again he requireth of us ſuch love and chaſtity as ought to be in wedlock, that we yield not our ſouls to Satan, to luſt, and to filthy deſires of the fleſh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the apoſtacy of the Jews, complaineth, Jer. iii. that they did throw away chaſtity, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the huſband, the more holy and chaſte that he himſelf is, the more is he kindled to anger, if he ſee his wife's mind incline to a ſtrange lover: ſo the Lord, Hoſea ii. that hath wedded us

The penalty annexed to the ſecond commandment, which the better to imprint, God mentioneth his power, his jealouſy, his practice in ſhewing both vengeance and mercy, not ſlightly but with long continuance as well of the one as the other: and the reaſon why God of himſelf as in the perſon of an huſband.

unto himself in truth, testifyeth that he hath a most fervently burning jealousy, so oft as neglecting the pureness of his holy marriage, we are defiled with wicked lusts, but specially then when we transfer to any other, or do infect with any superstition the worship of his name, which ought to be most uncorrupted: forasmuch as by this mean we do not only break the faith given in wedlock, but also so defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

That by the punishment which God doth threaten to the children of the disobedient for their fathers fault, that spiritual curse is meant, whereby as the father being destitute of the Spirit liveth wickedly, so the son likewise forsaken of God, followeth the same way to destruction.

19. In the threatning is to be seen what he meaneth by this, when he saith, that he will visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. For besides that it consists not with the equity of God's justice, to punish the innocent for another's offence, God himself also saith, that he will not make the son to bear the wickedness of the father, Ezek. xviii. 20. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sins of the ancestors upon the generation to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speak unto him, Numb. xiv. 8. Lord, Lord, that rendereſt the iniquity of the fathers to the children, unto the third and fourth generation. Likewise Jeremiah, (Jer. xxxii. 18.) Thou that shewest mercy to thousands, that rendereſt the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of the children after them. Many while they labour much in loosing this knot, think that it is to be understood only of temporal punishments, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurdity, for as much as they are often laid upon them for their salvation, which is indeed true. For Isaiah declared to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxix. 7. that his sons should be spoiled of the kingdom, and carried into exile for the sin that he had committed. The houses of (Gen. xii. 17.) Pharaoh and (and xx. 3.) Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleged for deciding this question, it is rather a shift than a true exposition. For here and in parallel places he threateneth a more grievous revenge than may be limited within the bounds of this present life. It is therefore thus to be understood: that the just curse of the Lord lieth not only upon the head of the wicked man himself, but also upon his whole family: when the curse once lieth upon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the Spirit of God, live most wickedly, and the son likewise forsaken of the Lord for the father's fault, does follow the same way of destruction: and finally the child's child, and the child of the child's child, the cursed seed of detestable men do fall headlong after them?

That for God so to plague men in their posterity, it is neither unjust nor repugnant unto that which the prophet hath where he teacheth how childrens teeth are not set on edge by the sowre grapes which their fathers have eaten.

20. First, let us see whether such revenge be unseemly for the justice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the Lord vouchsafeth not to communicate his grace. Nevertheless they do perish by their own unrighteousness, and not by unrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarrel: Why they are not assisted by the grace of God to salvation as others are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laid upon wicked men and evil doers for their offences that their houses are deprived of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuse God for this most just revenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, that the punishment of the father's sin shall not pass over unto the son. Observe what is there treated of. When the Israelites had been long and continually vexed with many calamities, they began to use for a proverb, that their fathers had eaten a sowre grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sins, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deserving it, did suffer the punishment rather by the unappeasable wrathfulness of God, than by a moderate severity. The prophet pronounceth unto them that it is not so: because they are punished for their own offences, and that it standeth not with the justice of God that the righteous son should suffer punishment for the naughtiness of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other means of salvation: in this that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, do go on in the steps of their fathers, they sustain curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporal miseries, and at last to eternal destruction, herein they are punished by the just judgment of God,

God not for the sins of others, but for their own iniquity.

The promise of mercy towards them and their, that fear God, begets comfort, is not varied by their issues, swerving sometimes out of kind, and it setteth out the largeness of his mercy to exceed the rigour of his justice.

21. On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemn covenant of the church: I will be thy God and of thy seed after thee. Which thing Solomon having respect unto, writeth that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not only by reason of holy bringing up, which also not a little availeth thereunto, but also for that blessing promised in the covenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon groweth great comfort to the faithful, great terror to the wicked. For if even after death, the remembrance both of righteousness and wickedness be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth unto posterity, much more shall it light and rest upon the heads of the doers themselves. But it maketh nothing against us, that the issue of the wicked many times cometh to good proof, and the issue of the faithful swerveth out of kind: because the lawmaker meant not here to establish such a perpetual rule as should derogate from his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous, and for the terror of the wicked, that the penalty is not vain or of no effect, although it do not always take place. For as the temporal punishments that are laid upon a few wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sins, and of the judgment that shall one day be given upon all sinners, although many escape unpunished even to the end of their life: so when God giveth one example of this blessing to shew mercy and bountifulness to the son for the father's sake, he giveth a proof of his constant and perpetual favour to them that worship him; and when he once pursueth the wickedness of the father in the son, he sheweth what judgment is prepared for all the reprobate for their own offences. Which assuredness he had in this place principally respect unto. And by the way he commendeth unto us the largeness of his mercy, which he extendeth unto a thousand generations, whereas he assigned but only four generations to vengeance.

The Third Commandment.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy "God in vain."

The end of the third commandment is the holy estimation of God's name which excludeth all ideas and speeches concerning him which are not agreeable to his greatness all irreverend mentioning of his word all carping at his works and if all rash, much more all impious abusing thereof.

22. The end of this commandment, is that his pleasure is to have the majesty of his name hallowed among us. Therefore the sum shall be that we do not defile it with the contemptuous and irreverent use of it. With which prohibiton the commandment hangeth orderly together, that we take study and care godlily to reverence it. Therefore we ought so to order our selves both in our minds and in our tongues, that we neither think nor speak any thing of God himself or his mysteries, but reverently and with much sobriety: that in considering his works we conceive nothing but what is honourable toward him. These three things I say, it behoveth us not negligently to mark, that whatsoever our mind conceiveth of him, whatsoever our tongue uttereth, it may savour of his excellency, and may agree with the holy highness of his name: and finally may serve to advance his magnificence. That we do not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy word and reverend mysteries either to ambition, or to covetousness, or to our own triflings: but that as they bear the dignity of his name imprinted in them, so they may keep their honour and estimation among us. Last of all, that we do not carp against or speak evil of his works, as these wretched men are wont to babble reproachfully against them: but that whatsoever we rehearse done by him, we report it with words of praise of his wisdom, righteousness and goodness. That is to sanctify the name of of God. Where otherwise done it is defiled with vain and perverse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right use to which only it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoiled of his dignity, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much evil in this rash readiness to use the name of God out of season, much more mischief is in this, if it be employed to evil uses, as they do that make it to serve the superstitions of Necromancy, cruel execrations, unlawful conjurations, and other wicked enchantments. But ſwearing is chiefly mentioned in the commandment, as the thing wherein the perverſe abuſe of God's name is moſt deteſtable, that thereby we may be the better deterred from all defiling thereof. But that here is commandment given of the worſhip of God, and of the reverence of his name, and not of the truth and equity that is to be kept among men, appeareth from hence that he afterward in the ſecond table condemneth perjury and falſe witneſs, whereby hurt is done to human ſociety: but it were in vain to repeat it again, if this commandment treated of the duty of charity. And alſo the diviſion of the law it ſelf requireth it, becauſe as it is ſaid, God did not in vain appoint two tables for his law, from whence it is gathered that in this commandment he challengeth his own right to himſelf, and defendeth the holineſs of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

The reverence God requireth to be given to his name in oaths.

23. Firſt let us ſee what is an oath. It is a taking of God to witneſs, to confirm the truth of that which we ſpeak. For thoſe curſed ſpeeches that contain manifeſt reproaches againſt God, are unworthy to be reckoned among oaths. That ſuch taking to witneſs, when it is rightly done, is a kind of worſhipping of God, is ſhewed in diverſe places of the ſcripture. As when Iſaiah propheſieth of the calling of the Aſſyrians and Ægyptians into fellowſhip of the covenant with Iſrael, they ſhall ſpeak (ſaith he) in the tongue of Canaan, and ſhall ſwear in the name of the Lord. That is to ſay, in ſwearing by the name of the Lord, they ſhall yield a confeſſion of his religion. Again, when he ſpeaketh of the enlargement of his kingdom, he ſaith, whoſoever ſhall bleſs himſelf, ſhall bleſs himſelf in the God of truth: and he that ſhall ſwear in the land ſhall ſwear in the true God. Jeremiah ſaith, xii. 16. if they ſhall teach the people to ſwear in my name as they have taught them to ſwear by Baal, they ſhall be builded up in the midſt of my houſe. And for good cauſe it is ſaid, that when we call upon the name of the Lord to witneſs, we do witneſs our religion toward him. For ſo we confeſs that he is the eternal and unchangeable truth, whom we call upon, not only as a moſt ſubſtantial witneſs of truth above all others but alſo as the only defence thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of hearts. For where human teſtimonies fail, there we flee to God for witneſs, ſpecially where any thing is to be proved that lieth ſecret in conſcience. For which cauſe the the Lord is exceeding angry with them that ſwear by ſtrange Gods, and he judgeth that manner of ſwearing to be an argument of manifeſt revolting from his allegiance: Thy ſons have forſaken me, and do ſwear by them that are no Gods. And he declareth the hainouſneſs of this offence by the threatning of puniſhment: (Jer. v. 7. Zeph. i. 5.) I will deſtroy them that ſwear by the name of the Lord and ſwear by Melchan.

Perjury, a profanation of the name of God.

24. Now then we underſtand that it is the Lord's will that there be in our oaths a reverence of his name: ſo much the more diligent heed is to be taken, that in ſtead of reverencing they do not contain diſhonour, contempt or abaſement of it. For it is no ſmall diſhonour, when perjury is committed in ſwearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, profanation. For what is left to the Lord when he is ſpoiled of his truth? he ſhall then ceaſe to be God. But truly he is ſpoiled thereof when he is made an affirmer and approver of falſehood. Wherefore, when Joſ. vii. 9. Joſhua minded to drive Achan to confeſs the truth he ſaid: my ſon give glory to the Lord of Iſrael, meaning thereby, that the Lord is grievouſly diſhonoured if a man ſwear falſly by him. And no wonder for we do as much as in us lyeth, in a manner to ſtain his holy name with a lye. And that this manner of ſpeech was uſed among the Jews ſo oft as any was called to take an oath appeareth by the like proteſtation that the Phariſees uſe in the Goſpel of John. John ix. 24. To this heedfulneſs the forms of oaths that are uſed in the ſcriptures do inſtruct us: 1. Sam. xiv. The Lord liveth, 2 King. vi. 31. the Lord do theſe things unto me, and add theſe things, 2. Cor. i. 23. The Lord be witneſs upon my ſoul. Which do prove that we cannot call God for witneſs of our ſayings, but that we alſo wiſh him to take vengeance of our perjury, if we ſpeak deceitfully.

The name of God abuſed when uſed as a witneſs though in truth yet wantonly without any urgent cauſe.

25. The name of the Lord is made vile and common, when it is uſed in ſuperfluous oaths although they be true. For in ſuch caſe it is alſo taken in vain. Wherefore it ſhall not be ſufficient to abſtain from ſwearing falſly, unleſs we do alſo remember, that ſwearing was ſuffered and ordained not for luſt or pleaſure, but for neceſſity's ſake: and therefore they go beyond the lawful uſe thereof, that apply it to things not neceſſary. And there can no other neceſſity be pretended but where it is to ſerve either re-religion or charity, wherein at this day men do too much licentiously offend, and so much the more intolerably because by very custom it hath ceased to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the judgment seat of God is not slighty considered. For every where without regard the name of God is defiled in trifling conversation, and it is not thought that they do evil, because by long suffered and unpunished boldness, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickedness. But the commandment of the Lord remaineth in force, the penalty abideth in strength, and shall one day have its effect, whereby there is a certain special revenge proclaimed against them that use his name in vain. This commandment is also transgressed in another point, that in our oaths we put the holy servants of God in the place of God, with manifest ungodliness, for so we transfer the glory of his Godhead to them. Deu. vi. 13. & x. 20. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath given a special commandment to swear by his name, and by special prohibition forbidden, Exod. xxiii. 13. that we should not be heard swear by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing do call upon a higher than themselves, and that God who had none greater than his own glory to swear by, did swear by himself.

The folly of Anabaptists in collecting the simple unlawfulness of all oaths out of the words of our Saviour Christ.

26. The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, do detest all oaths without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is general, Matt. v. I say unto ye, swear not at all, but let your conversation be yea, yea, and nay, nay, whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil. But by this mean, they do without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him adversary to his father, and as if he had come down from heaven to repeal his father's decrees. For the eternal God doth not only in the law (Ex. xxii. 11.) permit swearing as a thing lawful, which were enough: but also in necessity doth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father: John vii. 16. that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himself, &c. What then? will they make God contrary to himself, who shall afterwards forbid and condemn the same thing in mens conduct which he hath before allowed by commanding it? But because there is some difficulty in the words of Christ, let us consider them a little. But herein we shall never attain the truth, unless we consider the intention of Christ, and take heed unto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restrain the law, but to reduce it to the true and original meaning, which had been very much depraved by the false glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees. If we carefully attend to this we shall not imagine Christ did condemn oaths altogether but only those which are transgressions of the rule of the law. Hence it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no manner of swearing but perjuries, whereas the law doth not only forbid perjuries, but also all idle and superfluous oaths. The Lord (Matt. v. 34.) therefore the most sure expositor of the law, doth admonish them, that it is not only evil to swear falsely, but also to swear. But how to swear? in vain. But as for these oaths that are commanded in the law, he leaveth them safe and at liberty. They seem to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest hold of this word. At all, which yet is not referred to the word swear, but to the forms of swearing that are after rehearsed. For this was also part of their error, that when they did swear by heaven and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principal kind of offence against this commandment, the Lord doth also cut off from them all by shifts that they should not think that they have escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heaven and earth to witness. For here by the way it is also to be observed, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect forms do swear by him, as if they swear by the lively light, by the bread that they eat, by their baptism or other tokens of God's goodness towards them. Neither doth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to swear by heaven and earth and Jerusalem, speak it to correct superstition, as some men falsely think, but he rather confuteth their sophistical subtilty who thought it no fault babblingly to throw out indirect oaths, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is ingraven in all his benefits. But otherways it is, where either a mortal man, or a dead man, or an angel is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flattery devised that stinking form of swearing by the life or soul of the king: for then the false making of gods doth obscure and diminish the glory of the one only God. But when we mean only, to procure credit to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling oaths his majesty is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousness, all pretence of excuse, in this, that he forbiddeth to ſwear at all. And (Jam. v. 12.) James to the ſame purpoſe, reciting the ſame words of Chriſt which I have before alleged, becauſe the ſame raſh boldneſs hath always been in the world, which is a profane miſuſing of the name of God. For if ye refer this word, at all, to the ſubſtance, as if without any exception it were altogether unlawful to ſwear: wherefore ſerveth that expoſition which is added afterward: neither by heaven nor by earth, &c? Whereby it ſufficiently appeareth that thoſe cavils are met withal, by which the Jews thought their fault to be excuſed.

Oaths not only publick but alſo private ſoberly and reverently taken allowable and according both to reaſon and to approved examples.

27. Therefore it cannot now be doubtful to ſound judgments, that the Lord in that place did only reprove thoſe oaths that were forbidden by the law. For he himſelf who ſhewed in his life an exemplar of the perfection that he taught, did not ſtick to ſwear when occaſion required. And his diſciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their maſter in all things, followed the ſame example: who dare ſay that Paul would have ſworn, if ſwearing had been utterly forbidden? but when the matter ſo required, he ſware without any ſticking at it, yea, ſometimes adding an execration. But this queſtion is not yet ended, becauſe ſome do think that only public oaths are excepted out of this prohibition, as thoſe oaths that we take when the magiſtrate doth offer them to us and require them of us. And ſuch as princes uſe to take in ſtabliſhing of leagues, or the people when they ſwear allegiance to their prince, or the ſoldier when he is put to an oath for his true ſervice in the war, and ſuch like. And to this ſort they adjoin, and that rightfully, ſuch oaths as are in Paul, to confirm the dignity of the goſpel, for as much as the apoſtles in their office are not private men but public miniſters of God. And truly I deny not that thoſe are the ſafeſt oaths, becauſe they are defended with ſoundeſt teſtimonies of ſcripture. The magiſtrate is commanded in a doubtful caſe to drive the witneſs to an oath, and he on the other ſide to anſwer by oath: and the apoſtle ſaith, that mens controverſies are by this mean ended. In this commandment both theſe have a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and we may obſerve, that among the old heathen men, the public and ſolemn oath was had in great reverence, but common oaths that were uſually ſpoken without conſideration, were either nothing or very little regarded, becauſe they thought that in theſe they had not to do with the majeſty of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemn private oaths, that are in neceſſary caſes ſoberly, holily, and reverently taken, which are maintained both by reaſon and examples. For if it be lawful for private men in a weighty and earneſt matter to appeal to God as judge between them, much more is it lawful to call him to witneſs. Put the caſe: thy brother will accuſe thee of falſe breach of faith, thou endeavoureſt to purge thyſelf according to the duty of charity, and he by no means will ſuffer himſelf to be ſatisfied. If thy reputation be in danger by his obſtinate malicioufneſs, thou ſhalt without offence appeal to the judgment of God, that it will pleaſe him in time to make thine innocency known. Now if the weight of the words be conſidered, it is a leſs matter to call him to witneſs. Therefore I ſee not why in this caſe we ſhould affirm, that the calling him to witneſs is unlawful. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the oath of Abraham (Gen. xxi. 24.) and Iſaac with Abimelech be ſaid not to ſerve for our purpoſe, becauſe it was made in the name of a public company, yet (xxvi. 31. and xxxi. 53.) Jacob and Laban were private men, who ſtabliſhed a covenant with mutual oath between themſelves. Boaz (Ruth. iii. 13.) was a private man who by the ſame mean confirmed his promiſe of marriage to Ruth. Obadiah (1 Kings xviii. 10.) was a private man, a juſt man and fearing God, who affirmed unto Elijah by oaths, the thing that he meant to perſuade him. Therefore I have no better rule, but that oaths be ſo tempered, that they be not unadviſed, that they be not common without regard, that they be not uſed of raging luſt, nor triffling, but that they ſerve juſt neceſſity, as where the Lord's glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which end the commandment of the law tendeth.

The Fourth Commandment.

" Remember that thou keep holy the ſabbath day.
" Six days ſhalt thou labour and do all thy " works. But on the ſeventh day is the ſab-
" bath of the Lord thy God. In it thou ſhalt
" do no work, &c.

Three cauſes conſiderable in the fourth command-

28. The end of this commandment is, that we being dead to our own affections and works, ſhould be employed in medi-

ment concerning the observation of the sabbath day

meditation of the kingdom of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such means as he hath ordained. But because this commandment hath a peculiar and distinct consideration from the rest, therefore it must have also a distinct manner of exposition. The old writers use to call it a shadowish commandment, for that it containeth the outward observation of the day, which by the coming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I grant they say truly, but they touch but half the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I think) I have marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandment depends. For first the heavenly lawmaker meant under the rest of the seventh day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spiritual rest, whereby the faithful ought to cease from their own works, that they might suffer God to work in them. Secondly, his will was to have one appointed day, wherein they should meet together to hear the law, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his works: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godliness. Thirdly, he thought good to have a day of rest granted to servants, and such as lived under the government of others, wherein they might have some ceasing from their labour.

The Sabbath a figure of spiritual rest.

29. But we are many ways taught that the same shadowing of the spiritual rest, was the principal point in the Sabbath. For the Lord requireth the keeping of no commandment in a manner more distinctly, than this: when his meaning is in the prophets to declare that all religion is overthrown, then he complaineth (Num. xiii. 22.) that his Sabbaths are polluted, (Jer. xvii. 12. and 27.) defiled, not kept, nor (Exod. xxxi. 13. and xxxv. 2.) sanctified: as though that piece of service being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honoured. He did set forth the observing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithful did among other oracles marvellously esteem the reviling of the Sabbath. For in (Neh. ix. 14.) thus spake the Levites in a solemn convocation, Thou hast shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbath, and hast given them the commandments and the ceremonies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commandments of the law. All which things do serve to set forth the dignity of the mystery, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezekiel. Thus you have in Exodus, See that ye keep my Sabbath day, because it is a token between me and you in your generations: that you may know that I am the Lord that sanctify you: keep my Sabbath, for it is holy unto you. Let the children of Israel keep the Sabbath and celebrate it in their generations, it is an everlasting covenant between me and the children of Israel, and a perpetual token. Yet (in Ezek. xx. 12.) speaketh more at large. But the sum thereof cometh to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should know that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our own will, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward sign with the inward thing itself, we must altogether rest, that God may work in us: we must depart from our own will, we must resign up our heart, we must banish all lusts of the flesh. Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our own wit, that we may have God working in us: that we may rest in him, as the apostle (Heb. iii. 13. and iv. 9.) also teacheth.

God's appointing the seventh day for the Sabbath, and his ratifying the same, by his own example, was to confirm the perfection of that everlasting rest whereof the sabbath day being a figure is appointed on a day which following in orderly numeration beareth the name of a perfect number.

30. This perpetual ceasing was represented to the Jews, by the keeping of one day among seven: which day, to make it be observed with greater devotion, the Lord commended with his own example. For it availeth not a little to stir up man's endeavour, that he may know that he tendeth to the following of his creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seven: forasmuch as that number is in the scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signify everlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his works, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of days and nights. There may be also brought another probable remark of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabbath should never be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we begin our blessed rest, in it we do do daily proceed in profiting more and more. But becauſe we have ſtill a continual war with the fleſh, it ſhall not be ended until that ſaying of Iſaiah be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of new moon with new moon, of Sabbath with Sabbath, (Iſa. lxvi. 23.) even then when God ſhall be all in all. (1. Cor. xv. 28.) It may ſeem therefore that the Lord hath by the ſeventh day ſet forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbath at the laſt day, that our whole life might by continual meditation of the Sabbath, aſpire to this perfection.

The principal thing in the Sabbath is the myſtery of perpetual reſt: the ceremonial uſe thereof abrogated, the ſuperſtitious obſervation to be avoided.

31. If any man diſlike this obſervation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not againſt him, but that he may more ſimply take it: that the Lord ordained one certain day, wherein his people might under the diſcipline of the law be exerciſed to the continual meditation of the ſpiritual reſt: and that he aſſigned the ſeventh day, either becauſe he thought it ſufficient, or that by ſetting forth the likeneſs of his own example, he might the better move the people to keep it or at leaſt to put them in mind, that the Sabbath tendeth to no other end, but that they ſhould become like unto their creator. For it maketh ſmall matter, ſo that the myſtery remain which is therein principally ſet forth, concerning the perpetual reſt of our works, to conſideration whereof the prophets did now and then call back the Jews that they ſhould not think themſelves diſcharged by carnal taking of their reſt. Beſide the places already alleged, you have thus in Iſaiah: (Iſa. lviii. 13.) If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, that thou do not thine own will on my holy day, and ſhall call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable and ſhalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleaſure, nor ſpeaking thine own words, then ſhalt thou delight thyſelf in the Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the coming of our Lord Chriſt, ſo much as was ceremonial herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whoſe preſence all figures do vaniſh away, he is the body at ſight whereof the ſhadows are left, he, I ſay is the true fulfilling of the Sabbath, (Rom. vi. 4.) we being buried with him by baptiſm, are graffed into the fellowſhip of his death, that we being made partakers of the reſurrection, we may walk in newneſs of life. Therefore in another place the apoſtle writeth, (Col. ii. 16. 17.) that the Sabbath was a ſhadow of a thing to come: and that the true body, that is to ſay, the perfect ſubſtance of truth is in Chriſt, which in the ſame place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole courſe of our life, until that we being utterly dead to ourſelves, be filled with the life of God. Therefore ſuperſtitious obſerving of days ought to be far from chriſtians.

32. But foraſmuch as the two latter cauſes ought not to be reckoned among the old ſhadows, but do belong alike to all ages: ſince the Sabbath is abrogate, yet this hath ſtill place with us, that we ſhould meet at appointed days for hearing of the word, for partaking of the ſacrament, and for publick prayer: and then that to ſervants and labourers be granted their reſt from their labour. It is not to be doubted that in commanding the Sabbath, the Lord had care of both theſe things. The firſt of them hath ſufficient teſtimony by the only uſe of the Jews to prove it. The ſecond, Moſes ſpake of in Deuteronomy in theſe words: (Deut. v. 14.) that thy man ſervant and thy maid ſervant may reſt as well as thou: remember that thou thy ſelf didſt ſerve in Ægypt. Again, in Exodus: (Exod. xxv. 12.) that thy ox and thy aſs may reſt, and the ſon of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can deny that both theſe things do ſerve for us as well as for the Jews? meetings at the church, are commanded us by the word of God, and the neceſſity of them is ſufficiently known in the very experience of life. Unleſs they be certainly appointed and have their ordinary days, how can they be kept? All things by the ſentence of the apoſtle (1 Cor. xiv. 40.) are to be done comely and in order among us. But ſo far is it off, that comlineſs and order can be kept without this policy and moderation, that there is at hand preſent trouble and ruin of the church, if it be diſſolved. Now if the ſame neceſſity be among us, for relief of which the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Jews: let no man ſay that it belongeth nothing unto us. For our moſt provident and tender Father, willed no leſs to provide for our neceſſity than for the Jews. But thou wilt ſay, why do we not rather daily meet together, that

Although the firſt uſe of the Sabbath which was to ſignify ſpiritual reſt being ceremonial be done away, yet the ſecond and third whereby it was appointed for the people of God to meet and for labourers to ceaſe on it doth ſtill remain.

that the difference of days may be taken away? I would to God, that were granted, and truly ſpiritual wiſdom was a thing worthy to have a daily piece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakneſs of many to have daily meetings, and the rule of charity doth not ſuffer us, to exact more of them, why ſhould we not obey the order which we ſee prefcribed us by the will of God?

The difference between Jews and Chriſtians in obſerving the Sabbath day, they keep it as a ſhadow of a thing ſpiritual, we only for politicał partly, and partly for eccleſiaſtical orders ſake.

33. I am obliged here to be ſomewhat long, becauſe at this day many unquiet ſpirits do raiſe trouble, concerning the Sabbath. They cry out that the chriſtian people are nouriſhed in Jewiſh ſuperſtitions, becauſe they keep ſome obſervation of days. But I anſwer, that we keep thoſe days without any Jewiſh ſuperſtition, becauſe we do in this reſpect far differ from the Jews. For we keep it not with ſtrict religion as a ceremony, wherein we think a ſpiritual myſtery to be figured, but we retain it as a neceſſary remedy for the maintaining of order in the church. But Paul teacheth (Col. ii. 16.) that in keeping of it they are not to be judged chriſtians, becauſe it is a ſhadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vain among the Galatians, (Gal. iv. 10.) becauſe they did ſtill obſerve days. And to the Romans he affirmeth that it is ſuperſtition if any man do make difference between day and day. (Rom. xiv. 5.) But who, ſaving theſe mad men only, doth not ſee, of what obſerving the apoſtle meaneth? For they had no regard to this political end and the order of the church, but whereas they kept them ſtill as ſhadows of ſpiritual things, they did even ſo much darken the glory of Chriſt and the light of the goſpel. They did not therefore ceaſe from bodily labour, becauſe that did call them away from holy exerciſes and meditations, but for a certain religious end, that in ceaſing from work they did dream that they ſtill kept their myſteries of old time delivered them. The apoſtle, I ſay inveigheth againſt this diſordered difference of days, and not againſt the lawful choice of days that ſerveth for the quietneſs of chriſtian fellowſhip: for in the churches that he himſelf did ordain, the Sabbath was kept for this end. For he appointeth the Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 2.) the ſame day, wherein they ſhould gather the collection to relieve the brethren at Jeruſalem. If they fear ſuperſtition, there was more danger thereof in the feaſt days of the Jews, than in the Sundays that the chriſtians now have. For ſo as was expedient for the overthrowing of ſuperſtition, the day that the Jews religiouſly obſerved is taken away: and, ſo as was neceſſary for keeping of comelineſs, order, and quiet in the church, another day was appointed for the ſame uſe.

The blameleſs intent of chriſtians, ſubſtituting the Sunday inſtead of the Jews Sabbath, and of others among Chriſtians having other feſtival days appointed for the ſame purpoſes: the principal exerciſes whereby the Sabbath is ſanctified: their trifling vanity who ſee no difference between Jews and Chriſtians but the change of the day, when in the uſe of the day indeed we principally differ.

34. Although the old fathers have not without reaſon of their choice, put in place of the Sabbath day, the day that we call Sunday. For whereas in the reſurrection of the Lord is the end and fulfilling of that reſt, whereof the old Sabbath was a ſhadow: the chriſtians are by the very ſame day that made an end of ſhadows, put in mind that they ſhould no longer ſtick unto the ſhadowiſh ceremony. But yet I do not ſo reſt upon the number of ſeven that I would bind the church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemn thoſe churches, that have other ſolemn days for their meetings, ſo that they be without ſuperſtition, which ſhall be, if they be only applied to the obſervation of diſcipline and well appointed order. Let the ſum hereof be this: as the truth was given to the Jews under a figure, ſo is it delivered us without any ſhadows at all. Firſt, that all our life long we ſhould be meditating of a continual Sabbath or reſt from our own works, that the Lord may work in us by his ſpirit: then that every man privately ſo oft as he hath leiſure, ſhould diligently exerciſe himſelf in godly calling to mind the works of God, and alſo, that we all ſhould keep the lawful order of the church appointed, for the hearing of the word, for the miniſtration of the ſacraments and for public prayer: thirdly, that we ſhould not grievouſly oppreſs them that are under us. And ſo do the triflings of the falſe prophets vaniſh away that in the ages paſt have infected the people with a Jewiſh opinion, that ſo much as was ceremonial in this commandment is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the ſeventh day, but that ſo much as is moral remaineth, which is the keeping of one day day in the week. But that is nothing elſe in effect, than for reproach of the Jews to change the day, and to keep ſtill the ſame holineſs in their mind. For there ſtill remaineth with us the like ſignification of myſtery in the days as was among the Jews. And truly we ſee what good they have done by ſuch doctrine. For they that cleave to their conſtitutions, do by theſe as much exceed as the Jews in groſs and carnal ſuperſtition of Sabbath: ſo that the rebukings that are read in Iſaiah, (Iſa. i. 13. and lviii.) do no leſs fitly ſerve for them at theſe days, than for thoſe that the prophet reproved in his time. But this general doctrine is principally to be kept, that leſt religion ſhould fall away or wax faint among us, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and thoſe outward helps are to be uſed that are profitable to nouriſh the worſhipping of God.

The Fifth Commandment.

"Honour thy father and thy mother, that thou "mayeſt live long upon the land which the Lord "thy God ſhall give thee."

The end of the fifth commandment is preſervation of order for which God commandeth all things belonging to the honour, and forbiddeth any thing tending to the diſhonour of ſuperiors whom he beautifieth with amiable titles to ſoften and captivate the minds of men unto obedience & ſubjection under them.

35. The end of this commandment is, that becauſe the Lord delighteth in the preſervation of his order, therefore he willeth that thoſe degrees of preeminence which he hath ordained be not broken, the ſum therefore ſhall be that we reverence thoſe whom the Lord hath ſet over us, that we yield to them honour, obedience and thankfulneſs. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden us, to withdraw any thing from their dignity, either by contempt or obſtinacy or unthankfulneſs. For ſo doth the word honour, in the ſcripture ſignify very largely: as when the apoſtle ſaith, (1 Tim. i. 5.) that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not only that reverence is due unto them, but alſo ſuch recompence as their miniſtry deſerveth. And becauſe this commandment of ſubjection, doth moſt of all diſagree with the perverſeneſs of man's nature, which as it ſwelleth with an ambitious deſire of aſcending high, ſo it hardly endureth to be brought low: therefore he hath ſet that kind of ſuperiority for example, which by nature is moſt amiable and leaſt envious: becauſe he might the more eaſily ſoften and reclaim our minds to the uſe of ſubmiſſion. Therefore the Lord doth by little and little train us to all lawful ſubjection by that which is moſt eaſy to bear, foraſmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom he giveth any pre-eminence, he doth communicate his own name with them, ſo far as is neceſſary to preſerve the ſame pre-eminence: the name of Father, God, and Lord, do ſo belong unto him alone, that ſo oft as we hear one of them named, our mind muſt needs be touched with a feeling of his majeſty. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of theſe things, he maketh to gliſter with a certain ſpark of his brightneſs, that they may be honourable every one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our Father we have to conſider ſomewhat of the nature of God, becauſe he beareth not the name of God without cauſe. He that is our prince or our Lord, hath ſome partaking of honour with God.

36. Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here ſet a general rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinance ſet over us, ſo we yield unto him reverence, obedience, thankfulneſs, and ſuch other duties as it lieth in us to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or unworthy. For of what ſort ſoever they be, they have not without the providence of God attained that place, by reaſon whereof the law-maker would have them to be honoured. Yet namely he hath given commandment of reverence to parents, that have brought us into this life, to which reverence nature itſelf ought in a manner to inſtruct us. For they are monſters and not men, that break the authority of parents with diſhonour or ſtubbornneſs. Therefore the Lord commanded (Exod. xxi.) all that diſobeyed their parents, to be ſlain, as men unworthy to enjoy the benefit of light, that do not acknowlege by whoſe means they came into it. And by many additions of the law it appeareth to be true that we have obſerved, that there are three parts of honour that he here ſpeaketh of, reverence, obedience, and thankfulneſs. The firſt of theſe the Lord eſtabliſheth when he commandeth (Lev. xx. 9.) him to be killed that curſcurſeth his father or his mother, for there he puniſheth the contempt and diſhonour of them. The ſecond he confirmeth (Levit. x. 9.) when he appointeth the puniſhment of death for the diſobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that ſaying of Chriſt in the fifteenth of Matthew, that it is (Mat. xv. 4.) the commandment of God that we do good to our parents. And ſo oft as Paul (Col. iii. 20.) maketh mention of a commandment, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

Unto parents ſo termed in reſpect of their pre-eminence be they good or bad, as alſo unto our natural parents the honour of reverence, obedience and thankfulneſs is required at our hands.

What is meant by the promiſe annexed to the fifth commandment, and how it may ſtand with the ſhortneſs of their lives that are moſt obedient.

37. There is annexed a promiſe for a commendation, which doth the rather put us in mind, how acceptable unto God is the ſubmiſſion that is here commanded. For Paul uſeth the ſame incitement to ſtir up our dulneſs when he ſaith: (Eph. vi. 1.) that this is the firſt commandment with promiſe. For the promiſe that went before in the firſt table, was not ſpecial and properly belonging to one commandment, but extended to the whole law. Now this is thus to be taken: the Lord ſpake to the Iſraelites peculiarly of the land which he had promiſed them for their inheritance. If then the poſſeſſion of land was a pledge of God's goodneſs, let us not wonder if it pleaſed God to declare his favour by giving length of life, by which a man might long enjoy his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus: honour thy father and thy mother, that by a long ſpace of life thou mayeſt enjoy the poſſeſſion of that land that ſhall be unto thee for a teſtimony of my favour. But ſince all the earth is bleſſed to the faithful, we do juſtly reckon this preſent life among the bleſſings of God. Therefore this promiſe doth likewiſe belong unto us, for as much as the continuance of this life is a proof of God's good will. For it neither is promiſed to us, nor was promiſed to the Jews, as though it contained bleſſedneſs in it ſelf, but becauſe it is wont to be to the godly a token of God's tender love. Therefore if it chance that a child who obeys his parents be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes ſeen, yet doth God no leſs conſtantly continue in the performance of his promiſe, than if he ſhould reward him with an hundred acres of land, to whom he promiſed but one acre. All conſiſteth in this, that we ſhould conſider that long life is ſo far promiſed us, as it is the bleſſing of God, and that it is his bleſſing ſo far as it is a proof of his favour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witneſs and ſhew in effect to his ſervants.

The curſes that fall upon the diſobedient, in which number are all that withdraw their ſubjection from them to whom they owe all ſubmiſſion in the Lord, but no otherways than in the Lord.

38. Moreover when the Lord promiſeth the bleſſing of this preſent life to the children that honour their parents with ſuch reverence as they ought, he doth withal ſecretly ſay, that moſt aſſured curſe hangeth over the ſtubborn and diſobedient children. And that the ſame ſhould not want execution: he pronounceth them by his law ſubject to the judgment of death, and commandeth them to be put to execution: and if they eſcape that judgment, he himſelf taketh vengeance on them by one mean or other. For we ſee how great a number of that ſort of men are ſlain in battles and in quarrels and ſome other tormented in ſtrange unuſual ways, and they all in a manner are a proof that this threatening is not vain. But if any eſcape to old age, ſince contrary to reaſon, in this life being deprived of the bleſſing of God, they do nothing but miſerably languiſh, and are reſerved for greater pains hereafter, they are far from being partakers of the bleſſing promiſed to the godly children. But this is alſo by the way to be obſerved, that we are not commanded to obey them but in the Lord. And that is evident by the foundation before laid: for they ſit on high in that place to which the Lord hath advanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the ſubmiſſion that is uſed toward them, ought to be a ſtep toward the honouring of that ſovereign Father. Wherefore if they move us to tranſgreſs the law, then are they deſervedly not to be accounted parents, but ſtrangers who labour to withdraw us from obedience to the true Father. The ſame is to be ſaid of princes, Lords, and all ſorts of ſuperiors. For it is ſhameful and contrary to reaſon, that their pre-eminence ſhould prevail to preſs down his highneſs, ſince theirs as it dependeth wholly upon it, ſo ought only to guide us unto it.

The SIXTH COMMANDMENT.

"Thou ſhalt not kill."

The ſixth commandment tend-

39. The end of this commandment is, that foraſmuch as God hath ing to the union and thereby to the ſafety of all mankind, doth under the name of murder both forbid all hurt and enjoin all furtherance which may ariſe from man to man: which rule muſt bridle and direct not only outward deeds, but alſo inward thoughts.

hath united all mankind together with a certain bond of union, that every man ought to regard the ſafety of all men, as a thing given him in charge: in ſome therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all doing of harm, whereby our neighbour's body may be hurt, is forbidden us. And therefore we are commanded, if there be any power of ſuccour in our endeavours to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully employ the ſame, that we procure thoſe things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keep them from hurt, and if they be in any danger, that we give them our helping hand. If thou conſider that it is God the law-maker that ſo ſaith, then think withal that his meaning is by this rule alſo to govern thy ſoul. For were it fooliſh to imagine, that he who diſcovereth the thoughts of the heart, and principally reſteth upon them, ſhould inſtruct nothing but the body to true righteouſneſs. Therefore murder in the heart is alſo forbidden in this law, and an inward affection to preſerve our brother's life is here commanded. The hand by action bringeth forth the murder of a man, but the mind conceiveth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Look whether thou canſt be angry with thy brother without burning in deſire to do him hurt. If thou canſt not be angry with him, then canſt thou not hate him, foraſmuch as hatred is nothing but an old rooted anger. Although thou diſſemble and go about to wind out thy ſelf by vain circumſtances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurt. If thou wilt ſtill dally out with ſhifts to defend it, it is already pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghoſt (1 John v.) that he is a manſlayer who hateth his brother in his heart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lord Chriſt, that he is in danger of the judgment that is angry with his brother: that he is in danger of the counſel that ſaith Racha: that he is in danger of hell-fire, that ſaith unto him thou fool. (Mat. v. 22.)

Two ſpecial grounds of this commandment, the excellency of man's creation, and the price of his redemption, in regard of which two, if ſo much care be due to his body, to his ſoul how much more?

40. The ſcripture remarketh two points of equity, upon which this commandment is grounded: becauſe man is both the image of God and our own fleſh, wherefore unleſs we will defile the image of God, we muſt have care to touch man none otherwiſe, than as a ſacred thing: and unleſs we will diveſt ourſelves of all humanity, we muſt cheriſh him as our own fleſh. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Chriſt, ſhall be treated of in another place. God willed theſe two things naturally to be conſidered in man, that might perſuade us to the preſervation of him, that we ſhould both reverence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our own fleſh. He hath not therefore eſcaped the crime of manſlaughter, that hath kept himſelf from ſhedding of blood. If thou commit any thing in deed, if thou go about any thing with endeavour, if thou conceive any thing in deſire and purpoſe that is againſt the ſafety of another thou art holden guilty of manſlaughter. And again: if thou do not labour to the utmoſt of thy power and as occaſion may offer to defend his life, thou doeſt with like hainouſneſs offend the law. But if there be ſo much care taken for the ſafety of his body, let us hereby gather, how much ſtudy and pains is due to the ſafety of his ſoul, which in the ſight of God doth infinitely excel the body.

The Seventh Commandment.

"Thou ſhalt not commit adultery."

In the ſeventh commandment chaſtity and purity being ſought God by the name of actual intemperance, doth make hateful whatſoever tendeth thereunto, and require a care of continuing our bodies and ſouls in purity, for preſervation whereof marriage is eſtabliſhed.

41. The end of the commandment is, that becauſe God loveth chaſtity and cleanneſs, therefore all uncleanneſs ought to depart far away from us. The ſum therefore ſhall be, that we be defiled with no uncleanneſs or luſtful intemperance of the fleſh. Whereunto anſwereth the affirmative commandment, that we chaſtely and continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbiddeth by name, to which all unchaſte luſt tendeth: that by the filthineſs of that which is more groſs and ſenſible, for ſo much as it alſo defileth the body, he might bring us to abhor all filthy luſt. Since man was created in this eſtate, not to live a ſolitary life, but but to uſe a helper joined unto him: and ſince that by the curſe of ſin he is driven the more to this neceſſity, the Lord hath in this behalf provided help for man ſo much as was ſufficient, when he ordained marriage, when he ſanctified with his bleſſing the fellowſhip begun by his authority. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowſhip of man and woman out of marriage, is accurſed before him, and that the fellowſhip of marriage it ſelf, was ordained for remedy of neceſſity, that we ſhould not run out into unbridled luſt, Therefore let us not flatter ourſelves, ſince we hear that man cannot be coupled with woman out of marriage, without the curſe of God.

To whom the gift of continence is not given, they muſt uſe the remedy which God hath ordained.

42. Now foraſmuch as by the condition of nature, and by luſt more enkindled ſince the fall of man, we are become doubly ſubject to the deſire of intercourſe with women, except it be thoſe whom God of his ſingular grace hath exempted from it: let every man look well what is given unto him. Virginity, I grant, is a virtue not to be deſpiſed: but ſince it is to ſome denied, and to ſome granted but for a time, let them who are troubled with incontinence, and ſtriving with it, cannot get the upper hand, reſort to the help of marriage, that ſo they may keep chaſtity in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceive this word, if they do not ſuccour their own intemperance with the remedy that is offered and granted them, they ſtrive againſt God and reſiſt his ordinance. And let no man carp againſt me (as many do at this day) that being aided with the help of God, he can do all things. For the help of God is preſent only with thoſe, (Pſal. xix. 1. and 14.) that walk in his ways, that is in their vocation from which they do withdraw themſelves, who forſaking the aids of God, do ſtrive to overcome and maſter their neceſſity with vain raſh boldneſs. The Lord affirmeth that continency is a ſingular gift of God, and of that ſort that are not given generally, nor univerſally to the whole body of the church, but to a few members thereof. For firſt he ſaith, (Matth. xix. 12.) that there are ſome men who have made themſelves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's ſake: that is, that they might the more carefully and freely apply themſelves to ſpiritual and divine things. But, that no body ſhould think that it was in any man's power to make himſelf an eunuch, he ſhewed a little before, that all men are not able to receive it, but they to whom it is peculiarly given from heaven upon, which he concludeth, he that is able to receive it, let him receive it. But Paul (1 Cor. vii. 7.) yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

They ſin grievouſly againſt God who uſe it not although they keep themſelves unſtained with any bodily unclean act.

43. Whereas we are by open declaration admoniſhed, that it is not in every man's power to keep chaſtity in ſingle life, although with ſtudy and labour he endeavour never ſo much unto it, and that it is a peculiar grace, which God giveth but to certain men, that he may have them the more ready to his work: do we not ſtrive againſt God and nature which he hath inſtituted, if we do not apply the kind of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleanneſs and chaſtity of us. To keep the ſame there is but one way, that every man meaſure himſelf by his own meaſure. Neither let a man deſpiſe marriage as a thing unprofitable or ſuperfluous for him, nor otherwiſe deſire ſingle life, unleſs he be able to live without a wife. And therein alſo let him not provide only for the quiet and eaſe of the fleſh, but only that being looſed from this bond, he may be the more in readineſs and prepared to all religious duties. And foraſmuch as this benefit is given to many but for a time, let every man ſo long abſtain from marriage as he ſhall be meet to live to keep ſingle eſtate. If ſtrength fail him to tame his luſt, let him learn that the Lord hath now laid upon him a neceſſity to marry. This the apoſtle ſheweth (1 Cor. vii. 1. and 9.) when he commandeth that to avoid fornication every man have his own wife, and every woman have her own huſband, that he that cannot live continently ſhould marry in the Lord. Firſt he declareth that the moſt part of men are ſubject to the vice of incontinence: and then of thoſe that are ſubject unto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth all to uſe that only remedy, wherewith unchaſtity is reſiſted. Therefore if they that are incontinent do neglect to help their infirmity by this mean, they ſin even in this that they obey not the commandment of the apoſtle. Neither let him flatter himſelf that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of unchaſtity, while in the mean time his mind burneth inwardly with luſt. For Paul (1 Cor. vi. 24.) defineth chaſtity to be a cleanneſs of the mind, joined with chaſtity of the body. An unmarried woman (saith he) careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirm that former commandment, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himself with the company of a harlot, but he saith, that it is better to marry than to burn.

Marriage to be used as an holy remedy against evil not as a covert of dissolute lust, all acts, causes and signs whereof must be avoided in thought, look, raiment, speech, diet.

44. Now if married people do confess that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admnoished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust. For though the honesty of marriage do cover the filthiness of incontinence, yet it ought not forthwith to be a provocation of it. Wherefore let not people imagine, that all things are lawful unto them, but let every husband have his own wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them commit nothing unbecoming the honesty and temperance of marriage. For so ought marriage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure and modesty, and not to overflow into every kind of extream lasciviousness. This wantonness Ambrose (Amb. li. de phil.) reproved with a saying very sharp indeed, but not unfit for it, when he calleth the husband the adulterer of his own wife, who in use of wedlock hath no care of shamefacedness or honesty. Last of all, let us consider what lawmaker doth here condemn fornication, who since of his own right he ought to possess us wholly, requireth pureness of the soul spirit and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth wanton attire of body, immodest gestures, and filthy conversation to lay wait to insnare anothers chastity. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a young man who was clothed in an extremely wanton and gay manner, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily unchaste, if we have a regard unto God that abhorreth all filthiness in whatsoever part either of our soul or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastity. If the Lord requireth chastity of us, then he condemneth whatsoever is contrary. Therefore if thou desire to testify obedience, neither let thy mind burn inwardly with evil lust, nor let thine eyes run wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed up for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthy talk entice thy mind to like thoughts, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certain blots, wherewith the pureness of chastity is bespotted.

The Eighth Commandment.

"Thou shalt not steal."

That every man may have his own we are in the eighth commandment forbidden all practices whatsoever that tends to the unjust loss and danger of others, and all withholding of any duty whereby we are bound to do them good, forasmuch as either of these two doth make us guilty of those things.

45. The end of this commandment is, because God abhorreth unrighteousness, that every man may have his own rendered unto him. The sum therefore shall be that we are forbidden to covet other mens goods, and that therefore we are commanded every man to use his lawful endeavours to preserve to each man his own goods. For thus we ought to think that what every man possesseth is not happened unto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the sovereign Lord of all things: and therefore no man's goods can be gotten from him by evil means, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of thefts there be many kinds: one consists in violence, when the goods of another are by any manner of force and robbing licentiousness taken from him. Another kind consisteth in malicious deceit, where they are guilefully conveyed away. Another sort there is that lies in a more hidden subtilty, when they are wrested from the owner by colour of law. Another sort in flattery, where they are sucked away by pretence of gift. But lest we should tarry too long upon the division of all the several kinds of theft, let us know that all crafty means whereby the possession and money of our neighbours are conveyed unto us when they once go by crooked ways from sincere ness of heart, to a desire to beguile, or by any mean to do hurt, are to be accounted thefts. Although by pleading the law, they may prevail, yet God doth otherwise weigh them. For he seeth the long captious subtilties, wherewith the guileful man beginneth to entangle the simpler mind, till at length he draw him into his nets. He seeth the hard and ungentle laws, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth down the weaker. He seeth the allurements, wherewith as with baited hooks the craftier taketh the unwary. All which things are hidden from the judgment of man, and come not in his knowlege. And this manner of wrong is not only in money, in wares, or in lands, but in every man's right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we deny him these duties which we are bound bound to do for him. If any idle Factor or Stewart do devour his master's substance, and is not heedful to the care of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully spoil, or do riotously waste the substance committed unto him, if a servant do mock his master, if he disclose his secrets by any means, if he betray his life and his goods: again, if the master do cruelly oppress his household, they are before God guilty of theft. For he both withholdeth and conveyeth another man's goods, who performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

The duties of all sorts of men for performance of the law.

46. We shall therefore rightly obey this comandment, if being contented with our estate, we seek to get no gain but what is honest and lawful, if we covet not to wax rich with wrong, nor go about to spoil our neighbour of his goods that our own substance may increase, if we labour not to heap up cruel riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together every way, by right and by wrong, that either our covetousness may be filled, or our prodigality satisfied. But on the other side, let this be our perpetual mark, to aid all men faithfully by counsel, and help to keep their own so far as we may: but if we have to do with false and deceitful men, let us rather be ready to yield up some of our own, than to strive with them. And not that only, but let us communicate to their necessities, and with our store relieve their need, whom we see to be oppressed with hard and poor estate. Finally, let every man look how much he is by duty bound unto others and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people have in honour all those that are set over them, let them patiently bear their government, obey their laws and commandments, refuse nothing that they may bear, still keeping God favourable unto them. Again, let them take care of their people, preserve common peace, defend the good, restrain the evil, and so order all things, as to be ready to give account of their office to the sovereign judge. Let the ministers of churches faithfully apply to their ministry, and not corrupt the doctrine of salvation, but deliver it pure and sincere to the people of God, and let them instruct them not only with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be over them, as good shepherds are over the sheep. Let the people likewise receive them as the messengers and apostles of God, give them that honour whereof the highest master hath vouchsafed them, and minister unto them such things as are necessary for their life. Let parents take on them to feed, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and grieve not, nor turn away their minds from them with cruelty, but rather cherish and embrace them with such lenity and tenderness, as becometh their person. After which manner, we have already said, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let young men reverence old age, even as the Lord willeth that age be honourable. Let old men also govern the weakness of youth with their wisdom and experience, wherein they excel young men, not rating with rough and loud brawling, but tempering severity with mildness and gentleness. Let servants shew themselves diligent and serviceable to obey: and that not to the eye, but from the heart, as serving God himself. Also let masters shew themselves not rongh and hard to please, nor oppress them with too much sharpness, nor reproachfully use them, but rather acknowlege that they are their brethren and their fellow servants under the heavenly Lord, whom they ought mutually to love and gently to intreat. After this manner, I say, let every man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreover our mind ought always to have respect to the law-maker, that we may know that this law is made as well for our minds, as for our hands, that men should study to defend and further the good and advantage of other.

The NINTH COMMANDMENT.

"Thou shalt not be a lying witness against thy "neighbour."

To maintain truth we are in the ninth commandment forbidden the abuse of the tongue in hindering our neighbour, and commanded to employ it for his benefit.

47. The end of this commandment is, that because God who is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to observe truth without deceitful colour. The sum therefore shall be, that we neither hurt any man's name either with slanders or false reports, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that we offend no man, by lust to speak evil, or to be busy: with which prohibition is joined a commandment, that so far as we may, we employ our faithful endeavour for every man in affirming the truth, to defend the safety both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expound the meaning of his commandment in the twenty third chapter of Exodus, in these words: (Exod. xxiii. 1.) Thou shalt not use the voice of lying, nor ſhalt join thy hand to ſpeak falſe witneſs for the wicked. Again (Levit. xix. 15.) thou ſhalt flee lying. Alſo in another place he doth not only call us away from lying in this point that we be no accuſers, or whiſperers in the people, but alſo that no man deceive his brother, for he forbiddeth them both in ſeveral commandments. Truly it is not to be doubted but that as in the commandments before he hath forbidden cruelty, unchaſtity, and covetouſneſs, ſo in this he reſtraineth falſhood. Whereof their are two parts as we have obſerved before. For either we offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciouſneſs and froward mind to backbite, or in lying and ſometimes in evil ſpeaking we hinder their profit. There is no difference whether in this place be underſtood ſolemn and judicial teſtimony, or common teſtimony that is uſed in private converſation. For we muſt always have recourſe to this principle, that of all the general kinds of vices one ſpecial ſort is ſet for an example, to which the reſt may be referred, and that that is chiefly choſen, wherein the filthineſs of the fault is moſt apparent. Altho' it were convenient to extend it more generally to ſlanders and ſiniſter backbitings wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully grieved, for that falſhood of witneſſing which is uſed in judicial courts, is never without perjury, But perjuries inſomuch as they do prophane and defile the name of God, are already ſufficiently met withal in the third commandment. Wherefore the right uſe of this commandment is, that our tongue in affirming the truth, do ſerve both the good name and profit of our neighbours. The equity thereof is more than manifeſt. For if a good name be more precious than any treaſures, whatſoever they be: then is it no leſs hurt to a man to be ſpoiled of the goodneſs of his name than of his goods. And in bereaving his ſubſtance ſometime falſe witneſs doth as much as violence of hands.

The great liberty which men give themſelves in tranſgreſſing this law by their wanton delight to backbite, to ſcoff, to judge, or to hear them that do ſo.

48. And yet it is marvellous with how negligent careleſneſs men do commonly offend in this point, ſo that there are found very few that are not remarkably ſick of this diſeaſe: we are ſo much delighted with a certain poiſoned ſweetneſs both in ſearching out and in diſcloſing the evils of other. And let us not think that it is a ſufficient excuſe, if ſometimes we lie not. For he that forbiddeth thy brother's name to be defiled with lying, willeth alſo that it be preſerved untouched ſo far as the truth wil ſuffer. For howſoever he taketh heed to himſelf only, ſo that he tell no lie, yet in the ſame he ſecretly confeſſeth that he hath ſome charge of him. But this ought to ſuffice us to keep ſafe our neighbour's good name, that God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all evil ſpeaking is utterly condemned, But we mean not by evil ſpeaking, that rebuking which is uſed for chaſtiſement: nor accuſation, or judicial proceſs, whereby remedy is ſought for an evil, nor public reprehenſion which tendeth to put other ſinners in fear, nor diſcovering of faults to them for whoſe ſafety it behoveth that they ſhould be forewarned leſt they ſhould be in danger by ignorance: but we mean only hateful accuſing, which ariſeth of maliciouſneſs and of a wanton inclination to backbite. Alſo this commandment is extended to this point, that we covet not to uſe a ſcoffing kind of pleaſantneſs, but mingled with bitter taunts, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faults under pretence of paſtime, as many do that ſeek praiſe of merry conceits with other mens ſhame yea and grief: alſo when by ſuch wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproached. Now if we bend our eyes to the law-maker, which muſt according to his rightful authority bear rule no leſs over the ears and mind than over the tongue: truly we ſhall find that greedineſs to hear backbitings, and a haſty readineſs to evil judgments are no leſs forbidden. For it were very fond if a man ſhould think that God hateth the fault of evil ſpeaking in the tongue, and doth not diſallow the fault of evil maliciouſneſs in the heart. Wherefore if there be in us a true fear and love of God, let us endeavour ſo far as we may and as is expedient, and as charity beareth, that we give neither our tongue, nor our ears to evil ſpeakings, and bitter jeſtings. leſt we raſhly without cauſe yield our minds to indirect ſuſpicions. But being indifferent expoſitors of all mens ſayings, and doings, let us both in judgment, ears, and tongue gently preſerve their honour ſafe.

The Tenth Commandment.

"Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbour's houſe, &c."

As the former commandments have delivered a rule of charity to

49. The end of this commandment is, that becauſe the Lord's will is that our ſoul be wholly poſſeſſed with the affection of love: all luſt is to be ſhaken out

govern our evil ſtudies and works ſo the laſt commandment requireth the very firſt conceptions of the mind to be framed according to the ſame rule.

of our mind that is contrary to charity. The ſum therefore ſhall be, that no thought creep into us, which may move our minds with a concupiſcence hurtful and turning towards anothers loſs: wherewith on the other ſide agreeth the commandment, that whatſoever we conceive, purpoſe, will or ſtudy upon, be joined with the benefit and advantage of our neighbours. But here as it ſeemeth, ariſeth a hard and cumberſome difficulty. For if it be truly ſaid of us before that under the names of fornication and theft, are contained the luſt of fornication, and the purpoſe to hurt and deceive, it may ſeem ſuperfluouſly ſpoken. that the coveting of other mens goods ſhould afterward be diſtinctly forbidden us. But the diſtinction between purpoſe and coveting, will eaſily looſe us this knot. For purpoſe (as we have meant in ſpeaking of it in the other commandments before) is deliberate conſent of will, when luſt hath ſubdued the mind: but coveting may be without any ſuch either adviſement or aſſent, when the mind is either ſtruck or tickled with vain and perverſe objects. As therefore the Lord hath heretofore commanded, that the rule of charity ſhould govern our wills, ſtudies, and works: ſo now he commandeth the conceptions of our mind to be directed to the ſame rule, that there be none of them crooked and perverſe, that may provoke our mind another way. As he hath forbidden our mind to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robbery, and lying: ſo he doth now forbid us to be moved thereunto.

The laſt commandment which is by ſome rent amiſs into two, containeth not bare conceptions or fancys but ſuch as do bite and ſtir the mind with deſire repugnant to that which perfect charity requireth of which kind of concupiſcence thoſe are rehearſed for examples ſake which are

50. And not without cauſe doth he require ſo great uprightneſs. For who can deny that it is righteous, that all the powers of the ſoul be poſſeſſed with charity? But if any of them do err from the mark of charity, who can deny that it is diſeaſed? Now whence cometh it that ſo many deſires hurtful to thy neighbour, do enter in thy heart but of this, that neglecting him thou careſt only for thyſelf? For if thy mind were altogether throughly poſſeſſed with charity, no part thereof ſhould be open to ſuch imaginations. Therefore it muſt needs be void of charity, ſo far as it receiveth concupiſcence. But ſome man will object that yet it is not meet that fancies that are without order toſſed in mans wit, and at length do vaniſh away, ſhould be condemned for concupiſcence, whoſe place is in the heart. I anſwer that here our queſtion is of that kind of fancies, which while they are preſent before our minds, do together bite and ſtrike our heart with deſire, foraſmuch as it never cometh in our mind, to wiſh for any thing, but that our heart is ſtirred up and leapeth withal. Therefore God commandeth a marvellous ferventneſs of love which he willeth not to be entangled with never ſo ſmall ſnares of concupiſcence. He requireth a marvellouſly framed mind, which he ſuffereth not ſo much as with ſlight provocations to be any thing ſtirred againſt the law of love. To this expoſition Auguſtine did firſt open me the way: becauſe thou ſhouldeſt not think that it is without conſent of ſome grave authority. And though the Lord's purpoſe was to forbid us all wrongful coveting: yet in rehearſing the ſame, he hath brought forth for example thoſe things that moſt commonly do deceive us with a falſe image of delight: becauſe he would leave nothing to concupiſcence when he draweth it from theſe things, upon which it moſt of all rageth and triumpheth. Lo here, is the ſecond table of the law, wherein we are taught ſufficiently what we owe to men for God's ſake, upon conſideration whereof depends the rule of charity. Wherefore you ſhall but vainly call upon thoſe duties that are contained in this table, unleſs your doctrine do ſtay upon the fear and reverence of God, as upon her foundation. As for them who ſeek for two commandments, in the prohibition of coveting, the wiſe reader, though I ſay nothing will judge that by wrong diviſion, they tear in ſunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing againſt us, that this word, thou ſhalt not covet, is the ſecond time repeated, for after that he had firſt ſet the houſe, then he divideth the parts thereof, beginning at the wife whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrews do very well) it ought to be read in one whole ſentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that every man poſſeſſeth ſhould remain ſafe and untouched; not only from wrong and luſt to defraud them, but alſo from the very leaſt deſire that may move our minds.

51. Bet now to what end the whole law tendeth, it ſhall not be hard to judge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteouſneſs, that it might frame the life of man after the

in pure love towards God and man, and not to ſet down only certain rudiments that were afterwards to be further perfected.

the example of the pureneſs of God. For God hath therein ſo painted out his own nature, as if a man do perform in deeds, that which is there commanded, he ſhall in a manner expreſs an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moſes meant to bring the ſum thereof into the minds of the Iſraelites, he ſaid: And now Iſrael, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee but that thou fear the Lord, and walk in his ways: love him and ſerve him in all thy heart, and in all thy ſoul, and keep his commandments? And he ceaſed not ſtill to ſing the ſame ſong again unto them, ſo oft as he purpoſed to ſhew the end of the law. The doctrine of the law hath ſuch reſpect hereunto, that it joineth man, or as Moſes in another place (Deut. x. 12.) termeth it, maketh man to ſtick faſt to his God in holineſs of life. Deut. vi. 5. and 11. 13. Now the perfection of that holineſs conſiſteth in the two principal points already mentioned. Matt. 22. That we love the Lord our God with all our heart, all our ſoul, and all our ſtrength, and our neighbours as our ſelves. And the firſt indeed is, that our ſoul be in all parts filled with the love of God. From that immediately of itſelf floweth the love of our neighbour. Which thing the Apoſtle ſheweth when he writeth, 1 Tim. i. 15. that the end of the law is love out of a pure conſcience, and a faith not feigned. You ſee how, as it were, in the head is ſet conſcience and faith unfeigned, that is to ſay, in one word, true godlineſs, and that from thence is charity derived. Therefore he is deceived whoſoever thinketh that in the law are taught only certain rudiments and firſt introductions of righteouſneſs, wherewith men became to be taught their firſt ſchooling, but not yet directed to the true mark of good works: whereas beyond that ſentence of Moſes, and this of Paul, you can deſire nothing as wanting of the higheſt perfection. For how far, I pray you, will he proceed that will not be contented with this inſtitution, whereby man is inſtructed to the fear of God, to ſpiritual worſhipping, to obeying of the commandments, to follow the uprightneſs of the way of the Lord: finally, to pureneſs of conſcience, ſincere faith and love? Whereby is confirmed that expoſition of the law, which ſearcheth for, and findeth out in the commandments thereof all the duties of godlineſs and love. For they that follow only the dry and bare principles, as if it taught but the one half of God's will, know not the end thereof, as the apoſtle witneſſeth.

52. But whereas in rehearſing the ſum of the law, Chriſt and the apoſtle do ſometimes leave out the firſt table: many are deceived therein while they would fain draw their words to both the tables. Chriſt in Matthew, chap. v. 13. calleth the chief points of the law, mercy judgment and faith: under the word faith, it is not doubtful to me, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulneſs towards men. But ſome, that the ſentence might be extended to the whole law, take it for religiouſneſs toward God. But they labour in vain. For Chriſt ſpeaketh of thoſe works wherewith man ought to prove himſelf righteous. This reaſon if we obſerve, we will alſo ceaſe to marvel why, when a young man aſked him, what are the commandments by keeping whereof we enter into life: he anſwered theſe things only; Matth. xix. 28. Thou ſhalt not kill. Thou ſhalt not commit adultery. Thou ſhalt not ſteal. Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs. Honour thy father and thy mother. Love thy neighbour as thyſelf. For the obeying of the firſt table conſiſted in a manner all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually uſe. But the works of charity are ſuch as by them we may declare a perfect righteouſneſs. But this occurs every where ſo frequently in the prophets, that it muſt needs be familiar to a reader, but meanly exerciſed in them. For in a manner always when they exhort to repentance, they leave out the firſt table, and only call upon faith, judgment, mercy and equity. And thus they do not paſs over the fear of God, but they enquire the earneſt proof thereof by the tokens of it. This is well known, that when they ſpeak of the keeping of the law, they do for the moſt part reſt upon the ſecond table, becauſe therein the ſtudy of righteouſneſs and uprightneſs is moſt openly ſeen. It is needleſs to rehearſe the places, becauſe every man will of himſelf eaſily mark that which I ſay.

The reaſon why in the prophets and the goſpel ſo oftentimes when the keeping of the law is ſpoken of the duties only of the ſecond table are expreſsly mentioned.

53. But thou wilt ſay, is it then more available to the perfection of righteouſneſs, to live innocently among men, than with true godlineſs to honour God? No, but becauſe a man doth not eaſily keep charity in all points, unleſs he earneſtly fear God, therefore it is thereby proved that he hath godlineſs alſo. Beſide that, for-foraſmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from us unto him, which thing he doth alſo teſtify by the prophet: Pſal. xvi. therefore he requireth not our duties to himſelf, but doth exerciſe us in good works toward our neighbour. Therefore not without cauſe the apoſtle ſetteth the whole perfection of the ſaints in charity, Eph. i. 5. And not inconveniently in another place he calleth the ſame, Col. iii. 14. the fulfilling of the law: adding, that he hath performed the law that loveth his neighbour. Again, Rom. xiii. That all the law is comprehended in one word, Love thy neighbour as thyſelf. For he teacheth no other thing but the ſame which Chriſt doth when he ſaith, Matth. vii. 12. Whatſoever ye will that men do to you, do ye the ſame to them: for this is the law and the prophets. It is certain that in the law and the prophets faith and all that belongeth to the true worſhip of God, holdeth the principal place, and that love is beneath it in the lower degree: but the Lord's meaning is, that in the law is only preſcribed unto us an obſervation of right and equity, wherein we are exerciſed to teſtify our godly fear of him, if there be any in us.

The law doth not teach us to love our ſelves which we do ſo vehemently without teaching that it ſetteth up our affection this way as a mark which we ought to reach in loving others.

54. Here therefore let us ſtick faſt, that then our life ſhall be beſt framed to God's will and the rule of his law, when it ſhall be every way moſt profitable to our brethren. But in the whole law there is not read one ſyllable that appointeth to man any rule of ſuch things as he ſhall do or leave undone to the profit of his own fleſh. And ſurely ſince men are ſo born with ſuch diſpoſitions naturally that they are too much carried all headlong to the love of themſelves, and how much ſoever they fall from the truth yet ſtill they keep that ſelf-love, there needed no law any more to enflame that love, that was naturally of itſelf, too much beyond meaſure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the love of our ſelves, but the love of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the commandments, and that he liveth beſt and moſt holily, that (ſo near as may be) liveth and laboureth leaſt for himſelf, and that no man liveth worſe and more wickedly than he that liveth and laboureth for himſelf and only thinketh upon and ſeeketh for things of his own. And the Lord, the more to expreſs with how great earneſtneſs we ought to be led to the love of our neighbours, appointed it to be meaſured by the love of our ſelves as by a rule, becauſe he had no other vehementer or ſtronger affection to meaſure it by. And the force of the manner of ſpeaking is diligently to be conſidered. For he doth not, as certain ſophiſters have fooliſhly dreamed, give the firſt degree to the love of ourſelves, and the ſecond to charity, but rather that affection of love which we do all naturally draw to ourſelves he giveth away unto other, whereupon the Apoſtle ſaith that charity ſeeketh not her own, 1 Cor. xiii. 5. And their reaſon is not to be eſteemed worth a hair that the thing ruled is ever inferior to its rule. For God doth not make the love of ourſelves, a rule whereunto charity toward other ſhould be ſubject, but whereas by perverſeneſs of nature, the affection of love was wont to reſt in our ſelves, he ſheweth that now it ought to be elſewhere ſpread abroad, that we ſhould with no leſs chearfulneſs, ferventneſs, and carefulneſs be ready to do good to our neighbour than to ourſelves.

The commandments of the law in ſpeaking of our neighbours, meant not that we ſhould reſtrain the duties of love and charity to our ſpecial acquaintance.

55. Now ſince Chriſt hath ſhewed in the parable of the Samaritan (Luke. x. 36.) that under the name of neighbour every man is contained be he never ſo ſtrange unto us, there is no cauſe why we ſhould reſtrain the commandment of love within the bounds of our own freindſhips and acquaintances. I deny not that the nearer that any man is unto us, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our endeavours to do him good. For ſo the order of humanity requireth, that ſo many more duties of friendſhip men ſhould communicate together, as they are bound together with ſtraighter bonds of kindred, familiarity or neighbourhood, and that without any offence of God, by whoſe providence we are in a manner driven thereunto. But I ſay that all mankind without exception is to be embraced with one affection of charity: and that in this behalf is no difference of Barbarian or Grecian, of worthy or unworthy, of freind or foe, becauſe they are to be conſidered in God and not in themſelves: from which conſideration when we turn away, it is no wonder if we be entangled with many errors. Wherefore if we will keep the true trade of loving, we muſt not turn our eyes unto man, the ſight of whom would oftner enforce us to hate than to love, but unto God who commandeth that the love which we offer him be ſhed abroad among all men: that this be a perpetual foundation, that whatſoever the man be, yet he ought to be loved becauſe God is loved.

The absurdity of schoolmen in turning the commandments of the law into counsels whereunto all men are not bound.

56. Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the schoolmen of these commandments, touching not desiring of revenge, and loving our enemies, which in the old time both were given to the Jews, and at the same time were commonly given to all Christians, have made counsels which it is in our liberty to obey or not to obey. And the necessary obeying of them they have posted over to Monks who were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christans, that they willingly bound themselves to keep the counsels. And they render a reason why they receive them not for laws, for that they seem too burdensome and heavy, specially for Christians that are under the law of grace. So dare they presume to repel the eternal law of God touching the loving of our neighbours. Is there any such difference in any leaf of the law? and are not therein the rather every where found commandments that do most severely require of us to love our enemies? For what manner of saying is that, where we are commanded (Prov. xxv. 21.) to feed our enemy when he is hungry, (Exod. xxiii. 4.) to set into the right way his oxen or asses straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint under their burden? Shall we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good will to himself? What? is not the word of the Lord everlasting? (Deut. xxxii. 35. Leave vengeance to me, and I will requite it. Which also is spoken more plainly in another place, (Levit. xix. 18.) Seek not vengeance, neither be mindful of the injury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowlege that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not lyingly feign that he was a counsel giver.

We are not counselled only in the law, but commanded to love, do good, to pray for and bless our enemies: as the reason annexed, that ye may be the children of your father, doth shew and so the fathers have understood it: neither is the reason any thing against it which they bring concerning the hardness of performing it.

57. And what, I pray you, mean these things that they have presumed to mock withal in their dry insipid gloss? (Matt. v. 44.) Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, bless them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven. Who cannot here reason with Chrysostom, (Lib. de compunctione cordis.) that by so necessary a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandments? What remaineth more when we are blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monks shall be the children of the heavenly Father, they only shall be bold to call upon God their Father: what shall the church do in the mean time? it shall by like right be sent away to the Gentiles and publicans. For Christ saith: Matt. v. 46. If ye be friendly to your friends, what favour look you for thereby? do not the Gentiles and publicans the same? But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left unto us, and the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven taken away from us. And no less strong is Augustin's argument, (Lib. de doctri. Christ. cap. 30.) When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no less forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemy than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giveth leave to steal nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enemy. But these two, not to steal, and not to commit fornication. Paul (Rom. xiii. 9.) bringeth within the compass of the rule of love, yea and teacheth that they are contained under this commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy self. Therefore, either Paul must have been a false expositor of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loved, even by commandment, like as our friends. Therefore they do truly discover themselves to be the children of Satan that do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they have published this doctrine with more gross dulness or shamelessness. For there are none of the ancient writers that do not pronounce as of a thing certain, that these are mere commandments. And that even in Gregory's age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his own affirmation, for he without controversy taketh them for commandments. And how foolishly do they reason? They say that they are too weighty a burden for Christians. As though there could be devised any thing more weighty than to love God with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be counted easy, whether it be to love our enemy, or to lay aside all desire of revenge out of our mind. Indeed all things are high and hard to our weakness even the least title of the law. It is the Lord in whom we use strength. Let him give what he commandeth, and command what he will. Christian men to be under the law of grace, are not unbridledly to wander without law, but

but to be graffed in Chriſt, by whoſe grace they are free from the curſe of the law, and by whoſe ſpirit they have a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul improperly called a law, alluding to the law of God againſt which he did ſet it in compariſon. But theſe men do in the name of the law diſpute upon a matter of nothing.

58. Of like ſort it is that thy called venial ſin, both ſecret ungodlineſs that is againſt the firſt table, and alſo the direct tranſgreſſing of the laſt commandment. For they define it thus, that it is a deſire without adviſed aſſent, which reſteth not long in the heart. But I ſay that it cannot come at all into the heart but by want of thoſe things that are required in the law, We forbid to have ſtrange gods. When the mind ſhaken with the engines of diſtruſt, looketh about elſewhere, when it is touched with a ſudden deſire to remove her bleſſedneſs ſome other way: whence come theſe motions, although they quickly vaniſh away, but of this, that there is ſomething in the ſoul empty, to receive ſuch tentations? And to the end not to draw out this argument to greater length there is a commandment given to love God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our ſoul: if then all the powers of our ſoul be not bent to the love of God, we have already departed from the obedience of the law, becauſe the enemies that do therein ariſe againſt his kingdom, and interrupt his decrees, do prove that God hath not his throne well ſtabliſhed in our conſcience. As for the laſt commandment, we have already ſhewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any deſire of mind pricked us? we are already guilty of coveting, and therewithal are made tranſgreſſors of the law, becauſe the Lord doth forbid us, not only to purpoſe and practiſe any thing that may be to another's loſs, but alſo to be pricked and ſwell with coveting it. But the curſe of God doth always hang over the tranſgreſſion of the law. We cannot therefore prove even the very leaſt deſires free from judgment of death. In weighing of ſins (ſaith Auguſtine) Lib. 2. de bap. contra. Donatiſt. cap. 6. let us not bring falſe balances to weigh what we pleaſe and how we pleaſe at our own pleaſure, ſaying: this is heavy and this is light: but let us bring God's ballance out of the holy ſcriptures, as out of the Lord's treaſury, and let us therein weigh what is heavy: rather let us not weigh, but acknowlege things already weighed by the Lord. But what ſaith the ſcripture? Truly when Paul ſaith that the wages of ſin is death, he ſheweth that he knew not this abominable diſtinction. Since we are too much inclined to hypocriſy, this cheriſhment thereof ought not to have been added to flatter our ſlothful conſciences.

Every tranſgreſſion even of the leaſt commandment diminiſheth his authority that commandeth diſpleaſeth him, provoketh his wrath and is not otherwiſe pardonable than by his mercy, but deſerveth in it ſelf to be puniſhed with eternal death.

59. I would to God they would conſider what that ſaying of Chriſt meaneth: (Matth. v. 19.) He that tranſgreſſeth one of the leaſt of theſe commandments, and teacheth men ſo, ſhall be counted leaſt in the kingdom of heaven. Are not they of that ſort, when they dare ſo extenuate the tranſgreſſion of the law as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to have conſidered not only what is commanded, but what he is who commandeth becauſe his authority is diminiſhed in every tranſgreſſion, how little ſoever it be, of the law that he hath given in commandment. Is it a ſmall matter with them, that God's majeſty be offended in any thing? Moreover if God hath declared his will in the law, whatſoever is contrary to the law, diſpleaſeth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be ſo diſarmed, that puniſhment of death ſhall not forthwith follow upon them? And he himſelf hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather find in their hearts to hear his voice, than to trouble clear truth with their inſipid ſubtilties of argument. The ſoul (ſaith he, Ezek. xviii. 20.) that ſinneth, the ſame ſhall die. Again, which I juſt now alleged, (Rom. vi. 23.) the wages of ſin is death. But altho' they grant it to be a ſin, becauſe they cannot deny it: yet they obſtinately perſiſt in this, that it is no deadly ſin. But ſince they have hitherto too much born with their own madneſs, let them yet at length learn to grow wiſer. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewel: and let the children of God learn this, that all ſin is deadly, becauſe it is a rebellion againſt the will of God, which of neceſſity provoketh his wrath, becauſe it is a breach of the law, upon which the judgment of God is pronounced without exception: and that the ſins of the ſaints are venial or pardonable, not of their own nature, but becauſe they obtain pardon by the mercy of God.

CHAP. IX.

That Chriſt although he was known to the Jews under the law, yet was delivered only by the goſpel.

Chriſt was known to the fathers under the law, but not ſo clearly as to us he is manifeſted in the goſpel.

BECAUSE it pleaſed God in the old time not vainly by expiations and ſacrifices to declare himſelf a father, and not in vain he did conſecrate a choſen people to himſelf: even then without doubt he was known in the ſame image, wherein he now appeareth to us in full brightneſs. Therefore Malachi. (Mal. iv. 2.) after that he had bidden the Jews to take heed to the law of Moſes, and to continue in ſtudy thereof, (becauſe after his death there ſhould come a certain interruption of the office of the prophets) did forthwith declare, that there ſhould ariſe a ſon of righteouſneſs. In which words he teacheth, that the law availeth to this purpoſe, to hold the godly in expectation of Chriſt to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he ſhould be come indeed. For this reaſon doth Peter ſay, (1 Pet. i. 12.) that the prophets did make ſearch, and diligently enquire, of the ſalvation that is now opened by the goſpel: and that it was revealed unto them, that they ſhould miniſter, not to themſelves nor to their own age, but unto us, thoſe things that are declared by the goſpel. Not that their doctrine was unprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing availed themſelves: but becauſe they enjoyed not the treaſure which God ſent unto us by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they teſtified, is familiarly ſet before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little ſip of it, there is offered unto us a more plentiful enjoying thereof. Therefore Chriſt himſelf, who affirmeth that he had witneſs born him by Moſes, yet extolleth the meaſure of grace whereby we excel the Jews. For ſpeaking to the diſciples he ſaid, (John v. 46.) Bleſſed are the eyes that ſee that which ye ſee, and bleſſed are the ears that hear that which ye hear. For many kings and prophets have wiſhed it, and have not obtained it. This is no ſmall commendation of the revelation of the goſpel that God preferred us before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlineſs. With which ſentence that other place diſagreeth not, where it is ſaid, (Mat. xiii. 16.) that Abraham ſaw the day of Chriſt and rejoiced. For though the ſight of a thing far diſtant was ſomewhat dark, yet he wanted nothing to the aſſurance of good hope. And thence came that joy which accompanied the holy prophet, even to his death. And that ſaying of John Baptiſt: (John i. 18.) No man hath ſeen God at any time, the only begotten that is in the boſom of the Father, hath declared him unto us, doth not exclude the godly who had been dead before him, from the fellowſhip of the underſtanding and light that ſhineth in the perſon of Chriſt: But comparing their eſtate with ours, he teacheth that thoſe myſteries, which they ſaw but darkly under ſhadows, are manifeſt to us: as the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews doth well ſet out, ſaying, (Heb. i. 1.) that God, who at ſundry times, and in divers manners, ſpake in time paſt unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in theſe laſt days ſpoken unto us by his well-beloved Son. Altho' therefore, that only-begotten one, who is the brightneſs of the glory and the expreſs image of the ſubſtance of God the Father, was in old time known to the Jews, as we have in another place alleged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the old diſpenſation: yet is it true, which the ſame Paul elſewhere (2 Cor. iv. 6.) teacheth, that God which commanded the light to ſhine out of darkneſs, hath now ſhined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowlege of the glory of God, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt: becauſe when he appeareth in this his image, he did in a manner make himſelf viſible, in compariſon of the dark and ſhadowiſh form that had been of him before. And ſo much the more vile and deteſtable in their ingratitude and perverſeneſs who are here ſo blind at midday. And therefore Paul ſaith, that their minds are darkened by Satan, that they ſhould not ſee the glory of Chriſt ſhining in the goſpel, though there be no vail ſet between them and it.

Although in the law and the prophets there be many promiſes concerning the free forgiveneſs of ſins, yet the name of the goſ-

2. Now I take the goſpel for the clear diſcloſing of the myſtery of Chriſt. I grant truly, that in that reſpect that Paul calleth the goſpel the doctrine of faith, all the promiſes that we here and there find in the law, concerning the free forgiveneſs of ſins, whereby God reconcileth men to himſelf, are accounted parts thereof. For he compareth pel properly taken is not applicableuntothembut only to the publishing of grace now given in Jesus Christ.

pareth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if salvation were to be sought by works. Whereupon followeth, that in taking the name of the gospel largely, there are contained under it all the testimonies that God in old time gave to the fathers, of his mercy and fatherly favour: But in the most excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of (1 Tim. iv. 6.) the grace given in Christ. And that meaning is not only received by common use, but also dependeth upon the authority of Christ and the apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed unto him, (Matth. iv. 9.) that he preached the gospel of the kingdom. And Mark maketh his preface in this manner, (Mark i. 1.) The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ. And there is no need to gather places to prove a thing abundantly known. Christ therefore by his coming hath brought to light life and immortality by the gospel. By which words Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkness of death, until the Son of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogative of honour to the gospel he teacheth that it is a new and unwonted kind of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Son. For although the faithful have always found by experience, that same saying of Paul (2 Tim. i. 10.) to be true, that in Christ all the promises are yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their hearts: yet because he hath accomplished all parts of our salvation in his flesh, therefore that very lively delivering of the things, justly obtained a new and singular title of praise. Hence it is that Christ says; (John i. 52.) hereafter ye shall see the heavens open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man. For though he seem to have relation unto the ladder shewed in a vision to the patriarch Jacob: yet he setteth out the excellency of his coming by this mark, that he opened the gate of heaven to all men, that the entry thereof may stand familiarly open to all men.

We may not with Servetus think that because the promises made before are accomplished in Christ, therefore they are abolished, so as christians are not to look for any further enjoying of things promised than they have attained already.

3. But yet we must take heed of the devilish imagination of Servetus who when he goeth about, or at least feigneth that he goeth about, to extol the greatness of the grace of Christ, utterly abolisheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He pretends that by the faith of the gospel there is brought unto us the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference between us and Christ. I did indeed just now declare that Christ left nothing unperformed of the whole sum of our salvation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we do already enjoy the benefits purchased by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our salvation is hidden in hope. I grant indeed, that we by believing in Christ, do also pass from death to life: but in the mean time we must hold this saying of John, that although we know we are the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shall be like unto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer unto us in his gospel present fulness of spiritual good things, yet the enjoying thereof lyeth still hid under the keeping of hope, till being unclothed of the corruptible flesh, we be transformed into the glory of him that goeth before us. In the mean time the holy Ghost biddeth us to rest upon the promises, whose authority ought with us to put to silence all the barkings of that filthy dog. For as Paul witnesseth, (1 Tim. iv. 8.) godliness hath a promise as well of the life to come as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth (2 Tim. i.) that he is an apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him, And in another place (2 Cor. vii.) he putteth us in mind, that we have th same promises, which in the old time were gi e to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for en sum of felicity, that we are sealed up with the ly spirit of promise, but yet we do no otherwise enjoy Christ, but so far as we embrace him, cloth- ed with his promises. Whereby it cometh to pass, that he indeed dwelleth in our hearts, and yet we wander in journey abroad from him: because we walk by faith and not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together; that we possess in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heavenly life: and yet that fa- is a beholding of good things that are not se- ference to be observe- . Only there is a difthe promises: be- in the nature or quality of finger that t- ause the gospel sheweth with her figures. ing which the law did shadow under

The gospel is not so opposite to the law, as teaching another way of salvation, but the same more plainly.

4. And hereby also is their error convinced, who do never otherwise compare the law with the gospel, but as they compare the merits of works with the free imputation of righteousness. Although indeed this comparison of contraries be not to be rejected: because Paul doth oftentimes understand by the name of the law, a rule to live righteously, wherein God requireth of us, that which is his, not giving us any hope of life, unless we in all points obey it; and on the other side adding a curse if we do never so little depart from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckoned righteous, because the observation of the law, to which the reward is promised, is no where found. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousness of the law and of the gospel, contrary the one to the other. But the gospel did not so succeed in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diverse mean of salvation, but rather to confirm and prove to be of force, whatsoever the law had promised, and to join the body to the shadows. For when Christ saith, that the law and the prophets were until John: he maketh not the fathers subject to the curse, which the bondservants of the law cannot escape: but rather only that they were instructed with certain rudiments, so as they stayed a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the gospel. Therefore Paul (Rom. i. 16.) calling the gospel the power of God, to salvation to every believer, by and by addeth, that it hath witness of the law and the prophets. But in the end of the same epistle, although he shew that the title of praise of Jesus Christ is the revelation of the mystery kept secret in the everlasting times: yet he doth qualify that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that he is openly shewed by the writings of the prophets. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to treat of the whole law, the gospel differeth from the law only in respect of the plain disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath been laid open for us in Christ, it is now not without cause said, that at his coming the heavenly kingdom of God was erected in earth.

The preaching of John a mean between the law and the gospel. In which respect his office differing both from the prophets and apostles he is termed greater than the one and less than he who was least of the other.

5. Now between the law and the gospel came John, who had office that was middle and of affinity to them both. For though when he called Christ the lamb of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sins, he shewed forth the sum of the gospel: yet because he did not express that same incomparable strength and glory, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith that he was not equal to the apostles. For so do those words of his mean: that though John excel among the sons of women, yet he that is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred John before the prophets, he advanceth the preaching of the gospel to the highest degree: which preaching we see in another place signifyed by the kingdom of heaven. But whereas John himself (Matth. xi. 11.) doth answer that he is but a voice, as though he were inferior to the prophets, he doth not that for feigned humility's sake, but meaneth to teach that the proper office of the ambassador was not committed to him, (John i. 23.) but that he only executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was foretold by Malachi: (Mal. iv. 5.) Behold, I send Elias the prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lord do come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministry, but endeavour to prepare disciples to Christ: as also Isaiah proveth, that this was enjoined him from God. And in this sense Christ is called (John v. 35.) a candle burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this does not hinder but that he may be reckoned among the publishers of the gospel, like as he used the same baptism, which was afterwards delivered to the apostles. But that which he began was not fulfilled but by the apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken up from them into the heavenly glory.

CHAP. X.

Of the likeneſs of the old and new Teſtaments.

A thing neceſſary to know the agreement and difference between ourſelves and the fathers under the law.

FROM what has been ſaid it may now evidently appear, that all the men whom from the beginning of the world God adopted into the eſtate of his people, with the ſame law, and with the bond of the ſame doctrine, which now remaineth in force among us, were bound in covenant to him. But becauſe it is of no ſmall importance that this point be well eſtabliſhed, I will adjoin unto it for an addition, ſince the fathers were all partakers of the ſame inheritance with us, and all hoped for the ſame ſalvation by the grace of the ſame mediator, how far their eſtate differed from ours in this fellowſhip. But although the teſtimonies that we have gathered out of the law and the prophets for proof thereof, do make it plain that there was never any other rule of religion and godlineſs in the people of God: yet becauſe in writers there are oftentimes many things ſpoken of the difference of the old and new Teſtaments, that may make the reader that is not of very ſharp judgment to be in doubt: therefore we ſhall juſtly appoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact diſcuſſing of this matter: yea, and that thing alſo, which otherwiſe ſhould have been very profitable for us, is now made neceſſary by that monſtrous lying fellow Servetus and by divers other mad men of the ſect of Anabaptiſts, who have no other opinion of the people of Iſrael than as of a herd of ſwine: whom they fondly feign to have been fatted up by the Lord here in this earth, without any hope of heavenly immortality. Therefore that we may prevent this peſtilent error from coming into godly minds, and alſo that we may pluck out of them all doubts which are wont by and by to ariſe upon hearing mention of the diverſity between the old and the new Teſtament; let us by the way look, what they have in them like, and what unlike one to the other: what covenant the Lord made with the Iſraelites in the old time before the coming of Chriſt, and what covenant he hath now made with us ſince Chriſt hath been openly ſhewed.

The fathers had the ſame covenant which we have: they looked for immortality and had it promiſed: they expected it by mercy and not by merit: they knew that Chriſt was their mediator to obtain, mercy as well as we.

2. And both theſe points may be made plain with one word. The covenant of all the fathers ſo differeth nothing from ours in ſubſtance and in matter itſelf, that it is altogether one and the ſelf ſame: but the miniſtration is divers. But becauſe of ſo great ſhortneſs no man were able to attain a certain underſtanding, we muſt needs proceed on with a longer declaration if we mean to profit any thing at all. But in ſhewing how they are like, or rather all one, it ſhall be ſuperfluous to diſcourſe again anew upon all the ſpecial particulars that have already been declared: and it ſhall be out of ſeaſon to mingle thoſe things together that remain yet to be ſpoken in other places. Here we muſt chiefly reſt upon three principal points: Firſt, that we hold, that carnal wealth and felicity was not the mark appointed to the Jews to aſpire unto, but that they were by adoption choſen unto the hope of immortality: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly aſſured unto them both by oracles, and by the law, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the covenant whereby they were joined to the Lord, was upholden not by any merits of theirs, but by the only mercy of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Chriſt the mediator, by whom they ſhould both be joined to God and enjoy his promiſes. Of which points, becauſe the ſecond peradventure is not yet ſufficiently known, it ſhall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we ſhall confirm by many and clear teſtimonies of the prophets, that it was of his own mere goodneſs, and tender favour, whatſoever good the Lord at any time did, and promiſed to the people of Iſrael. The third alſo hath already had here and there ſome plain declarations of it, and we have not left the firſt altogether untouched.

As well to the fathers under the law as to us in goſpel, promiſes were made of the life to come and not of temporal happineſs only.

3. Therefore in ſetting out of this point, becauſe it moſt eſpecially belongeth to this preſent matter, and becauſe they contend with us moſt about it, we will therefore beſtow the more pains upon it: but yet ſo that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way ſupplied, or in convenient place be added. Truly, the apoſtle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he ſaith,

Rom.

Rom. i. 2. that God the Father long before by the prophets in the holy ſcriptures promiſed the goſpel, which he afterwards publiſhed according to the time appointed. Again, Rom. iii. 21. that the righteouſneſs of faith which is taught by the goſpel itſelf, hath witneſs of the law and the prophets. For the goſpel doth not hold the hearts of men in the joy of this preſent life, but lifteth them up to the hope of immortality: doth not faſten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope laid up in heaven, doth in a manner tranſport them thither. For thus he defineth, (Eph. i. 13.) in another place. Since that ye believed the goſpel, ye are ſealed up with the holy Spirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance, for the redemption of the purchaſed poſſeſſion. Again, (Col. i. 4.) we have heard of your faith in Chriſt Jeſus, and of your charity towards the ſaints, for the hope's ſake which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye have heard by the true ſpeech of the goſpel. Again: (1 Theſſ. ii. 14.) He hath called us by the goſpel to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Wherefore it is called both the word of ſalvation, and the power of God to ſave the faithful; and the kingdom of heaven. Now, if the doctrine of the goſpel be ſpiritual, and openeth the entry to the poſſeſſion of an incorruptible life; let us not think that they to whom it was promiſed and declared, did paſs over and neglect the care of their ſouls, and lie dully like beaſts in ſeeking pleaſures of the body. Neither let any man here cavil that the promiſes which are ſealed in the law and the prophets concerning the goſpel, were ordained for the new people. For within a little after, that which he ſpake of the goſpel promiſed in the law, he addeth, Rom. iii. 19. that all the things that the law containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are under the law. I grant indeed it is in another argument. But he was not ſo forgetful, that when he had once ſaid, that all the things which the law containeth belong to the Jews, he did not remember what in a few verſes before he had affirmed of the goſpel promiſed in the law. Wherefore the apoſtle ſheweth moſt plainly, that the old Teſtament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he ſaith, that under it are contained the promiſes of the goſpel.

The ſame mercy by virtue of the ſame mediator ſaved the fathers which ſaveth us.

4. By the ſame reaſon followeth, both that it ſtood upon the free mercy of God, and alſo was confirmed by the mean of Chriſt. For the very preaching of the goſpel pronounceth no other thing, but that ſinners are juſtified by the fatherly kindneſs of God without their own deſerving, and the whole ſum thereof is fulfilled in Chriſt. Who then dare make the Jews without Chriſt, with whom we hear that the covenant of the goſpel was made, whereof Chriſt is the only foundation? Who dare make them ſtrangers from the benefit of free ſalvation, to whom we hear that the doctrine of the righteouſneſs of faith was miniſtred? But, that we diſpute not long of an evident matter, we have a remarkable ſentence of the Lord, John viii. 56. Abraham rejoiced that he might ſee my day, he ſaw it and was glad. And the ſame thing which Chriſt there teſtifieth of Abraham, the apoſtle ſheweth that it was univerſal in the faithful people, when he ſaith, that Chriſt is the ſame yeſterday to day, and for ever. For he ſpeaketh not there only of the eternal Godhead of Chriſt, but alſo of his power, which was continually opened to the faithful. Wherefore both the bleſſed virgin and Zachary in their ſongs, do ſay Luke. i. 54. and 72. that the ſalvation revealed in Chriſt, is the performance of the promiſes, which God in old time had made to Abraham and the patriarchs. If the Lord in giving his Chriſt, fulfilled his antient oath, it cannot be ſaid but that the end thereof was always in Chriſt an everlaſting life.

Equality between the fathers and us in the thing ſignified both by their and our ſacraments.

5. Yea, and the apoſtle doth make the Iſraelites equal with us, not only in the grace of the covenant, but alſo in ſignification of ſacraments. For meaning by examples of puniſhments, wherewith the ſcripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they ſhould not run into the like offences, he beginneth with this preface, 1 Cor. x. 1. and 11. that there is no cauſe why we ſhould challenge any prerogative unto ourſelves, to deliver us from the vengeance of God which they ſuſtained, foraſmuch as the Lord did not only grant unto them the ſame benefits, but he hath glorioufly ſet forth his grace among them with the ſame tokens: as if he ſhould have ſaid: If ye truſt that ye are out of danger, becauſe both baptiſm, wherewith ye are diſtinguiſhed, and the ſupper which ye daily receive, have excellent promiſes, and in the mean time deſpiſing the goodneſs of God, ye are licentiouſly wanton: Know ye, that the Jews alſo were not without ſuch ſacraments, againſt whom yet the Lord did moſt ſeverely put his judgments in execution. They were baptized in paſſing over the ſea, and in the clouds wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the ſun. They

ſay, that that ſame paſſage was a carnal baptiſm, which after a certain proportion anſwereth to our ſpiritual baptiſm. But if that were allowed true, the apoſtle's argument could not proceed, which meaneth here to have this taken away from the chriſtians, that they think that they excel they Jews by the prerogative of baptiſm. Neither is that which ſoon after followeth, ſubject to this cavil: that they did eat the ſame ſpiritual meat that we eat, and drunk the ſame ſpiritual drink, which he expoundeth to be Chriſt.

The words of Chriſt in ſaying: Your fathers did eat Manna and are dead: do not contradict the apoſtle who ſaith: They did eat the ſame ſpiritual meat that we eat. For they unto whom Chriſt ſpeaketh gave him occaſion not to touch the myſtery but only the carnal uſe of their Manna.

6. To overthrow this ſentence of Paul, they object that which Chriſt ſaith: Your fathers did eat Manna in the wilderneſs, and are dead: he that eateth my fleſh ſhall not die for ever. Which two places are very eaſily to be made to agree together. The Lord, becauſe he then talked to hearers that ſought only to be filled with food of their bellies, but cared not for the meat of the ſoul, tempered his talk ſomewhat to their capacity, but eſpecially he frameth the compariſon of Manna, and of his body according to their ſenſe. They required that he, to get himſelf ſome credit, would approve his power with doing ſome ſuch miracle, as Moſes did in the wilderneſs, when he obtained Manna from heaven. But in Manna they conceived nothing but the remedy of carnal hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they pierced not to that higher myſtery which Paul hath reſpect unto; Chriſt therefore, to ſhew how much greater a benefit they ought to look for at his hand, than that which they reported that Moſes did beſtow upon their fathers, frameth this compariſon, "If it were a great miracle "in your opinion, and worthy to be remembered, "that the Lord by Moſes miniſtred food from heaven "to his people, to ſuſtain them for a ſmall time, "that they ſhould not periſh for hunger in the "wilderneſs:" gather hereby how much more excellent is the meat that giveth immortality. We ſee why the Lord paſſed over that thing which was principal in Manna, and ſpake only of the baſeſt profit of it: even becauſe the Jews as it were of purpoſe to reproach him, did caſt Moſes in his teeth, which ſuccoured the neceſſity of the people with remedy of Manna: he anſwered that he is the miniſter of a much higher grace, in compariſon whereof, the carnal feeding of the people which alone they ſo much eſteemed ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, becauſe he knew that the Lord when he rained Manna from heaven did not only pour it down for the feeding of their belly, but alſo did diſtribute it for a ſpiritual myſtery, to be a figure of the ſpiritual quickning that is had in Chriſt, did not neglect that part that was moſt worthy of conſideration. Wherefore it certainly and clearly followeth, that the ſame promiſes of eternal and heavenly life, which now the Lord vouchſafeth to grant unto us, were not only communicated unto the Jews, but alſo ſealed with very ſpiritual ſacraments. Of which matter Auguſtin diſputeth largely againſt Fauſtus the Manichee.

7. But if the readers had rather to have teſtimonies alledged unto them out of the law and the prophets, whereby they may perceive that the ſpiritual covenant was common alſo to the fathers, as we hear by Chriſt and the apoſtles: I will alſo follow that deſire, and ſo much the more willingly, becauſe by that mean the adverſaries ſhall be more ſurely convinced, ſo that they ſhall have afterwards no way to dally. And I will begin at that proof, which although I know that the Anabaptiſts pride will think very fond, and in a manner to be laughed at, yet ſhall much avail with ſuch readers as are willing to learn and have their right wits. And I take it as a principle confeſſed that there is ſuch effectual force of life in the word of God, that whom ſoever God vouchſafeth to be partakers thereof, it quickeneth their ſouls. For the ſaying of Peter (1 Pet ii. 13.) hath always been of force, that it is the incorruptible ſeed which abideth for ever, as alſo he gathereth out of the words of Iſaiah, Iſa. 40. 6. Now ſince God in the old time bound the Jews unto him with this holy bond, it is not to be doubted but that he did alſo ſeparate them into the hope of eternal life. For when I ſay they embraced the word, which ſhould join them nigher to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it; not that general manner, which is poured abroad throughout the heaven and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it do quicken all things, every one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliver them from neceſſity of corruption: but I ſpeak of this ſpecial manner, whereby the ſouls of the godly are both enlightened unto the knowlege of God, and as it were united to him. By this enlightening of the word, ſince Adam, Abel, Noah, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaved unto God, I ſay that it is not doubtful that they had an entry into the immortal kingdom of God. For it was a ſound partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefit of eternal life.

Since the fathers were enlightened and united unto God by the ſeed of that word which is immortal, it ſheweth that they had the benefit of immortality and eternal life.

The form of the covenant of God with the fathers promiſing to be their God proveth that eternal life was promiſed them.

8. But if this ſeem ſomewhat perplexed, go to the very form of the covenant, which ſhall not only ſatisfy ſober minds, but alſo ſhall ſufficiently convince their ignorance who bend themſelves to ſpeak againſt it. For God did always thus covenant with his ſervants: Lev. xxvi. 12. I will be to you a God, and ye ſhall be to me a people. In which words the prophets themſelves are wont to expound, that both life and ſalvation, and the whole ſum of bleſſedneſs is comprehended. For David (Pſal. cxliv. 15.) doth not without cauſe often pronounce, that bleſſed is the people, whoſe God is the Lord: bleſſed is the nation, which he hath choſen to be his inheritance: Pſal. xxxiii. 12. and that not for earthly felicity's ſake, but becauſe he delivereth them from death, he preſerveth them for ever, and continually ſheweth them eternal mercy, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other prophets, Hab. i. 12. Thou art our God, we ſhall not die: Iſa. xxxiii. 21. The Lord is our king, our lawmaker, he ſhall ſave us. Deut. xxxiii. 29. Bleſſed art thou, O Iſrael, becauſe thou art ſaved in the Lord God. But, not to labour overmuch in a thing needleſs, this admonition is found and every where in the prophets, that we ſhall want nothing toward all abundance of good things, and aſſurance of ſalvation, ſo that the Lord be our God. And juſtly: For if his face ſo ſoon as it beginneth to ſhine, is a moſt preſent pledge of ſalvation, to what man ſhall he openly ſhew himſelf for his God, but that he will alſo open to him his treaſure of ſalvation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the midſt of us: as he teſtified by Moſes, Lev. xxvi. 12. But ſuch preſence cannot be obtained, but that life muſt be alſo together had in poſſeſſion with it. And although there were no more expreſſed, yet had they a promiſe of ſpiritual life plain enough in theſe words: Exod. vi. 7. I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God unto their bodies alone, but principally to their ſouls. But ſouls unleſs they be united to God by righteouſneſs remain eſtranged from him in death. But on the other ſide, let that joining be preſent, it ſhall bring everlaſting ſalvation with it.

God in promiſing the fathers to be their God in time to come, and to continue his mercy to their children, likewiſe in affirming himſelf to be the God of the dead, gave the living plain hope of endleſs life.

9. Beſide that, he did not only teſtify that he was to them their God, but he alſo promiſed that he would be ſo always to the end that their hope not contented with preſent benefits, ſhould be extended to eternity. And many ſayings do ſhew, that the ſpeaking in the future time meant ſo much, as where the faithful not only in preſent evils, but alſo for the time to come, do comfort themſelves with this, that God will never fail them. Now as concerning the ſecond part of the promiſe, he yet more plainly aſſured them of the bleſſing of God to be prolonged unto them beyond the bounds of this life in ſaying: Gen xvii. 7. I will be the God of your ſeed after you. For if he had a mind to declare his good will toward them being dead, in doing good to their poſterity, much more would his favour not fail toward themſelves. For God is not like unto men, who do therefore carry their love to their friends children, becauſe their power is interrupted by death, ſo that they cannot employ their friendly actions upon them to whom they did bear good will. But God, whoſe bountifulneſs is not hindred by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruit of the mercy, which for their ſakes he poureth out into a thouſand generations. Therefore the Lord's will was by a notable proof to ſet forth unto them the greatneſs and exuberant plenty of his goodneſs, which they ſhould feel after death, when he deſcribed it to be ſuch as ſhould flow over into all their poſterity. And the truth of this promiſe the Lord did then ſeal, and as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when he named himſelf (Exod iii.6.) the God of Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, long after their death. For, what had it not be a fond naming, if they had utterly periſhed? For then had it been all one, as if he had ſaid, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the evangeliſts, (Luke xx. 32.) rehearſe, that with this one argument the Sadducees were ſo driven to a ſtrait, that they could not deny that Moſes did teſtify the reſurrection of the the dead, becauſe they had learned by by Moſes, (Deut. xxxiii. 3.) that all the ſaints were in his hand. Whereupon it was eaſy to gather, that they are not deſtroyed by death, whom he that is the judge of life and death had received into his ſafe-guard, cuſtody, and protection.

The eſtate of Adam, Abel, and Noah, declareth that they had an eye to a better than this preſent life.

10. Now (which is the principal point whereupon this controverſy depends) let us ſee, whether the faithful themſelves have not been ſo inſtructed of the Lord, that they perceived that they ſhould have a better life elſewhere, and ſo neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. Firſt the ſtate of life that was enjoyned them by God, was a continual exerciſe, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the moſt miſerable of all men, if their happineſs were only in this life. Adam, moſt unhappy, even with only remembrance of the happineſs that he had loſt, (Gen. iii. 17.) did with painful labours hardly ſuſtain his needineſs, and that he ſhould not be preſſed with the curſe of God, in the only labours of his hands, even there received he extreme ſorrow of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two ſons, the one was taken away by the wicked ſlaughter of his brother: the other he had left alive, whoſe ſight he worthily deteſted and abhorred. (Gen. iv. 8.) Abel cruelly murdered in the very flower of his age, became an example of the wretchedneſs of men. Noah, while the whole world careleſly lived in pleaſure, ſpent a good part of his age with great wearineſs in building the ark. (Gen. vi. 22.) This that he eſcaped death, came to paſs by his greater troubles, than if he ſhould have died an hundred deaths. For beſide that the ark was to him as a grave for ten months, there is nothing more unpleaſant than to be holden ſo long in a manner drowned in dung of beaſts. (Gen. ix. 24.) When he had paſſed over ſo great difficulties, he fell into new matter of grief, he ſaw himſelf ſcorned of his own ſon, and was compelled with his own mouth to curſe him, whom by the great benefit of God (Gen. xii. 4.) he had received ſafe from the general flood.

11. Abraham indeed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thouſand, if we conſider his faith, which is ſet forth unto us for the beſt rule of believing, of whoſe kindred we muſt be accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what greater abſurdity is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithful, and not to poſſeſs ſo much as the ſmalleſt corner among them? but he cannot be thrown down out of the number, no not from the moſt honourable degree, but that the whole church muſt be deſtroyed. Now as touching the experiences of his life: when he was firſt called by the commandment of God, he was plucked away from his country, his parents and his friends, in whom men think to be the chief ſweetneſs of life: even as if God of determinate purpoſe meant to ſpoil him of all the pleaſures of life. So ſoon as he came into the land where he was commanded to dwell, he was driven out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for ſuccour, where to ſave himſelf, he was compelled to deliver out his wife to be abuſed, which we know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the land of his own dwelling, he was driven out again from thence with famine. What a felicity is this, to dwell in that land, wherein a man muſt ſo oft be hungry, yea die for famine if he run not away? And therewithal he was brought to that neceſſity with Abimelech, that he muſt needs redeem his life with the loſs of his wife, while many years long he wandered uncertainly hither and thither, he was compelled by the continual brawlings of his ſervants to put away his nephew, whom he loved as his own ſon. Which departing without doubt he did no otherwiſe take than if he had ſuffered the cutting off of one of his limbs. A little after, (Gen. xii. 12.) he heard that he was carried away captive by his enemies. Whitherſoever he went, he found neighbours outragiouſly barbarous, who would not ſuffer him ſo much as to drink water out of the wells that himſelf had digged with great labour. For he would not have redeemed the uſe of them at the hand of king Gerar, if he had not firſt been forbidden. Now when he came to old age, he ſaw the thing which is the moſt unpleaſant and bitter that age hath, himſelf puniſhed with having no children, till beſide all hope he begat Iſhmael, whoſe birth yet he paid dear for, when he was wearied with the brawling of Sarah, as if he in maintaining the ſtubbornneſs of his bondwoman were himſelf the cauſe of the trouble of his houſhold. At length Iſaac was born, but with this condition that his firſt begotten Iſhmael muſt, as forſaken, be cruelly caſt out of doors. When only Iſaac was left, in whom the wearied age of the ſilly good man, might reſt, within a little after he was commanded to kill him. What can man's wit deviſe more miſerable than the father to be made the butcher of his own ſon? If Iſaac had died of any ſickneſs, who would not have thought the old man moſt miſerable, that had a ſon given him in mockery, for whom his grief of want of children ſhould be doubled? If he had been ſlain by ſome ſtranger, the unhappineſs of the thing would have much increaſed his miſery. But this paſſeth all examples of miſery, to have him ſlain with his father's own hand. Finally, he was in all the whole courſe of his life ſo toſſed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miſerable life, he could find none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man object that he was not altogether unhappy, becauſe he at length proſperouſly eſcaped from ſo many and ſo great tempeſts. For we cannot ſay that he lived a bleſſed life, who for a long ſpace together painfully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of evils, quietly enjoyeth preſent good things.

The lives of Iſaac and Jacob eſpecially, how far from outward happineſs?

12. Iſaac who was leſs troubled with evils, yet ſcarce taſted of ſweetneſs. He alſo felt the ſame vexations, that do not ſuffer a man to be bleſſed in the earth. Famine chaſed him out of the land of Canaan: (Gen. xxvi. 35.) he had his wife violently plucked away from his boſom: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all means oppreſſed him, ſo that he was fain to ſtrive for his water: at home in his houſe, he ſuffered much troubleſomeneſs by his children's wives, he was grieved with diſagreements of his ſons, and could not remedy that ſo great a miſchief, but by the baniſhment of him whom he had bleſſed. But as for Jacob, he is nothing elſe but a notable example of extreme infelicity: he paſſed his childhood (Gen. xxviii. 5.) moſt unquietly at home among the threatenings and terrors of his elder brother, to whom at length he was compelled to give place. When he had fled from his parents and his native country, beſides that it was a grievous thing to live in baniſhment, he was nothing more kindly or gently received of his uncle Laban. (Gen. xxix. 20.) Then it ſufficed not that he had ſerved ſeven years a hard and cruel ſervice, but that alſo muſt be by guile defrauded of his wife. For another wife's ſake he was driven into new ſervice, where he was all the day ſcorched with heat of the ſun, and all the night lay waking and pained with froſt and cold, as himſelf complained. While he by the ſpace of twenty years ſuffered ſo hard a life, he was daily vexed with new injuries of his father in law. (Gen. xxxi. 23.) Neither was he quiet in his own houſe, ſeeing it divided and in a manner ſcattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and envy of his wives. When he was commanded to return into his own country, he was compelled to watch an advantage to take his journey, much like a ſhameful running away: and yet could he not ſo eſcape the unjuſt dealing of his father in law, but was fain to ſuffer his reproaches and rebukes in the midſt of his journey. (Gen. xxxii. 11.) Then fell he into a much more cruel diſtreſs. For when he came near to his brother, he had ſo many deaths before his eyes, as might be prepared by a cruel man and a bent enemy. So was he above meaſure tormented and as it were drawn aſunder with terrible fears, ſo long as he looked for his brother's coming, when he came once in his ſight, he fell down as half dead at his feet, until he found him more favourable than he durſt have hoped. (Gen. xxxv. 16.) Beſide that, at his firſt entry into the land, he loſt Rachel his dearly beloved wife. Afterward he heard word (Gen. xxxvii. 35.) that the ſon whom he had by her, and whom therefore he loved above the reſt, was torn with wild beaſts: by whoſe death how great grief he conceived, he himſelf declared in this that after long weeping he obſtinately ſtopped up all ways whereby comfort might come to him, leaving himſelf nothing, but to go down to his ſon wailing into the grave. In the mean time how great cauſes of grief, wailing and wearineſs were (Gen. xxxiv. 8.) the raviſhment and deflowring of his daughter, and the boldneſs of his ſons in revenging it, which not only made him to be abhorred in ſight of all the inhabitants of that country, but alſo procured him moſt imminent danger of utter deſtruction? Then followed that horrible outragious offence of Reuben (Gen. xxxv. 22.) his firſt begotten ſon, which was ſuch, as there could not happen a more grievous. For whereas the defiling of a man's wife is reckoned among the higheſt ill fortunes: what is to be ſaid of it, when that wickedneſs is committed by a man's own ſon? Within a little while after, his houſe is polluted with another unnatural adultery: (Gen. xxxvii. 18.) ſo that ſo many ſhames might well break a heart, that otherwiſe were moſt conſtant and unable to be quenched with calamities. A little before the end of this life, while he ſought to provide ſuccour for the famine of himſelf and other, he was ſtruck with tidings of a new misfortune, (Gen. xlii. 32.) understanding that another of his sons was kept in prison, for recovering of whom he was compelled to leave to the rest Benjamin his only darling. Who can think that in such a multitude of calamities he had any one moment given him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himself the best witness of himself, affirmed to Pharaoh, (Gen. xlvii. 9.) that his days were short and evil upon the earth. Now truly he that declareth that he hath passed his life by continual miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperity which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Jacob did unkindly and unthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truly professed that he had been miserable upon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fixed upon earthly things.

As the life of the fathers sheweth, so the apostle witnesseth that they looked for other than earthly blessedness at the hands of God.

13. If these holy fathers looked for (as undoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truly they both thought and saw it to be another manner of blessedness, than the blessedness of earthly life. Which thing the apostle also doth shew excellently well: Abraham (saith he Heb. xi. 9.) sojourned by faith in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promises. For they looked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. These all died in faith not having received the promises, but having seen them a far off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. Whereby they declare that they sought for a country; and if they had been moved with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to return. But they sought for a better, that is the heavenly country. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a city. For they had been duller than blocks, to follow promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, unless they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefly inforceth, and that not without good reason, that they called this life a journey from home, even as Moses (Gen. xlvii. 9.) reporteth. For if they were strangers and foreigners in the land of Canaan, where is the Lord's promise, whereby they were made heirs of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lord's promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foot in the land of Canaan, but for burial, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receive the fruit of the promise till after death. And this is the cause why Jacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he (Gen. xxvii. 29. and 30.) compelled his son Joseph to promise it him, and to swear to perform it: and why Joseph (Gen. l. 25.) willed his bones, certain ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be removed thither.

The righteous of old did account the end of this life to be the beginning of a better.

14. Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the ills of this life they had always, set before them the blessedness of the life to come. For to what purpose should Jacob have so much desired, and with so great danger sought the pre-eminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his child: but no good at all, unless he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the words which he spake amongst his last breathings. (Gen. xlix. 18.) Lord I will look for thy salvation. What salvation could he have looked for, when he saw that he lay ready to give up the Ghost, unless he had seen in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute we of the saints and children of God, when even he was not without a taste of such understanding, who otherwise was an enemy to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said: (Num. xxiii. 10.) Let my soul die the death of the righteous, and my last end be like unto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that David afterward uttered, (Psal. cxvi. 15.) that the death of the saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, (Psal. xxxiv. 22.) but the death of the wicked is very evil: if the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it be observed no difference between the righteous and unrighteous, they differ the one from the other by the diversity of the estates that after death shall befal to them both.

The hope which David had of immortality.

15. We are not yet come beyond Moses, who (as these men say) had no other office, but to persuade the carnal people to worship God by the fruitfulness of the ground and plenty of all things. And yet (unless a man will flee the light that willingly offereth itself) there is already a plain declaration of the ſpiritual covenant. But if we come down to the prophets, there with moſt full brightneſs both the life everlaſting and the kingdom of Chriſt do utter themſelves. And firſt of all David, who as he was before the other in time, ſo according to the order of God's diſtribution, he ſhewed the heavenly myſteries in ſhadows more darkly than the reſt, yet with what plainneſs and certainty directeth he all his ſayings to that end? How he eſteemed the earthly dwelling, this ſentence teſtifieth: (Pſal. xxxix. 13.) I am here a forreigner and ſtranger, as all my fathers were. Every living man is vanity, every one walketh about as a ſhadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? even to thee is my hope. Truly he who confeſſing that in the earth there is nothing ſound or ſtedfaſt, keepeth ſtill a ſtedfaſtneſs of hope in God, conſidereth his felicity laid up in another place. To ſuch conſideration is he wont to call all the faithful, ſo oft as he meaneth to comfort them truly. For in another place after he had ſpoken of the ſhortneſs, and the tranſitory and vaniſhing image of man's life, he addeth: but the mercy of the Lord is for ever upon them that fear him. Like to which is that which is in the cii. Pſalm, 25th verſe; At the beginning Lord thou didſt lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They ſhall periſh, but thou abideſt: they ſhall wax old like a garment, and thou ſhalt change them as apparel, but thou remaineſt the ſelf ſame, and thy years ſhall not fail: the ſons of thy ſervants ſhall dwell, and their poſterity ſhall be eſtabliſhed before thee. If the godly ceaſe not, notwithſtanding the decay of heaven and earth, to be ſtabliſhed before the Lord, it followeth that their ſalvation is joined with the eternity of God. But that hope cannot ſtand at all, unleſs it reſt upon the promiſe that is ſet forth in Iſaiah: (Iſa. li. 6.) The heavens (ſaith the Lord) ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoke, the earth ſhall be worn out like a garment, and the inhabitants of it ſhall periſh like thoſe things: But my ſalvation ſhall be for ever, and my righteouſneſs ſhall not fail: where everlaſtingneſs is given to righteouſneſs and ſalvation, not in reſpect that they remain with God, but in reſpect that they are felt of men.

16. Neither may we otherwiſe take thoſe things, that he commonly ſpeaketh of the proſperous ſucceſs of the faithful, but to apply them to the open ſhewing of the heavenly glory. As theſe ſayings: (Pſal. xcvii. 10.) The Lord keepeth the ſouls of the righteous, he ſhall deliver them from the hand of the ſinner. (Pſal. cxii. 7, 9.) Light is ariſen to the righteous, and joy to the upright in heart. (Pſal. cxl. 12.) The righteouſneſs of the godly man abideth for ever: his horn ſhall be exalted in glory, the deſire of the ſinner ſhall periſh. Again: (Pſal. cxii. 6.) but the righteous ſhall confeſs unto thy name, the upright ſhall dwell with thy countenance. Again: (Pſal. xxxiv. 23.) the righteous ſhall be in eternal remembrance. Again: the Lord ſhall redeem the ſouls of his ſervants. For the Lord oftentimes leaveth his ſervants to the luſt of the wicked, not only to be vexed, but alſo to be torn in pieces and deſtroyed: he ſuffereth the good to lie languiſhing in darkneſs and filth, while the wicked do in a manner ſhine among the ſtars. And he doth not ſo cheer them with the brightneſs of his countenance, that they enjoy long continuing gladneſs. Wherefore even he alſo hideth not, that if the faithful fix their eyes upon the preſent ſtate of things, they ſhall be ſtruck with a ſore temptation, as though there were no favour or reward of innocence with God. So much doth wickedneſs for the moſt part proſper and flouriſh, while the company of the godly is oppreſſed with ſhame, poverty, contempt, and all kinds of croſſes. It wanteth but little (ſaith he) that my foot ſlipped not, and my ſteps fell not abroad, while the fortune of fools grieveth me, and while I ſee the proſperity of the wicked. At length after rehearſal of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could underſtand theſe things. But it is a torment to my ſpirit, till I enter into the ſanctuary of the Lord, and underſtand the laſt end of them.

it hath relation to future bleſſedneſs in the world to come.

The expectation which David had of a judgment to come and felicity to follow it.

17. Let us therefore learn yet by this confeſſion of David, that the holy fathers under the old Teſtament were not ignorant, how ſeldom or never God doth in this world perform to his ſervants thoſe things that he promiſeth them, and that therefore they did lift up their minds to God's ſanctuary, wherein they had that laid up in ſtore, which appeareth not in the ſhadow of this preſent life. That was the laſt judgment of God, which when they could not ſee with eyes, they were content to underſtand by faith. Truſting upon which affiance, whatſoever happened

ed in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promiſes of God ſhould be fulfilled. As theſe ſayings do witneſs, Pſal. xvii. I will behold the face of God in righteouſneſs: I will be ſatisfied with thy countenance. Again, Pſal. lii. 10. I am as a green olive tree in the houſe of the Lord. Again, Pſal. xcii. 13. The righteous ſhall flouriſh like the palm-tree, and ſhall ſpread in branches like the cedar of Lebanon, being planted in the houſe of the Lord, they ſhall flouriſh in the palaces of our God: They ſhall ſtill bear fruit, they ſhall be fat and green in their old age. When he had ſaid a little before; How deep are thy thoughts? O Lord, while the wicked do flouriſh, they bud out like an herb, that they may periſh for ever. Where is that fair ſhew and beauty of the faithful, but when the face of this world ſhall be turned inward by diſcloſing of the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternity, they deſpiſed the hardneſs enduring but a moment of preſent miſeries, and boldly burſt forth into theſe words: Pſal. lv. 23. Thou ſhalt not ſuffer for ever the righteous to die, but thou ſhalt throw down the wicked headlong into the pit of deſtruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternal deſtruction that may ſwallow up the wicked? Among whoſe felicities, this is alſo reckoned in another place, Job. xxi. 13. that they cloſe up the end of their life in a moment without languiſhing Where is that ſo great ſtedfaſtneſs of the ſaints, whom David himſelf every where complaineth, not only to be ſhaken with trouble, but alſo to be oppreſſed, and utterly broken in pieces? Forſooth, he did ſet before his eyes, not what the altering courſe of the world beareth, which is unſtable and more unſtedfaſt than the ebbing and flowing of the tides, but what the Lord will do, when he ſhall one day ſit for the eternal ſettling of heaven and earth. As in another place he excellently well deſcribeth it: Pſal. xlix. 7. The fooliſh truſt in their wealth, and are proud, becauſe of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flouriſh in never ſo great dignity, can redeem his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ranſom, but whereas they ſee that both the wiſe do die, and that the wicked alſo and fools do periſh and leave their riches to ſtrangers, yet they think their houſes ſhall abide for ever, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they advance their names upon the earth, but man ſhall not continue in honour: he ſhall be like to the beaſts that periſh This imagination of theirs is extremeſt folly, which yet their poſterity do greedily follow. Like ſheep they are laid in the grave, death ſhall feed on them, and the upright ſhall have dominion over them in the morning, and their beauty ſhall conſume in the grave from their dwelling. Firſt, this laughing to ſcorn of the fooliſh for that they reſt on the ſlippery and rolling good things of the world, doth ſhew that the wiſe muſt ſeek a far other felicity. But there he more evidently diſcloſeth the myſtery of the reſurrection, where after the deſtruction and extinction of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the godly. For what riſing of light, I pray you, ſhall we call that, but the revealing of the new life which followeth the end of this preſent life.

The faithful could not have comforted themſelves, as both David and Samuel did with the momentary ſhortneſs of their troubles in the world except they had made a reckoning of endleſs reſt afterwards.

18. From thence did ſpring up that conſideration, which the faithful oftentimes uſed for a comfort of their miſeries and remedy of patience: it is but a moment in the Lord's diſpleaſure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, who were in affliction in a manner their life long? where did they diſcover ſo long an enduring of God's kindneſs, whereof they ſcarcely felt any little taſte? If they had ſticked faſt upon the earth, they could have found no ſuch thing, but becauſe they looked upon heaven, they acknowleged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exerciſes his ſaints by the croſs, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do laſt the world's age. Again, they did foreſee the eternal and never ending deſtruction of the ungodly, which were as in a dream happy for one day. Whereupon came theſe ſayings: Prov. x. 7. The remembrance of the righteous ſhall be in bleſſing, but the name of the wicked ſhall rot. Pſal. cxvi. and xxx. 22. Precious is the death of the ſaints in the ſight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked moſt evil. Again in 1 Sam. ii. 9. The Lord ſhall keep the feet of the holy, and the wicked ſhall be put to ſilence in darkneſs. Which doth declare that they well knew, that howſoever the godly were variouſly toſſed about with affliction, yet their latter end is life and ſalvation: and that the proſperity of the wicked is a pleaſant way, whereby they by little and little ſlide forward into the gulf of death. Therefore they called the death of ſuch, (Ezek. xxviii. 10. and 31.) the deſtruction of the uncircumciſed, as of them from whom the hope of the reſurrection was cut away. Wherefore David could not deviſe a more grievous curſe than this:

this: Pſal. lxix. Let them be blotted out of the book of life, and not written with the righteous.

Job's hope of life in death. Neither was this in him, or the like in others the ſpecial perſuaſion only of ſome, but the general doctrine delivered all men to believe.

19. But above all others, notable is that ſaying of Job (Job xix. 25.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the laſt day I ſhall riſe again out of the earth, and in my fleſh I ſhall ſee God my Saviour: this hope is laid up in my boſom. Some that have a mind to make a ſhew of their ſharp wit, do cavil that this is not to be underſtood of the laſt reſurrection, but of the firſt day that Job looked to have God more gentle to him, which altho' we grant them in part, yet ſhall we enforce them to confeſs whether they will or no, that Job could not have come to that largeneſs of hope, if he had reſted his thought upon the earth. Therefore we muſt needs confeſs, that he lifted up his eyes to the immortality to come, who ſaw that his Redeemer would be preſent with him, even lying in his grave. For to them that think only of this preſent life, death is their uttermoſt deſperation: which very death could not put off Job's hope. Yea though he kill me (ſaid he) Job xiii. 15. nevertheleſs I will ſtill hope in him. And let no trifler here carp againſt me and ſay, that theſe were the ſayings but of a few, whereby is not proved that ſuch doctrine was among the Jews. For I will by and by anſwer him, that theſe few did not in theſe ſayings utter any ſecret wiſdom, whereunto only certainly excellent wits, were ſeverally and privately ſuffered to attain, but that as they were by the holy Ghoſt appointed teachers of the people, ſo they openly publiſhed thoſe myſteries of God, that were to be univerſally learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we hear the public oracles of the holy Ghoſt, wherein he ſpake of the ſpiritual life ſo clearly and plainly in the church of the Jews, it were a point of intolerable ſtubbornneſs to ſend them away only to the fleſhly covenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth, and earthly wealth.

How the prophets have ſhadowed our unſeen ſpiritual felicity to come by temporal and earthly bleſſings preſently ſeen and known.

20. If I come down to the later prophets, there we may freely walk as in our own field. For if it were not hard for us to get the upper hand in David, Job, and Samuel, here it ſhall be much more eaſy. For God kept this diſtribution and order in diſpoſing the covenant of his mercy, that how much the nearer it drew on in proceſs of time to the full performance thereof, with ſo much greater increaſe of revelation he did day by day more brightly ſhew it. Therefore at the beginning when the firſt promiſe of ſalvation was made unto Adam, there gliſtered out but as it were ſmall ſparkles of it. After, having more added unto it, a greater largeneſs of light began to be put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and diſplayed her brightneſs farther abroad, till at length all the clouds were driven away, and Chriſt the Sun of righteouſneſs fully enlightned the whole world. We need not therefore to fear we fail of teſtimonies of the prophets, if we ſeek them to prove our cauſe, but becauſe I ſee that there will ariſe a huge deal of matter, whereupon I ſhould be conſtrained of neceſſity to tarry longer than the proportion of my purpoſe may bear, for it would ſo grow to a work of a great volume, and alſo becauſe I have already, by thoſe things that I have ſaid before, made plain the way, even for a reader of mean capacity, ſo as he may go forward without ſtumbling: therefore I will at this preſent abſtain from long tediouſneſs: which to do is no leſs neceſſary: but giving the readers warning beforehand, that they remember to open their own way with that key that we have firſt given them in their hand. That is, that ſo oft as the prophets ſpeak of the bleſſedneſs of the faithful people, whereof ſcarcely the leaſt ſteps are ſeen in this preſent life, they may reſort to this diſtinction: that the prophets the better to expreſs the goodneſs of God, did as in a ſhadow expreſs it to the people by temporal benefits, as by certain rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they have painted thereof, was ſuch as might raviſh mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elements of this world, and of the age that ſhall periſh, and of neceſſity raiſe it up to the conſidering of the ſpiritual felicity of the life that is to come.

The power which God hath to give life ſhewed by a viſion of breath and livelineſs reſtored to a field full of dead bones.

21. We will be content with one example. When the Iſraelites being carried away to Babylon, ſaw their ſcattering abroad to be like unto death, they could hardly be removed from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezekiel prophecied concerning their reſtitution: becauſe they reckoned it even all one as if he had had told them that rotten carcaſes ſhould be reſtored again to life. The Lord to ſhew, that even the ſame difficulty could not ſtop him from bringing his benefit to effect, ſhewed to the prophet, in a viſion a field full of dry bones, to which in a moment with the power only of his word he reſtored breath and livelineſs. The viſion indeed ſerved to correct the peoples incredulity at that preſent time: but in the mean while he did put the Jews in mind how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which ſo eaſily quickened only with his beck, bones already rotten and ſcattered abroad: wherefore you ſhall compare that with another ſaying of Iſaiah, (Iſa. xxvi. 19.) Thy dead men ſhall live, together with my dead body ſhall they ariſe: awake and ſing ye that dwell in the duſt: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth ſhall caſt out the dead. Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and ſhut thy doors about thee, hide thyſelf as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpaſt. For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to puniſh the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth alſo ſhall diſcloſe her blood, and ſhall no more cover her ſlain.

Immortality to come expreſly ſpoken of by Iſaiah and Daniel.

22. Although a man ſhould do fondly, that would go about to draw all to ſuch a rule. For there are ſome places that without any covering do ſhew the immortality to come, that is prepared for the faithful in the kingdom of God, of which ſort we have recited ſome, and of like ſort are the moſt part of the reſt, eſpecially theſe two, the one in Iſaiah, (Iſai. lxvi. 22.) As a new heaven and a new earth which I make to ſtand before me, ſo ſhall your ſeed ſtand, and there ſhall be month of month, and ſabbath of ſabbath: all fleſh ſhall come to worſhip before my face, ſaith the Lord. And they ſhall go out and ſee the dead carcaſes of the men that have offended againſt me, that their worm ſhall not die, and their fire ſhall not be quenched. The other of Daniel, (Dan. xii. 1.) In that time ſhall riſe up Michael the great prince, that ſtandeth for the ſons of his people, and there ſhall come a time of diſtreſs, ſuch as was not ſince nations firſt began to be, and then ſhall all thy people be ſaved that ſhall be found written in thy book. And of thoſe that ſleep in the duſt of the earth, there ſhall awake ſome to eternal life, and ſome to everlaſting ſhame.

Seeing that Chriſt promiſeth us no reſt but with

23. Now, as for proving the other two points that the fathers had Chriſt for pledge of their covenant, and that they repoſed in him all their truſt of bleſſing, I will not labour therein at all, becauſe they have both leſs controverſy and more plainneſs. Let us therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the devil may be removed, that the old teſtament, or covenant which the Lord made with his people Iſrael, was not limited within the compaſs of earthly things, but alſo contained the promiſe of the ſpiritual and eternal life: the expectation of which muſt needs have been imprinted in all their minds that truly conſented to the covenant. But let us baniſh from our minds this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did ſet forth in his promiſe to the Jews nothing elſe, or that the Jews ſought nothing elſe but filling of their belly, delights of the fleſh, flouriſhing wealth, outward power, fruitfulneſs of children, and whatſoever a natural man eſteemeth. For at this day Chriſt promiſeth (Matth. viii. 11.) no other kingdom of heaven to his, but where they ſhall dwell with Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob. And Peter affirmed, Acts iii. 29. that the Jews of his time were heirs of the grace of the goſpel, becauſe they were the children of the prophets, comprehended in the covenant, which the Lord had of old made with his people. And that the ſame ſhould not be witneſſed with words only, the Lord alſo approved it by deed. For in the very moment that he roſe again, (Matth. xxvii. 51.) he vouchſafed to have many of the holy men to riſe again in company with him, and made them to be ſeen in the city: ſo giving an aſſured token, that whatſoever he did and ſuffered for the purchaſing of eternal ſalvation, pertaineth no leſs to the faithful of the old Teſtament, than unto us. For as Peter teſtifieth, Acts. xv. 8. they were alſo endowed with the ſame ſpirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we hear that the ſame ſpirit which is in us, a certain ſparkle of immortality, whereupon it is alſo in another place called the earneſt of our inheritance, did likewiſe dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is ſo much the more ſuprizing, that in the old time the Sadducees fell into ſuch an extremely groſs error, that they

them, and Peter comprehendeth us in the ſame covenant which God made with them ſeeing Chriſt hath riſen unto life accompanied with many of them, and hath witneſſed by Peter, that the ſpirit of faith which is in us, was alſo in them: howſoever the Sadducees have denied the heavenly, and the Jews at this day do expect an earthly kingdom, we may not take from the Fathers the inheritance of eternal life.

denied both the reſurrection and alſo the ſubſiſtence of ſouls, both which points they ſaw ſealed with ſo clear teſtimonies of ſcripture. And no leſs to be wondered at, even at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdom of Chriſt, if the ſcripture had not long before declared that they ſhould have that puniſhment for refuſing the goſpel. For ſo it behoved by the juſt judgment of God, to ſtrike thoſe minds with blindneſs, which in refuſing the light of heaven that was offered to them, did wilfully bring themſelves into darkneſs. Therefore they read, and continually turn over Moſes, but they are ſtopped with a vail ſet between them and him, that they cannot ſee the light that ſhineth in his countenance. And ſo ſhall it remain covered and hidden from them, till he be turned to Chriſt, from whom now they labour to lead and draw him away, ſo much as in them lieth.

CHAP. XI.

Of the difference of the one Teſtament from the other.

The firſt difference of the old and new Teſtament. God did in that by the ſhadow of earthly things, and in this doth plainly direct unto heaven.

WHAT then? wilt thou ſay: ſhall there be no difference left between the old Teſtament and the new? and to what purpoſe ſerve all thoſe places of ſcripture, where they are compared one againſt the other, as things moſt contrary? I do willingly allow thoſe differences that are mentioned in the ſcripture: but however that they do not at all hinder the unity or ſameneſs already eſtabliſhed, as it ſhall be obvious to ſee when we ſhall have treated of them in order. Thoſe differences are (as far as ever I could mark or can remember) chiefly four in number, to which if you pleaſe to add a fifth I am not againſt it. I aſſert, and hope to make good, that they are all ſuch as rather belong to the manner of miniſtration, than to the ſubſtance of them. And by this means they ſhall nothing hinder, but that the promiſes of both the old and new Teſtament may remain all one, and all one foundation of the ſame promiſes, Chriſt. Now the firſt difference is, that altho' even in the old time alſo, the Lord's will was to direct the minds of his people, and to have them raiſed up to the heavenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nouriſhed in the hope of this he gave it to be ſeen or rather taſted of, under earthly benefits: but now having revealed the grace of the life to come, by the goſpel, he more clearly and plainly directeth our minds the ſtraight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exerciſing which he uſed with the Iſraelites. They that attend not this purpoſe of God, are of opinion that that people did not aſcend in their thoughts any higher than to the good things promiſed to the body. They ſo often hear the land of Canaan ſpoken of as the excellent, or rather only reward for the obſervers of God's law. They hear that God threatened nothing more ſeverely to the tranſgreſſors of the ſame law, than that they ſhall be driven out of the poſſeſſion of the ſame land, and ſcattered abroad into ſtrange countries. They ſee that in a manner to this effect come all the bleſſings and curſes that are pronounced by Moſes. Hereby they do undoubtedly determine, that the Jews, not for their own ſakes, but for others, were ſeparated from other nations, that is, that the church of Chriſt might have an image, in whoſe outward form ſhe might ſee examples of ſpiritual things. But ſince the ſcripture doth ſometimes ſhew, that God himſelf directed all the earthly benefits that he did for them to this end, that ſo he might lead them by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefits; it was extremely ignorant, not to ſay ſtupid, not to conſider this order of diſpoſition. The iſſue or point of our controverſy with this ſort of men is this, that they teach that the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan was to the Iſraelites their chief and laſt good, and that to us after the revealing of Chriſt, it doth but figuratively ſignify the heavenly inheritance. On the other ſide we affirm, that they did in the earthly poſſeſſion which they enjoyed, as in a looking glaſs behold the inheritance to come, which they believed to be prepared for them in heaven.

The fathers and we are one heir unto whom one and the ſame inheritance doth belong. But they being that heir in a younger which we are in an elder age, had a training tho' not to another thing,

2. That ſhall better appear by the ſimilitude that Paul uſed to the Galatians, chap. iv. 1. He compareth the nation of the Jews to an heir within age, who being not yet able to govern himſelf followeth the guiding of the tutor or ſchoolmaſter, to whoſe care he is committed. And whereas he applieth that ſimilitude to the ceremonies, that does not hinder but that it may alſo very fitly

fitly serve to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for us: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter upon and use. The same church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lord kept them under this schooling, that he gave them not the spiritual promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posterity unto hope of immortality, he promised them the land of Canaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes upon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirm themselves in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appear. And that they might not be deceived, there was given unto them a higher promise to testify that that land was not the highest benefit of God. So Abraham was not suffered to ly slothful in the promise received of the land, but his mind was with a greater promise raised up unto the Lord. For Abraham heard this said unto him: Gen. xv. 1. I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward. Here we see that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not reckon upon a transitory and slippery reward in the elements of this world, but rather think it to be such as cannot fade away. Afterwards he adds the promise of the land to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their own sayings do declare. So David ascends from temporal blessings, to that same highest and last blessing, Psal. lxxiii. 26. My heart (saith he) and my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for ever. Again, Psal. xvi. 5. The Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that savest mine heritage for me. Again, Psal. cxliv. 6. I have cried unto thee, O Lord, I have said, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the living. Truly they that dare say so, without doubt profess that with their hope they climb above the world, and all the good things here present. But the prophets do oft describe this blessedness of the world to come, under the figure that they had received of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be understood: (Job xviii. 17.) That the godly shall possess the land by inheritance, and the wicked shall be destroyed out of it: (Psal. cxxxiii. 3.) That Jerusalem shall abound with all kind of riches, and Sion overflow with plenty of all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Jerusalem, but of the true country of the faithful, and that heavenly city wherein the Lord hath commanded blessing and life forever.

God's figuring of heavenly by earthly blessedness in the old law is the cause why then his temporal benefits do seem to have been more sweet to the righteous and his punishments more grievous than now.

3. This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the old testament did esteem the mortal life and the blessings thereof more than is now meet to do. For although they knew well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to mind, what marks of his grace the Lord had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the small rate of their tenderness, they felt a greater sweetness of it, than if they had considered it by it self. But as the Lord in testifying his good will toward the faithful, by present good things, did as in shadow express the spiritual felicity, by such figures and signs: so on the other side he did in corporal pains shew examples of his judgment against the reprobate. Therefore as the benefits of God were to be seen in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the unskilful do not weigh this comparison or agreement, as I may call it between the punishments and the rewards, they marvel at so much alteration in God, who in old time was so suddenly ready to take vengeance on every offence of man with unrelenting and dreadful punishments and now as if he had laid aside the affection of his old anger, he punisheth both much more gently and seldomer, yea, and for the same cause they do almost imagine several gods of the old and new testament: which the Manichees did in reality do. But we shall easily be delivered from such doubts, if we apply our minds to consider this orderly disposition of God which I have spoken of, whose will was for the time to signify and set forth in figure both the grace of the eternal felicity to come by temporal benefits, and the grievousness of the spiritual death, by corporal pains. Whereby he delivered his testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certain manner folded up.

The second difference between the two testaments is, that

4. Another difference of the old and new testament is said to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew only an image in absence of the truth, the new doth exhibit that foundation of the covenant which the old did teach them to expect.

and a ſhadow inſtead of the body. But the new teſtament giveth the truth preſent, and the ſound body it ſelf. And this difference is mentioned commonly whereſoever the new teſtament is in compariſon ſet againſt the old: but it is more largely treated of in the epiſtle to the Hebrews than any where elſe. There the apoſtle diſputeth againſt them, who thought that the obſervation of Moſes law might not be taken away, but that they ſhould alſo draw with them the ruin of religion. To confute this error, he uſeth that which had been foretold by the prophet (Pſal. cx.) concerning the prieſthood of Chriſt. For whereas there is given him an eternal prieſthood, it is certain, that that prieſthood is taken away, wherein new ſucceſſors were daily put in, one after another. But he proveth (Heb. vii. 11. and 19. and ix. 9. and x. 1.) that the inſtitution of this new prieſthood is to be preferred, becauſe it is eſtabliſhed with an oath. He after addeth further, that in the ſame change of the prieſthood, is alſo contained the change of the teſtament. And that it was neceſſary ſo to be, he proveth by this reaſon: becauſe the weakneſs of the law was ſuch that it could help nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakneſs, even this, that it had a certain outward righteouſneſs of the fleſh, which could not make the obſervers of them perfect, according to conſcience: that by ſacrifices of beaſts, it could neither take away ſins, nor purchaſe true holineſs. He concludeth therefore that there was in it a ſhadow of good things to come, but not the lively image of the things themſelves: and that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is delivered in the goſpel. Here is to be ſeen, in what point the covenant of the law is compared with the covenant of the goſpel, and the miniſtry of Chriſt, with the miniſtry of Moſes. For if the compariſon concerned the ſubſtance of the promiſes, then were there great difference between the two teſtaments: but ſince the point of our caſe leadeth us another way, we muſt tend to this end, to find out the truth. Let us then ſet forth here the covenant which he hath eſtabliſhed to be eternal, and never to periſh. The accompliſhment of that by which, it attaineth to be eſtabliſhed and continuing in force, is Chriſt. While ſuch eſtabliſhment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moſes appoint ceremonies, to be as it were ſolemn ſigns of the confirmation. Now this came there in queſtion, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to give place to Chriſt or no. Altho' theſe ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verily additions and things adjoined, or (as the people call them) acceſſary things to the covenant, yet becauſe they were inſtruments or means of the adminiſtration thereof, they bear the name of the covenant it ſelf, as the like is wont to be attributed to other ſacraments. Therefore in ſum: the old teſtament is in this place called the ſolemn form of confirming the covenant, contained in ceremonies and ſacrifices. The apoſtle ſaith, that becauſe in it is nothing perfect, unleſs we paſs further, therefore it behoved that they ſhould be diſcontinued and abrogated that place might be given to Chriſt the aſſurer and mediator of a better teſtament, by whom eternal ſanctification is once purchaſed to the elect, and the tranſgreſſions blotted out that remained under the law. Or if you like it better, thus: that the old teſtament of the Lord was that which was delivered, wrapped up in the ſhadowiſh and effectual obſervations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, becauſe it did but (as it were) hang in ſuſpence until it might ſtay upon a more ſtedfaſt and ſubſtantial confirmation: and that then only it was made new and eternal, after that it was conſecrated and eſtabliſhed by the blood of Chriſt. Whereupon Chriſt calleth the cup that he gave at his ſupper to his diſciples, (Matth. xxvi. 20.) The cup of the new teſtament in his blood: to ſignify that then the teſtament of God attaineth his truth: by which it becometh new and eternal, when it is ſealed with his blood.

The kingdom is now manifeſted which in former times was darkly beheld.

5. Hereby appeareth in what ſenſe the apoſtle ſaid: that in the ſchooling of the law, the Jews were brought unto Chriſt, before that he was ſhewed in the fleſh. And he confeſſeth, (Gal. iii. 24. and iv.) that they were the children and heirs of God, but yet ſuch as for their young age were to be kept under the cuſtody of a ſchoolmaſter. For it behoved, that ere the ſun of righteouſneſs was yet riſen, there ſhould neither be ſo great brightneſs of revelation, nor ſo great deep ſight of underſtanding. Therefore God ſo gave them in meaſure the light of his word, that they ſaw it as yet far off and darkly. Therefore Paul expreſſeth this ſlenderneſs of underſtanding by the term of young age, which the Lord's will was to have to be exerciſed with with the elements of this world and with outward obſervations, as rules of inſtruction for children until Chriſt ſhould ſhine abroad, by whom it behoved that the knowlege of the faithful people ſhould grow to full age. This diſtinction Chriſt himſelf meant to ſpeak of, when he ſaid, (Matth. xi. 13.) that the law and the prophets were until John, and that from thenceforth the kingdom of God is preached. What did the law and the prophets reveal to men of their time? even this, they gave a taſte of that wiſdom which in time to come ſhould be plainly diſcloſed: and they ſhewed it before as it were twinklingly ſhining afar off. But when it came to paſs that Chriſt might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdom of God ſet open. (Col. i. 9.) For in him are laid up the treaſures of all wiſdom and underſtanding, whereby we attain, even in a manner, into the ſecret cloſets of heaven.

The Prophets themſelves did not ſo clearly know Chriſt, but that even in them there appeareth a difference between thoſe times and theſe.

6. And it maketh not againſt us, that there can ſcarcely any one be found in the chriſtian church, that in excellency of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the prophets excelled in ſuch force of ſpirit, that even at this day they enlighten the whole world withal. For our queſtion is not here, what grace the Lord hath beſtowed upon a few, but what ordinary diſpoſition he uſed in teaching his people: ſuch as is declared in the prophets themſelves, which were endowed with peculiar knowlege above the reſt. For even their preaching is dark and incloſed in figures, as of things afar off. Moreover how marvellous knowlege ſoever appeared in them above other, yet forasmuch as they were driven of neceſſity to ſubmit themſelves to the common childiſh inſtruction of the people, they themſelves alſo were reckoned in the number of children. Finally, there never happened any ſuch clear ſight to any at that time, but that it did in ſome part ſavour of the darkneſs of the time. Whereupon Chriſt ſaid (Matth. xiii. 17.) Many kings and prophets have deſired to ſee the things that ye ſee, and have not ſeen them, and to hear the things that ye hear, and have not heard them. Therefore bleſſed are your eyes, becauſe they ſee, and your ears becauſe they hear. And truly it is meet that the preſence of Chriſt ſhould have this excellency of prerogative, that from it ſhould ariſe the clear revealing of the heavenly myſteries. And for this purpoſe alſo maketh that, which even we now alleged out of the firſt epiſtle of Peter, (1 Pet. i. 12.) that it was opened to them, that their labour was profitable, principally for our age.

The third difference between the old covenant and the new, mentioned by the apoſtle out of Jeremiah.

7. Now I come to the third difference, which is taken out of Jeremiah, (Jer. xxxi. 31, 32, 33, 34.) whoſe words are theſe: Behold, the days come, ſaith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the houſe of Iſrael, and with the houſe of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, (which my covenant they brake, although I was an huſband unto them, ſaith the Lord:) But this ſhall be the covenant that I will make with the houſe of Iſrael, after thoſe days, ſaith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they ſhall be my people. And they ſhall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, ſaying, know ye the Lord: for they ſhall all know me, from the leaſt of them unto the greateſt of them, ſaith the Lord. Of which words the apoſtle (1 Cor. ii. 6.) took occaſion to make this compariſon between the law and the goſpel, that he called the law a literal, and the goſpel a ſpiritual doctrine: the law, he ſaid, was faſhioned out in tables of ſtone, the goſpel written in hearts: that the law was the preaching of death, the goſpel the preaching of life: the law the preaching of damnation, the goſpel the preaching of righteouſneſs: that the law is made void, that the goſpel abideth. Since the apoſtle's purpoſe was but to declare the meaning of the prophet, it ſhall be ſufficient that we conſider the words of one of them, to attain the meaning of them both. Altho' there is ſome unlikeneſs between them. For the apoſtle ſpeaketh more odiouſly of the law than the prophet doth: and that not in ſimple reſpect of the law, but becauſe there were certain naughty men, having a wrong zeal to the law, who did with perverſe love of the ceremonies, obſcure the brightneſs of the goſpel. He diſputeth of the nature of the law, according to their error and fooliſh affection. Therefore it will be uſeful to obſerve that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, becauſe they do by compariſon ſet the Old and New Teſtament, the one againſt the other, do conſider nothing in the law, but that which properly belongeth unto it. As for example, the law doth commonly in every place contain promiſes of mercy, but becauſe they are borrowed from elſewhere, therefore they are not reckoned as part of the law, when the mere nature of the law is ſpoken of. The only thing they aſcribe unto it, to command things that are right, and to forbid wicked actions; to promiſe reward to the followers of righteouſneſs, and to threaten puniſhment to the tranſgreſſors: but in the mean time neither to change nor amend the perverſeneſs of heart, that is naturally in all men.

The ſeveral branches of the third difference between the two Teſtaments.

8. Now let us expound the apoſtle's compariſon one piece after another. The Old Teſtament is literal, becauſe it was publiſhed without the effectual working of the ſpirit: the new is ſpiritual which the Lord hath ſpiritually engraven in the hearts of men: therefore the ſecond diverſity is as it were a declaration of the firſt. The old is deadly, becauſe it can do nothing but wrap all mankind within the curſe: the New is the inſtrument of life, becauſe it delivereth from the curſe, and reſtoreth to favour with God. The Old is the miniſtry of damnation, becauſe it condemneth all Adam's children of unrighteouſneſs; the New is the miniſtry of righteouſneſs, becauſe it revealeth the mercy of God, by which we are made righteous. The laſt diverſity is to be referred to the ceremonies. Becauſe the Old Teſtament had an image of things abſent, it behoved that it ſhould in time decay and vaniſh away: but the goſpel, becauſe it giveth the true body indeed, keepeth ſtill a firm and perpetual ſtedfaſtneſs. Jeremiah indeed calleth even the moral law, a weak and frail covenant: but that is for another reaſon, becauſe by the ſudden falling away of the unthankful people, it was by and by broken, but foraſmuch as ſuch breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cannot properly be laid upon the Teſtament. But the ceremonies, foraſmuch as by their own weakneſs were diſſolved by the coming of Chriſt, had the cauſe of their weakneſs within themſelves. Now, that difference of the letter and ſpirit is not ſo to be taken as though the Lord had given his laws to the Jews without any fruit at all, having none of them converted unto him. But it is ſpoken by way of compariſon, to advance the abundance of grace, wherewith the ſame law-maker as it were putting on a new perſonage, did honourably ſet forth the preaching of the goſpel. For if we reckon up the multitude of theſe whom the Lord out of all people hath by the preaching of the goſpel regenerate with his ſpirit, and gathered into the communion of his church, we ſhall ſay, that there were very few, or in a manner none in the old time in Iſrael, who with affection of mind and entirely from their heart embraced the covenant of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their own number without compariſon.

The fourth difference, the one held the conſcience in thraldom and fear, the other giveth liberty and joy.

9. Out of the third difference riſeth the fourth. For the ſcripture calleth the old teſtament, the teſtament of bondage, becauſe it gendereth fear in mens minds: but the new teſtament the teſtament of liberty, becauſe it raiſeth them up to confidence and aſſuredneſs. So ſaith Paul (Rom. viii. 15.) in the eight chapter of his epiſtle to the Romans. Ye have not received the ſpirit of bondage again to fear, but the ſpirit of adoption, by which we cry Abba, father. Hereunto ſerveth that in the epiſtle to the Hebrews, (Heb. xii. 18.) that the faithful are not now come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlwind, darkneſs and tempeſt, where nothing can be heard or ſeen but what ſtriketh mens minds with terror, in ſo much that Moſes himſelf quaked for fear, when the terrible voice ſounded, which they all beſought, that they might not hear: But that we are come to the mount Sion, and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jeruſalem. But that which Paul ſhortly toucheth in the ſentence that we have alleged out of the epiſtle to the Romans, he ſetteth out more largely in the epiſtle to the Galatians, (Gal. iv. 21.) when he maketh an allegory of the two ſons of Abraham after this manner, that Agar the bond woman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Iſrael received the law; Sarah the free woman is a figure of the heavenly Jeruſalem, from whence proceedeth the Goſpel. That, as the ſeed of Agar is born bond, which may never come to the inheritance, and the ſeed of Sarah is born free, to whom the inheritance is due: ſo by the law we are made ſubject to bondage, by the Goſpel only we are regenerate into freedom. But the ſum cometh to this effect that the Old teſtament did ſtrike mens conſciences with fear and trembling; but by the benefit of the new teſtament it cometh to paſs, that they are made joyful. The old did hold mens conſciences bound to the yoke of bondage, by the liberty of the new they are diſcharged of bondage, and brought into freedom. But if out of the people of Iſrael they object againſt us the holy fathers, who ſince it is evident, that they were endowed with the ſame ſpirit that we are, it followeth that they were alſo partakers both of the ſelf ſame freedom and joy. We anſwer, that neither of both came of the law. But that when they felt themſelves by the law to be both oppreſſed with the eſtate of bondage, and wearied with unquietneſs of conſcience, they fled to the ſuccour of the Goſpel, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruit of the new teſtament, that beſide the common law of the old teſtament they were exempted from theſe evils. Moreover we will deny that they were ſo endowed with the ſpirit of freedom and aſſuredneſs, that they did not in ſome part feel both fear and bondage by the law. For howſoever they enjoyed that prerogative which they had obtained by grace of the Goſpel, yet were they ſubject to the ſame bonds and burdens of obſervation, that the common people were. Since therefore they were compelled to the careful keeping of thoſe ceremonies, which were the ſigns of a ſchooling much like unto bondage, and the hand writings whereby they confeſſed themſelves guilty of ſin, did not diſcharge them from being bond: it may juſtly be ſaid, that in compariſon of us they were under the teſtament of bondage and fear, while we have reſpect to that common order of diſtribution that the Lord then uſed with the people of Iſrael.

The laſt three differences are meant of the law diſtinguiſhed from thoſe intermingled promiſes of grace and mercy, the firſt including them: to which Saint Auguſtine though he ſeem to be, yet is not repugnant.

10. The three laſt compariſons that we have recited, are of the law and the Goſpel. Wherefore in them by the name of the old Teſtament is meant the law, and by the name of the new Teſtament is meant the goſpel. The firſt ſtretched further, for it comprehendeth under it the promiſes alſo that were publiſhed before the law, but whereas Auguſtine (Lib. 3. ad Bonif. cap. 4.) denieth that they ought to be reckoned under the name of the old teſtament, therein he thought very well, and meant even the ſame thing that we do now teach, for he had regard to thoſe ſayings of Jeremiah and Paul, where the old Teſtament is diſtinguiſhed from the word of mercy and grace. And this alſo he very aptly adjoineth in the ſame place, that the children of promiſe regenerate of God who by faith working through love have obeyed the commandments, do from the beginning of the world belong to the new Teſtament, and that in hope not of fleſhly, earthly and temporal, but ſpiritual, heavenly, and eternal good things, principally believing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the ſpirit was not miniſtred unto them, both to do good, and to have pardon ſo oft as they ſinned. For the ſame thing it is that I minded to affirm, that all the ſaints whom the ſcripture rehearſeth to have been from the beginning of the world choſen by God, were partakers of the ſelf ſame bleſſing with us unto eternal ſalvation. This difference therefore is between our diviſion and Auguſtine's: that ours (according to that ſaying of Chriſt: Mat. xi. 13.) The law and the prophets were unto John: from thenceforth the kingdom of God is preached; doth make diſtinction between the clearneſs of the goſpel, and the darker diſtribution of the word that went before: and Auguſtine doth only ſever the weakneſs of the law from the ſtrength of the goſpel. And here alſo is to be remarked concerning the holy fathers, that they ſo lived under the old Teſtament, that they ſtayed not there, but always aſpired to the new, yea and embraced the aſſured partaking thereof. For the Apoſtle condemneth them of blindneſs and accurſedneſs who being contented with preſent ſhadows, did not ſtretch up their mind unto Chriſt. For (to ſpeak nothing of the reſt) what greater blindneſs can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of ſin by the killing of a beaſt? than to ſeek for the cleanſing of the ſoul in outward ſprinkling of water? than to ſeek to appeaſe God with cold ceremonies, as though he were much delighted therewith? For into all theſe abſurdities do they fall, who adhere to the obſervations of the law without reſpect to Chriſt.

The fifth and laſt difference between the two teſtaments: the old was given only to the Jews, the new to all nations.

11. The fifth difference that we may add, lieth in this: that until the coming of Chriſt the Lord had choſen out one nation, within which he would keep diſtinct the covenant of his grace. When the Moſt High did diſtribute the nations, when he divided the ſons of Adam (ſaith Moſes) Deut. iii. 28. his people fell to his poſſeſſion. Jacob the lot of his inheritance. In another place (Deut. x. 14.) he thus ſpeaketh to the people: Behold the heaven and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy God's. He cleaved only to thy fathers, he loved them to chooſe their ſeed after them, even your ſelves out of all nations. Therefore he vouchſafed to grant the knowlege of his name to that people only, as if they only of all men belonged unto him: he laid his covenant as it were in their boſom: to them he openly ſhewed the prepreſence of his Godhead: them he honoured with all prerogatives. But (to omit the reſt of his benefits, and ſpeak that which only here is to our purpoſe) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the mean time he ſuffered other nations to walk in vanity, Acts xiv. 16. as though they had not any intercourſe, or any thing to do with him: neither did he to help their deſtruction, give them that which was only the remedy, namely the preaching of his word. Therefore Iſrael was then the Lord's ſon that was his darling, others were ſtrangers: Iſrael was known to him and received into his charge and protection, others were left to their own darkneſs: Iſrael was ſanctified by God, others were prophane: Iſrael was honoured with the preſence of God, others were excluded from coming nigh unto him. But when (Gal. iv. 4.) the fulneſs of time was come, appointed for the reſtoring of all men, and that ſame reconciler of God and men was delivered indeed, (Eph. ii. 14.) the partition was plucked down, which had ſo long holden the mercy of God incloſed within the bounds of Iſrael, and peace was preached to them that were far off, even as to them that were near adjoined, that being together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherefore now (Gal. vi. 15.) there is no reſpect of Greek or Jew, circumciſion or uncircumciſion, but Chriſt is all in all, to whom the nations are given for his inheritance, (Pſal. ii. 8. and the ends of the earth for his peculiar poſſeſſion, that univerſally without difference he might have dominion from ſea to ſea, and from the rivers to the uttermoſt ends of the earth. Pſal. lxxii. 8.

The calling of the Gentiles under the new Teſtament ſpoken of by the prophets, not ſuddenly proceeded unto by Chriſt, by the apoſtles ſcarce admitted, wondred at by the very angels themſelves.

12. Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a remarkable token, whereby is clearly ſhewed the excellency of the new Teſtament above the old. It had indeed been before teſtified by many, and moſt plain oracles of the prophets, but ſo as the performance thereof was ſtill deferred unto the kingdom of the Meſſias. And Chriſt himſelf did not proceed unto it at the firſt beginning of his preaching, but deferred it ſo long until that all the parts of redemption being performed, and the time of his abaſement ended, he received of his Father a name that is above all names, (Phil. ii.) before whom all knees ſhall bow. For which cauſe, when this convenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he ſaid to the woman of Canaan, Matth. xv. 24. that he was not ſent but to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael. And he ſuffered not his apoſtles at the firſt ſending, to paſs theſe bounds. Go not ye (ſaith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael. But howſoever it was before uttered by ſo many teſtimonies, yet when the apoſtles were firſt to begin it, it ſeemed ſo new and ſtrange a thing unto them, that they were afraid of it, as of ſome monſter. Truly very fearfully, and not without ſticking at it they firſt did ſet upon it. And no wonder, for it ſeemed againſt reaſon, that the Lord, who by ſo many ages had choſen out Iſrael from all other nations, ſhould now undo that choice, as it were ſuddenly changing his purpoſe. It was indeed ſpoken of before by prophecies: but they could not give ſo great heed to the prophecies, as to be nothing moved with the newneſs of the thing that they ſaw. And theſe examples which the Lord had ſhewed of the calling of the Gentiles that ſhould one day come to paſs, were not ſufficient to move them. For beſides this that he had called very few, he did after a certain manner ingraff them into the houſhold of Abraham, to add them unto his people as a parcel of them: but by this general calling, the Gentiles were not only made equal with the Jews, but alſo it appeared that they came into the place of the Jews, that were become dead. And yet all thoſe ſtrangers whom God hath before that time brought into the body of the church, were never made equal with the Jews. And therefore not without a cauſe doth Paul ſo extol his myſtery hidden from ages, (Col. i. 10.) and generations, and which he alſo ſaith to be marvellous to the very angels.

Theſe alterations not improper but expedient for the church.

13. In theſe four or five points, I think I have well and faithfully ſet forth the whole difference of the Old and New Teſtament, ſo much as ſufficeth to the ſimple order of teaching. But becauſe many report this variety in governing the church, this divers manner in teaching, ſo great alteration of uſages and ceremonies, to be a great abſurdity: theſe perſons are alſo to be anſwered before we proceed to other things. And that may be done ſhortly, becauſe the objections are not ſo ſtrong that they need a curious confutation. It is incongruous (ſay they) that God who doth always uniformly agree with himſelf, ſhould ſuffer ſo great an alteration, as afterwards to diſallow the ſame ſame thing, which he had before both commanded and approved. I anſwer that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, becauſe he applyed divers forms to divers ages, as he knew to be expedient for every one. If the huſband man appoint to his houſhold one ſort of buſineſs in winter, and another in ſummer, ſhall we therefore accuſe him of inconſtancy, or think that he deviates from the right rule of huſbandry which agreeth with the continual order of nature? Likewiſe if a father of a houſhold do inſtruct, rule and order his children of one ſort in childhood, of another in youth, and of another in the ſtate of manhood, we cannot therefore ſay that he is fickle and forſaketh his own plan. Why therefore do we charge God with the reproach of inconſtancy, becauſe he hath diſtinguiſhed the diverſity of times, with fit and ſuitable marks? The laſt ſimilitude ought fully to ſatisfy us. Paul compares the Jews unto children and chriſtians to young men. What diſorder is there in this government of God that he held them in their childiſh leſſons, who according to the capacity of their age were fit for them, and inſtructed us with ſtronger and as it were more manly diſcipline. Therefore herein appeareth the conſtancy of God, that he taught one ſelf ſame doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the ſame worſhip of his name, which he commanded from the beginning. But whereas he changed the outward form and manner thereof, in that he ſhewed not himſelf ſubject to change: but ſo far he accommodated himſelf to the capacity of man, which is different and changeable.

God may diverſly deal with his church and people upon cauſes kept ſecret unto himſelf, neither may we without intollerable preſumption blame and accuſe his manner of dealing

14. But whence (ſay they) cometh this diverſity, but becauſe God willed it to be ſuch? Could he not as well from the beginning as ſince the coming of Chriſt, reveal the eternal life in plain words without any figures, inſtruct thoſe that are his with a few ſacraments which were eaſy to be underſtood, give his holy ſpirit, and ſhed abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is juſt as if they ſhould quarrel with God becauſe he hath created the world ſo late, ſince he might have created it from the beginning: or becauſe his will was to have interchanged courſes between winter and ſummer, between day and night. But as for us, even us all godly men ought to think, let us not doubt that whatſoever God hath done, is wiſely and righteouſly done, although oftentimes we know not the cauſe why it ought ſo to have been done. For that were to take preſumptuouſly too much upon us, not to give God leave to have the cauſes of his own purpoſe ſecret to himſelf from us. But it is marvellous (ſay they) that he now refuſeth and abhorreth the ſacrificing of beaſts, and all the furniture of the Levitical prieſthood, wherewith in the old time he was delighted: as though theſe outward and tranſitory things did delight God, or any way move affection in him. We have already ſaid that he did none of theſe for his own cauſe, but diſpoſed them all for the ſalvation of man. If a phyſician do heal a young man of his diſeaſe after one very good mean and afterward, do uſe another manner of healing with the ſame man when old: ſhall we therefore ſay, that he hath refuſed the manner of healing which before pleaſed him, but rather continuing ſtill in the ſame, he hath conſideration of age? So behoved it, that Chriſt being abſent, ſhould be expreſſed in figure by one ſort of ſigns, and by another ſort before ſhewed that he was to come: and it is proper that now being already delivered, he be repreſented by other ſigns. But concerning God's calling, now at the coming of Chriſt more largely ſpread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy Ghoſt more plentifully poured out: who, I pray you, can deny it to be right, that God have in his own hand and will the diſpoſing of his own graces, to give light to what nations it pleaſeth him? to raiſe up the preaching of his word in what places it pleaſeth him? to give what doctrine and how great profiting and ſucceſs of doctrine it pleaſeth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowlege of his name out of the world for their unthankfulneſs? and again when he will to reſtore it for his own mercy? We ſee therefore, that the cavillations are too much unſuitable wherewith wicked men do in this point diſquiet the minds of the ſimple, to make them call either the righteouſneſs of God, or the faith of the ſcripture into doubt.

CHAP. XII.

That it behoved that Christ to perform the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

It was necessary that he who should inseparably join man to God should himself be both.

NOW it much behoved us that he should be both God and man, who should be our Mediator. If a man ask of the necessity, it was not indeed a simple or absolute necessity, as they commonly call it, but it proceedeth from the heavenly decree, upon which all the salvation of men, depended. But the most merciful father appointed that which should be best for us. For whereas our own iniquities had, as it were cast a cloud between him and us, and utterly excluded us from the kingdom of heaven, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attain unto God. But who could have attained unto him? could any of the sons of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shun the sight of God for fear. Could any of the angels? but they also had need of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and inseparably cleave unto God. What then? It was past all hope, unless the very majesty of God would descend unto us, for we could not ascend unto it. So it behoved that the Son of God should become for us Immanuel, that is, God with us: and that in this sort, that by mutual joining, his godhead and the nature of man might grow into one together. Otherwise neither could the nearness be near enough, nor the alliance strong enough for us to hope by, that God dwelleth with us. So great was the disagreement between our filthiness, and the most pure cleanness of God. Although man had stood undefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attain to God without a Mediator. What could he then do being plunged down into death and hell with a deadly fall, defiled with so many spots, abominable by his own corruption, and overwhelmed with all accursedness? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forth Christ as the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is man. (1 Tim. ii. 3.) One Mediator (saith he) of God and man, the man Jesus Christ. He might have said, God: or at least he might have left the name of man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knew our weakness: therefore to provide for it in time, he used a most fit remedy, setting among us the son of God familiarly as one of us. Therefore lest any man should trouble himself to know where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come unto him, in naming man, he putteth us in mind that he is near unto us, yea so near that he toucheth us, for as much as he is our own flesh. Truly he meaneth there even the same thing that in another place is set out with moe words: (Heb. iv. 15.) that we have not a bishop that cannot have compassion of our infirmities, for as much as he was in all things tempted as we are, only sin excepted.

The Son of God becoming man, hath confirmed us in the state of being sons to the same Father, and having right to the same inheritance with him and being God, hath swallowed death, conquered sin, subdued powers, and bestowed life, which otherwise he could not have done.

2. That shall also appear more plainly, if we consider how it was no inconsiderable thing that the Mediator had to do; that is, so to restore us to the favour of God, as to make us of the children of men, the children of God: of the heirs of hell, the heirs of the kingdom of heaven. Who could do that, unless the Son of God were made also the son of man, and so take ours upon him to convey his unto us, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earnest, we trust that we are the children of God, because the natural Son of God hath shapen for himself a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with us. He disdained not to take that upon him which was proper unto us, to make again that to belong to us which he had proper to himself, and that so in common together with us, he might be both the Son of God and the son of man. Hereupon cometh that holy brotherhood which he commendeth with his own mouth, when he saith: I ascend to my Father and your Father, (John x. 17.) my God and your God. By this mean is the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven assured unto us: for that the only Son of God, to whom it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted us into his brethren (Rom. viii. 17.) because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreover it was for the same cause very profitable, that he who should be our Redeemer, should be both very very God and very man. It was his office to swallow up death: who could do that but life itself? It was his office to overcome sin: who could do that but righteousness itself? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the world and of the air: who could do that but a power above both world and air? Now in whose possession is life, or righteousness, or the empire and power of heaven, but in God's alone? Therefore the most merciful God, in the person of his only begotten Son, made himself our Redeemer, when his will was to have us redeemed.

The manhood of Christ is a warrant unto us that man hath satisfied God, that he is the promised seed, and that we have fellowship with him and interest in the fruit of all his actions.

3. Another principal point of our reconciliation with God was this, that man who had lost himself by his disobedience should for remedy set obedience against it, should satisfy the judgment of God, and pay the penalty of sin. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and took upon him his name to enter into his stead in obeying his Father, to yield our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the just judgment of God, and in the same flesh suffer the pain that we had deserved. For as much as therefore neither being only God, he could feel death, nor being only man he could overcome death he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yield the one subject to death to satisfy for sins, and by the power of the other he might wrestle with death, and get victory for us. They therefore that spoil Christ either for his godhead or for his manhood, do indeed either diminish his majesty and glory, or obscure his goodness: but on the other side they do no less wrong unto men whose faith they do thereby weaken and overthrow, which cannot stand but resting upon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the Son of Abraham and David, which God had promised in the law and the prophets. Whereby the godly do gather this other fruit, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to David and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I even now declared, is principally to be holden in mind, that the common nature between him and us is a pledge of our fellowship with the Son of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death and sin together, that the victory so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered up for sacrifice the flesh that he received of us, that having made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltiness, and appease the just wrath of his Father.

4. He that shall be diligently heedful in considering these things as he ought, will easily neglect these wandering speculations that draw unto them light spirits and desirous of novelties: of which sort is, that Christ should have been man, although there had been no need of remedy to redeem mankind. I grant that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature uncorrupted, he was set as head over angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But since the whole scripture declares that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or end. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough known: even to restore the world fallen into ruin, and to succour men being lost. Therefore under the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithful to hope that God would be merciful to them, when after satisfaction made for sin, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, even when the law was not yet published, the Mediator was never promised without blood; we gather that he was appointed by the eternal counsel of God, to purge the filthiness of men, because the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimony of Isaiah, shall suffice us for all, where he foretelleth, (Isa. liii. 4. 5.) that he shall be stricken with the hand of God for the sins of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be upon him: and that he should be a priest that should offer up himself for sacrifice: that by his wounds we should be healed: and that, because all have strayed and been scattered abroad like sheep, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might might bear the iniquities of all. Since we hear that Chriſt is properly appointed by God to help wretched ſinners, whoſoever paſſeth beyond theſe bounds, he doth too much follow fooliſh curioſity. Now when himſelf was once come, he affirmed this to be the cauſe of his coming to appeaſe God, and gather us up from death into life. The ſame thing did the apoſtle's teſtify of him. So John (John i. 9.) before that he teacheth that the word was made fleſh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himſelf is to be heard before all, when he ſpeaketh, thus of his own office: (John i. 14.) God ſo loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him ſhould not periſh, but have everlaſting life. Again: (John iii. 16.) the hour is come that the dead ſhall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear it, ſhall live. (John v. 25.) I am the reſurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, although he were dead, yet ſhall he live. Again, (John xi. 25) The Son of man cometh to ſave that which was loſt. Again: (Mat. xviii. 11.) The whole need not a phyſician: I ſhould never make an end if I ſhould rehearſe all. The apoſtles do all with one conſent call us to this fountain. And truly if he had not come to reconcile God, the honour of the prieſthood ſhould have come to nought. For as much (Heb. v. 1.) as the prieſt appointed mean between God and man to make interceſſion: and he ſhould not be our righteouſneſs, (2 Cor. v. 19.) becauſe he was made a ſacrifice for us, that God ſhould not impute ſins unto us. Finally, he ſhould be ſpoiled of all the honourable titles, wherewith the ſcripture doth ſet him out. And alſo that ſaying of Paul ſhould prove vain, (Rom. viii. 3.) that that which was impoſſible to the law, God hath ſent his own Son, that in likeneſs of the fleſh of ſin he ſhould ſatisfy for us. Neither will this ſtand that he teacheth in another place, (Tit. ii. 11.) that in this glaſs appeared the goodneſs of God and his infinite goodneſs toward men, when Chriſt was given to be the Redeemer. Finally, the ſcripture every where aſſigneth no other end why the Son of God would take upon him our fleſh, and alſo received this commandment of his Father, but to be made a ſacrifice to appeaſe his Father toward us. So it is written, (Luke xxiv. 26.) and ſo it behoved that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore (John x. 17.) my Father loveth me, becauſe I give my life for the ſheep, this commandment he gave me. (John iii. 14.) As Moſes lifted up the Serpent in the wilderneſs, ſo muſt the Son of man be lifted up. In another place: (John xii. 27, 28.) Father, ſave me from this hour. But I am therefore come even to this hour. Father, glorify thy Son. Where he plainly ſpeaketh of the end why he took fleſh, that he might be a ſacrifice and ſatisfaction to do away ſin. After the ſame ſort doth (Luke i. 79.) Zachariah pronounce, that he came according to the promiſe given to the fathers, to give light to them that ſat in the ſhadow of death. Let us remember that all theſe things are ſpoken of the Son of God: in whom Paul (Col. ii. 3.) in another place teſtifieth, that (1 Cor. ii. 2.) all the treaſures of knowlege and wiſdom are hidden, and beſide whom he glorifieth that he knoweth nothing.

Since Christ from the beginning was promised to no other end, but the restoration of the world, no otherwise set forth in sacrifices, taught by prophets, spoken of by his apostles and by himself: since no other end can stand with his priesthood, his titles, that which the scripture speaketh every where of him, it were too much rashness to affirm that the Son of God had taken flesh although this cause had never been.

5. If any man take exception and ſay, that none of all theſe things prove the contrary, but that the ſame Chriſt that redeemed men being damned might alſo in putting on their fleſh teſtify his love toward them, being preſerved and ſafe. The anſwer is ſhort, that forasmuch as the holy Ghoſt pronounceth, that by the eternal decree of God theſe two things were joined together, that Chriſt ſhould be our Redeemer, and alſo partaker of all one nature with us, therefore it is not lawful for us to ſearch any further. For whoſoever is tickled with deſire to know any more, he being not contented with the unchangeable ordinance of God, doth ſhew alſo that he is not contented with the ſame Chriſt that was given us to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearſeth to what end he was ſent, but alſo climbing to the high myſtery of predeſtination. (Eph. iv. 5.) he very fitly repreſſeth all wantonneſs and itching deſire of man's wit. The Father choſe us in Chriſt before the creation of the world, to make us his ſon's by adoption, according to the purpoſe of his will: and he accepted us in his beloved Son, in whom we have redemption by his blood. Truly here is not the fall of Adam ſet before us though it were foremoſt in time, but is ſhewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to help the miſery of mankind. If the adverſaries object again, that this purpoſe of God did hang upon the fall of man which he did foreſee: it is enough and more for me, to ſay that they with wicked boldneſs break forth to feign them a new Chriſt, whoſoever ſuffer themſelves to ſearch for more, or hope hope to know more of Chriſt than God hath fore-appointed them by his ſecret decree. And for good cauſe did Paul, (Eph. iii. 16.) after he had ſo diſcourſed of the proper office of Chriſt, wiſh to the Epheſians the ſpirit of underſtanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, breadth, and depth, even the love of Chriſt that ſurmounteth all knowlege: even as if of purpoſe he would ſet bars about our minds, that when mention is made of Chriſt, they ſhould not, be it never ſo little, ſwerve from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, ſince this is a faithful ſaying (as Paul teſtifieth) that Chriſt is come to ſave ſinners, (1 Tim. i. 15.) I do gladly reſt in the ſame. And whereas in another place the ſame apoſtle teacheth, that the grace which is now diſcloſed by the goſpel, was given us in Chriſt before the times of the world: I determine that I ought conſtantly to abide therein to the end. Againſt this modeſty Oſiander carpeth unjuſtly who hath again in this time unhappily ſtirred this queſtion before lightly moved by a few. He accuſeth them of preſumption who ſay, that the Son of God ſhould not have appeared in the fleſh, if Adam had not fallen, becauſe this invention is confuted by no teſtimony of Scripture. As though Paul (1 Tim. iii. 9.) did not bridle froward curioſity, when after he had ſpoken of redemption purchaſed by Chriſt, he by and by commandeth to avoid fooliſh queſtions. The madneſs of ſome did burſt out ſo far, that while they diſorderly coveted to ſeem witty, they moved this queſtion, whether the Son of God might have taken upon him the nature of an aſs. This monſtrouſneſs which all the godly do juſtly abhor as deteſtable, let Oſiander confute with this pretence, that it is never expreſsly confuted in the ſcripture. As though when Paul accounteth nothing precious or worthy to be known, but Chriſt crucified, he doth therefore admit an aſs to be the author of ſalvation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth that Chriſt by the eternal counſel of his Father was ordained to be a head to gather all things together, will never the more acknowlege another (Eph. iv. 22.) that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

It is not for us to examine curiouſly whether Chriſt might have been without this cauſe, when God hath ſet down, that for this cauſe he purpoſed before all worlds Chriſt ſhould be and commanded to avoid fooliſh queſtions.

A vain principle whereupon Oſiander gathereth that although Adam had neve. ſinned, Chriſt nevertheleſs had been made man.

6. But as for the principle that he boaſteth of, it is very trifling. He would have it that man was created after the image of God, becauſe he was faſhioned after the pattern of Chriſt to come, that he might reſemble him, whom the father had already decreed to clothe with our fleſh. Whereupon he gathereth, that if Adam had never fallen from his firſt and uncorrupted original ſtate, yet Chriſt ſhould have been man. How trifling this is and wreſted, all men that have ſound judgement, do eaſily perceive of themſelves. In the mean time firſt he thinketh that he hath ſeen what was the image, of God, that forſooth the glory of God did not only ſhine in thoſe excellent gifts wherewith he was adorned, but alſo that God himſelf eſſentially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I grant that Adam did bear the image of God, in ſo much as he was joined to God, (which is the true and higheſt perfection of dignity) yet I ſay, that the likeneſs of God is no where elſe to be ſought, but in thoſe marks of excellency wherewith he had beautified Adam above other living creatures. And that Chriſt was then the image of God, all men do grant with one conſent, and therefore that whatſoever excellency was ſtamped in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the only begotten ſon he approached to the glory of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, (Gen. i. 27.) in whom the creator's will was to have his glory ſeen as in a looking glaſs. To this degree of honour was he advanced by the benefit of the only beggoten ſon: But I ſay further, that the ſame ſon was a common head as well to angels as to men, ſo that the ſame dignity that was beſtowed upon man, did alſo belong unto angels. For when we hear them called the children of God, it were inconvenient to deny, that there is ſomething in them wherein they reſemble their father. Now if his will was to have his glory to be repreſented as well in angels as in men, and to be ſeen in both natures, Oſiander doth fondly trifle in ſaying, that the angels were then ſet behind men, becauſe they did not bear the image of Chriſt. For they could not continually enjoy the preſent beholding of God, unleſs they were like him. And Paul (Gal. iii. 10.) teacheth, that men are no otherwiſe renewed after the image of God, but if they be united with angels, that they may cleave together under one head. Finally, if we believe Chriſt, this ſhall be our laſt felicity, to be made of like form to the angels, when we ſhall be received up into heaven. But if Oſiander will conclude, that the original pattern of the image of God was in Chriſt as he is man, by the ſame reaſon a man may ſay, that Chriſt muſt needs have been partaker of the nature of angels, becauſe the image of God pertaineth alſo to them.

The reſt of Oſiander's reaſons anſwered.

7. Therefore, Oſiander hath no cauſe to fear, that God ſhould be found a liar, unleſs it had been firſt ſtedfaſtly and unchangeably decreed in his mind, to have his ſon incarnate: becauſe if the integrity of Adam had not fallen, he ſhould with the angels have been like unto God, and yet it ſhould not therefore have been neceſſary, that the Son of God ſhould be either man or angel. And in vain he feareth that abſurdity, leſt unleſs the unchangeable council of God had been before the creation of man that Chriſt ſhould be born, not as the redeemer but as the firſt man he ſhould have loſt his prerogative: foraſmuch as now he ſhould be born man only by an accidental cauſe, that is to reſtore mankind being loſt, and ſo it might be gathered thereupon, that Chriſt was created after the image of Adam. For why ſhould he ſo much abhor that which the ſcripture (Heb. iv. 15.) ſo openly teacheth, that he was made like unto us in all things, except ſin? Whereupon Luke (Luke iii. 38.) doubteth not to reckon him the ſon of Adam in his genealogy. And I would fain know why Paul (1 Cor. xv. 47.) calleth Chriſt the ſecond Adam, but becauſe the eſtate of man was appointed for him, that he might raiſe up the poſterity of Adam out of their ruin. For if he were in order before that creation, he ſhould have been called the firſt Adam. Oſiander boldly affirmeth, that becauſe Chriſt was already before known man in the mind of God, men were formed after the ſame pattern. But Paul in naming him the ſecond Adam, ſetteth a mean between the firſt beginning of man and the reſtitution which we obtain by Chriſt, the fall of man whereby grew the neceſſity to have nature reſtored to its firſt degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this ſame was the cauſe why the ſon of God was born to become man. In the mean time, Oſiander reaſoneth ill and unſavourily, that Adam, ſo long as he had ſtood without falling, ſhould have been the image of himſelf and not of Chriſt. I anſwer by the contrary, becauſe though the ſon of God had never put on fleſh, nevertheleſs both in the body and in the ſoul of man ſhould have ſhined the image of God, in the bright beams whereof it always appeared, that Chriſt is verily the head, and hath the ſovereign ſupremacy in all. And ſo is that fooliſh ſubtilty aſſoiled, which Oſiander bloweth abroad, that the angels ſhould have lacked this head, unleſs it had been purpoſed by God to clothe his ſon with fleſh, yea, though there had been no fault of Adam. For he doth too raſhly ſnatch hold of that which no man in his right wit will grant, that Chriſt hath no ſupremacy over angels, that they ſhould have him for their Prince, but inſomuch as he is man. But it is eaſily gathered by the words of Paul, (Col. i. 15.) that in as much as he is the eternal Word of God he is the firſt begotten of all creatures, not that he is created or ought to be reckoned among creatures: but becauſe the ſtate of the world in integrity, ſuch as it was at the beginning adorned with excellent beauty, had no other original; and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the firſt begotten of the dead. For the apoſtle in one ſhort clauſe ſetteth forth in both theſe points to be conſidered: (Col. i. 18.) that all things were created by the ſon, that he might bear rule over angels: (Col. i. 19) and that he was made man, that he might begin to be the Redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he ſaith, that men ſhould not have had Chriſt to be their King if he had not been man. As though the kingdom of God could not ſtand, if the eternal Son of God, although not cloathed with the fleſh of man, gathering together both angels and men into the fellowſhip of his heavenly glory and life, ſhould himſelf bear the ſovereignty. But in this falſe principle he is always deceived, or rather deceiveth himſelf that the church ſhould have been without a head, unleſs Chriſt had appeared in the fleſh. As though, even as the angels enjoyed him their head, he could not likewiſe by his divine power rule over men, and by the ſecret force of his ſpirit quicken and nouriſh them like his own body, till being gathered up into heaven, they might enjoy all one life with the angels. Theſe trifles that I have hitherto confuted, Oſiander looks upon as very powerful oracles: even ſo as being drunk with the ſweetneſs of his own ſpeculations, he uſeth to blow out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he ſaith is much more ſtrong, that is the prophecy of Adam, who ſeeing his wife ſaid, (Gen. ii. 23.) this now is bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh. But how proveth he that to be a prophecy? Becauſe in Matthew Chriſt giveth the ſame ſaying to God. As though that whatſoever God hath ſpoken by men, containeth ſome prophecy. Let Oſiander ſeek prophecies in every commandment of the law, which it is certain came from God the author of them. Beſide that, Chriſt ſhould have been groſs and earthly, if he had reſted upon the literal ſenſe. Becauſe he ſpeaketh not of the myſtical union to which he hath vouchſafed to receive his church, but only of faithfulneſs between man and wife: for this cauſe he teacheth that God pronounced that man and wife ſhall be one fleſh, that no man ſhould attempt to break that inſeparable knot by divorce. If Oſiander lothe this ſimplicity, let him blame Chriſt, for for that he led not his disciples further to a mystery, in more subtilly expounding the saying of his father. Neither yet doth Paul maintain his error, who after he had said that we are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this was a great mystery; for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but under the figure and similitude of marriage to set forth the holy marriage union that maketh us one with Christ. And so do the words sound. Because when he giveth warning that he speaketh this of Christ and his church, he doth as it were by way of correction, separate the spiritual joining of Christ and his church from the law of marriage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I think I need no more to shake up any more of that sort of chaff, because the vanity of them all is soon found out by the this short confutation. But this sobriety shall abundantly suffice to feed soundly the children of God: that when the fulness of times was come, the Son of God was sent, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law.

CHAP. XIII.

That Christ took upon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

The truth of Christ's human nature proved against the Manichees and Marcionites.

NOW, unless I be deceived, it were superfluous to treat again of the Godhead of Christ which hath already in another place been proved with plain and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seen, how he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of mediator. The truth of his human nature hath in the old time been impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whom the Marcionites feigned an apparition instead of the real body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heavenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the scripture do stand against them both. For the blessing is promised, (Gen. xvii. 2. xii. 18. and xxvi. 4.) neither in a heavenly seed, nor in the counterfeit shape of man, but in the seed of Abraham and Jacob. Neither is the eternal throne promised (Psal. xlv. 7.) to a man made of air, but to the son of David, and to the fruit of his womb. Therefore being delivered in the flesh he is called (Matth. i. 1.) the Son of David and Abraham: not because he is only born of the womb of the Virgin, and created in the air, but because (as Paul expoundeth it, Rom. i. 3.) he is according to the flesh made of the seed of David: as in another place (Rom. ix. 5.) the apostle teacheth, that he descended of the Jews. For which cause the Lord himself not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himself the Son of man, meaning to express more plainly that he was man truly issued of the seed of mankind. Since he holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many means, with so great diligence and simplicity declared a thing not obscure of itself, who would have thought any men to be so shameless as to presume yet to spread mists to darken it? And yet we have other testimonies at hand, if we had a mind to heap up more of them. As is that saying of Paul: Gal, iv. 4. that God sent his son made of a woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subject to hunger, thirst, cold, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of these many are chiefly to be chosen, such as may most avail to edify our minds in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gave not so great honour to the angels (Heb. ii. 16.) as to take their nature upon him, but took our nature, that in flesh and blood he might by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Again, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethren. Again, that he ought to have been made like unto his brethren, that he might be made a merciful and faithful intercessor. That we have not a bishop that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and such like. And for the same purpose serveth that which we touched a little before, that it behoved that the sins of the world should be cleansed in our flesh, which Paul (Rom. viii. 3.) plainly affirmeth. And truly whatsoever (John i. 16.) the father hath given to Christ, it doth therefore belong to us, because he is the head, from which the whole body being knit together, groweth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the (John i. 19.) Spirit was given him without measure, that all we should draw of the fulness thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurdity than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidental gift. And for this cause Christ saith in another place: I do sanctify myself for them.

The grounds on which the Marcionites and Mani-

by their trifling ſubtilties, when they go about to wipe away thoſe things that I have alleged for our part. Maricon imagineth that Chriſt did put the on the appearance of a body inſtead of a real body: becauſe in ſome places (Phil. ii. 7.) it is ſaid, that he was made after the likeneſs of a man, and that he was found in faſhion as a man. But ſo he nothin weigheth what is Paul's purpoſe in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Chriſt took upon him, but that whereas he might have ſhewed forth his Godhead, he made no other ſhew of himſelf, but as of an abject and unregarded man. For, to exhort us by his example to ſubmiſſion, he ſheweth that foraſmuch as he was God, he might have by and by ſet forth his glory to be ſeen to the world: but yet that he gave over ſome of his own right, and of his own accord abaſed himſelf, becauſe he did put on the image of a ſervant and contented with that humility, ſuffered his Godhead to be hidden with the vail of the fleſh. He doth not here teach what Chriſt was, but how he behaved himſelf. And alſo by the whole proceſs of the text it is eaſily gathered, that Chriſt was abaſed in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in ſhape he was found as man, but that for a time the glory of his Godhead did not ſhine forth, but only the ſhape of man appeared in baſe and abject eſtate? For otherwiſe that place in Peter could not ſtand together, 1 Pet. iii. 18. that he was dead in the fleſh, but quickened in the ſpirit, if the Son of God had not been weak in the nature of man: which Paul, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. expreſſeth more plainly in ſaying, that he ſuffered by reaſon of the weakneſs of the fleſh. And hereunto ſerveth the exaltation: becauſe it is expreſly ſaid, 1 Cor. xv. 47. that Chriſt attained a new glory after he had abaſed himſelf, which could not well agree to be ſpoken of any, but of a man having fleſh and ſoul. The Manicheus framed Chriſt a body of air, becauſe Chriſt is called the ſecond Adam, heavenly of heaven. But neither in that place doth the apoſtle bring in a heavenly eſſence of the body, but a ſpiritual force, which being ſhed abroad by Chriſt, doth quicken us. Now, as we have already ſeen, Peter and Paul do ſever the ſame from his fleſh. But rather that doctrine which is received among the true teachers, concerning the fleſh of Chriſt, is very well proved by that place. For if Chriſt had not all one nature of body with us, it were a very vain argument, that Paul with ſo much vehemence followeth: 1 Cor. xv. 16. that if Chriſt be riſen again, we ſhall alſo riſe again: and if we do not riſe, then that Chriſt alſo is not riſen. By what cavils ſoever either the old Manichees or their new diſciples go about to eſcape, they ſhall not wind themſelves away. It is a foul ſhift, that they fondly ſay, that Chriſt is called the ſon of man, inſomuch as he is promiſed of men. For it is plain, that after the Hebrew phraſe, very man indeed is called the ſon of man. And Chriſt without doubt kept the phraſe of his own tongue. Alſo it ought to make no queſtion, what ought to be underſtood by the children of Adam. And (not to go far off) the place of the eighth pſalm, which the apoſtles apply to Chriſt, ſhall be ſufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the ſon of man that thou viſiteſt him? In this figure is expreſſed the true manhood of Chriſt. For though he were not immediately begotten of a mortal father, yet his deſcent came from Adam. For otherwiſe that place could not ſtand which we have already alleged that Chriſt is made partaker of fleſh and blood, that he might gather to him young children to the ſervice of God. In which words it is plainly determined, that Chriſt is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with us. In which meaning alſo he ſaith, Heb. ii. 14. that both the author of holineſs, and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is proved by the proceſs of the text, that the ſame is referred to the fellowſhip of nature: becauſe he by and by addeth: Therefore he is not aſhamed to call them brethren. For if he had ſaid before, that the faithful are of God in ſo great dignity, what cauſe ſhould there be to be aſhamed? But becauſe Chriſt of his infinite grace doth join himſelf to the baſe and ignoble, therefore it is ſaid, that he is not aſhamed. But in vain they object, that by this mean the wicked ſhall become the brethren of Chriſt: becauſe we know that the children of God are not born of fleſh and blood, but of the holy Ghoſt by faith. Therefore only fleſh maketh not a brotherly joining. But although the apoſtle giveth this honour to the faithful only, to be of one with Chriſt, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be born of the ſame original. As when we ſay that Chriſt was made man, to make us the ſons of God; this ſaying extendeth not to all men, becauſe faith is the mean which ſpiritually graffeth us into the body of Chriſt. Alſo they fooliſhly move a ſtrife about the name of Firſt begotten. They ſay that Chriſt ſhould have been born of Adam ſtraight at the beginning, that he might be the firſt begotten among brethren. For the title of Firſt begotten is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellency of power. And more colour hath that which they babble,

Heb.

(Heb. ii. 16.) that Chriſt took to him man and not angels, becauſe he received mankind into favour. For, to ſet out more largely the honour which God vouchſafed to give us, he compared the angels with us, who were in this behalf ſet behind us. And if the teſtimony of Moſes be well attended to, where (Gal. iii. 5.) he ſaith that the ſeed of the woman ſhall break the head of the ſerpent, it ſhall utterly end the controverſy. For Chriſt alone is not there ſpoken of, but all mankind. Becauſe the victory was to be gotten by Chriſt for us, he generally pronounceth that the poſterity of the woman ſhould get the upper hand of the devil. Whereupon it followeth, that Chriſt iſſued of mankind, becauſe it was God's purpoſe there to raiſe up Eve, whom he ſpake unto with good hope, that ſhe ſhould not faint with ſorrow.

The ſhifts which new Marcionites have to avoid the evidence of ſcripture which maketh againſt them.

3. They do no leſs wickedly than fooliſhly entangle with allegories theſe teſtimonies where Chriſt is called the ſeed of Abraham, and the fruit of the womb of David. For if the name of ſeed had been ſpoken in an allegory, truly Paul would not have left it untold, where he plainly and without figure affirmeth, that there are not many ſons of Abraham Redeemers, (Gal. iii. 18.) but one Chriſt. Of like ſort is it that they allege: that he is no otherwiſe called the ſon of David, but becauſe he was promiſed and at length in his due time delivered. For after that Paul had once named him the Son of God: in that he by and by addeth, according to the fleſh, he truly meaneth of nature. And ſo in the ninth chapter calling him the bleſſed God, he ſaith diſtinctly beſide, that according to the fleſh he deſcended of the Jews. Now if he were not truly begotten of the ſeed of David, to what purpoſe ſhall this saying be, that he is the fruit of his womb? (Rom. i. 3.) What meaneth this promiſe? Out of thy loins ſhall he deſcend, who ſhall abide in thy ſeat. Now in the genealogy of Chriſt, as it is related by Matthew, they do ſophiſtically mock. For though he doth not rehearſe the parents of Mary but of Joſeph, yet becauſe he ſpeaketh of a thing ſufficiently known abroad among the people, he reckoneth it enough to ſhew that Joſeph came of the ſeed of David, when it was well known that Mary was of the ſame ſtock. But Luke more expreſſeth them in teaching that ſalvation brought by Chriſt, is common to all mankind: becauſe Chriſt the author of ſalvation proceeded from Adam the common parent of all. I grant indeed, that by the genealogy it can no otherwiſe be gathered that Chriſt was the ſon of David, but in ſo much as he was begotten of the Virgin. But the new Marcionites to colour their error act too proudly, when, in order to prove that Chriſt took his body of nothing, they affirm that women are without ſeed, and ſo they overthrow the principles of nature. But becauſe that is not a queſtion in divinity, and the reaſons which they bring are ſo fickle that they may very eaſily be confuted, therefore I will not touch thoſe things that belong to philoſophy and phyſic, and will hold me contented to wipe away thoſe things that they allege out of ſcripture: that is, that Aaron and Joiadah took wives of the tribe of Judah, and ſo the difference of tribes had then been confounded, if woman had engendering ſeed in her. But it is well enough known that as touching civil order, the kindreds are reckoned by the ſeed of the man, and yet the excellency of the kind of man above woman proveth not the contrary, but that in generation the ſeed of woman muſt meet. And this ſolution extendeth to all the genealogies. Oftentimes when the ſcripture reckoneth up a genealogy, it nameth the men only: ſhall we therefore ſay, that the women are nothing? But even children do know, that women are comprehended under the name of men. And after this ſort is ſaid, that women bring forth to their huſbands, becauſe the name of the houſhold always remaineth with the males. Now as this is granted to the excellency of the male kind, that the children are counted noble or ignoble, according to the eſtate of their fathers: ſo alſo in the ſtate of bondage the iſſue followeth the womb, according to the judgment of the civil lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the iſſue is ingendered of the ſeed of the woman. And it hath of long time been received in common uſe of all nations, that the mothers are called Genetrices, that is engenderers. Wherewith God's law alſo agreeth, which otherwiſe ſhould wrongfully forbid the marriage of the uncle with his ſiſter's daughter, becauſe there were no conſanguinity between them: and alſo it were lawful for a man to marry his ſiſter by the mother's ſide, ſo that the were begotten of another father. But as I grant that there is a paſſive power aſcribed to women, ſo do I anſwer that the ſame thing is indifferently ſpoken of them that is of men. And Chriſt himſelf is not ſaid (Gal. iv. 4.) to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But ſome of that ſect ſhaking off all modeſty do too lewdly aſk, whether we will say that Christ was engendered of the menstrual seed of the Virgin, for I will likewise ask of them, whether he did not congeal in the blood of his mother, which they shall be constrained to confess. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthew's words, that because Christ was begotten of Mary, he was engendered of her seed: as a like engendering is meant when it is said, that Boaz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgin as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he separateth this marvellous manner of generation from the common manner, for that (Matth. i. 5.) by her was Christ begotten of the seed of David. For even in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Solomon of David, and Joseph of Jacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the evangelist so frameth the order of his speech, and willing to prove that Christ came of David, is contented with this one reason, that he was begotten of Mary. Whereby it followeth, that he took it for a matter confessed, that Mary was of kin to Joseph.

It is no dishonour unto Christ to have taken his original of man.

4. The absurdities wherewith they would charge us, are stuffed full of childish cavils. They think it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he should have taken his original of men; because he so could not be exempt from the universal law that encloseth all the offspring of Adam without exception under sin. But the comparison that we read in Paul doth easily assoil this doubt: (Rom. v. 12.) that as by one man came sin, and by sin death, so by the righteousness of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeth another comparison of his: (1 Cor. xv. 47.) the first Adam of earth earthly, and natural, the second of heaven heavenly. Therefore in another place, (Rom. viii. 3.) the same apostle, where he teacheth that Christ was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh to satisfy the law, doth so expressly separate him from the common estate of men, that he be very man without fault and corruption. But very childishly they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secret working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seed of Mary, then is not the woman's seed, but only the man's seed unclean. For we do not make Christ free from all spot; for this cause that he is only engendered of his mother without copulation of man, but because he is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and uncorrupted, such as should have been before the fall of Adam. And this always remained stedfastly determined with us, that so oft as the scripture putteth us in mind of the spotlessness of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhood: because it were superfluous to say that God is unspotted. Also the sanctification that he speaketh of in the seventeenth of John, could have no place in the nature of God. Neither are there feigned two seeds of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man is not unclean or vicious of itself, but accidental by his falling. Therefore it is no wonder if Christ, by whom the estate of innocence was to be restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this upon us for an absurdity, that if the word of God did put on flesh, then was it inclosed in a narrow prison of an earthly body: this is but mere obstinacy because although the infinite essence of the word did grow together into one person with the nature of man: yet do we feign no inclosing of it. For the Son of God descended marvellously from heaven, so as yet he left not heaven, it was his will to be marvellously born in the virgin's womb, to be conversant in earth, and hang upon the cross, yet that he always filled the world even as at the beginning.

CHAP. XIV.

How the two natures of the Mediator do make one person.

The divine and human natures of Christ united in his person, yet in their properties distinguished, as the body and the soul in one and the same men.

NOW where it is said, that the Word was made flesh: that is not so to be understood, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusedly mingled with flesh, but because he chose him a temple of the Virgin's womb to dwell in, he that was the Son of God, became also the son of man, not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person. For we so affirm the godhead joined and united to the manhood, that either of them have their whole property remaining, ing, and yet of them both is made one Chriſt. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to ſo great a myſtery, the ſimilitude of man is moſt fit whom we ſee to conſiſt of two ſubſtances, whereof yet neither is ſo mingled with other, but that either keepeth the property of his own nature. For neither is the ſoul the body, nor the body the ſoul. Wherefore both that thing may be ſeparately ſpoken of the ſoul, which can no ways agree with the body: and likewiſe of the body that thing may be ſaid, which can by no means agree with the ſoul: and that may be ſaid of the whole man, which can be but unfitly taken neither of the ſoul nor of the body ſeparately. Finally, the properties of the ſoul are ſometimes attributed to the body, and the properties of the body ſometimes to the ſoul: and yet he that conſiſteth of them is but one man and not many. But ſuch forms of ſpeech do ſignify both that there is one perſon in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two divers natures which do make the ſame perſon. And ſo do the ſcriptures ſpeak of Chriſt: ſometimes they give unto him thoſe things that ought ſingularly to be referred to his manhood, and ſometimes thoſe things that do peculiarly belong to his godhead, and ſometimes thoſe things that do comprehend both natures, and do agree with neither of them ſeparately. And this conjoining of the two natures that are in Chriſt, they do with ſuch religiouſneſs expreſs, that ſometimes they do put them in common together: which figure is among the old authors called communicating of properties.

Things in ſcripture ſometimes ſpoken of the perſon of Chriſt and agreeing in reſpect of the one nature only, ſometimes of one nature and agreeing in reſpect of the other.

2. Theſe things were but weak, unleſs many phraſes of ſcripture, and ſuch as are every where eaſy to be found, did prove that nothing hereof hath been deviſed by man. That ſame thing which Chriſt ſpake of himſelf, ſaying: before that Abraham was, (John viii. 58.) I am, was far diſagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what cavillation the erroneous ſpirits do pervert this place: for they ſay that he was before all ages, becauſe he was already foreknown the Redeemer, as well in the counſel of the Father, as in the minds of the godly. But whereas he openly diſtinguiſheth the day of his manifeſtation from his eternal eſſence, and of purpoſe pronounceth unto himſelf an authority by antiquity wherein he excelleth above Abraham, he doth undoubtedly challenge to himſelf that which is proper to the godhead. Whereas Paul (Col. i. 15.) affirmeth that he is the firſt begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keep their being: and whereas he himſelf reporteth that he was in glory with the Father before the creation of the world, and that he worketh together with the Father, (John xvii. 5.) theſe things do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certain, (John v. 17.) that theſe and ſuch like are peculiarly aſcribed to the Godhead. But whereas he is called (Iſa. xlii. 1.) the ſervant of the Father: and whereas it is ſaid, (Luke i. 52.) that he grew in age, wiſdom and favour with God and men: (John viii. 50.) that he ſeeketh not his own glory: (Matth. xiii.) that he knoweth not the laſt day: (John xiv. 10, and vi. 36.) that he ſpeaketh not of himſelf: (Luke xxiv. 39.) that he doth not his own will: where it is ſaid, that he was ſeen and felt: this wholly belongeth to his own manhood. For in reſpect that he is God neither can he increaſe in any thing, and he worketh all things for his own ſake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all things according to the free choice of his own will, and can neither be ſeen nor felt. And yet he doth not ſeparately aſcribe theſe things to his nature of man only, but taketh them upon himſelf, as if they did agree with the perſon of the Mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul ſaith, (Acts xx. 28.) that God did by his own blood purchaſe unto him a church: (1 Cor. ii. 6.) and the Lord of glory crucified. Again, where John ſaith, (1 John i. 1.) that the word of life was felt. Truly God neither hath blood, nor ſuffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But becauſe he who was both very God and man, Chriſt being crucified, did ſhed his blood for us: thoſe things that were done in his nature of man, are unproperly, and yet not without reaſon given to his Godhead. A like example is, (1 John iii. 16.) where John teacheth that God gave his ſoul for us: therefore there alſo the property of the manhood is communicated with the other nature. Again, when Chriſt ſaid being yet converſant in earth, that no man hath aſcended into heaven, (John iii. 13.) but the Son of man that was in heaven: truly according to his manhood, and in the fleſh that he had put on, he was not then in heaven: but becauſe himſelf was both God and man, by reaſon of the unity of both natures, he gave to the one that which belonged to the other.

Things ſpoken of the perſon of Chriſt and agreeing no more to one nature than another, but indifferently to either, and truly to him that conſiſteth of both. In which kind his office of mediation is.

3. But moſt plainly of all do theſe places ſet forth the true ſubſtance of Chriſt, which do comprehend both natures together; of which ſort there are very many in the goſpel of him. For that which is there read is ſingularly belonging neither to his Godhead nor to his manhood, but to both together, that he hath received of his Father power to forgive ſins, to raiſe up whom he will, to give righteouſneſs, holineſs and ſalvation, to be made judge over the quick and the dead, to be honoured even as the Father is: Finally, that he is called (John i. 29. and v. 21.) the light of the world, (John ix. 5.) the good ſhepherd, the only door, the true vine. For ſuch prerogatives had the Son of God, when he was manifeſted in the fleſh, which although he enjoyed with his Father before the world was made, (John xxi. 1.) yet he had them not in the ſame manner or the ſame reſpect, and which could not be given to ſuch a man as was nothing but man. In the ſame meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: (1 Cor. ii. 4.) that Chriſt after the judgment ended, ſhall yield up the kingdom to God and the Father: even the kingdom of the Son of God, which had no beginning, nor ſhall have any ending: but even as he lay hid under the baſeneſs of the fleſh, and abaſed himſelf, taking upon him the form of a ſervant, and laying aſide the air of majeſty, he ſhewed himſelf obedient to his Father: (Phil. ii. 8.) and having performed all ſuch ſubjection, at length is crowned with honour and glory, and advanced to the higheſt dominion, that all knees ſhall bow before him: ſo ſhall he then yield up to his Father both that name and crown of glory, and whatſoever he hath received of his Father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpoſe is power and dominion given him, but that the Father ſhould govern us by his hand? In which ſenſe it is alſo ſaid, (Heb. ii. 6.) that he ſitteth at the right hand of the Father. But this is but for a time, (Phil. ii. 10.) till we may enjoy the preſent beholding of the Godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excuſed, who while they took no heed to the perſon of the Mediator, have obſcured the natural meaning of almoſt all the doctrine that is read in the goſpel of John, and have entangled themſelves in many ſnares. Let this therefore be unto us the key of right underſtanding, that ſuch things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not ſpoken ſimply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Chriſt ſhall reign till he come forth to judge the world, in ſo much as he uniteth us to his Father, according to the ſmall meaſure of our weakneſs. But when we being made partakers of the heavenly glory, ſhall ſee God ſuch as he is, then he having performed the office of Mediator, ſhall ceaſe to be the ambaſſador of his Father, and ſhall be contented with that glory which he enjoyed before the making of the world: and the name of Lord doth in no other reſpect peculiarly agree with the perſon of Chriſt, but in this, that it ſignifieth the mean degree between God and us. For which purpoſe maketh that ſaying of Paul: (1 Cor. viii.) One God of whom are all things, and one Lord by whom are all things, even he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the Father, until his divine majeſty be to be ſeen face to face. From whom ſo far is it off that any thing ſhall decay, by yielding up the dominion to his Father, that he ſhall become ſo much the more glorious. For then ſhall God alſo ceaſe to be the head of Chriſt becauſe Chriſt's Godhead ſhall then ſhine of itſelf, whereas yet it is covered with a certain vail.

Things ſpoken of Chriſt do need wiſe and ſober expoſitors for the avoiding as of other errors, ſo of thoſe wherein Neſtorius and Eutyches are condemned.

4. And this obſervation ſhall do no ſmall ſervice to aſſoil many doubts, if the readers do fitly apply it. For it is marvellous how much the unſkilful, yea ſome not utterly unlearned, (Aug. in enchir. ad Lauren. c. 36.) are cumbered with ſuch forms of ſpeech, which they ſee ſpoken by Chriſt, which do well agree neither with his Godhead nor with his manhood, becauſe they conſider not that they do agree with his perſon wherein he is ſhewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediator. And it is always eaſy to ſee how well all things hang together, if they have a ſober expoſitor, to examine ſo great myſteries with ſuch devout reverence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that theſe furious and frantic ſpirits meddle not with. They catch hold of thoſe things that are ſpoken of his manhood, to take away the Godhead; and likewiſe of thoſe things that are ſpoken of his Godhead to take away way his manhood: and of those things that are so jointly spoken of both natures, that they severally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man, and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, united, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true Son of God, even according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driven far away from us, who when he went about rather to draw in sunder, than to distinguish the nature, did by that means imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the scripture crieth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the Son of God is given to him that was born of the virgin, Luke i. 33. and 44. and the virgin herself is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madness of Eutyches, lest while we go about to shew the unity of person, we destroy either nature. For we have already alleged so many testimonies, and there are every where so many more to be alleged, where his Godhead is distinguished from his manhood, as may stop the mouths even of the most contentious. And a little hereafter I will adjoin some testimonies to confute better that feigned device, but at this present, one place shall content us. Christ would not have called his body a temple, John ii. 19. unless the Godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was justly condemned in the synod at Ephesus, so also was Eutyches afterwards condemned in the synod of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawful to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

The monstrous impiety of Servetus, denying Christ to have been actually the Son of God before he was born of the virgin Mary.

5. But in our age also there hath risen up no less pernicious a monster, Michael Servetus, who did thrust in place of the Son of God, a feigned thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh, and three elements uncreated. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the son of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy Ghost in the womb of the virgin. But to this end tendeth his subtilty, that the distinction of the two natures being once overthrown, Christ might be thought to be a certain thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole process he travelleth towards this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were only certain shadowish figures in God, whereof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honour, began truly to be the Son of God. And we indeed do confess that the mediator who is born of the virgin, is properly the Son of God. For Christ, in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable favour of God, unless this dignity were given him to be, and be called, the only begotten Son of God. But in the mean while the definition of the church standeth firmly established, that he is counted the Son of God, because he being the Word begotten of the Father before all worlds, did by hypostatical union take upon him the nature of man. Now the hypostatical union is called with the old fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was devised to overthrow the doting error of Nestorius, because he feigned that the Son of God did so dwell in the flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Servetus slandereth us, that we make two Sons of God, when we say that the eternal Word was already the Son of God before that it was cloathed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurdity is it to say, that the Son of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this always from eternal begetting to be the Son, which the angel's words to Mary do secretly shew, That holy thing that shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God: as if he should have said, that the name of the Son, which was obscure in the time of the law, shall now become famous and every where known abroad. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely and with boldness to cry, Abba, Father. Rom. viii. 15. But were not the holy fathers in old time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, and bearing them bold upon that interest, they called upon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten Son of God was brought forth into the world, the heavenly fatherhood is become more plainly known: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were a privilege to the kingdom of Christ. But yet this is invariably to be maintained, that God never was father either to angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten Son: and that men specially whom their own wickedness maketh hateful to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the Son of God by nature. And there is no cause why Servetus ſhould cavil, that this dependeth upon filiation or becoming a ſon, which God had determined with himſelf, becauſe our purpoſe is not here to ſpeak of the figures how the expiation was ſhewed in the blood of beaſts: but becauſe they could not indeed be the children of God, unleſs their adoption were grounded upon the head, it is without reaſon to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Pſal. lxxxii. 7. Whereas the ſcripture calleth the angels the ſons of God, whoſe ſo great dignity did not depend upon the redemption to come; yet muſt it needs be that the Son is in order before them, which maketh the Father to be their Father. I will repeat it again ſhortly, and add the ſame of mankind. Since from at their firſt beginning both angels and men were created with this condition, that God ſhould be common father to them both, if that ſaying of Paul be true, that Chriſt was always the head and the firſt begotten of all creatures, to have the firſt degree in all: I think I do rightly gather that he was alſo the Son of God before the creation of the world.

Chriſt truly and properly the Son of God in the fleſh, but not in reſpect of the fleſh which before he took upon him, he was the Son.

6. But if his filiation (if I may ſo term it) began ſince he was manifeſted in the fleſh, it ſhall follow, that he was alſo ſon in reſpect of his nature of man. Servetus and other ſuch frantic men would have it, that Chriſt who appeared in the fleſh, is the Son of God, becauſe out of the fleſh he could not be called by that name. Now let them anſwer me whether he be the Son according to both natures, and in reſpect of both. So indeed they prate, but Paul teacheth far otherwiſe. We grant indeed that Chriſt is in the fleſh of man called the Son, but not as the faithful are, that is by adoption only and grace, but the true and natural, and therefore the only Son, that by this mark he may be diſcerned from all others. For God vouchſafeth to give the name of his ſons to us, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and only begotten Son, he giveth to Chriſt only. How can he be the only Son in ſo great a number of brethren, but becauſe he poſſeſſeth that by nature, which we have received by gift? And the honour we extend to the whole perſon of the Mediator, that he be truly and properly the Son of God, who was alſo born of the virgin, and offered himſelf for ſacrifice to his Father upon the croſs: but yet in reſpect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, Rom. i. 2. when he ſaith he was ſeparated to preach the goſpel of God, which he had before promiſed of his Son, who was begotten of the ſeed of David according to his fleſh, and declared to be the Son of God in power. But why, when he nameth him diſtinctly the ſon of David according to the fleſh, ſhould he ſeparately ſay, that he was declared the Son of God, unleſs he meant to ſhew that this did depend upon ſome other thing, than upon the very fleſh? For in the ſame ſenſe in another place he ſaith, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. that he ſuffered by the weakneſs of the fleſh, and roſe again by the power of the ſpirit, even ſo in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they muſt needs grant, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the ſon of David, ſo he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Son of God, and the ſame is another thing and diſtinct from the nature of man. The ſcripture giveth him two names, calling him here and there ſometimes the Son of God and ſometimes the Son of man. Of the ſecond there can be no contention moved: but according to the common uſe of the Hebrew tongue he is called the Son of man, becauſe he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrary I affirm, that he is called the Son of God in reſpect of the Godhead and eternal eſſence: becauſe it is no leſs proper that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Son of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Son of man. Again, in the ſame place that I alleged, Paul doth mean that he who was according to the fleſh begotten of the ſeed of David, was no otherwiſe declared to be the Son of God by power, than he teacheth in another place, Rom. ix. 5. that Chriſt, who according to the fleſh deſcended of the Jews, is God bleſſed for ever. Now if in both places the diſtinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they ſay, that he who according to the fleſh is the Son of man, is not alſo the Son of God, in reſpect of the nature of God.

Places of ſcripture wreſted by Servetus from their true meaning to prove that Chriſt began to be the Son of God when he became the ſon of man.

7. They do indeed diſorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is ſaid, that God ſpared not his own Son, and where the angel commanded, that the very ſame perſon that ſhould be born of the virgin, ſhould be called the Son of the Higheſt. But leſt they ſhould glory in ſo fickle an objection, let them conſider with us a little, how ſtrongly they reaſon. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the Son of God, becauſe he that is conceived is called the Son of God, then ſhall it follow, low, Luke i. 32. that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh; because John saith, (John i. 1.) that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his hands have handled. Likewise that, which is read in the prophet: (Micah v. 2. Thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah: though thou art a little one in the thousands of Judah: out of thee shall be born to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his coming forth from the beginning, from the days of eternity. How will they be compelled to expound this, if they will be content to follow such manner of reasoning? For I have protested, that we do not agree with Nestorius, who imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine Christ hath made us the sons of God with him by right of brotherly conjoining, because he is the only begotten Son of God in the flesh which he took of us. And Augustine doth wisely admonish us, that this is a bright glass wherein to behold the marvellous and singular favour of God, that he attained honour in respect that he is man which he could not deserve. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency even according to the flesh from the womb of his mother, to be the Son of God. Yet is there not in the unity of person to be feigned such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the Godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternal Word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures united into one person, be divers ways called the Son of God, than that he be according to divers respects, called sometimes the Son of God, and sometimes the Son of man. And no more doth that other cavil of Servetus distress us: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Son of God, but under a figure, because although the describing of him then was somewhat dark; yet whereas it is already clearly proved that he was no otherwise eternal God, but because he was the Word begotten of the eternal Father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which he hath taken upon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not been called Father from the beginning, if there had not then been a mutual relation to the Son, Eph. iii. 15. by whom all kindred or fatherhood is reckoned in heaven and in earth: hereby it is easy to gather, that even in the time of the law and the prophets, he was the Son of God before that this name was commonly known in the church. But if they strive only about the only word, Solomon discoursing of the infinite highness of God, affirmeth as well his Son as himself to be incomprehensible. Tell his name, if thou canst (saith he, Prov. xxx. 4.) or the name of his Son. Yet I am not ignorant that with the contentious this testimony will not be of sufficient force: neither do I lay much stress upon it, saving that it sheweth that they do maliciously cavil, who deny Christ to be the Son of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent have openly testified the same: so that their shamelessness is no less worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred who dare object Ireneus and Tertullian against us, both which do confess that the Son of God was invisible, who afterwards appeared visible.

The sundry gross absurdities into which Servetus fell, by denying Christ to have been really and actually the Son of God before he was manifested in the flesh.

8. But although Servetus hath heaped up horrible monstrous devices, which peradventure the other would not allow: yet if ye press them hard, ye shall perceive that all they who do not acknowlege Christ to be the Son of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceived in the womb of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichees in old time did foolishly affirm, that man hath his soul (as it were) by derivation from God, because they read that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast hold of the name of Son, that they leave no difference between the natures, but babble disorderly that Christ being man, is the Son of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternal begetting of wisdom that Solomon (Eccl. xxiv. 14.) speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the Godhead in the Mediator, or an imagined apparition is thrust in place of the manhood. It were indeed profitable to confute the grosser deceits of Servetus, wherewith he hath bewitched himself and some others, to the end that the godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselves within the compass of soberness and modesty: saving that I think it should be superfluous, because I have already done it in a book by itself. The sum of them cometh to this effect, that the Son of God was a form in mind from the beginning, and even then he was before appointed to be man that should be the essential image of God. And he doth acknowlege no other word of God but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Son, which also in act extended to the nature itself. In the mean time he confoundeth the spirit with the word, for that God distributed the invisible word and the spirit into flesh and soul. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, that he who then was but a shadowish son in form, was at length begotten by the word, to which he assigneth the office of seed. Whereby it shall follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were created of the original seed of the word of God. For although he compound Christ of three uncreated elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he feigneth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essential Godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And lest he should seem to strip Christ out of his Godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantial with God, and that the word was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he cannot conceive Christ to be the Son of God, unless his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into Godhead, he bringeth the eternal person of the word to nothing, and taketh from us the Son of David, that was promised to be the Redeemer. He often repeateth this, that the Son was begotten of God by knowlege and predestination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elements, which afterward appeared in the first light of the world, in the cloud and in the pillar of fire. Now how shamefully he sometimes disagreeth with himself, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recital the readers that have their sound wit may gather, that with the circumstances of this unclean dog the hope of salvation is utterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the Godhead itself, it should cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our Redeemer, but he that begotten of the seed of Abraham and David, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And he wrongfully standeth upon the words of John, that the word was made flesh. For as they resist the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked invention, whereof Eutyches was author, for as much as the only purpose of the Evangelist was to defend the unity of persons in the two natures.

CHAP. XV.

That we may know, to what end Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought us: three things are principally to be considered in him, his prophetical office, his kingdom, and priesthood.

Christ a Prophet, a King, and Priest, so to be acknowleged, not with a cold mentioning of those titles, but with a right understanding of the end and use of them. The people of God before his coming, looked for more light of knowlege at his hands when he should come, than they received by their other prophets.

AUGUSTINE saith rightly, that although the Heretics do brag of the name of Christ, yet they have not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth only proper to the church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ, Christ shall be found among them only in name, and not in very deed. So at this day the Papists, although the name of the Son of God Redeemer of the world, sound in their mouth: yet because being contented with vain pretence of the name, they spoil him of his power and dignity: this saying of Paul may be well spoken of them, that they have not the head. Therefore, that faith may find sound matter of salvation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be established, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three parts. For he is given both a Prophet, a King, and a Priest. Although it were but small profit to know those names, without knowlege of the end and use of them. For they are also named among the Papists, but coldly and to no great profit, where it is not known what each of these titles containeth in it. We have said before, how though God sending prophets by continual course one after another, did never leave his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to salvation: that yet the minds of the godly had always this persuasion, that full light of understanding was to be hoped for only at the coming of Messias; yea and the opinion thereof was come, even to the Samaritans, who yet never knew the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: (John iv. 25.) When Messias cometh he shall teach us all things. And the Jews had not rashly gathered this upon presumptions in their minds: but as they were taught by assured oracles, so they believed. Above all remarkable is that saying of Isaiah: (Isa. lii. 4.) Behold, I have made him a witness witneſs to peoples, I have given him to be a guide and ſchoolmaſter to peoples: even as in another place he had called him the angel or interpreter of the great counſel. After this manner the apoſtle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the goſpel, after that he had ſaid, (Heb. i. 1.) that God in the old time ſpake to the fathers by the prophets diverſly, and under manifold figures, addeth that laſt of all he ſpake unto us by his beloved Son. But becauſe it was the common office of the prophets to keep the church in ſuſpence, and to uphold it until the coming of the Mediator, therefore we read that, in their ſcattering abroad, the faithful complained that they were deprived of that ordinary benefit, ſaying: (Pſal. lxxiv. 9.) We ſee not our tokens, there is not a prophet among us: there is no more any that hath knowlege. But when Chriſt was now not far off, there was a time appointed to Daniel, to ſeal up the viſion and the prophecy, not only that the prophecy, which is there ſpoken of, ſhould be eſtabliſhed in aſſured credit, but alſo that the faithful ſhould learn with contented mind to want the prophets for a time, becauſe the fulneſs and cloſing up of all revelations was at hand.

2. Now it is to be obſerved, that the title of commendation of Chriſt belongeth to theſe three offices. For we know that in the time of the law, as well the prophets as prieſts and kings were anointed with holy oyl. For which cauſe the renowned name of Meſſias was given to the promiſed Mediator. But though indeed I confeſs (as I have alſo declared in another place,) that he was called Meſſias, by peculiar conſideration and reſpect of his kingdom: yet the anointings in reſpect of the office of prophet and of prieſt, have their place, and are not to be neglected of us. Of the firſt of theſe two is expreſs mention made in Iſaiah (Iſa. li 1.) in theſe words: The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah is upon me. Therefore the Lord hath anointed me, that I ſhould preach to the meek, ſhould bring health to the contrite in heart, ſhould declare deliverance to captives, ſhould publiſh the year of good will, &c. We ſee that he was anointed with the ſpirit, to be the publiſher and witneſs of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is diſtinguiſhed from other teachers that had the like office. And here again is to be obſerved, that he took not the anointing for himſelf alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole body, that in his continual preaching of the goſpel, the virtue of the ſpirit ſhould join withal. But in the mean time this remaineth certain, that by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an end is made of all prophecies, ſo that they do diminiſh his authority, who not being content with the goſpel, do patch any foreign thing unto it. For that voice which thundered from heaven, ſaying: (Matth. iii. 17.) This is my beloved Son, hear him: hath advanced him by ſingular privilege above the degrees of all other. Then this ointment is poured abroad from the head unto all the members: as it was foretold by Joel. (Joel ii. 28.) Your children ſhall propheſy, and your daughters ſhall ſee viſions, &c. But where Paul ſaith, (1 Cor. i. 30.) that he was made unto us wiſedom, and in another place, (Col. ii. 3.) that in him are hidden all the treaſures of knowlege and underſtanding: this hath ſomewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they who by faith perceive what he is, have comprehended the whole infiniteneſs of heavenly good things. For which cauſe he writeth in another place, (Cor. ii. 2.) I have counted it precious to know nothing, but Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified: which is moſt true, becauſe it is not lawful to paſs beyond the ſimplicity of the goſpel. And hereunto tendeth the dignity of a prophet's office in Chriſt, that we might know that in the ſum of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wiſdom.

3. Now come I to his kingdom, of which it were vain to ſpeak, if the readers were not firſt warned, that the nature thereof is ſpiritual. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpoſe it ſerveth, and what it availeth us, and the whole force and eternity thereof, and alſo the eternity which in Daniel the angel doth attribute to the perſon of Chriſt, and again the angel in Luke doth worthily apply to the ſalvation of the people. But that is alſo two fold, or of two ſorts, for the one belongeth to the whole body of the church, the other is proper to every member. To the firſt is to be referred that which is ſaid in the Pſalm: (Pſal. lxxxix. 36.) I have once ſworn by my holineſs to David, I will not lie, his ſeed ſhall abide for ever, his ſeat ſhall be as the ſun in my ſight, it ſhall be eſtabliſhed as the moon for ever, and a faithful witneſs in heaven. Neither is it doubtful, but that God doth there promiſe, that he will be by the hand of his Son an eternal governor and defender of his church. For the true performance of this prophecy can he found no where elſe but in Chriſt: foraſmuch as immediately after the death of Solomon, the greater part of the dignity of the kingdom fell away, and was to the diſhonour of the houſe of David conveyed over to a private man, and afterwards by little and little was diminiſhed, till at length it came to utter decay, with heavy and ſhameful deſtruction. And the ſame meaning hath that exclamation of Iſaiah: (Iſa liii. 8.) Who ſhall ſhew forth his generation? For he ſo pronounceth that Chriſt ſhall remain alive after death, that he joineth him with his members. Therefore ſo oft as we hear that Chriſt is armed with eternal power, let us remember that the everlaſting continuance of the church is upholden by this ſupport, to remain ſtill ſafe among the troubleſome toſſings, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grievous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable deſtructions. So when David (Pſal. ii. 3, 4.) ſcorneth the boldneſs of his enemies, that go about to break the yoke of God and of Chriſt, and ſaith, that the kings and peoples raged in vain, becauſe he that dwelleth in heaven is ſtrong enough to break their violent aſſaults; he aſſured the godly of the continual preſervation of the church, and encourageth them to hope well ſo oft as it happeneth to be oppreſſed. So in another place, (Pſal. cx.) when he ſaith, in the perſon of God: Sit at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footſtool: he warneth us, that how many and ſtrong enemies ſoever do conſpire to beſiege the church, yet they have not ſtrength enough to prevail againſt that unchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his Son an eternal king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impoſſible that the devil with all the preparation of the world, may be able at any time to deſtroy the church, which is grounded upon the eternal ſeat of Chriſt. Now for ſo much as concerneth the ſpecial uſe of every one, the very ſame eternal continuance ought to raiſe us up to hope of immortality. (John xviii. 36.) For we ſee, that whatſoever is earthly and of the world, endureth but for a time, yea and is very frail. Therefore Chriſt to lift up our hope unto heaven, pronounceth, that his kingdom is not of this world. Finally, when any of us heareth, that the kingdom of Chriſt is ſpiritual, let him be raiſed up with this ſaying, and let him aſpire to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is now defended by the hand of Chriſt, let him look for the full fruit of this grace in the world to come.

To know the eternal kingdom of Chriſt it cannot profit us at all except we know it to be ſpiritual, and to conſiſt of two parts, the enriching of his ſubjects with good things, and the forcible defending of them againſt the aſſaults of principal enemies: out of this our comfort ſloweth.

4. That, as we have ſaid, the force and profit of the kingdom of Chriſt cannot otherwiſe be perceived by us, but when we know it to be ſpiritual, appeareth ſufficiently though it were but by this, that while we muſt live in warfare under the croſs, during the whole courſe of our life, our eſtate is hard and miſerable: what then ſhould it profit us to be gathered together under the dominion of a heavenly king, unleſs we were certain to enjoy the fruit thereof out of the ſtate of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be known, that whatſoever felicity is promiſed us in Chriſt, it conſiſteth not in outward advantages, that we ſhould lead a merry and quiet life, abound in wealth, be ſafe from harm, enjoy to the full thoſe delightful things that the fleſh is wont to deſire: but that it wholly belongeth to the heavenly life. But as in the world the proſperous and deſired ſtate of the people is partly maintained by plenty of good things and peace at home, and partly by ſtrong forcible defences, whereby it may be ſafe againſt outward violence: ſo Chriſt alſo doth enrich his with all things neceſſary to eternal ſalvation of ſouls, and fortifieth them with ſtrength, by which they may ſtand invincible againſt all aſſaults of principal enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for us than for himſelf, and that both within and without: that being furniſhed ſo far as God knoweth to be expedient for us, with the gifts of the Spirit, whereof we are naturally empty, we may by theſe firſt fruits perceive that we are truly joined to God unto perfect bleſſedneſs. And then, that relying upon the power of the ſame ſpirit, we may not doubt that we ſhall always have the victory againſt the devil, the world, and every kind of hurtful thing. To this purpoſe tendeth the anſwer of Chriſt (Luke xvii. 28.) to the Phariſees, that becauſe the kingdom of God is within us, it ſhall not come with obſervation. For it is likely that becauſe he profeſſed that he was the ſame king, under whom the ſovereign bleſſing of God was to be hoped for, they in ſcorn required him to ſhew forth forth his ſigns. But he, becauſe they (who otherwiſe are too much bent to the earth) ſhould not fooliſhly reſt upon worldly pomps, bideth them to enter into their own conſciences, becauſe the kingdom of God (Rom. xiv. 17.) is righteouſneſs, peace, and joy in the holy Ghoſt. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdom of Chriſt availeth us. For, becauſe it is not earthly or fleſhly, ſubject to corruption, but ſpiritual: he lifteth us up even to eternal life, that we may patiently paſs over this life in miſeries, hunger, cold, contempt, reproaches, and other griefs, contented with this one thing, that our king will never leave us deſtitute, but ſuccour us in our neceſſities, till having ended our war, we be called to triumph. For ſuch is his manner of reigning, to communicate with us all that he hath received of his Father. Now whereas he armeth and furniſheth us with power, and adorneth us with beauty and magnificence, enricheth us with wealth? hereby is miniſtred unto us moſt plentiful matter to glory upon, and alſo bold courage to fight without fear againſt the devil, ſin and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteouſneſs, we may valiantly overcome all the reproaches of the world, and as he liberally filleth us with his gifts, ſo we again for our part, may bring forth fruit to his glory.

Chriſt ſpiritually anointed a king, that is to ſay, royally enriched with gifts of the Spirit which laſt forever, that in him Chriſtians might ever be rich, neither is any thing taken from this, when it is ſaid that he ſhall yield up his kingdom to his Father.

Therefore his kingly anointing is ſet forth unto us, not done with oil or ointments made with ſpices, but he is called the anointed of God becauſe upon him hath reſted the ſpirit of wiſdom, underſtanding, counſel, ſtrength and fear of God. This is the oil of gladneſs, wherewith the Pſalm reporteth that he was anointed above his fellows, becauſe if there were not ſuch excellency in him, we ſhould be all needy and hungry. For, as it is already ſaid, he is not privately enriched for himſelf, but to pour his plenty upon us, being hungry and dry. For as it is ſaid, that the Father gave the ſpirit to his Son, not by meaſure, ſo there is expreſſed a reaſon why, that all we ſhould receive of his fulneſs, and grace for grace. Out of which fountain floweth that liberal giving, whereof Paul maketh mention, whereby grace is diverſly diſtributed to the faithful, (Eph. iv. 7.) according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. Hereby is that which I ſaid ſufficiently confirmed, (John i. 32.) that the kingdom of Chriſt conſiſteth in the ſpirit, not in earthly delights or pomps, and therefore we muſt forſake the world that we may be partakers of it. A viſible ſign of this holy anointing was ſhewed in the baptiſm of Chriſt, when the holy Ghoſt reſted upon him in the likeneſs of a dove. That the holy Ghoſt and his gifts are meant by the word. Anointing, ought to ſeem neither novelty nor abſurdity. For we are none other way quickened, ſpecially for ſo much as concerneth the heavenly life: there is no drop of lively power in us, but that which the holy Ghoſt poureth into us, which hath choſen his ſeat in Chriſt, that from thence the heavenly riches might largely flow out unto us, whereof we are ſo needy. And whereas both the faithful ſtand invincible by the ſtrength of their king, and alſo his ſpiritual riches plenteouſly flow out unto them, they are not unworthily called chriſtians. But this eternity whereof we have ſpoken, is nothing derogate, by that ſaying of Paul: (1 Cor. xv. 24.) Then he ſhall yield up the kingdom to God and the Father. Again: (1 Cor. xv. 28.) the Son himſelf ſhall be made ſubject, that God may be all in all: for his meaning is nothing elſe, but that in the ſame perfect glory, the adminiſtration of the kingdom ſhall not be ſuch as it is now. For the Father hath given all power to the Son, that by the Son's hand he may govern, cheriſh and ſuſtain us, defend us under his ſafe-guard, and help us. So while for a little time we are wavering abroad from God, Chriſt is the mean between God and us, by little and little to bring us to perfect conjoyning with God. And truly, whereas he ſitteth on the right hand of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the Father's deputy, under whom is the whole power of his dominion, becauſe it is God's will to rule and defend his church by a mean (as I may ſo call it) in the perſon of his Son. As alſo Paul doth expound it in the firſt chapter to the Epheſians, that he was ſet at the right hand of the Father, to be the head of the church, which is his body. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in another place, (Phil. ii. 9.) that there is given him a name above all names, that in the name of Jeſus all knees ſhould bow, and all tongues confeſs that it is to the glory of God the Father. For even in the ſame words alſo he ſetteth out in the kingdom of Chriſt an order neceſſary for our preſent weakneſs. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God ſhall then be by himſelf the only head of the church, becauſe Chriſt's office in defending of the church, ſhall be fulfilled. For the ſame reaſon the ſcripture commonly calleth him Lord, becauſe his Father did ſet him over us to this end, to exerciſe his own lordly power by him. For though there be many lordſhips in the world, yet is there to us but one God the Father, of whom are all things and we in him, and one Lord Chriſt, by whom are all things and we by him, ſaith Paul. Whereupon is rightly gathered that he is the ſelf ſame God, who by the mouth of Iſaiah (Iſa. xxxiii. 22.) affirmed himſelf to be the king and the law-maker of the church. For though he do every where call all the power that he hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing elſe, but that he reigneth by the power of God: becauſe he hath therefore put on the perſonage of the Mediator, that deſcending from the boſom and incomprehenſible glory of the Father, he might approach nigh unto us. And ſo much more juſt it is, that we be with full conſent prepared to obey, and that with great chearfulneſs we direct our obedience to his commandment. For as he joineth the offices of king and paſtor toward them who willingly yield themſelves obedient: ſo on the other ſide, we hear that he beareth an iron ſcepter, to break and bruiſe all the obſtinate (Pſal. ii. 9.) like potters veſſels: we hear alſo that he ſhall be the judge of nations, to cover the earth with dead corpſes, and to overthrow the height that ſtandeth againſt him. Of which thing there are ſome examples ſeen at this day; but the full proof thereof ſhall be at the laſt judgment, which may alſo properly be accounted the laſt act of his kingdom.

6. Concerning his prieſthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the end and uſe of it is, that he ſhould be a Mediator pure from all ſpot, that he ſhould by his holineſs reconcile us to God. But becauſe the juſt curſe poſſeſſeth the entry, and God according to his office of judge is bent againſt us, it is neceſſary that ſome expiation be uſed, that he being a prieſt may procure favour for us, to appeaſe the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Chriſt might fulfil this office, it behoveth that he ſhould come forth with a ſacrifice. For in the law it was not lawful for the prieſt to enter into the ſanctuary without blood, that the faithful might know, that though there were a prieſt become mean for us to make interceſſion, yet God could not be made favourable to us before that our ſins were purged. Upon which point the apoſtle diſcourſeth largely in the epiſtle to the Hebrews, from the ſeventh chapter almoſt to the end of the tenth. But the ſum of all cometh to this effect, that the honour of prieſthood can be applyed to none but to Chriſt, which by the ſacrifice of his death hath wiped away our guiltineſs, and ſatisfied for our ſins. But how weighty a matter it is, we are informed by that ſolemn oath of God, which was ſpoken without repentance: (Pſal. cx. 4.) Thou art a prieſt for ever according to the order of Melchizedec. For without doubt his will was to eſtabliſh that principal point, which he knew to be the chief joint whereupon our ſalvation depended. For as it is ſaid, there is no way open for us or for our prayers to God, unleſs our filthineſs being purged, the prieſts do ſanctify us and obtain grace for us, from which the uncleanneſs of our wicked doings and ſins doth debar us. So do we ſee, that we muſt begin at the death of Chriſt, that the efficacy and profit of his prieſthood may come unto us. Of this it followeth that he is an eternal interceſſor, by whoſe mediation we obtain favour, whereupon again ariſeth not only affiance to pray, but alſo quietneſs to godly conſciences, while they ſafely lean upon the fatherly tenderneſs of God, and are certainly perſuaded that it pleaſeth him whatſoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the law, God commanded ſacrifices of beaſts to be offered to him: there was another and a new order in Chriſt, that one ſhould be both the ſacrificed hoſt, and the prieſt: becauſe there neither could be found any other ſatisfaction for ſins, nor any was worthy ſo great honour to offer up to God his only begotten Son. Now Chriſt beareth the perſon of a prieſt, not only by eternal mean of reconciliation to make the Father favourable and merciful unto us, but alſo to bring us into the fellowſhip of ſo great an honour. For we that are defiled in our ſelves, (Rev. i. 6.) yet being made prieſts in him, do offer up our ſelves, and all ours to God, and do freely enter into the heavenly ſanctuary, that all the ſacrifice of prayer and praiſe that come from us, may be acceptable and ſweet ſmelling in the ſight of God. And thus far doth that ſaying of Chriſt extend: (John xvii. 15.) For their ſakes I ſanctify my ſelf: becauſe, having his holineſs poured upon us, in as much as he hath offered us with himſelf to his Father, we that otherwiſe are abominable in his ſight, do pleaſe him as pure and clean, yea, and holy. Hereunto ſerveth the anointing of the ſanctuary, whereof mention is made in Daniel. (Dan. ix. 24.) For the compariſon of contrariety is to be obſerved between this anointing, and that ſhadowiſh dowish anointing that then was in use: as if the angel should have said, that the shadows being driven away, there should be a clear priesthood in the person of Christ, And so much more detestable is their invention, not who contented with the sacrifice of Christ, have presumed to thrust in themselves to kill him: which is daily enterprised among the Papists, where the Mass is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

CHAP. XVI.

How Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase salvation for us, wherein is treated of his death, and resurrection and his ascension to heaven.

The sum of all which we seek for in Christ is salvation. In which respect he hath the name of Saviour given him: which name containeth all good things.

ALL that we have hitherto said of Christ, is to be directed to this mark, that being damned, dead, and lost in ourselves, we may seek for righteousness, deliverance, life and salvation in him: as we are taught by that notable saying of Peter, Acts iv. 12. that there is none other name under heaven given to men whereby they must be saved. Neither was the name of Jesus given him unadvisedly, or at random, or by the will of men, but brought from heaven by the angel, Matth. i. 22. the publisher of God's decree, and with a reason also assigned: Luke i. 31. because he was sent to save his people from their sins. In which words that is to be observed which we have touched in another place, that the office of Redeemer was appointed him, that he should be our Saviour: but in the mean time our redemption should be but unperfect, unless he should by gradual steps convey us forward to the uttermost mark of salvation. Therefore so soon as we depart never so little from him, our salvation by little and little vanisheth away, which wholly resteth in him: so that all they wilfully spoil themselves of all grace, who rest not in him. And the admonition of Bernard is worthy to be rehearsed, (Bern. in cant. serm. 15.) that the name of Jesus is not only light, but also meat, yea, and oil also, without which all the meat of the soul is dry, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before us is unsavoury. Finally, that it is honey in the mouth, melody in the ear, and joyfulness in the heart, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputation is unsavoury, but where this name soundeth. But here it deserves diligently to be considered how salvation is purchased by him for us: that we may not only be persuaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast upholding of our faith, we may refuse all such things as might draw us away hither or thither. For since no man can descend into himself, and earnestly consider what he is, without feeling God angry and bent against him, he hath need carefully to seek a mean and way to appease him, which demandeth satisfaction: there is no common assuredness required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth always upon sinners, till they be loose from their guiltiness: who, as he is a righteous judge, suffereth not his law to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to revenge it.

How God can be said to have been our enemy till Christ reconciled us, and yet give us his Son, by whom we might be reconciled, seeing this work to reconcile us sheweth love before reconcilement.

2. But before we go any further, it is to be seen by the way, how it agreed together, that God who prevented us with his mercy, was our enemy until he was reconciled to us by Christ. For how could he have given us in his only begotten Son a singular pledge of his love, unless he had already before that embraced us with his free favour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrariety, I will first unty this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, Rom. v. 10. that God was enemy to men, till they were restored into favour by the death of Christ: Gal. iii. 10. that they were accursed till their iniquity was purged by his sacrifice: Col. i. 21. that they were separated from God, till they were received into a nearness by his body. Such manner of phrases are adapted to our capacity, that we may the better understand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in express words, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and everlasting death did rest upon us, we would less acknowlege how miserable we should de without God's mercy, and would less regard the benefit of deliverance. As for example. If a man hear this spoken to him: if God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and caſt thee away as thou hadſt deſerved, thou ſhouldſt have ſuffered horrible deſtruction: but becauſe he hath willingly and of his own free kindneſs kept thee in favour, and not ſuffered thee to be eſtranged from him, he hath ſo delivered thee from that peril: truly he will be moved with, and in ſome part feel how much he oweth to the mercy of God. But if he hear on the other ſide that which the ſcripture teacheth, that he was by ſin eſtranged from God, the heir of wrath, ſubject to the curſe of eternal death, excluded from all hope of ſalvation, a ſtranger from all bleſſing of God, the bond-ſlave of Satan, captive under the yoke of ſin: finally, ordaind unto and already entangled with horrible deſtruction, that in this caſe Chriſt became an interceſſor to entreat for him, that Chriſt took upon him and ſuffered the puniſhment which by the juſt judgment of God did hang over all ſinners, that he hath purged with his blood thoſe evils that made them hateful to God, that by his expiation is ſufficient ſatisfaction and ſacrifice made to God the Father, that by his interceſſor this wrath was appeaſed; that within this foundation reſteth the peace between God and men: that upon this bond is contained his good-will towards them: ſhall not he be ſo much the more moved with theſe, as it is more lively repreſented out of how great miſery he hath been delivered? In a word: becauſe our mind can neither ardently enough take hold of life in the mercy of God, nor receive it with ſuch thankfulneſs as we ought, but when it is before ſtriken and thrown down with the fear of the wrath of God and dread of eternal death, we are ſo taught by holy ſcripture, that without Chriſt we may ſee God as it were wrathfully bent againſt us, and his hand armed to our deſtruction: and that we may embrace his good-will and fatherly kindneſs no otherwhere, but in Chriſt.

God loving us freely as his creatures, but hating that iniquity which is in us, gave his Son to take away that which hindered us from the benefits of his love.

3. And although this be ſpoken according to the weakneſs of our capacity, yet it is not falſely ſaid. For God who is the higheſt righteouſneſs, cannot love wickedneſs which he ſeeth in us all. Therefore we all have in us that which deſerves God's hatred. Therefore in reſpect our corrupted nature, and then of evil life addeth unto it, truly we all are ſubject to God's diſpleaſure guilty in his ſight, and, born to damnation of hell. But becauſe the Lord will not loſe that which is his in us, he findeth yet ſomewhat that he of his goodneſs may love. For howſoever we be ſinners by our own fault, yet we may remain his creatures. Howſoever we have purchaſed death to ourſelves, yet he made us unto life. So is he moved by mere and free loving of us to receive us into favour. But ſince there is a perpetual and unappeaſable diſagreement between righteouſneſs and iniquity, ſo long as we remain ſinners, he cannot receive us wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of diſagreement, he might wholly reconcile us unto himſelf, he doth by expiation ſet forth in the death of Chriſt, take away whatſoever evil is in us, that we, who before were unclean and impure, may now appear righteous and holy in his ſight. Therefore God the Father doth with his love prevent and go before our reconciliation in Chriſt, yea, becauſe he firſt loved us, 1 John iv. 19. therefore he afterwards doth reconcile us unto himſelf. But becauſe until Chriſt with his death come to ſuccour us, there remaineth wickedneſs in us, which deſerveth God's indignation, and is accurſed and damned in his ſight, therefore we are not fully and firmly joined to God, until Chriſt do join us. Therefore if we will aſſure ourſelves to have God made well pleaſed and favourable unto us, we muſt fix our eyes and minds upon Chriſt only: as indeed we obtain by him only, that our ſins be not imputed to us, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

S. Auguſtine's judgment that we were loved even when we were hated.

4. And for this reaſon Paul ſaith, that the ſame love, wherewith God embraced us before the creation of the world, was ſtayed and grounded upon Chriſt. Theſe things are plain and agreeable with the ſcripture, and do make thoſe places of ſcripture to accord very well together, where it is ſaid: that God declared his love toward us in this, John iii. 16. that he gave his only begotten Son to death: and yet (Rom. v. 10.) that was our enemy till he was made favourable again to us by the death of Chriſt. But that they be more ſtrongly proved to them that require the Teſtament of the old church I will allege one place of Auguſtine (Tract. in Evang. Joh. i. 10.) where he teacheth the very ſame that we do. The love of God, ſaith he, is incomprehenſible and unchangeable. For he began not to love us ſince the time that we were reconciled to him by the blood of his Son. But before the making of the world he loved us, even before that we were any thing at all, that we might alſo be his children with his only begotten Son. Therefore whereas we were reconciled by the death of Chriſt, it is not ſo to be taken as though the Son did therefore reconcile us unto him, that he might now begin to love love us whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that already loved us, to whom we were enemies by reason of sin. And whether this be true or no that I say, let the apostle bear witness. (Rom. v. 8.) He doth commend (saith he) his love towards us, because when we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. He therefore had a love to us, even then when we were enemies to him and wrought wickedness. Therefore after a marvellous and divine manner he loved us, even then when he hated us. For he hated us in that we were such as he had not made us, and because our wickedness had on every side wasted away his work, he knew how in every one of us, both to hate that which we ourselves had made, and to love that which he had made. These are the words of Augustin.

Although Christ wrought our redemption by the whole course of his life, yet he is said to have reconciled us especially by death wherein we are to note, that he died willingly, was reputed worthy, and yet pronounced unworthy to die.

5. Now where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our sins, and taken away the strife between us and God, and purchased such righteousness as might make him favourable and well willing toward us: it may be generally answered that he hath brought it to pass by the whole course of his obedience, Which is proved by the testimonies of Paul: (Rom. v. 19.) As by one man's offence many were made sinners, so by one man's obedience we are made righteous. And in another place (Gal. iv. 4.) he extendeth the cause of the pardon that delivereth us from the curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ saying: when the fulness of time was come, God sent his Son made of a woman, subject to the law, to redeem them that were under the law: and so affirmed that in his very baptism (Matth. iii. 25.) was fulfilled one part of righteousness, that he obediently did the commandment of his Father. Finally, from the time that he took upon him the person of a servant, he began to pay the ransom to redeem us. But the scripture to set out the manner of our salvation more certainly, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. He himself pronounced that he gave his life (Matth. x. 18.) to be a redemption for many. Paul teacheth (Rom. iv. 25.) that he died for our sins. John Baptist cried out (John i. 29.) that Christ came to take away the sins of the world, because he was the Lamb of God. In another place Paul saith, (Rom. iii.) that we are justified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his own blood. Again, (Rom. v.) that we are justified in his blood and reconciled by his death. Again, (1 Cor. v. 21.) he that knew not sin, was made sin for us, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be endless, and many of them must be hereafter alleged in their order. Therefore in the sum of belief, which they call the apostle's Creed, it is very orderly passed immediately from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the sum of perfect salvation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehendeth (Phil. i. 7.) it wholly from the beginning to the end, in saying, that he abased himself, taking upon him the form of a servant, and was obedient to his Father to death, even the death of the cross. And truly even in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, unless it had been willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousness. Therefore (John x. 15.) where the Lord testifieth, that he gave his soul for his sheep, he expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my self. According to which meaning Isaiah saith, (Isa. liii. 7.) that he held his peace like a lamb before the shearer. And the history of the gospel rehearseth, (Matth. xxvii. 2.) that he went forth and met the soldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himself, and stood still to yield himself to judgment to be pronounced upon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities upon him, and it behoved that his obedience to his Father, should be this way tried. and this was no slender shew of his incomparable love towards us, to wrestle with horrible fear, and in the midst of these cruel torments to cast away all care of himself, that he might provide for us. And this is to be believed, that there could no sacrifice be well offered to God any otherwise, but by this that Christ forsaking all his own affection, did submit and wholly yield himself to his Father's will. For proof whereof, the apostle doth fitly allege that testimony of the Psalm: (Heb. 5.) in the book of the law it is written of me, To do thy will I take delight, O my God, (Psal. xl. 9.) and thy law is in the midst of my heart. Then I said: Lo, I come. But because trembling consciences find no rest but in a sacrifice and washing whereby sins are cleansed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Chriſt is appointed for us the matter of life. Now foraſmuch as by our own guiltineſs, curſe was due unto us, before the heavenly judgment-ſeat of God, therefore firſt of all is recited how he was condemned before Pontius Pilate the Roman governour: that we ſhould know that the puniſhment to which we were ſubject, was juſtly laid upon us. We could not eſcape the dreadful judgment of God: Chriſt, to deliver us from it, ſuffered himſelf to be condemned before a mortal man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the governour is expreſſed not only to procure credit to the hiſtory, but that we ſhould learn that which Iſaiah teacheth, (Iſa. liii. 9.) that the chaſtiſement of our peace was upon him, and that by his ſtripes we are healed. For to take away our damnation, every kind of death ſufficed not for him to ſuffer, but to finiſh our redemption, one ſpecial kind of death was to be choſen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himſelf, and taking our guiltineſs upon himſelf, he might deliver us from them both. If he had been murdered by thieves, or had been ragingly ſlain in a commotion of the common people: in ſuch a death there ſhould have been no appearance of ſatisfaction. But when he was brought to be arraigned before the judgment-ſeat, when he was accuſed and preſſed with witneſſes againſt him, and was by the mouth of the judge condemned to die: by theſe tokens we underſtand, that he did bear the perſon of a guilty man and of an evil doer. And here are two things to be obſerved, which both were before ſpoken by the prophecies of the prophets, and do bring a ſingular comfort and confirmation of faith. For when we hear that Chriſt was ſent from the judges ſeat to death, and was hanged among thieves, we have the fulfilling of that prophecy, which is alleged by the Evangeliſt. He was accounted among the wicked. (Iſa. liii. 21.) And why ſo? even to take upon him the ſtead of a ſinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, (Mat. xv. 18.) becauſe he ſuffered death not for the cauſe of innocency, but for ſin. On the other ſide when we hear that he was acquitted by the ſame mouth whereby he was condemned, for Pilate was conpelled openly more than once to bear witneſs of his innocency: let that come in our mind which is in the other prophet: (Pſal. xcix. 5.) that he repayeth that which he had not taken away. And ſo we ſhall behold the perſon of a ſinner and evil doer repreſented in Chriſt: and by the open appearance of his innocency it ſhall become plain to ſee, that he was charged rather with other offence than his own. He ſuffered therefore under Pontius Pilate, (John xviii. 38.) and ſo by the ſolemn ſentence of the governour, was reckoned in the number of wicked doers: but yet not ſo, but that he was by the ſame judge at the ſame time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he found no cauſe of condemnation in him. This is our acquital, that the guiltineſs which made us ſubject to puniſhment, is removed upon the head of the Son of God. For this ſetting of one againſt the other, we ought principally to hold faſt, leſt we tremble and be careful all our life long, as though the juſt vengeance of God did hang over us, which the Son of God hath taken upon himſelf.

6. Beſide that, the very manner of his death is not without a ſingular myſtery. The croſs was accurſed, not only, by the opinion of men, but alſo by the decree of the law of God. Therefore when Chriſt was lifted up upon the croſs, he made himſelf ſubject to the curſe. And ſo it behoved to be done, that when the curſe was removed from us to him, we might be delivered from all that curſe that for our ſins was prepared for us, or rather did already reſt upon us. Which thing was alſo by ſhadow expreſſed in the law. For the ſacrifices and ſatisfactory oblations that were offered for ſins, were called Aſhemoth. Which word properly ſignifieth ſin it ſelf. By which figurative change of name, the holy Ghoſt meant to ſhew, that they were like unto cleanſing plaiſters to draw out to themſelves, and bear the curſe due to ſin. But the ſame which was figuratively repreſented in the ſacrifices of Moſes, is indeed delivered in Chriſt the original pattern of all the figures. Wherefore he, (Iſa. liii. 5. and 21.) to perform a perfect expiation, gave his own ſoul to be an aſham, that is a ſatisfactory oblation, as the prophet calleth it, upon which our filth and puniſhment might be caſt, and ſo ceaſe to be imputed to us. The apoſtle teſtifieth (2 Cor. v. 21.) the ſame thing more plainly, where he teacheth that he who knew no ſin, was by his Father made ſin for us, that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him. For the Son of God being moſt clean from all fault, did yet put upon him the reproach and ſhame of our iniquities, and on the other ſide covered us with his cleanneſs. It ſeemeth that he meant the ſame when he ſpeaketh of ſin, that ſin was condemned in his fleſh. For the Father deſtroyeth the force of ſin, when the curſe thereof was removed, and laid upon the fleſh of Chriſt. It is therefore declared declared by this saying, (Rom. viii. 3.) that Christ was in his death offered up to his Father for a satisfactory sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sin being ended by his sacrifice, we might cease to dread the wrath of God. Now it is plain, what that saying of the prophet (Isa. liii. 6.) meaneth, that the iniquities of us all were laid upon him, that is, that he intending to wipe away the filthiness of our iniquities, was himself as it were by way of interchanged imputation, covered with them. Of this, the cross wherenunto he was fastened was a token, as the apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) Gal. iii. 13. redeemed us from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for us. For it is written: Cursed is every one that hangeth (Deut. xxvii. 26.) on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had (1 Pet. ii. 24.) Peter respect unto, where he teacheth that Christ did bear our sins upon the tree. Because by the very token of the curse we do more plainly learn that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid upon him. And yet it is not so to be understood, that he took upon him such a curse, wherewith himself was overloaden, but rather that in taking it upon him, he did tread down, break and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiveth acquittal in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doth not without a cause honourably report the triumph that Christ obtained to himself on the cross, as if the cross which was full of shame, had been turned into a chariot of triumph. For he saith, (Col ii. 19.) that the hand writing which was against us, was fastened to the cross, and the princely powers were spoiled and led openly. And no wonder: because (as the other apostle testifieth Heb. ix. 17.) Christ offered up himself by the eternal spirit. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take deep root, and be throughly settled in our hearts, let us always think upon his sacrifice and washing. For we could not certainly believe that Christ was the ransom, redemption, and satisfaction, unless he had been a sacrificed offering. And therefore there is so often mention made of blood, where the scripture sheweth the manner of our redemption. Altho' the blood of Christ, that was shed, served, not only for sacrifice, but also in stead of washing, to cleanse away our filthiness.

Two benefits by Christ's dying

7. It followeth in the creed, that he was dead and buried. Where again it is to be seen, how he did every where put himself in our stead, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held us bound under his yoke. Christ in our stead did yield himself into the power of death, to deliver us from it. This the apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to pass that we should not die, or, (which is all one) by his death he did redeem life for us. But in this he differed from us, that he gave himself to death, as it were to be devoured, not that he should be swallowed up with the gulfs of it, but rather that he should swallow up it, of which we should have been presently swallowed: that he gave himself to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he should overthrow death which approached near us, yea, and had already beaten us down and triumphed upon us. Finally, (Heb. ii. 19.) that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and might deliver them that by fear of death were all their life long subject to bondage. This is the first fruit that his death did bring us. Another is that by our participating of him, he mortifieth our earthly members, that they should no more hereafter use their own works: and killeth our old man, that it should no more live and bear fruit. And to the same purpose pertaineth his burial, that we being partakers thereof, should also be buried to sin. For when the apostle teacheth (Gal. ii. 19. and vi. 14.) that we are grafted into the likeness of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sin, that by his cross the world was crucified to us, and we to the world, that we are dead together with him, he doth not only exhort us to express (Col. iii. 3.) the example of Christ's death, but he declareth that there is such effectualness in it, as ought to appear in all christians, unless they will make his death unprofitable and fruitless. Therefore in the death and burial of Christ, there is offered us a double benefit to be enjoyed, that is deliverance from death, to which we were become bond, and the mortifying of our flesh.

8. But it is not meet to pass over his descending to hell, wherein is no small importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the old fathers, that that part which is read in Christ's descending into hell a necessary article of our faith, whereby to understand his lying

the Creed was not in old time so much used in the churches: yet in treating of the sum of our doctrine, it is necessary that it have a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a very profitable mystery of a very important matter, which ought not to be despised. And there are also some of the old writers that do not leave it out. Whereby we may guess, that it was after a certain time added, and did not presently but by little and little grow in use in the churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceeded of the common judgment of all the godly: for as much as their is none of the fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christ's going down to hell, although after divers manner of exposition. But by whom, or at what time it was first added, maketh little to the purpose. But rather in the creed this is to be taken heed unto, that we therein certainly have a full and in all points a perfect sum of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thrust, but that which is taken out of the most pure word of God. Now, if any will not for precise curiosity admit it into the Creed, yet it shall straightway be made to appear plainly, that it is of so great importance to the sum of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is lost a great part of the fruit of the death of Christ. There are again some who think, that there is no new thing spoken in this article, but that in other words the same thing is repeated which was spoken before of his burial: for as much as the word infernum, hell, is in the scripture oftentimes used for the grave. I grant that to be true, which they allege of the signification of the word, that hell is oftentimes taken for the grave: but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily persuaded to dissent from them. For what an idleness were it, when a thing not hard to understand, hath once been set out in plain and easy words, afterwards with darker implication of words, rather to point towards it than to declare it. For when two manners of speaking that express one thing be joined together, it behoveth that the later be an exposition of the former. But what an exposition were this, if a man should say thus: whereas it is said that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went down to hell? Again it is not likely that such a superfluous vain repetition could have crept into this abridgement, wherein the chief points of our faith are summarily noted in as few words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall have somewhat diligently weighed the matter itself will easily agree with me.

To take hell for a lake where the souls of the fathers were who died before Christ is a fabulous vanity.

9. Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went down to the souls of the fathers that died in the time of the law, to carry them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliver them out of prison wherein they were kept inclosed: and to prove this, they do wrongfully draw testimonies out of (Psal. x. 16.) that he brake the brazen gates and iron bars. Again, out of Zachariah, ix. 11. that he redeemed them that were bound out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalm speaketh of their deliverances that in far countries are cast captive into bonds, and Zachariah compareth the overthrow of Babylon, wherein the people was oppressed, to a dry pit or bottomless depth, and therewithal teacheth that the salvation of the whole church is as it were a coming out of the deep hell. I know not how it is come to pass, that they who came after thought that there was a certain place under the earth to which they have given the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day many do earnestly defend it for a truth; is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to inclose the souls of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what need was it that Christ's soul should go down thither to set them at liberty? I do indeed willingly confess, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had only tasted of by hope, was then delivered to the world. And to this purpose may the place of Peter (1 Pet. iii. 19.) be probably applied, where he saith, that Christ came and preached to the spirits that were in a dungeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very process of the text leadeth us to this, that the faithful who were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth thereby amplify the force of Christ's death, for that it pierced even to the dead, when the godly souls enjoyed the present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appear to the reprobate that they were excluded from all salvation. But whereas Peter in his saying maketh no distinction between them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the the godly and ungodly without difference: but only he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

By his descending into hell, his feeling the rigour of God's vengeance and his wrestling in soul with infernal horror must be understood.

10. But concerning Christ's going down to hell, beside the consideration of the Creed, we must seek for a more certain exposition, and we assuredly have such a one out of the word of God, as is not only holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christ's death had been to no effect, if he had suffered only a corporal death: but it behoved also that he should feel the rigour of God's vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath and satisfy his just judgment. For which cause also it behoved that he should as it were hand to hand wrestle with the armies of hell, and the horror of eternal death. We have even now alleged out of the prophet (Isa. liii. 5.) that the chastisement of our peace was laid upon him: that he was striken of his Father for our sins, and bruised for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the stead of sinners, as surety and pledge, yea, and as the very guilty person himself, to abide and suffer all the punishments that should have been laid upon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden still of the sorrows of death. Therefore it is no wonder if it be said (Acts ii. 24.) that he went down to hell, since he suffered that death wherewith God in his wrath striketh evil doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be scorned, who say, that by this exposition the order is perverted, because it were an absurdity to set that after his burial which went before it. For after the setting forth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that invisible and incomprehensible judgment which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should know that not only the body of Christ was given to be the price of our redemption; but that there was another greater and more excellent price paid in this, that in his soul he suffered the terrible torments of a damned and forsaken man.

Christ sorrowed, feared, cryed, feeling the very torments which they do whose enemy God is, although God were not his enemy. If he had not done this, where were our comfort?

11. According to this meaning doth Peter say, (Acts ii. 24.) that Christ rose again having loosed the sorrows of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or overcome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresseth that the Son of God was wrapped in the sorrows of death, which proceeded from the curse and wrath of God, which is the original of death. For how small a matter had it been, carelessly as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true proof of his infinite mercy, not to shun that death which he so sore trembled at. And without doubt the same is the apostle's meaning to teach, in the epistle to the Hebrews where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his own Fear: some translate it reverence or pity, but how unfitly, both the matter itself, and the very manner of speaking proveth. Christ therefore praying with tears and mighty cries, is heard of his own fear: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed up of death as a sinner: because in that place he had put our person upon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadful bottomless depth than for a man to feel himself forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth upon him, even as if God himself had conspired to his destruction. Even thither we see that Christ was thrown down, so far that by enforcement of distress he was compelled to cry out; (Mat. xxvii. 46.) my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would have it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of others, than as he felt in himself: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is evident, that this saying proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottom of his heart. Yet do we not mean thereby, that God was at any time his enemy or angry with him. For how could he be angry with his beloved Son, upon whom his mind rested? Or how could Christ (Vide Cyril. lib. 2. de rect. fide. ad regi.) by his intercession appease his Father's wrath towards others, having him hatefully bent against himself? But this is our meaning: that he suffered the grievousness of God's rigour, for that he being stricken and tormented with the hand of God, did feel all the tokens of God when he is angry and punisheth. Whereupon Hilariy argueth thus, that by this going down we have obtained this, that death is slain. And in other places he agreeth with our judgment, as where he saith: the cross, death, and hell are our life. Again, in another place: the Son of God is in the hell, but man is carried up to heaven. But why do I allege the testimony of a private man, when the apostle affirmeth the same, mentioning this for a fruit of his victory, that they were delivered which were by fear of death all their life long subject to bondage? It behoved therefore, that he should overcome that fear, that naturally doth continually torment and oppress all mortal men: which could not be done but by fighting with it. Moreover, that his fear was no common fear or conceived upon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainly appear. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the devil, with the horror of death, with the pains of hell, it came to pass, that he both had the victory of them, and triumphed over them, that we now in death should no more fear those things, which our prince hath swallowed up.

Their reasons frivolous who can not like this interpretation of Christ's descending into hell, as if it were a disgrace unto him to be made subject unto such passions.

12. Here some lewd men, although unlearned, yet rather moved by malice than by ignorance, cry out that I do a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against reason, that he should be fearful for the salvation of his soul. And then they more strongly enforce this cavil, with saying, that I ascribe to the Son of God desperation, which is contrary to faith. First they do but maliciously move controversy of Christ's fear and trembling, which the evangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirit and struck with heaviness, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for fear. If they say that he did but counterfeit, that is too foul a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truly teacheth, boldly confess the sorrowfulness of Christ, unless we be ashamed of his cross. And truly, if his soul had not been partaker of pain, he had been only a Redeemer for our bodies. But it behoved that he should wrestle, to raise up them that lay thrown down. And his heavenly glory is so nothing impaired thereby, that even herein gloriously shineth his goodness which is never sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weakness upon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorrows, which the apostle setteth before us: that this Mediator did feel our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour us in misery. They say: that that thing which is evil of it self, is unworthily ascribed unto Christ. As though they were wiser than the Spirit of God, which joineth these two things together, (Heb. iv. 15.) that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that he was without sin. Therefore there is no cause that the weakness of Christ should make us afraid, whereunto he was not by violence or necessity compelled, but by mere love of us, and by mercy was led to submit himself. And whatsoever he of his own will suffered for us, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backbiters deceived, that they do not perceive in Christ an infirmity clean and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himself within the bounds of obedience. For whereas there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affections do with troublesome violence exceed all measure, they do wrong to measure the form of God by that standard. But when man was in his uncorrupted state, then there was a moderation having force in all his affections, to restrain excess. Whereby it might well be that he was like unto us in sorrow, dread, and fearfulness, and yet that by this mark he differed from us. Being so confuted, they have recourse to another cavil, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse and wrath of God from which he knew himself to be safe. But let the godly readers weigh how honourable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more fearful than the most part of the very dregs of men. Thieves and other evil doers do obstinately hasten to death, many do with haughty courage despise it, some others do mildly suffer it. But what constancy or stout courage were it for the Son of God to be astonished and in a manner struck dead with the fear of it? For even that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemency of grief, even drops of blood did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shew to the eyes of others, but when in a secret corner whither he was gone out of company, he groaned unto his Father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needful that he should have angels to come down from heaven to relieve him with an unwonted manner of comforting. How shameful a tenderness, as I said, should this have been, to be so far tormented for fear of common death, as to melt in bloody sweat, and not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of angels? What? doth not that prayer thrice repeated, (Matth. xxvi. 39.) Father if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitterness of heart, shew that Christ had a more cruel and harder battle than with common death? Whereby appeareth that those thoſe triflers againſt whom I now diſpute, do boldly babble upon things that they know not, becauſe they never earneſtly conſidered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we be redeemed from the judgment of God. But this is our wiſdom, well to underſtand how dear our ſalvation did coſt the Son of God. Now if a man ſhould aſk me, if Chriſt went then down to hell, when he prayed to eſcape that death: I anſwer, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grievous and terrible torments he ſuffered, when he knew himſelf to ſtand to be arraigned for our cauſe before the judgment ſeat of God. But although for a moment of time, the divine power of the Spirit did hide itſelf to give place to the weakneſs of the fleſh: yet muſt we know, that the temptation by feeling of ſorrow and fear was ſuch as was not againſt faith. And ſo was that fulfilled which is in the ſermon of Peter, Acts ii. 24. that he could not be holden of the ſorrows of death, becauſe when he felt himſelf as it were forſaken of God, yet he did nothing at all ſwerve from the truſt of his goodneſs. Which is proved by that his notable calling upon God, when for extremity of pain he cried out, Matth. xxvii. 47. My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? For though he was above meaſure grieved, yet he ceaſeth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forſaken. Moreover hereby is confuted as well the error of Apollinaris, and theirs that were called Monothelites. Apollinaris, imagined that Chriſt had an eternal ſpirit inſtead of a ſoul, ſo that he was only but half a man. As though he could cleanſe our ſins any other way, but by obeying his Father. But where is that affection or will of obedience but in the ſoul? which ſoul of his we know was troubled for this purpoſe, to drive away fear, and bring peace and quietneſs to our ſoul. Again, for confuſion of the Monothelites, we ſee how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to ſpeak how he did ſubdue the foreſaid fear with a contrary affection. For herein is a plain ſhew of contrariety. John xii. 27. Father deliver me from this hour. But even for this end I came even unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. In which perplexity yet was there no ſuch outrage in him as is ſeen in us, even then when we moſt of all endeavour to ſubdue ourſelves.

13. Now followeth his reſurrection from the dead, without which all that we have hitherto were but imperfect. For ſince there appeareth in the croſs, death, and burial of Chriſt nothing but weakneſs: faith muſt paſs beyond all thoſe things, that it may be furniſhed with full ſtrength. Therefore altho' we have in his death a full accompliſhment of ſalvation, becauſe by it we are both reconciled to God, and his juſt judgment is ſatisfied, and the curſe taken away, and the penalty fully paid: yet we are ſaid to be regenerate into a living hope, not by his death, but by his riſing again. For as he in riſing again roſe up the vanquiſher of death, ſo the victory of our faith conſiſteth in the very reſurrection: but how this is, is better expreſſed in the words of Paul. Rom. iv. 25. For he ſaith that Chriſt died for our ſins, and was raiſed up again for our juſtification: as if he ſhould have ſaid, that by his death ſin was taken away, and by his riſing again, righteouſneſs was renewed and reſtored. For how could he by dying deliver us from death, if he himſelf had lyen ſtill overcome by death? How could he have gotten victory for us, if himſelf had been vanquiſhed in fight? Wherefore we do ſo part the matter of our ſalvation between the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, that by his death we ſay, ſin was taken away and death deſtroyed, and by his reſurrection righteouſneſs was repaired, and life raiſed up again: but ſo that by means of his reſurrection, his death doth ſhew forth its force and effect unto us. Therefore Paul affirmeth that in his very reſurrection he was declared the Son of God, becauſe then at laſt he diſcovered his heavenly power, which is both a clear glaſs of his Godhead, and a firm pillar of our faith. As alſo in another place he teacheth, 1 Cor. xiii. 4. that Chriſt ſuffered after the weakneſs of the fleſh, and roſe again by the power of the ſpirit. And in the ſame meaning in another, where he treateth of perfection, he ſaith: Phil. iii. 10. That I may know him and the power of his reſurrection. Yet ſoon after he adjoineth the fellowſhip with death. With which that ſaying of Peter very well agreeth: 1 Pet. i. 21. that God raiſed him up from the dead and gave him glory, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being ſupported by his death ſhould waver, but that the power of God, which keepeth us in the faith, doth principally ſhew itſelf in the reſurrection. Therefore let us remember, that ſo oft as mention is made of his death only, there is alſo comprehended that which properly belongeth to his reſurrection: and the ſame figure of comprehenſion is there in the word Reſurrection, as oft as it is uſed ſeparately without ſpeaking of his death, ſo that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But foraſmuch as by riſing again he obtained the crown of conqueſt, ſo that there ſhould be both reſurrection and life: therefore Paul doth for good cauſe affirm, 1 Cor. xv. 17. that our faith is deſtroyed, and the goſpel is become vain and deceitful, if the reſurrection of Chriſt be not fixed in our hearts. Therefore in another place, Rom. viii. 34. after he had gloried in the death of Chriſt againſt all the terrors of damnation, to amplify the ſame, he ſaith further: Yea, the ſame Jeſus who died is riſen up again, and now ſtandeth a Mediator for us in the preſence of God. Furthermore, as we have before declared that upon the partaking of his croſs depends the mortification of our fleſh: ſo is it to be underſtood, that by his reſurrection we obtain another benefit which anſwereth that mortification. For (ſaith the apoſtle) Rom. vi. 4. we are therefore planted into the likeneſs of his death, that being partakers of his reſurrection, we may walk in newneſs of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Chriſt, to prove that we ought to mortify our members upon earth: Col. iii. 5. likewiſe alſo becauſe we are riſen up with Chriſt, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to ſeek for thoſe things that are above, and not thoſe that are upon the earth. By which words (Col. iii. 1.) we are not only exhorted to be raiſed up after the example of Chriſt, to follow a newneſs of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate into righteouſneſs. We obtain alſo a third fruit of his reſurrection, that we are, as by an earneſt delivered us, aſſured of our own reſurrection, of which we know that his reſurrection is a moſt certain argument. Whereof he diſputeth more at large in the fifteenth chapter of his epiſtle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be obſerved, that it is ſaid, that he roſe again from the dead: in which ſaying is expreſſed the truth both of his death and of his reſurrection: as if it had been ſaid, that he did both die the ſame death that other men naturally do die, and received immortality in the ſame fleſh which he had put on mortal.

14. To his reſurrection is not unfitly adjoined his aſcending into heaven. For although Chriſt began more fully to ſet forth his glory and power by riſing again, becauſe he had now laid away that baſe and unnoble ſtate of mortal life, and the ſhame of the croſs: yet by his aſcending up into heaven only, he truly began his kingdom. Which the Apoſtle (Eph. 4. 10.) ſheweth where he teacheth, that Chriſt aſcended to fulfil all things. Wherein ſeeming of repugnancy he ſheweth that there is a goodly agreement: becauſe he ſo departed from us, that yet his preſence might be more profitable to us, which had been ſhut up in a baſe lodging of the fleſh, while he was converſant in earth. And therefore John, (Joh. vii. 37.) after that he had rehearſed that notable calling, If any thirſt let him come to me, &c. by and by ſaith, that the holy Ghoſt was not yet given to the faithful, becauſe Jeſus was not yet glorified. Which the Lord himſelf did alſo teſtify to the Diſciples, ſaying, (John xvi. 7.) It is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not go away, the holy Ghoſt ſhall not come. But he giveth them a comfort for his corporal abſence, that he will not leave them as parentleſs, but will come again to them after a certain manner, indeed inviſible, but yet more to be deſired, becauſe they were then taught by more aſſured experience, that the authority which he enjoineth, and the power which he uſeth, is ſufficient for the faithful, not only to make them live bleſſedly but alſo to die happily. And truly we ſee how much greater abundance of his ſpirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then advanced his kingdom, how much greater power he then ſhewed, both in helping his, and in overthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken up into heaven, he took away the preſence of his body out of our ſight: not to ceaſe to be preſent with the faithful that yet wandered in the earth, but with more preſent power to govern both heaven and earth. But rather the ſame that he had promiſed, that he would be with us to the end of the world, he performed by this his aſcending, by which as his body was lifted up above all heavens, ſo his power and effectual working was poured and ſpread abroad beyond all the bounds of heaven and earth. But this I had rather declare in Auguſtine's words, (Tract in Evan. Johan. 109.) than mine own. Chriſt (ſaith he) was to go by death to the right hand of the Father, from whence he is to come to judge the quick and the dead: and that likewiſe in bodily preſence, according to the ſound doctrine and rule of faith. For in ſpiritual preſence with them, he was to come after his aſcenſion. And in another place more largely and plainly: according to an unſpeakable and inviſible grace is that fulfilled which he had ſpoken: Matth. xxviii. 20. Behold I am with you all the days, even to the end of the world. But according to the fleſh which the Word took took upon him, according to that that he was born of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Jews, that he was faſtened on the tree, that he was taken down from the croſs, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was laid in the grave that he was openly ſhewed in his riſing again: this was fulfilled, Ye ſhall not always have me with you. Why ſo? becauſe he was converſant (Acts i. 3, and 9.) according to the preſence of his body forty days with his diſciples, and they being in his company, ſeeing him, not following him, he aſcended into heaven, and is not here, for he ſitteth there at the right hand of his Father: and is here, for he is not gone away in preſence of majeſty. Therefore according to the preſence of his majeſty, (Matth. xvi.) we always have Chriſt: according to the preſence of his fleſh, it was truly ſaid to his diſciples, but me ye ſhall not always have. For the church had him a few days according to the preſence of his fleſh, but now ſhe holdeth him by faith, but ſeeth him not with eyes.

15. Wherefore, it by and by followeth, that he is ſat down at the right hand of his father: which is ſpoken by way of ſimilitude, taken of princes that have their ſitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and govern in their ſtead, So it is ſaid, that Chriſt in whom the father will be exalted and reign by his hand, was received to ſit at his right hand as if it had been ſaid, that he was inveſted in the dominion of heaven and earth, ſolemnly entred upon the poſſeſſion of the government committed unto him, and that he not only entred upon it, but alſo continueth in it till he come down to judgment. For ſo doth the Apoſtle (Phil. ii. 9.) expound it, when he ſaith thus: The father hath ſet him at his right hand, above all principality and power, and ſtrength and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but in the world to come, &c. (1 Cor. xv, 27.) He hath put all things under his feet, (Eph. iv. 15.) and hath given him to be head of the church above all things. Now you ſee to what purpoſe belongeth that ſitting, Act, 2. 30. and 3. 21. that is, that all creatures both heavenly and earthly may with admiration look upon his majeſty, be governed with his hand, behold his countenance, and be ſubject to his power. And the Apoſtles mean nothing elſe when they ſo oft rehearſe it, but to teach that all things are left to his will. Therefore they think not rightly, who think that bleſſedneſs is only meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Acts, Stephen teſtifieth (Acts vii. 56.) that he ſaw him ſtanding, becauſe we ſpake not here of the geſture of his body, but of the majeſty of his dominion: ſo that to ſit is nothing elſe, but to be chief judge in the heavenly judgment ſeat.

Three collections of faith out of Chriſt's aſcending and ſitting in heaven.

16. Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit: For it learneth, that the Lord by his aſcending into heaven, hath opened the entry of the heavenly kingdom, which before had been ſtopped up by Adam. For when he entred into it in our fleſh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apoſtle ſaith, that we do already in him after a certain manner ſit in heaven, For that we do not with bare hope look for heaven, but already in our head we poſſeſs it. Moreover faith perceiveth that he ſitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a ſanctuary not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father (Heb. 7. 25. and 9. 11.) a continual advocate and interceſſor for us: he ſo turneth the father's eyes to his righteouſneſs, that he turneth them away from our ſins: (Rom. 8. 34.) He ſo reconcileth his mind unto us, that by his interceſſion he prepareth us a way and paſſage to his throne, filling it with grace and mercifulneſs, which otherwiſe would have been full of horror to wretched ſinners. Thirdly, faith conceiveth his power, wherein conſiſteth our ſtrengh, might, wealth, and glorying againſt hell. For (Eph. iv. 6.) aſcending into heaven he led captivity captive, and ſpoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with abundance of ſpiritual riches. He ſitteth therefore on high, that from thence pouring out his power unto us, he may quicken us to a ſpiritual life, ſanctify with his ſpirit, and beautify his church with the divers gifts of his grace, preſerve it ſafe againſt all harm by his protection, reſtrain with the ſtrength of his hand the raging enemies of his croſs and of our ſalvation: finally, hold all power, both in heaven and earth, till he hath overthrown all his enemies who are alſo our enemies, and made perfect the building up of his church. And this is the true ſtate of his kingdom: this is the power that his father hath given him, till he make an end of the laſt act, when he cometh to judge the quick and the dead.

His coming to judge quick and dead at the laſt day.

17. Chriſt doth indeed here ſhew to them that are his, plain proofs of his power preſent among them: but becauſe under the baſeneſs of fleſh his kingdom doth in a manner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cauſe is faith called to think think upon that visible presence, which he will openly shew at the last day. For he shall in visible form come down from heaven, even such as he was seen to go up: and he shall appear to all men with unspeakable majesty of his kingdom, with bright glistering of immortality, with infinite power of Godhead, with a guard of angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to look for him to come our Redeemer at that day, when he shall severe the lambs from the goats, the chosen from the forsaken: and there shall be none of all either the quick or the dead, that shall escape his judgment, for from the furthest corners of the world shall be (Matth. xxv. 31.) heard the sound of the trumpet, wherewith all shall be called to his judgment seat, (1 Thes. iv. 16.) both they that shall be found alive at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the company of the quick. Some there are who in this place expound the words of the quick and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the old writers did stick in doubt upon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaid meaning is plain and easy to be understood; so doth it better agree with the Creed which is evident that it was written according to the capacity of the common people. (Heb. ix. 17.) And herewith nothing disagreeth that which the apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they who shall remain in mortal life at the last judgment shall not die after a natural manner and order; yet that change which they shall suffer, because it shall be like a death, is not unproperly called death. It is indeed certain, (1 Cor. xv. 51.) that not all shall sleep, but all shall be changed. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortal life shall perish and be swallowed up and be utterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of the flesh no man can deny to be a death: and yet in the mean time it remaineth true, that the quick and the dead shall be summoned to the judgment: (1 Thes. iv. 16.) because the dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they that shall remain and be living, shall with them be suddenly taken up into the air to meet the Lord. And truly it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, (Acts x. 42.) which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemn protestation of Paul to Timothy.

A comfort to us to know that our Saviour shall be our judge.

18. Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we hear that he is judge, which hath already appointed us partners with him in judging: so far is it off, that he will go up into the judgment seat to condemn us. For how should the most merciful prince destroy his own people? how should the head scatter abroad his own members? how should the patron condemn his own clients? For if the apostle (Rom. v. 33.) dare cry out, that while Christ is intercessor for us, there can none come forth that can condemn us: it is much more true, that Christ himself being our intercessor, will not condemn them whom he hath received into his charge and tuition. It is truly no small assuredness, that we shall be brought before no other judgment seat, but of our own Redeemer, from whom our salvation is to be looked for: moreover that he who now by the gospel promiseth eternal blessedness, shall then by sitting in judgment perform his promise. Therefore to this end (John v. 22.) the Father hath honoured the Son, in giving him all judgment, that so he hath provided for the consciences of them that are his, trembling for fear of the judgment. Hitherto I have followed the order of the Apostles Creed, because whereas it shortly in few words containeth the chief articles of our redemption, it may serve us for a table, wherein we do distinctly and separately see those things that are in Christ worthy to be taken heed unto. I call it the Apostles Creed, not carefully regarding who were the authors of it. It is truly by great consent of the old writers ascribed to the apostles, either because they thought that it was by common travel written and set out by the Apostles; or for that they judged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, delivered by the hands of the Apostles, was worthy to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whencesoever it proceeded at the first, it hath even from the first beginning of the church, and from the very time of the Apostles, been used as a public confession, and received by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not privately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is evident that even from the farthest age it hath always continued of sacred authority and credit among all the godly. But that thing which is only to be cared for, we have wholly out of controversy, that the whole history of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing contained in it, that is not sealed with sound testimonies of scripture. Which being understood, it is to no purpose either curiously curiously to doubt, or to strive with any man who was the author of it: unless perhaps it be not enough for some man to be assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but that he do also understand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hand it was written.

All good things to be sought and found in Christ alone.

19. But forasmuch as we do see, that the whole sum of our salvation, and all the parts thereof, are comprehended in Christ, we must beware, that we do not draw away from him any part thereof be it never so little. If we seek for salvation, we are taught by the very name of Jesus (Acts iv. 12.) that it is in him, if we seek for any other gifts of the spirit, (1 Cor. i. 30.) they are to be found in his anointing, if we seek for strength, it is in his dominion: if we seek for cleanness, it is in his conception: if we seek for tender kindness, it sheweth it self in his birth, whereby he was made in all things like unto us, that he might learn to sorrow with us: if we seek for redemption, it is in his passion; if we seek for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if we seek for release of the curse, it is in his cross: if we seek for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if we seek for cleansing, it is in his blood: if we seek for reconciliation, in his going down to hell: if we seek for mortification of the flesh, it is in his burial: if we seek for newness of life, it is in his resurrection: if we seek for immortality, it is in the same: if we seek for the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven, it is in his entrance into heaven: if we seek for defence, for assuredness, for plenty and store of all good things, it is in his kingdom: if we seek for a dreadless looking for the judgment, it is in the power given to him to judge. Finally, since the treasures of all sorts of good things are in him, let us draw thence and from no where else, even till we be full withal. For they who being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into divers hopes, although they have principal regard to him, yet even in this they are out of the right way, that they turn any part of their knowlege to any other where. Although such distrust cannot creep in where the abundance of his good gifts hath once been known.

CHAP. XVII.

That it is truly and properly said, that Christ hath deserved God's favour and salvation for us.

Christ's meriting our salvation is not opposite to God's free bestowing it, but both are repugnant unto our deserving.

THIS question is also to be resolved for an addition. For there are some subtile men after a wrong manner, who although they confess that we obtain salvation by Christ, yet cannot abide to hear the name of deserving, by which they think the grace of God is obscured: and so they will have Christ to be only the instrument, or minister, not the author, guide, or prince of life, as Peter (Acts iii. 20.) calleth him. Indeed I confess, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himself against the judgment of God, then there shall be no room for deserving: because there cannot be found in man any worthiness that may deserve the favour of God. But as Augustine (Lib. 1. de præ. sanctorum.) most truly writeth, the most clear light of predestination and grace is our Saviour himself, the man Christ Jesus, who hath obtained so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deservings of works or of faith going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same man deserved to be taken up by the word that is co-eternal with the Father into one person, and so to be the only begotten Son of God. Let therefore appear in our head the very fountain of grace, from whom according to the measure of every one, it floweth abroad into all his members. By that grace every one from the beginning of his faith is made a christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ. Again in another place: (De bono perseverant, ca. ult.) there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediator himself. For he who made of the seed of David a man righteous that never should be unrighteous, without any deserving of his will going before, even the same he doth of unrighteous make them righteous that are members of that head: and so on as there followeth. Therefore when we speak of Christ's deserving, we do not say that in him is the beginning of deserving, but we ascend to the ordinance of God, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his own mere good will appointed him Mediator, to purchase salvation for us. And so is the deserving of Christ unfitly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one under another do not disagree. And therefore it may well ſtand together, that man's juſtification is free by the mere mercy of God, and, that there alſo the deſerving of Chriſt come between which is contained under the mercy of God. But againſt our works are aptly ſet, as directly contrary, both the free favour of God, and the obedience of Chriſt, either of them in their degree. For Chriſt could not deſerve any thing but by the good pleaſure of God, and but becauſe he was appointed to this purpoſe, with his ſacrifice to appeaſe the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a ſum: becauſe the deſerving of Chriſt depends entirely upon the nearer grace of God, which appointed us this mean of ſalvation, therefore as well the ſame deſerving, as that grace, is fitly ſet againſt all the works of men.

The grace of God hath appointed the worthineſs of his Son for a mean to make us ſons, who in our ſelves are by nature enemies.

2. This diſtinction is gathered out of many places of the ſcripture. (John 3. 16.) God ſo loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him ſhall not periſh. We ſee how the love of God holdeth the firſt place, as the ſovereign cauſe original, and then followeth faith in Chriſt, as the ſecond or nearer cauſe. If any man take exception and ſay, that Chriſt is but the formal cauſe, he doth more diminiſh his power than the words may bear. For if we obtain righteouſneſs by faith that reſteth upon him, then is the matter of our ſalvation to be ſought in him, which is in many places plainly proved. Not that we firſt loved him, but he firſt loved us, and ſent his Son to be the propitiation for our ſins. In theſe words is clearly ſhewed, that God to the end that nothing ſhould withſtand his love toward us, appointed us a mean to be reconciled in Chriſt. And this word propitiation is of great weight; becauſe God after a certain unſpeakable manner, even the ſame time that he loved us, was alſo angry with us, until he was reconciled in Chriſt. And to this purpoſe ſerve all thoſe ſayings: (1 John ii. 2.) He is the propitiation for our ſins. Again: (Col. i. 20.) It pleaſed God by him to reconcile all things to himſelf, appeaſing himſelf through the blood of the Croſs by him, &c. Again, (2 Cor. v. 19.) God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world to himſelf, not imputing to men their ſins. Again, (Eph. ii. 16.) he accepted us in his beloved Son. Again, That he might reconcile both to God into one man by the Croſs. The reaſon of this myſtery is to be fetched out of the firſt chapter to the Epheſians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were choſen in Chriſt, addeth therewithal, that we have obtained favour in him. How did God begin to embrace with his favour them whom he loved before the making of the world, but becauſe he uttered his love when he was reconciled by the blood of Chriſt? For ſince God is the fountain of all righteouſneſs, it muſt needs be, that man ſo long as he is a ſinner, have God his enemy and his Judge. Wherefore the beginning of his love is righteouſneſs, ſuch as is deſcribed by Paul: (1 Cor. v. 21.) He made him that had done no ſin, to be ſin for us, that we might be the righteouſneſs of God in him. For he meaneth, that we have obtained free righteouſneſs by that ſacrifice of Chriſt, that we ſhould pleaſe God, who by nature are the children of wrath and by ſin eſtranged from him. But this diſtinction is alſo meant ſo oft as the grace of Chriſt is joined to the love of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giveth us of his own that which he hath purchaſed: for otherwiſe it would not agree with him, that this praiſe is given him diſtinctly from his Father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

Chriſt in his obedience, righteouſneſs and death hath purchaſed and merited our ſalvation.

3. But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Chriſt by his obedience hath purchaſed us favour with his father. For this I take for a thing confeſſed, that if Chriſt hath ſatisfied for our ſins, if he hath ſuffered the puniſhment due unto us, if by his obedience he hath appeaſed God, finally, if he being righteous, hath ſuffered for the unrighteous, then is ſalvation purchaſed for us by his righteouſneſs: which is as much in effect as to deſerve it. But as Paul (Rom. v. 11.) witneſſeth, we are reconciled and have received reconciliation by his death. But, reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hateful by reaſon of ſin, is by the death of his Son appeaſed, ſo that he might be favourable unto us. And the compariſon of contraries that followeth a little after, is diligently to be obſerved, as by the tranſgreſſion of one man, many were made ſinners: ſo alſo by the obedience of one many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: (Rom. v. 19.) As by the ſin of Adam we are eſtranged from God and ordained to deſtruction, ſo by the obedience of Chriſt we are received into favour as righteous. And the future time of the verb doth not exclude preſent righteouſneſs, as appeareth by the proceſs of the text: For he had ſaid before, that that the free gift was of many ſins unto juſtification.

What is meant by ſaying that Chriſts deſerving purchaſed grace.

4. But when we ſay, that grace is purchaſed us by the merits of Chriſt, we mean this, that we are cleanſed by his blood, and that his death was a ſatisfaction for our ſins. John i. 5. This blood is it that is ſhed for remiſſion of ſin. If this be the effect of his bloodſhed, that ſins be not imputed unto us: it followeth, that with that price the judgment of God is ſatisfied. To which purpoſe ſerveth that ſaying of John the Baptiſt: John i. 29. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the ſin of the world. For he ſetteth in compariſon Chriſt againſt all the ſacrifices of the law, to teach, that in him only was fulfilled that which thoſe figures ſhewed. And we know, what Moſes every where ſaith: Iniquity ſhall be cleanſed, ſin ſhall be put away and forgiven. Finally, we are very well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Chriſt: and this point the Apoſtle ſetteth out in the epiſtle to the Hebrews, very fitly taking this principle, Heb. ix. 12. that remiſſion is not wrought without ſhedding of blood. Whereupon he gathereth, that Chriſt for the aboliſhing of ſin, appeared once for all by his ſacrifice. Again: that he was offered up to take away the ſins of many. And he had ſaid before, that not by the blood of goats or of calves, but by his own blood he once entered into the holy place, finding eternal redemption. Now when he thus reaſoneth: If the blood of a calf do ſanctify according to the cleanneſs of the fleſh, that much more conſciences are cleanſed by the blood of Chriſt from dead works, it eaſily appeareth that the grace of Chriſt is too much diminiſhed, unleſs we grant unto his ſacrifice the power of cleanſing, appeaſing and ſatisfying. As a little after he addeth: This is the Mediator of the new Teſtament, that they who are called may receive the promiſe of eternal inheritance by mean of death for the redemption of ſins going before, which remained under the law. But ſpecially it is convenient to conſider the relation which Paul deſcribeth, Gal. iii. 13. that he became a curſe for us, &c. For it were ſuperfluous, yea, and an abſurdity, that Chriſt ſhould be charged with a curſe, but for this intent, that he paying that which others did owe, ſhould purchaſe righteouſneſs for them. Alſo the teſtimony of Iſaiah, (Iſa. liii. 5.) is plain, that the chaſtiſement of our peace was laid upon Chriſt, and that we obtained health by his ſtripes. For if Chriſt had not ſatisfied for our ſins, it could not have been ſaid, that he appeaſed God by taking upon him the pains to which we were ſubject. Wherewith agreeth that which followeth in the ſame place: 1 Pet. ii. 24. which ſhall leave nothing doubtful: that he did bear our ſin upon the tree. For he ſaith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were delivered, was laid upon Chriſt.

5. And the Apoſtles do plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ranſom to redeem us from the guiltineſs of death. Being juſtified by his grace, thro' the redemption which is in Chriſt, whom God hath ſet forth to be a propitiation by faith which is in his blood. Rom. iii. 24. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, becauſe he hath given the price of of redemption in the death of Chriſt: and then he biddeth us to flee unto his blood, that having obtained righteouſneſs, we may ſtand boldly before the judgment of God. And to the ſame effect is that ſaying of Peter: (1 Pet. i. 18.) that we are redeemed not by gold and ſilver, but by the precious blood of the unſpotted Lamb. For the compariſon alſo would not agree, unleſs with that price ſatisfaction had been made for ſins: for which reaſon Paul (1 Cor. vi. 20) ſaith that we are preciouſly bought. Alſo that other ſaying of his, (Col. i. 14.) would not ſtand together. There is one Mediator that gave himſelf to be a redemption, unleſs the pain had been caſt upon him which we had deſerved: therefore the ſame Apoſtle defineth, (Col. i. 14.) that the redemption in the blood of Chriſt is the forgiveneſs of ſins: as if he ſhould have ſaid, that we are juſtified or acquitted before God, becauſe that blood anſwereth for ſatisfaction for us. Wherewith alſo agreeth the other place, Col. ii. 14. that the hand-writing which was againſt us, was cancelled upon the croſs. For therein is meant the payment or recompence that acquitteth us from guiltineſs. There is alſo great weight in theſe words of Paul: Gal. ii. 21. If we be juſtified by the works of the law, then Chriſt died in vain. For hereby we gather, that we muſt fetch from Chriſt that which the law would give, if any man can fulfil it: or (which is all one) that we obtain by the grace of Chriſt, that which God promiſed to our works in the law when he ſaid: Lev. xviii. 5. He that doth theſe things ſhall live in them. Which he no leſs plainly confirmeth in his ſermon made at Antioch, Acts xiii. 38. affirming that by believing in Chriſt we are juſtified from all thoſe things from which we could not be juſtified by the law of Moſes. For if the keeping of the law be righteouſneſs who can deny that Chriſt deſerved favour for us, when taking that burden upon him, he ſo reconciled us to God, as we ourſelves had kept the law? To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth that which he afterwards writeth to the Galatians: (Gal. iv. 4.) God ſent his Son ſubject to the law, that he might redeem thoſe that were under the law. For to what end ſerved that ſubmiſſion of his, but that he purchaſed to us righteouſneſs, taking upon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof cometh that imputation of righteouſneſs without works, whereof Paul ſpeaketh, Rom. iv. becauſe the righteouſneſs is reckoned to us which was found in Chriſt only. And truly for no other cauſe is the fleſh of Chriſt called our meat, John vi. 55. but becauſe we find in him the ſubſtance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing elſe, but becauſe the Son of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteouſneſs, As Paul ſaith, Eph. v. 2. that he gave himſelf a ſacrifice of ſweet ſavour. And in Rom. iv. 25. He died for our ſins, he roſe again for our juſtification. From which we may gather, that not only ſalvation is given us by Chriſt, but alſo that for his ſake his Father is now favourable unto us. For there is no doubt but that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God under a figure pronounceth by Iſaiah, ſaying, Iſa. xxxvii. 35. I will do it for mine own ſake, and for David my ſervant's ſake. Whereof the Apoſtle is a right good witneſs, where he ſaith: 1 Joh. ii. 12. Your ſins are forgiven you for his name's ſake. For tho' the name of Chriſt be not expreſſed, yet John, after his accuſtomed manner, ſignifieth him by the pronoun He. In which ſenſe alſo the Lord pronounceth; John vi. 57. As I live by the Father, ſo ſhall ye alſo live by me. Wherewith agreeth that which Paul ſaith, Phil. i. 29. It is given you becauſe of Chriſt, not only to believe on him, but alſo to ſuffer for him.

Whether Chriſt did merit for himſelf, it is both curioſity to demand and raſhneſs to anſwer.

6. But to demand, whether Chriſt deſerved for himſelf, (as Lombard, and the other ſchoolmen do) is no leſs fooliſh curioſity, than it is a raſh determination when they affirm it. For what needed the Son of God to come down to purchaſe any new thing for himſelf? And the Lord declaring his own counſel, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not ſaid, that the Father provided for the advance of his Son in his deſervings, but that he delivered him to death, and ſpared him not, becauſe he loved the world. And the prophets manners of ſpeaking are to be remarked, as, Iſa. ix. 6. A Child is born to us. Again: Rejoice, thou daughter of Zion; behold thy King cometh to thee. Alſo that confirmation of love ſhould be very cold, which Paul ſetteth out, Rom. v. 10. that Chriſt ſuffered death for his enemies. For thereupon we gather, that he had no reſpect of himſelf: and that ſame he plainly affirmeth in ſaying, John xvii. For their ſakes I ſanctify myſelf. For he that giveth away the fruit of his holineſs unto others, doth thereby teſtify that he purchaſeth nothing for himſelf. And truly this deſerves to be taken notice of, that Chriſt, to give himſelf wholly to ſave us, did after a certain manner forget himſelf. But to this purpoſe they do wrongfully draw this teſtimony: Phil. ii. 9. Therefore the Father hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, &c. For by what deſervings could man obtain to be judge of the world, and the head of the angels, and to enjoy the ſovereign dominion of God, and that in him ſhould reſt that ſame majeſty, the thouſand part whereof all the powers of men and angels cannot reach unto? But the ſolution thereof is eaſy and plain, that Paul doth not there treat of the cauſe of exalting of Chriſt, but only to ſhew the effect enſuing thereof, that it might be for an example to us. And no other thing is meant by that which is ſpoken in another place, that it behoveth that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, and ſo enter into the glory of his Father. Luke xxiv. 26.

BOOK THIRD,

Which treateth of the Manner how to receive the grace of CHRIST, and what benefits do accrue to us, and what effects follow from it.

CHAP. I.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, do profit us by the secret working of the Holy Ghost.

No benefit cometh by Christ to us till the bond of the spirit have united us unto him.

NOW it is to be seen how those good things do come unto us, which the Father hath given to his only begotten Son, not for his own private use, but to enrich them that were without them and stood in need of them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of us, and we are separated from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the salvation of mankind, is unprofitable and nothing availeth for us. Therefore that he may impart to us those things which he hath received of his Father, it behoveth that he become ours, and dwell in us. And for that cause he is called (Eph. iv. 15.) our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is said, (Rom. viii. 29.) that we are grafted into him, (Rom. xi. 17.) and did put on him. For (as I have before said) all that ever he possesseth belongeth nothing to us, (Gal. iii. 16.) until we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtain this by faith; yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference do embrace this participation of Christ, which is offered by the gospel, therefore reason itself teacheth us to ascend higher, and to enquire of the secret effectual working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to pass, that we enjoy Christ and all his good things. I have before treated of the eternal Godhead and essence of the spirit, at this present let us be content with this one special article, that Chriſt ſo came in water and blood that the Spirit ſhould teſtify of him, leaſt the ſalvation that he hath purchaſed, ſhould ſlip away from us. (1 John v. 7.) For as there are alleged three witneſſes in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, ſo are there alſo three in earth, Water, Blood, and the Spirit. And not without cauſe is the teſtimony of the Spirit twice repeated, which we feel to be engraven in our hearts inſtead of a ſeal: whereby cometh to paſs, that it ſealeth the waſhing and ſacrifice of Chriſt. After which meaning Peter alſo ſaith, (1 Pet. i. 2.) that the faithful are choſen in ſanctification of the Spirit unto obedience and ſprinkling of the blood of Chriſt. By which words he telleth us that to the intent the ſhedding of that holy blood ſhould not become void, our ſouls are cleanſed with it by the ſecret watering of the holy Spirit. Agreeably to which Paul alſo ſpeaking of cleanſing and juſtification, ſaith that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Jeſus Chriſt and in the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the ſum, that the holy Spirit is the bond wherewith Chriſt effectually bindeth us unto him. For proof of which alſo do ſerve all that we have taught in the laſt book before this, concerning his anointing.

The Spirit being Chriſt's after a peculiar manner both to have and to beſtow, is by property his in fulneſs, and in meaſure ours by gift.

2. But that this, being a matter eſpecially worthy to be known, may be made more certainly evident, we muſt bear this in mind, that Chriſt came furniſhed with the holy Spirit after a certain peculiar manner, to the end that he might ſevere us from the world, and gather us together into the hope of an eternal inheritance. For this cauſe he is called the Spirit of ſanctification, becauſe he doth not only quicken and nouriſh us with that general power which appeareth as well in mankind as in all other living creatures, but alſo is in us the root and ſeed of a heavenly life. Therefore the prophets do principally commend the kingdom of Chriſt by this title of prerogative, that then ſhould flouriſh a more plentiful abundance of the Spirit. And remarkable above all the reſt is that place of Joel: (Joel. ii. 28.) In that day I will power of my Spirit upon all fleſh. For though the prophet there ſeem to reſtrain the gifts of the Spirit to the office of prophecying, yet under a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightening of his Spirit will make thoſe his ſcholars which before were unſkilful and void of all heavenly doctrine. Now foraſmuch as God the Father doth for his Son's ſake give us his holy Spirit, and yet hath left with him the whole fulneſs thereof, to the end that he ſhould be a miniſter and diſtributer of his free goodneſs: he is ſometimes called the Spirit of the Father, and ſometimes the Spirit of the Son. (Rom. viii. 9.) Ye are not (ſaith Paul) in the fleſh, but in the Spirit, for the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man have not the Spirit of Chriſt, he is none of his. And hereupon he putteth us in hope of full renewing, for that he who raiſed up Chriſt from the dead, ſhall quicken our mortal bodies, becauſe of his Spirit dwelling in us. For it is no abſurdity, that to the Father be aſcribed the praiſe of his own gifts, whereof he is the author: (Rom. viii. 11.) and yet that the ſame be aſcribed to Chriſt, with whom the gifts of the Spirit are left, that he may give them to thoſe that are his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirſt, (John vii. 37.) to come to him to drink. And Paul teacheth (Eph. iv. 7.) that the Spirit is diſtributed to every one, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. And it is to be known, that he is called the Spirit of Chriſt, not only in reſpect that the eternal word of God is with the ſame Spirit joined with the Father, but alſo according to his perſon of Mediator, (1 Cor. xv. 45.) becauſe if he had not had that power, he had come to us in vain. After which meaning he is called the ſecond Adam given from heaven, to be a quickening Spirit: whereby Paul compareth the ſingular life that the Son of God breatheth into them that are his that they may be all one with him, with the natural life that is alſo common to the reprobate. Likewiſe where he wiſheth to the faithful the favour of Chriſt and the love of God, he joineth withal the common partaking of the Spirit, without which no man can taſte neither of the fatherly favour of God, nor of the bountifulneſs of Chriſt. As alſo he ſaith in another place: (Rom. v. 5.) the love of God is ſhed abroad in our hearts by the holy Spirit that is given us.

The titles which the ſcripture giveth the Spirit, teach that without it Chriſt is altogether dead and unprofitable unto us.

3. And here it ſhall be profitable to obſerve, with what titles the ſcripture ſetteth out the holy Spirit, where it treateth of beginning and whole reſtoring of our ſalvation. Firſt, he is called the Spirit of adoption, becauſe he is a witneſs unto us of the free good will of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced us in his beloved only begotten Son, that he

he might be a Father unto us, and doth encourage us to pray boldly, yea and doth minister unto us words to cry without fear, (Gal. iv. 6.) Abba, Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest, pledge, and seal of our inheritance, (2 Cor. i. 21.) because he so giveth life from heaven to us wandering in the world, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soul is in safe guard under the faithful keeping of God, for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteousness. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh us fruitful to bring forth the buds of righteousness, he is oftentimes called water, as in Isaiah: (Isa. lv. 1.) All ye that thirst come to the waters. Again, (Isa. xliv. 2.) I will pour out my Spirit upon the thirsty, and floods upon the dry land: wherewith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did even now allege. (John vii. 17.) If any thirst let him come to me. Although sometimes he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezekiel xxxvi. 25. where the Lord promiseth clean waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthiness. And forasmuch as he restoreth and nourisheth into lively quickness, them upon whom he hath poured the liquor of his grace, he is therefore called (1 John ii. 20.) by the name of oil and anointment. Again because in continually seething out and burning up the vices of our lust, he setteth our hearts on fire with the love of God and zeal of godliness, he is also for this effect justly called (Luke iii. 16.) fire. Finally, he is described unto us as a fountain, (John iv. 14.) from whence do flow unto us all heavenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he useth his power: because by the breath of his power he so breatheth divine life into us, that we are not now stirred by ourselves, but ruled by his stirring and moving: so that if there be any good things in us, they are the fruits of his grace: but our own gifts without him, are darkness of mind and perverseness of heart. This point is set out plainly enough, that till our minds are bent upon the holy Ghost, Christ lieth in a manner idle, because we coldly espy him without us, yea and far away from us. But we know that he profiteth none other but them whose (Eph. iv. 15.) head he is, and the (Rom. iii. 29.) first begotten among brethren, and them who have put on him. This conjoining only maketh that, as concerning us, he is come not unprofitably with the name of Saviour. And for proof of this serveth that (Gal. iii. 27.) holy marriage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirit only he maketh himself one with us: by the grace and power of the same Spirit (Eph. iii. 30.) we are made his members, so that he containeth us under him, and we again possess him.

It is the Spirit which worketh faith in our hearts.

4. But forasmuch as faith is his principal work, to it are for the most part referred all those things, that we commonly find spoken to express his force and working: because he bringeth us into the light of the gospel by nothing but by faith: as John Baptist teacheth, (John i. 13.) that this prerogative is given to them that believe in Christ, that they be the children of God who are born not of flesh and blood, but of God: where setting God against flesh and blood, he affirmeth it to be a supernatural gift that they receive Christ by faith, who otherwise should remain subject to their own infidelity. Like to which is that answer of Christ: (Matth. xix. 17.) flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven. These things I do now but shortly touch because I have already treated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, (Eph. i. 13.) that the Ephesians were sealed up with the holy Spirit of promise. For Paul sheweth that he is an inward teacher, by whose working the promise of salvation pierceth into our minds, which otherwise should but beat the air or our ears. Likewise, when he saith, that (2 Thes. i. 3.) the Thessalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the Spirit and believing of the truth: by which joining of them together, he briefly admonisheth that faith it self proceedeth from nothing else but from the holy Spirit: which thing John setteth out more plainly, saying (2 John iii. 24. and iv.) We know that there abideth in us of the Spirit which he hath given us. Again, John xiv. 7. by this we know that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit. Therefore Christ promised to his disciples the Spirit of truth which the world cannot receive, that they might be able to receive the heavenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same Spirit this proper office, to put them in mind of those things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vain should the light shew itself to the blind, unless the same spirit of understanding should open the eyes of their mind: so as a man may rightly call the holy Spirit, the key by which the treasures of the heavenly kingdom are opened unto us: and may call his enlightening, the eye-

ſight of our mind to ſee. Therefore doth St. Paul (2 Cor. iii. 6.) ſo much commend the miniſtry of the Spirit: becauſe teachers ſhould cry without profiting, unleſs Chriſt himſelf the inward maſter ſhould draw them with his Spirit that are given him by his Father. Therefore as we have ſaid, (Luke iii. 16.) that perfect ſalvation is found in the perſon of Chriſt: ſo that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize us in the holy Spirit and fire, lightening us into the faith of his goſpel, and ſo new begetting us, that we may be new creatures: and purging us from unholy filthineſs, doth dedicate us to be holy temples to God.

CHAP. II.

Of Faith, wherein both is given the definition of it, and the properties that it hath are declared.

The object of faith is not barely God, as the ſchoolmen coldly diſpute, but God diſplaying himſelf in Chriſt.

But all theſe things ſhall be eaſy to be underſtood when there ſhall have been given a plain definition of faith, that the readears may know the force and nature of it. But firſt it is proper to call to mind again thoſe things that have been already ſpoken, that ſince God doth appoint us by his law what we ought to do, if we fail in any point thereof, the ſame terrible judgment of eternal death that he pronounceth doth reſt upon us. Again, that foraſmuch as it is not only hard but altogether above our ſtrength and beyond all our power to fulfil the law if we only behold our ſelves, and weigh what eſtate is worthy for our deſervings, there is no good hope left, but we ly caſt away from God under eternal deſtruction. Thirdly, this hath been declared, that there is but one mean of deliverance to draw us out of ſo wretched a calamitiy; wherein appeareth Chriſt the Reedemer, by whoſe hand it pleaſed our heavenly father, having mercy upon us of his infinite goodneſs and clemency, to ſuccour us, ſo that we with ſound faith embrace this mercy, and with conſtant hope reſt upon it. But now it is convenient for us to weigh this, what manner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, do enter upon the poſſeſſion of the heavenly kingdom, foraſmuch as it is certain, that not every opinion, nor yet every perſuaſion is ſufficient to bring to paſs ſo great a thing. And with ſo much the more care and ſtudy muſt we look about for, and ſearch out the natural property of faith, by how much the more hurtful at this day is the error of many in this behalf. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiveth no higher thing, but a certain common aſſent to the hiſtory of the goſpel. Yea, when they diſpute of faith in the ſchools, in barely calling God the object of faith, they do nothing but (as we have ſaid in another place) by vain ſpeculation rather draw wretched ſouls out of the right way, than direct them to the true mark. For whereas (1 Tim. vi. 16.) God dwelleth in a light that none can attain to, it behoveth of neceſſity that Chriſt become mean between us and it. For which cauſe he calleth himſelf the light of the world: and in another place, (John 8. 12.) The way, the truth, and the life, becauſe no man cometh to the to the father (who is the fountain of John xiv. 6. life) but by him: becauſe he only knoweth the father, and by him the faithful to whom it pleaſeth him to diſcloſe him. According to this reaſon Paul affirmeth, (1 Cor. ii.) that he accounteth nothing excellent to be known, but Chriſt: and in the xx. Chapter of the Acts (Acts xx. 17.) he ſaith, that he preached faith in Chriſt, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Chriſt ſpeaking after this manner, I will ſend thee among the Gentiles that they may receive forgiveneſs of ſins, and an inheritance among them that are ſanctified, by the faith which is in me. And Paul teſtifieth, (2 Cor. iv. 6.) that the glory of God is in his perſon viſible unto us: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowlege of God's glory ſhineth in his face. It is true indeed, that faith hath reſpect only to the one God, but this alſo is to be added, that it acknowlege him whom he hath ſent, even Jeſus Chriſt. Becauſe God himſelf ſhould have lyen ſecret and hidden far from us, unleſs the brightneſs of Chriſt did caſt his beams upon us. For this intent the Father left all that he had with his only begotten Son, even by the communicating of good things with him to expreſs the true image of his glory. For as it is ſaid, that we muſt be drawn by the Spirit, that we may be ſtirred to ſeek Chriſt, ſo again we ought to be admoniſhed, that the inviſible Father is no where elſe to be ſought but in this image. Of which matter Auguſtine ſpeaketh excellently well, (Lib. 11. de civit. Dei. cap. 2.) who treating of the mark that faith ſhould ſhoot at, ſaith that we muſt know whither we muſt go, and which way:

way: and then by and by after he gathereth that the safest way against all errors is that he is both God and man. For it is God to whom we go, and man by whom we go: and both these are found no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul, when he speaketh of faith in God, mean to overthrow that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath its whole stay upon Christ. As Peter doth most fitly join them both together, 1 Pet. i. 21. saying that by him we believe in God.

2. Therefore this evil, even as innumerable others is to be imputed to the schoolmen, who have hidden Christ as it were with a veil drawn before him, to the beholding of whom unless we be directly bent, we shall always wander in many uncertain mazes. But beside this, that with their dark definition they do deface and in a manner bring to nought the whole force of faith, they have forged a device of unexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most gross ignorance do with great hurt deceive the silly people, yea (to say truly and plainly as the thing is indeed) this device doth not only bury but utterly destroy the true faith. Is this to believe, to understand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowlege, and that not only of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obtain salvation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoever the church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowlege God to be a merciful father to us by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is given us unto righteousness, sanctification, and life. By this knowlege, I say, not by submitting of our sense, we attain an entry into the kingdom of heaven. For when the Apostle saith, Rom. x. 10. that with the heart we believe to righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made to salvation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man unexpressedly believe that which he understandeth not, nor seeketh to learn: but he requireth an expressed acknowleging of God's goodness, in which consisteth our righteousness.

Simple men abused when they are made believe it is faith indeterminately to hold what the church holdeth, without

3. Indeed I deny not (such is the ignorance with which we are surrounded) that there now are and hereafter shall be many things wrapped and hidden from us, till having put off the burden of our flesh we come nearer to the presence of God: in which very things that are hidden from us, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our judgment, but to stay our mind in determined purpose to keep unity with the church. But under this colour to imitate ignorance tempered with humility by the name of faith, is a great absurdity. For faith lieth in the knowlege of God and of Christ, not in reverence of the church. And we see what a maze they have framed with this then hidden implication, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choice, so that it be thrust in under title of the church, is greedily received of the ignorant as it were an oracle; yea, sometimes also most monstrous errors. Which unadvised lightness of belief, whereas it is a most certain downfal to ruin, is nevertheless excused by them, for that it believeth nothing determinately, but with this condition adjoined, If the faith of the church be such. So do they feign, that truth is holden in error, light in blindness, true knowlege in ignorance. But because we will not tarry long in confuting them, we do only warn the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainness of the truth itself will of itself minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnants of ignorance, but they definitively say that they believe aright, who stand amazed in their ignorance, yea and do flatter themselves therein, so that they do agree to the authority and judgment of the church, concerning things unknown. As though the scripture did not every where teach, that with faith is joined knowlege.

Our faith as long as we live is unexpressed, yet unexpressed faith be taken for faith mingled with ignorance, of that which should ever more and more proceed on further forward with gentle willingness to learn.

4. But we do grant, that so long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expressed, not only because many things are hidden from us, but being compassed with many mists of errors, we attain not all things. For the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and more, proceed on further forward with gentle willingness to learn. Therefore Paul, Phil. iii. 15. exhorteth the faithful, if upon any thing they differ one from another, to abide for revelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be unclothed of our flesh, we attain to know less than were to be wished, and daily in reading we light upon many dark places which do convince us of ignorance. And with this bridle

God holdeth us in modesty, assigning to every one a measure of faith, that even the very best teacher may be ready to learn. And remarkable examples of this unexpressed faith, we may mark in the disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightened. We see, how they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did stick even in the smallest points, how they hanging at the mouth of their master did not yet much proceed, yea, when at the women's information they ran to the grave, the resurrection of their master was like a dream unto them. Since Christ did before bear witness of their faith, we may not say that they were utterly without faith: but rather if they had not been persuaded that Christ should rise again, all care of him would have perished in them. For it was not superstition that did draw the women to embalm with spices the corpse of a dead man, of whom there was no hope of life: but although they believed his words whom they knew to be a speaker of truth, yet the grossness that still possessed their minds so wrapped their faith in darkness, that they were in a manner amazed at it. Whereupon it is said, that they then at the last believed when they had by trial of the thing itself proved the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then began to believe, but because the seed of hidden faith, which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiving livelines, did spring up. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an unexpressed faith, because they reverently embraced Christ for their only teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their salvation: finally, they believed that he came from heaven by the grace of his Father to gather his disciples to heaven. And we need not seek any more familiar proof hereof than this, that in all things always unbelief is mingled with faith.

When we begin by faith to know somewhat, and have a desire to learn more, this may be termed an unexpressed faith.

5. We may also call it an unexpressed faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Evangelists do rehearse that many believed, who only being ravished to admiration with miracles, proceedeth no further but that Christ was the Messias who has been promised, altho' they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the gospel. Such obedience which brought them in subjection willingly to submit themselves to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was indeed but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that believed Christ's promise, concerning the healing of his Son when he came home, as the Evangelists testifieth, (John 4. 3.) believed again: because he received as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted himself to his authority to receive his doctrine. Although it is to be known, that he was so tractable and ready to learn, that yet in the first place the word of the believing signifieth a particular belief: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the disciples, that professed to be the schollars of Christ. A like example doth John set forth in the Samaritans, John iv. who so believed the woman's report, that they ran earnestly to Christ, who yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we believe not because of thy report, but we have heard him, and we know that he is the Saviour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they, who are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithful, indeed not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindness vouchsafeth to grant so great honour to that godly affection. But this willingness to learn, with a desire to proceed further, differ far from that gross ignorance, wherein they ly dull that are content with the unexpressed faith, such as the Papists have imagined. For if Paul severely condemneth them (2 Tim. iii. 7.) who, always leaning, yet never come to the knowlege of truth, how much more grievous reproach do they deserve that of purpose study to know nothing?

Faith beholdeth Christ but in no other glass than the gospel.

6. This therefore is the true knowlege of Christ, if we receive him such as he is offered of his Father, that is to say, clothed with his gospel. For as he is appointed to be the object of our faith, so we cannot go the right way to him, but by the gospel going before to guide us. And truly there are opened to us the treasures of grace, which being shut up, Christ should little profit us. So Paul joineth faith an inseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Eph. iv. 20. Ye have not so learned Christ, for ye have been taught what is the truth in Christ. Yet do I not so restrain faith to the gospel, but that I confess that there hath been so much taught by Moses and the prophets, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath been delivered in the gospel a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is justly called of Paul, Rom. x. 4. the doctrine of faith. For which cause also he saith in another place, that by the coming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the new and unaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared peared our ſchoolmaſter, hath more plainly ſet forth the mercy of his Father, and more certainly teſtified of our ſalvation. Although it ſhall be the more eaſy and more convenient order, if we deſcend by degrees from the generalty to the ſpecialty. Firſt, we muſt be put in mind that there is a general relation of faith to the word, and that faith can no more be ſeparated from the word, than the ſun beams from the ſun from whom the proceed. Therefore in Iſaiah, (Iſa. lv. 3.) God crieth out: Hear me and your ſoul ſhall live. And that the ſame is the fountain of faith, John ſheweth in theſe words: Joh. x. 13. Theſe things are written that ye may believe. And the prophet meaning to exhort the people to believe, ſaith: Pſal. xcv. 8. This day if ye ſhall hear his voice. And to hear is commonly taken for to believe. Moreover, God doth not without cauſe in Iſaiah ſet this mark of difference between the children of the church and ſtrangers, that he will inſtruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefit univerſal to all, why ſhould he direct his words to a few? Wherewith agreeth this that the Evangeliſts do commonly uſe the words Faithful and Diſciples, as ſeveral words expreſſing one thing, and ſpecially Luke very oft in the Acts of the Apoſtles. Acts vi. 1. and ix. 26. and xi. 26. and xiii. and 14. Yea and he ſtretcheth that name even to a woman in the ninth chapter of the Acts. Wherefore if faith do ſwerve never ſo little from this mark, to which it ought to be directly levelled, it keepeth not her own nature, but becometh an uncertain lightneſs of belief and wandering error of mind. The ſame word is the foundation wherewith faith is upholden and ſuſtained, from which if it ſwerve, it falleth down. Therefore take away the word, and then there ſhall remain no faith. We do not here diſpute whether the miniſtry of man be neceſſary to ſow the word of God that faith may be conceived thereby, which queſtion we will elſewhere treat of: but we ſay that the word itſelf howſoever it be conveyed to us, is like a mirror where faith may behold God. Whether God doth therein uſe the ſervice of man, or work it by his own only power, yet he doth always ſhew himſelf by his word unto thoſe, whom his will is to draw unto him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to be an obedience that is given to the goſpel, Rom. i. 5. And in another place he praiſeth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. Phil. ii. 17. For this is not the only purpoſe in the underſtanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this alſo, yea, this chiefly, that we underſtand what will he beareth us. For it not ſo much behoveth us to know what he is in himſelf, but what a one he will be to us. Now therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowlege of the will of God, perceived by the word. And the foundation hereof is a pre-conceived perſuaſion of the truth of God. Of the aſſuredneſs whereof ſo long as thy mind ſhall diſpute with itſelf, the word ſhall be but of doubtful and weak credit, yea rather no credit at all. But alſo it ſufficeth not to believe that God is a true ſpeaker, who can neither deceive nor lie, unleſs thou further hold this for undoubtedly determinded, that whatſoever proceedeth from him is the ſacred and inviolable truth.

The true and full definition of faith.

7. But becauſe not at every word of God man's heart is raiſed up to faith, we muſt yet further ſearch what this faith in the word hath properly reſpect unto. It was the ſaying of God to Adam: (Gen. ii. 17. and iv.) Thou ſhalt die the death. It was the ſaying of God to Cain: The blood of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet theſe are ſuch ſayings as of themſelves can do nothing but ſhake faith, ſo much leſs are they able to ſtabliſh faith. We deny not in the mean time that it is the office of faith to agree to the truth of God, how oft ſoever, whatſoever, and in what ſort ſoever it ſpeaketh: but now our queſtion is only, what faith findeth in the word of the Lord to lean and reſt upon. When our conſcience beholdeth only indignation and vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for fear? And how ſhould it but flee God, of whom it is afraid? But faith ought to ſeek God, and not to flee from him. It is plain therefore, that we have not yet a full definition of faith, becauſe it is not to be accounted for faith to know the will of God, of what ſort ſoever it be: but what if in the place of will, whereof many times the meſſage is ſorrowful and the declaration dreadful, we put kindneſs or mercy? Truly ſo we ſhall come nearer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to ſeek God, after that we have learned that ſalvation is laid up in ſtore with him for us. Which thing is confirmed unto us, when he declareth that he hath care and love of us. Therefore there needeth a promiſe of grace, whereby he may teſtify that he is our merciful Father, for that otherwiſe we cannot approach unto him, and upon that alone the heart of man may ſafely reſt. For this reaſon commonly in the Pſalms theſe two things Mercy and Truth do cleave together, becauſe neither ſhould it any thing profit us to know that God is true, unleſs he did mercifully allure us unto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercy, unleſs he did with his own mouth offer it (Pſal. xl. 11.) I have reported thy truth and thy ſalvation, I have not hidden thy goodneſs and thy truth. (Pſal. xxv. 20.) Thy goodneſs and thy truth keep me. In another place: (Pſal. xxxvi. 6.) Thy mercy reacheth to the heavens, thy truth even to the clouds. Again: (Pſal. cvii.) All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth, to them that keep his covenant. Again, (Pſal. cxxxviii.) His mercy is multiplied upon us, and the truth of the Lord abideth for ever. Again: I will ſing to thy name upon thy mercy and truth. I omit that which is in the prophets to the ſame meaning, that God is merciful and faithful in his promiſes. For we ſhall raſhly determine that God is merciful unto us, unleſs himſelf do teſtify of himſelf, and prevent us with his calling, leaſt his will ſhould be doubtful and unknown. But we have already ſeen, that Chriſt is the only pledge of his love, without whom on every ſide appear the tokens of hatred and wrath. Now foraſmuch as the knowlege of God's goodneſs ſhall not much prevail, unleſs he make us to reſt in it, therefore ſuch an underſtanding is to be baniſhed as is mingled with doubting, and doth not ſoundly agree in itſelf, but as it were, diſputeth with itſelf. But man's wit, as it is blind and darkened, is far from attaining and climbing up to perceive the very will of God: and alſo the heart of man, as it wavereth with perpetual doubting, is far from reſting aſſured in that perſuaſion. Therefore it behoveth both that our underſtanding be enlightened, and our heart ſtrengthened by ſome other mean, that the word of God may be of full credit with us. Now we ſhall have a perfect definition of faith, if we ſay, that it is a ſtedfaſt and aſſured knowlege of God's kindneſs toward us, which being grounded upon the truth of the free promiſe in Chriſt, is both revealed to our minds, and ſeal'd in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt.

8. But before I proceed any further, it ſhall be neceſſary that I make ſome preambles to diſſolve certain doubts that otherwiſe might make ſome ſtop to the readers. And firſt I muſt confute that diſtinction that flyeth about in the ſchools, between faith formed and unformed. For they imagine that ſuch as are touched with no fear of God, with no feeling of godlineſs, do believe all that is neceſſary to ſalvation. As though the holy Ghoſt in enlightening our hearts unto faith, were not a witneſs to us of our adoption. And yet preſumptuouſly, when all the ſcripture crieth out againſt it, they give the name of faith to ſuch perſuaſion void of the fear of God. We need to ſtrive no further with their definition, but ſimply to rehearſe the nature of faith, ſuch as it is declared by the word of God. Whereby ſhall plainly appear how unſkilfully and fooliſhly they rather make a noiſe than ſpeak of it. I have already touched part, the reſt I will add hereafter as place ſhall ſerve. At this preſent I ſay that there cannot be imagined a greater abſurdity, than this invention of theirs. They will have faith to be an aſſent, whereby every deſpiſer of God may receive that which is uttered out of the ſcripture. But firſt they ſhould have ſeen whether every man of his own power do bring faith to himſelf, or whether the holy Ghoſt be by it a witneſs of adoption. Therefore they do childiſhly play the fools, in demanding whether faith which a quality added doth form, be the ſame faith or another and a new faith. Whereby appeareth certainly, that in ſo babbling they never thought of the ſingular gift of the holy Ghoſt. For the beginning of believing doth already contain in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weigh that ſaying of Paul: (Rom. x. 10.) With the heart man believeth unto righteouſneſs, they would ceaſe to feign that ſame cold quality. If we had but this one reaſon, it ſhould be ſufficient to end this contention: that the very ſame aſſent (as I have already touched, and will again more largely repeat) is rather of the heart than of the brain, rather of affection than of underſtanding. For which cauſe it is called (Rom. i. 5.) the obedience of faith, which is ſuch as the Lord preferreth no kind of obedience above it: and that deſervedly, for as much as nothing is more precious to him than his truth, which as (John iii. 25.) John the Baptiſt witneſſeth, the believers do as it were ſubſcribe and ſeal unto. Since the matter is not doubtful we do in one word determinately ſay, that they ſpeak fondly when they ſay that faith is formed by adding of godly affection unto aſſent: whereas aſſent itſelf, at leaſt ſuch aſſent as is declared in the ſcriptures, conſiſteth of godly affection. But yet there is another plainer argument that offereth itſelf to be alleged. For whereas faith imbraced Chriſt as he is offered us of the Father: and Chriſt is offered not only for righteouſneſs, forgiveneſs of ſins and peace, but alſo for ſanctification, and a fountain of living water:

without doubt no man can ever truly know him, unleſs he do therewithal receive the ſanctification of the Spirit. Or, if any man deſire to have it more plainly ſpoken, Faith conſiſteth in the knowlege of Chriſt. And Chriſt cannot be known but with ſanctification of his Spirit: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no mean be ſeparated from godly affection.

St. Paul's words abuſed for the maintenence of unformed faith.

9. Whereas they are wont to lay this againſt us, that Paul ſaith: If a man have all faith, ſo that he remove mountains, if he have not charity, he is nothing: whereby they would deform faith, in ſpoiling it of charity: they conſider not what the apoſtle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had ſpoken of the divers gifts of the holy Ghoſt, among which he had reckoned the divers kinds of languages, power and prophecy, and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the beſt of theſe gifts, that is to ſay, ſuch gifts whereby more profit and advantage might come to the whole body of the church: he ſtraightway ſaith further, that he would ſhew them yet a more excellent way. That all ſuch gifts, how excellent ſoever they be of themſelves, yet are they nothing to be eſteemed, unleſs they ſerve charity. For they were given to the edifying of the church, and unleſs they be applied thereunto, they loſe their grace. For proof of this he particularly rehearſeth them, repeating the ſelf ſame gifts that he had ſpoken of before, but in other names. And he uſeth the words power and faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Since therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gift of God, which every ungodly man may both have and abuſe, as the gift of tongues, as prophecy and other gifts of grace: it is no marvel if it be ſevered from charity. But all the error of theſe men ſtandeth in this, that where this word faith, hath divers ſignifications, they not conſidering the diverſity of the thing ſignified, diſpute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of James which they alleg: for maintenance of the ſame error, ſhall be elſe where diſcuſſed. But although for teaching's ſake, when we mean to ſhew what manner of knowlege of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are divers ſorts of faith: yet we acknowlege and ſpeak of but one faith of the godly, as the ſcripture teacheth. Many indeed do believe that there is a God, they think that the hiſtory of the goſpel and other parts of the ſcripture are true (as commonly we are wont to jndge of ſuch things, as either are reported being done long ago, or ſuch as we ourſelves have been preſent at and ſeen.) There be alſo ſome that go further, for both they believe the word of God to be a moſt aſſured oracle, and they do not altogether deſpiſe his commandments, and they ſomewhat after a ſort are moved with his threatenings and promiſes. It is indeed teſtified that ſuch have faith: but that is ſpoken out by abuſe, becauſe they do not with open ungodlineſs fight againſt the word of God, or refuſe or deſpiſe it: but rather pretend a certain ſhew of obedience.

A kind of faith ſaid to be in them who notwithſtanding are no true believers.

10. But this image or ſhadow of faith, as it is of no value, ſo it is not worthy of the name of faith. From the ſound truth whereof how far it differeth, although it ſhall be hereafter more largely treated, yet there is no cauſe to the contrary, why it ſhould not now be touched by the way. It is ſaid, (Acts viii. 13. and 18.) that Simon Magus believed, which yet within a little after bewrayed his own unbelief. And whereas it is ſaid that he believed, we do not underſtand it as ſome do, that he feigned a belief when he had none in his heart: but we rather think that being overcome with the majeſty of the goſpel, he had a certain faith ſuch as it was, and ſo acknowleged Chriſt to be the author of life and ſalvation, that he willingly profeſſed himſelf to be one of his. After the ſame manner it is ſaid in the goſpel of Luke, (Luke viii. 7. and 13.) that they believe for a time, in whom the ſeed of the word is choaked up before it bring forth fruit, or before it take any root at all, it by and by withereth away and periſheth: we doubt not that ſuch delighted with a certain taſte of the word do greedily receive it, and begin to feel the divine force of it: ſo far that with deceitful counterfeiting of faith, they beguile not only other mens eyes, but alſo their own minds. For they perſuade themſelves, that that reverence which they ſhew to the word of God, is moſt true godlineſs, becauſe they think that there is no ungodlineſs but manifeſt and confeſſed reproach or contempt of his word. But what manner of aſſent ſoever that be, it pierceth not to the very heart to remain there ſtabliſhed: and though ſometime it ſeemeth to have taken root, yet thoſe are not lively roots. The heart of man hath ſo many ſecret corners of vanity, is full of ſo many hiding holes of lying, is covered with ſo guileful hypocriſy, that it oft deceiveth himſelf. But let them that glory in ſuch ſhadows of faith underſtand, that therein they are no better than the devil. But that firſt ſort of men are far worſe than the devil, who do ſenſeleſly hear and underſtand thoſe things, for knowlege whereof the devils do tremble. And the other are in this point equal with the devil that the feeling ſuch as it is wherewith they are touched, turned only to terror and diſcouragement.

The difference between the faith of God's elect and reprobates.

11. I know that ſome think it hard, that we aſſign faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is eaſily diſſolved: for though none receive the light of faith, nor do truly feel the effectual working of the goſpel, but they that are fore-ordained to ſalvation: yet experience ſheweth that the reprobate are ſometime moved with the ſame feeling that the elect are, ſo that in their own judgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no abſurdity, that the apoſtle aſcribeth to them the taſte of the heavenly gifts, that Chriſt aſcribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they ſoundly perceive the ſpiritual force of grace and aſſured light of faith: but becauſe the Lord, the more to condemn them and make them inexcuſable, conveyeth himſelf into their minds ſo far forth, as his goodneſs may be taſted without the ſpirit of adoption. If any object, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithful whereby to prove certainly their adoption: I anſwer that though there be a great likeneſs and affinity between the elect of God and them that are endowed with a falling faith for a time, yet there liveth in the elect only that affiance which Paul ſpeaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate only the elect with incorruptible ſeed for ever, ſo that the ſeed of life planted in their hearts never periſheth: ſo ſoundly doth he ſeal in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be ſtable and ſure. But this withſtandeth not but that that other inferior working of the Spirit may have its courſe, even in the reprobate. In the mean ſeaſon the faithful are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themſelves, leaſt inſtead of aſſuredneſs of faith, do creep in careleſs confidence of the fleſh. Beſide that, the reprobate do never conceive but a confuſed feeling of grace, ſo that they rather take hold of the ſhadow than of the ſound body, becauſe the holy Spirit doth properly ſeal the remiſſion of ſins in the elect only, ſo that they apply it by ſpecial faith to their uſe. But yet it is truly ſaid, that the reprobate believe God to be merciful unto them, becauſe they receive the gift of reconciliation, although confuſedly and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the ſelf ſame faith or regeneration with the children of God, but becauſe they ſeem to have as well as they, the ſame beginning of faith, under a cloke of hypocriſy. And I deny not, that God doth ſo far give light unto their minds, that they acknowlege his grace, but he maketh that ſame feeling ſo different from the peculiar teſtimony which he giveth to his elect, that they never come to the ſound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore ſhew himſelf merciful unto them, for that he having truly delivered them from death, doth receive them to his ſafeguard, but only he diſcloſeth to them a preſent mercy. But he vouchſafeth to grant to the only elect the lively root of faith, ſo that they continue to the end. So is that objection anſwered, if God do truly ſhew his grace, that the ſame remaineth perpetually ſtabliſhed, for that there is no cauſe to the contrary, but that God may enlighten ſome with a preſent feeling of his grace, which afterward vaniſheth away.

Wicked men who by reaſon of a vaniſhing ſweetneſs which they feel in the grace of God towards them for a time, are ſaid to believe, yet indeed do neither embrace what they ſhould, nor as they ſhould.

12. Alſo though faith be a knowlege of God's kindneſs toward us, and an aſſured perſuaſion of the truth thereof: yet it is no marvel that the feeling of God's love in temporal things doth vaniſh away: which although it have an affinity with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I grant, the will of God is unchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway ſtedfaſtly agree with itſelf, but I deny that the reprobate do proceed ſo far as to attain unto that ſecret revelation, which the ſcripture faith doth belong to the elect only. Therefore I deny that they do either conceive the will of God as it is unchangeable, or do ſtedfaſtly embrace the truth thereof, becauſe they abide in a feeling that vaniſheth away: like as a tree that is not planted deep enough to take lively roots, in proceſs of time waxeth dry, although for a few years it bringeth forth not only bloſſoms and leaves but alſo fruit. Finally, as by the fall of the firſt man, the image of God might have been blotted out of his mind, and ſoul, ſo it is no marvel, if God do ſhine upon the reprobate with certain beams of his grace, which afterward he ſuffereth to be quenched. And there is no cauſe to the contrary, but that he may lighty overwaſh ſome, and throughly ſoak other ſome with the knowlege of his goſpel. This is in the mean time to be holden for truth, that how ſmall and weak ſoever faith be in the elect, yet becauſe it is to them a ſure pledge of the Spirit of God, and a ſeal of their adoption, the print thereof can never be blotted out of their hearts: as for the reprobate, that they are overſpread with ſuch a light as afterward cometh to nought, and yet the Spirit is not deceitful becauſe he giveth not life to the ſeed that he caſteth in their hearts, to make it abide always incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I go yet further, for whereas it is evident by the teaching of the ſcripture and by daily experience, that the reprobate are ſometime touched with the feeling of God's grace, it muſt needs be that there is raiſed in their hearts a certain deſire of mutual love. So for a time there lived in Saul a godly affection to love God, by whom he knew himſelf to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certain ſweetneſs of his goodneſs. But as the perſuaſion of the fatherly love of God is not faſt rooted in the reprobate, ſo do they not ſoundly love him again as his children, but are led with a certain affection like hired ſervants. For to Chriſt only was the ſpirit of love given, to this end, that he ſhould pour it into his members. And truly that ſaying of Paul (Rom. v. 5.) extendeth no further, but to the elect only. The love of God is poured abroad into our hearts by the holy Spirit that is given us, even the ſame love that engendereth the ſame confidence of calling upon him, which I have before touched. As on the contrary ſide we ſee God to be marvellouſly angry with his children, whom yet he ceaſeth not to love: not that in himſelf he hateth them, but becauſe his will is to make them afraid with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of fleſh, to ſhake off their drowſineſs, and to move them to repentance. And therefore all at one time they conceive him to be both angry with them or with their ſins, and alſo merciful unto them: becauſe they not feignedly do pray to appeaſe his wrath, to whom yet they flee with quiet aſſured truſt. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that ſome do counterfeit a ſhew of faith, which yet do lack the true faith, but while they are carried with a ſudden violent motion of zeal, they deceive themſelves with falſe opinion. And it is no doubt that ſluggiſhneſs ſo poſſeſſeth them, that they do not well examine their heart as they ought to have done. It is likely that they were ſuch to whom (as John witneſſeth John ii. 24.) Chriſt did not commit himſelf when yet they believed in him, becauſe he knew them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fall from the common faith (I call it common, becauſe the faith that laſteth but a time hath a great likeneſs and affinity with the lively and continuing faith) Chriſt would not have ſaid to his diſciples: (John viii. 31.) If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my diſciples, and ye ſhall know the truth, and the truth ſhall make you free. For he ſpeaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increaſe of faith, that they ſhould not by their own ſluggiſhneſs quench the light that is given them. Therefore doth Paul affirm, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vaniſh away, becauſe they have not taken lively root. Like as Chriſt alſo ſaith in Matthew xv. 13. every tree that my Father hath not planted, ſhall be rooted up. In other there is a groſſer kind of lying, that are not aſhamed to mock both God and men. James enveigheth againſt that kind of men, that with deceitful pretence do wicked abuſe faith. James ii. Neither would Paul require of the children of God a faith unfeigned, 1 Tim. i. 5. but in reſpect that many do preſumptuouſly challenge unto themſelves that which they have not, and with vain coloured deceit do beguile others or ſometimes themſelves. Therefore he compareth a good conſcience to a cheſt wherein faith is kept, becauſe many in falling from good conſcience have ſuffered ſhipwreck of their faith.

13. We muſt alſo remember the doubtful ſignification of the word faith. For oftentimes faith ſignifieth the ſound doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now allege, and in the ſame epiſtle where Paul will have deacons (1 Tim. iii. 9.) to hold faſt the myſtery of faith in a pure conſcience. Again, 1 Tim. iv. 1. and 6. where he publiſheth the falling away of certain from the faith. But on the other ſide, he ſaith, that Timothy was nouriſhed up with the words of faith. Again (2 Tim. ii. 16. and iii. 8.) where he ſaith that prophane vanities and oppoſitions, falſely named ſciences, are the cauſe that many depart from the faith: whom in another place he calleth reprobate touching faith. As again he chargeth Titus, (Tit. i. 13. and ii. 2.) ſaying, Warn them that they be ſound in the faith.

faith. By ſoundneſs he meaneth nothing elſe but pureneſs of doctrine, which is eaſily corrupted and brought out of kind by the lightneſs of men. Even becauſe in Chriſt, whom faith poſſeſſeth, are hidden all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowlege: therefore faith is worthily extended to ſignify the whole ſum of heavenly doctrine, from which it cannot be ſeparated. Contrariwiſe, ſometimes it is reſtrained to ſignify ſome particular object, as when Matthew ſaith, (Matth. ix. 2.) that Chriſt ſaw the faith of them that did let down the man ſick of the palſy through the tiles: and Chriſt himſelf crieth out, (Matth. viii. 10.) that he found not in Iſrael ſo great faith as the centurion brought. But it is likely that the centurion was earneſtly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his mind: yet becauſe being contented with the only aſſent and anſwer of Chriſt, he requireth not Chriſt's bodily preſence, therefore in reſpect of this circumſtance, his faith was ſo much commended. And a little here before we have ſhewed, that Paul taketh faith for the gift of working miracles, 1 Cor. xiii. 10. which gift they have that neither are regenerate by the Spirit of God, nor do heartily worſhip him. Alſo in another place he ſetteth faith for the doctrine whereby we are inſtructed in faith. For where he writeth that faith ſhall be aboliſhed, it is out of queſtion that that is meant by the miniſtry of the church, which at this time is profitable for our weakneſs. In theſe forms of ſpeech ſtandeth a proportional relation. But when the name of faith is unproperly removed, to ſignify a falſe profeſſion or a lying title of faith, that ſhould ſeem to be as hard a figurative abuſe, as when the fear of God is ſet for a corrupt and wrongful manner of worſhipping, as when it is oftentimes ſaid in the ſacred hiſtory, that the foreign nations which had been tranſplanted into Samaria and the places bordering thereabout, feared the feigned gods and the God of Iſrael, which is as much as to mingle heaven and earth together. But now our queſtion is, What is that faith which maketh the children of God different from the unbelievers, by which we call upon God by the name of our Father, by which we paſs from death to life, and by which Chriſt the eternal ſalvation and life dwelleth in us. The force and nature thereof I think I have ſhortly and plainly declared.

14. Now let us again go thro' all the parts of it, even from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I think) there ſhall remain nothing doubtful. When in defining faith we call it a knowlege, we mean not thereby a comprehending, ſuch as men uſe to have of thoſe things that are ſubject to man's underſtanding. For it is ſo far above it, that man's wit muſt go beyond and ſurmount itſelf to come unto it, yea, and when it is come unto it, yet doth it not attain that which it feeleth, but while it is perſuaded of that which it conceiveth not, it underſtandeth more by the very aſſuredneſs of perſuaſion, than if he did with man's own capacity thoroughly perceive any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul ſaith very well, Eph. iii. 18. where he calleth it to be comprehended what is the length, breadth, depth and height, and to know the love of Chriſt that far ſurmounteth knowlege. For his meaning was to ſignify, that the thing which our mind conceived by faith, is every way infinite, and that this kind of knowlege is far higher than all underſtanding. But yet becauſe the Lord hath diſcloſed to his ſaints the ſecret of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reaſon faith is in ſcripture ſometimes called an acknowleging: and John calleth it (1 John iii. 2.) a certain knowlege, where he teſtifieth expreſly, that the faithful do certainly know that they are the children of God. And undoubtedly they know it aſſuredly, but rather by being conformed by perſuaſion of God's truth, than by being informed by natural demonſtration. And this alſo the words of Paul do declare, ſaying, (2 Cor. v. 6. that while we dwell in the body, we are wandring abroad from the Lord, becauſe we walk by faith and not by ſight: whereby he ſheweth, that thoſe things which we underſtand by faith, are yet abſent from us, and are hidden from our ſight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowlege of faith ſtandeth rather in certainty than in comprehending.

Faith a ſure and ſtedfaſt knowlege.

15. We further call it a ſure and ſtedfaſt knowlege, to expreſs thereby a more found conſtancy of perſuaſion. For as faith is not contented with a doubtful and wavering opinion, ſo is it alſo not contented with a dark and entangled underſtanding: but requireth a full and fixed aſſuredneſs, ſuch as men are wont to have of things found by experience and proved. For unbelief ſticketh ſo faſt and is ſo deep rooted in our hearts, and we are ſo bent unto it, that this which all men confeſs with their mouth to be true, that God is faithful, no man is without great contention perſuaded in his heart. Specially when he cometh to the proof, then the wavering of all men diſcloſeth the fault that that before was hidden. And not without cauſe the ſcripture with ſo notable titles of commendation maintaineth the authority of the word of God, but endeavoureth to give remedy for the aforeſaid diſeaſe, that God may obtain to be fully believed of us in his promiſes: The words of the Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. xix. 10.) are pure words, as the ſilver tried in a furnace of earth, fined ſeven times. Again, the word of the Lord fined is a ſhield to all that truſt in him. And Solomon confirming the ſame, and in a manner in the ſame words, ſaith, (Prov. xxx. 5.) Every word of God is pure. But ſince the whole cxix. Pſalm treateth only in a manner upon the ſame, it were ſuperfluous to allege any more places. Truly ſo oft as God doth ſo commend his word unto us, he doth therein by the way reproach us with our incredulity: becauſe that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to root up all perverſe doubtings out of our hearts. There be alſo many which ſo conceive the mercy of God, that they take little comfort thereof. For they be even therewithal pinched with a miſerable carefulneſs, while they doubt whether he will be merciful to them or no, becauſe they incloſe within too narrow bounds the very ſame mercifulneſs, of which they think themſelves moſt aſſuredly perſuaded. For thus they think with themſelves, that his mercy is indeed great and plentiful poured out upon many, offering itſelf, and ready for all men: but that it is not certain whether it will extend unto them or no, or rather whether they ſhall attain unto it or no. This thought when it ſtayeth in the mid race is but an half. Therefore it doth not ſo confirm the Spirit with aſſured quietneſs, as it doth trouble it with unquiet doubtfulneſs. But there is a far other feeling of full aſſuredneſs, which in the ſcriptures is always aſſigned to faith, even ſuch a one as plainly ſetting before us the goodneſs of God, doth clearly put it out of doubt. And that cannot be, but that we muſt needs truly feel and prove in ourſelves the ſweetneſs thereof. And therefore the apoſtle out of faith deriveth aſſured confidence, and out of it again boldneſs. For thus he ſaith, (Eph. iii. 12.) that by Chriſt we have boldneſs, and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which words truly he ſheweth that it is no right faith, but when we are bold with quiet minds to ſhew ourſelves in the preſence of God. Which boldneſs proceedeth not but of aſſured confidence of God's good-will and our ſalvation. Which is ſo true, that many times this word faith is uſed for confidence.

16. But hereupon hangeth the chief ſtay of our faith, that we do not think the promiſes of mercy which the Lord offereth to be true only in others beſide us, and not at all in ourſelves: but rather that in inwardly embracing them we make them our own. from hence proceedeth the confidence which the ſame Paul in another place calleth peace, unleſs ſome had rather ſay, that peace is derived of it. It is an aſſuredneſs that maketh the conſcience quiet and chearful before God, without which the conſcience muſt of neceſſity be vexed, and in a manner torn in pieces with troubleſome trembling, unleſs perhaps it do forget God and itſelf, and ſo ſlumber a little while. And I may truly ſay, for a little while, for it doth not long enjoy that miſerable forgetfulneſs, but is with often recourſe of the remembrance of God's judgment ſharply tormented. Briefly, there is none truly faithful, but he that being perſuaded with a ſound aſſuredneſs that God is his merciful and loving Father, doth promiſe himſelf all things upon truſt of God's goodneſs: and none but he that truſting upon the promiſes of God's good-will towards him, conceiveth an undoubted looking for of ſalvation: as the Apoſtle ſheweth in theſe words: if we keep ſure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is an heir of the kingdom of heaven, There is none (I ſay) faithful, but he that leaning upon the aſſuredneſs of his own ſalvation, doth confidently triumph over the devil and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding ſentence of Paul: (Rom. viii. 38.) I am perſuaded (ſaith he) that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God, wherewith he embraceth us in Chriſt Jeſus. And in like manner, the ſame Apoſtle thinketh, that the eyes of our mind are by no other mean well lightened, unleſs we ſee what is the hope of the eternal inheritance to which we are called. And each where his common manner of teaching is ſuch, that he declareth that no otherwiſe we do well comprehend the goodneſs of God, unleſs we gather of it the fruit of great aſſuredneſs.

We have no ſuch certainty of faith as is free from being ſhaken with

17. But (ſome men will ſay) the faithful do find by experience a far other thing within themſelves, which in recording fears and terrors.

the grace of God toward them, are not only tempted with unquietneſs, which oftentimes chanceth unto them, but alſo are ſometimes ſhaken with moſt grievous terrors: ſo great is the vehemency of temptations to throw down their minds: which thing ſeemeth not ſufficiently well to agree with that aſſuredneſs of faith. Therefore this doubt muſt be anſwered if we will have our aforeſaid doctrine to ſtand. But truly when we teach that faith ought to be certain and aſſured, we do not imagine ſuch a certainty as is touched with no doubting, nor ſuch an aſſuredneſs as if aſſailed with no carefulneſs: but rather we ſay, that the faithful have a perpetual ſtrife with their own diſtruſtfulneſs. So far are we from ſettling their conſciences in ſuch a peaceable quietneſs, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other ſide we ſay, that in what ſort ſoever they be afflicted, they do never fall and depart from that aſſured confidence which they have conceived of the mercy of God. The ſcripture ſetteth forth no example of faith more plain, or more notable than in David, eſpecially if a man behold the whole continual courſe of his life. But yet how he was not always of quiet mind himſelf declareth by innumerable complaints, of which at this time it ſhall be ſufficient to chuſe out a few. When he reproacheth his own ſoul with troubleſome motions, what is it elſe but that he is angry with his own unbelief? Pſal. xlii. 4. lxiii. 5. Why trembleſt thou my ſoul, (ſaith he) and why art thou diſquieted within me? truſt in God. And truly that ſame diſcouragement was a plain token of deſtruction, even as if he thought himſelf to be forſaken of God. And in another place we read a larger confeſſion thereof, Pſal. xxxi. 22. where he ſaith: I ſaid in my overthrow, I am caſt out from the ſight of thy eyes. Alſo in another place he diſputeth with himſelf in careful and miſerable perplexity, yea, and quarrelleth of the very nature of God, ſaying, Pſal. lxxvii. 10. Hath God forgotten to have mercy? will he caſt off for ever? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I have ſaid, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the Higheſt. For as in deſpair he condemneth himſelf to deſtruction, and not only confeſſeth himſelf to be toſſed with doubting, but as if he were vanquiſhed in battle, he leaveth nothing to himſelf, becauſe God hath forſaken him, and hath turned to deſtroy him, the ſame hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cauſe he exhorteth his ſoul to return to her quietneſs, Pſal. cxvi. 7. becauſe he had found by experience, that he was toſſed among troubleſome waves. And yet (which is marvellous in all theſe aſſaults, faith upholdeth the hearts of the godly, and is truly like unto a date tree to endeavour and riſe upwards againſt all burdens, how great ſoever they be: as David when he might ſeem to be utterly overwhelmed, yet in rebuking himſelf, ceaſeth not to riſe up to God. And truly he that ſtriving with his own weakneſs, reſorteth to faith in his troubles, is already in a manner conqueror. Which may be gathered by this ſentence and other like: Pſal. xxvii. 14. Wait for the Lord, be ſtrong, he ſhall ſtrengthen thy heart: wait for the Lord. He reproacheth himſelf of fearfulneſs, and in repeating that ſame twice, confeſſeth himſelf to be ſometimes ſubject to many troubleſome motions. And in the mean time he doth not only become diſpleaſed with himſelf in theſe faults, but earneſtly endeavoureth to amendment. Truly if we will more nearly by good examination compare him with Achaz, there ſhall be found great difference, Iſaiah was ſent to bring remedy to the careful grief of the wicked king and hypocrite, and ſpake unto him in theſe words: Iſai. vii. 3. Be in ſafeguard and be quiet: fear not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before ſaid, that his heart was moved as the trees of the wood are ſhaken with wind, though he heard the promiſe, yet he ceaſed not to quake for fear. This therefore is the proper reward and puniſhment of unbelief, ſo to tremble for fear, that in temptation he turneth himſelf away from God, that doth not open to himſelf the gate by faith. Contrariwiſe the faithful whom the weighty burden of temptations maketh to ſtoop, and in a manner oppreſſeth do conſtantly riſe up, although not without trouble and hardneſs. And becauſe they know not their own weakneſs, they pray with the prophet: Pſal. cxix. 43. Take not the word of truth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that ſometimes they become dumb as though their faith were utterly overthrown, yet they faint not nor turn their backs, but proceed in their battle, and with prayer do encourage their ſlothfulneſs, leſt by favouring themſelves they ſhould grow to inſenſible dulneſs.

18. For the underſtanding thereof, it is needful to return to that diviſion of the fleſh and ſpirit, whereof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalf moſt clearly appear. The godly heart therefore feeleth a diviſion in itſelf, which is partly delighted with ſweetneſs by acknowleging the goodneſs of God, and partly grieved with bitterneſs by feel-feeling of his own misery; partly resteth upon the promise of the gospel, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimonies of his own wickedness; partly rejoiceth with conceiving of life, and partly quaketh for fear of death. Which variations cometh by imperfection of faith, forasmuch as we never are in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulness to be altogether filled and possessed by faith. Hereupon proceed those battles, when the distrustfulness that abideth in the remnants of the flesh, riseth up to assail the faith that is inwardly conceived. But if in a faithful mind assuredness be mixed with doubtfulness, come we not alway to this point, that faith standeth not in a certain and clear knowlege, but in a dark and doubtfully entangled knowlege of God's will toward us? No; not so. For though we be diversly drawn with sundry thoughts, yet we are not therefore by and by severed from faith, though we be vexed with tossing up and down of distrustfulness, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomless depths thereof: and though we are shaken, yet are we not thrust down out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battle, that faith doth at length with wrestling overcome those hard troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

The imbecility of our knowlege excludeth not the certainty of that we know by faith.

19. Let this be the sum of all. So soon as any drop of faith, be it never so small, is poured into our hearts, we by and by begin to behold the face of God mild and pleasant, and loving toward us: yet the same we see from afar off, and far distant from us, but with so sure sight that we know we are not deceived. From thence forward how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come unto so much the nearer, and therefore certainer beholding of him, and by very continuance he is made more familiar unto us. So we see that the mind enlightened with the knowlege of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by little and little is wiped away. Yet the same mind is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkly seeing that which she seeth, but that she enjoyeth a clear knowlege of God's will toward her, which is the first and principal point in faith. For as if a man being shut up in prison, have beams of the sun shining in sidelong at a narrow window, or as it were but half glimmering, he wanteth indeed the free beholding of the sun, yet he seeth with his eyes an undoubted brightness thereof, and receiveth the use of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoever we be on each side covered with much darkness, yet are we sufficiently enlightned unto perfect assuredness, by the light of God extending his beams of light upon us, though it be but a little, to shew forth his mercy.

Our faith unperfect but stedfast, though our hearts be both naturally inclined, and partly by outward temptations, partly by inward guiltiness of conscience provoked to distrustfulness.

20. Both these points the Apostle very well teacheth in divers places. For when he saith, 1 Cor. xiii. 9. that we know imperfectly, and prophecy imperfectly, and see by a dark speaking as by a glass, he sheweth how scanty a portion of the true godly wisdom is given us in this present life. For though these words do not expresly shew that our faith is imperfect so long as we groan under this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth us by our own imperfection that we have need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth, that that thing which is infinite cannot be comprehended by our small capacity, and narrow compass. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, 1 Cor. iii. 18. but unto every one of us his own, dulness is an hinderance and stay that he cannot come so near as were to be wish'd. But how sure and undeceivable a taste of itself, even a small drop of faith doth make us feel, the same apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the gospel we behold the glory of God with uncovered face, having no veil between us and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doubting and fearful trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certain natural instinct of itself, is inclined to unbelief. Beside that, there be temptations, both infinite in number, and divers in kind, do oftentimes with great sudden violently assail us. But especially our own conscience oppressed with heavy burden of sins lying upon it, doth sometimes lament and groan with itself, and sometimes accuseth itself: sometimes it secretly murmureth, and sometimes is openly troubled. Whether therefore adversities do shew an appearance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth find in itself any proof or matter of his wrath, from thence unbelief doth take weapons and engines to vanquish faith withal: which are always directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our adversary and hatefully bent against us, should both not hope for any help at his hand, and also be afraid of him as of our deadly enemy.

How faith being assaulted getteth the victory and remaineth still unconquerable.

21. To bear these assaults, faith doth arm and fortify herself with the word of God. And when such a temptation assaileth, that God is our enemy, because he is sharp against us: faith on the other side answereth, that even when he punisheth he is also merciful, because his chastisement cometh rather of love than of wrath. When faith is stricken with this thought, that God is a revenger of iniquities, against that stroke it setteth his pardon ready for all offences, so oft as the sinner resorteth to the mercifulness of the Lord. So a godly mind howsoever it be in marvellous wise tossed and vexed, yet at length riseth up above all dangers, and never, suffereth the confidence of God's mercy to be plucked away from it: but rather whatsoever contentions do trouble and weary it, in the end they turn to the assuredness of this confidence. And hereof this is a proof: that the saints, when they think themselves most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet even then they make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, even then nevertheless they call upon him. For to what purpose were it to make their moan to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would never find in their hearts to call upon him, unless they believed that there were some help at his hand prepared for them. So the disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smallness of faith, complained indeed that they perished, (Matth. viii. 25.) but yet they called to him for help. And when he rebuked them for their small faith, yet he doth not reject them from the number of his people, nor maketh them of the number of the unbelievers, but stirreth them to shake off that fault. Therefore we affirm again that which we have above spoken, that the root of faith is never plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottom, that howsoever it be shaken and seem to bend this way or that way, the light thereof is never so quenched or choaked up, but that it lieth at least hidden under some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed that the word which is an incorruptible seed, bringeth forth seed like to itself, the spring whereof doth never wither and utterly perish. For whereas this is the most extreme matter of despair to the saints, to feel according to the consideration of present things, the hand of God bent to their destruction: yet Job affirmeth (Job xiii. 15) that his hope shall proceed so far, that though God do kill him, yet he will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore. Unbelief reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardly assaileth them: neither doth she deadly wound them with her weapons, but only troubleth them, or so hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, Eph. vi. 16. serveth us for a shield, that being holden up against weapons, doth so receive the force of them, that it either utterly driveth them back, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they cannot pierce them to endanger their life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong soldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remove his foot, and give ground a little: and when faith itself is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not struck through. For alway the godly mind will attain to rise thus high as to say with David, if I walk in the midst of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, because thou art with me. Psal. xxiii. 4. It is indeed terrible to walk in the darkness of death, and it cannot be but that the faithful how much strength soever they have, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, that they have God present with them, and providing for their safety, that fear is overcome with assuredness. For (as Augustine saith) how great engines soever the devil raiseth up against us, so long as he possesseth not the place of the heart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the doors. And so if we may judge by the success, the faithful not only escape safe from every battle, so that by and by receiving fresh courage they are ready to come again into the field: but also that is fulfilled which John saith in his canonical epistle, 1 John v. 4. This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith. For he affirmeth that it shall not only win the victory in one or few battles, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the upper hand of the whole world, although it be a thousand times assailed.

All fear is not repugnant unto faith.

22. There is another kind of fear and trembling, but such a one as by it the assuredness of faith is nothing at all diminished, that thereby it is the more soundly stablished. That is, when the faithful either in thinking that the examples of God's vengeance against the wicked are shewed as lessons for them to learn by, do carefully beware that they happen not not to provoke God's wrath againſt themſelves with the ſame offences: or recording with themſelves their own miſery, do learn to depend altogether upon the Lord without whom they ſee themſelves to be more fickle and vaniſhing ſooner than any blaſt of wind. For when the Apoſtle, in ſetting forth the ſcourges wherewith the Lord in old time had puniſhed the people of Iſrael, putteth the Corinthians in fear (1 Cor. x. 11.) that they intangle not themſelves with like evils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but only ſhaketh away the dulneſs of the fleſh by which faith is wont more to be expreſſed than ſtrengthened. And when he taketh occaſion of the Jews fall, to exhort him that ſtandeth, to take heed that he fall not, he doth not thereby bid us waver as though we were not fully aſſured of our ſtedfaſtneſs, but only he taketh away arrogant preſumption and raſh truſting too much in our own ſtrength, that after the thruſting out of the Jews, the Gentiles being received into their place, ſhould not too much outrageouſly triumph againſt them, (Rom. xi. 22. Albeit he ſpeaketh there not only to the faithful, but alſo in the ſame ſaying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried only in outward ſhew. For neither doth he admoniſh every man particularly, but making a compariſon between the Jews and the Gentiles, after that he had ſhewed that the Jews in this that they were rejected, did ſuffer juſt judgment for their unbelief and unthankfulneſs, he alſo exhorted the Gentiles that they ſhould not, by being proud and extolling themſelves, loſe the grace of adoption lately conveyed into them. But as in that general rejecting of the Jews, there remained yet ſome that were not fallen from the covenant of adoption, ſo out of the Gentiles there might ariſe ſome, which without true faith, ſhould be puffed up only with fooliſh confidence of the fleſh, and ſo abuſe God's loving kindneſs to their own deſtruction. But although you take this as ſpoken to the elect and faithful, yet thereupon ſhall follow no inconvenience. For it is one thing to hold down the raſh preſumption which out of the remnants of the fleſh creepeth ſometime even into the holy ones, that with vain confidence it wax not outrageouſly wanton: and another thing to ſtrike the conſcience with fear, that it reſt not with full aſſuredneſs in the mercy of God.

We may fear at the conſideration of our own frailty and corruption

23. Then, when he teacheth, that with fear and trembling we ſhould work our own ſalvation, he requireth nothing elſe, but that we ſhould accuſtom us with much abaſing of our ſelves, reverently to look up unto the mightineſs of God. For truly nothing doth ſo much awake us to caſt all our confidence and aſſurance of mind upon the Lord as doth the diſtruſt of our ſelves and carefulneſs conceived by knowlege in conſcience of our own wretchedneſs. And according to this meaning is that ſaying in the prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodneſs I will enter into thy temple: I will worſhip in fear. (Pſal. v. 8.) Where he comelily joineth the boldneſs of faith that leaneth upon Gods mercy with a reverent fear, which we muſt needs feel ſo oft as coming into the ſight of Gods majeſty, we perceive by the glorious brightneſs thereof, how great is our own filthineſs. And Solomon ſaith truly, (Prov. xxviii. 14.) where he pronounceth the man bleſſed, that continually maketh his own heart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into evil. But ſuch fear he meaneth as may make us more heedful, not ſuch whereby we ſhould be troubled and utterly fall: even ſuch a fear as when the mind confounded in it ſelf, doth recover it ſelf again in God: when deſpairing it ſelf, it reviveth by truſt in him. Therefore there is no cauſe to the contary, but that the faithful may at one time both be in fear, and alſo enjoy moſt aſſured comfort in reſpect that ſometime they turn their eyes to behold their own vanity, and ſometimes they caſt the thought of their mind upon the truth of God. But how (will ſome man ſay) ſhall fear and faith dwell both in one mind? Even thus, as contrarily unſenſible dulneſs, and carefulneſs. For whereas the wicked travel to procure to themſelves a want of grief, that no fear of God might trouble them, yet, the judgment of God ſo preſſeth them, that they cannot attain that which they deſire. So there is nothing to withſtand, but that God may exerciſe them that be his to humility, that in fighting valiantly, they may reſtrain themſelves under the bridle of modeſty. And by the proceſs of the text it appeareth, that this was the intent of the Apoſtle, where he aſſigneth the cauſe of fear, and trembling to be the good pleaſure of God, whereby he giveth to them that are his both to will well, and valiantly to go through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that ſaying of the prophet: (Hoſ. iii. 5.) The children of Iſrael ſhall fear God and his goodneſs: becauſe not only godlineſs begetteth a reverence of God, but the very ſweetneſs and pleaſant taſte of grace, filleth man being diſcoura-and yet in his mercy reſt with ſure and certain confidence.

ged in himſelf with fear and admiration, to make him depend upon God, and humbly yeild himſelf ſubject to his power.

By faith we look for aſſured ſalvation in Chriſt notwithſtanding the weakneſs and unworthineſs which we find to be in ourſelves.

24. Yet we do not hereby make room to that moſt peſtilent philoſophy, which many half Papiſts at this day begin to coin in corners. For, becauſe they cannot defend that groſs doubtfulneſs which hath been taught in ſchools, they flie to another device, to make a confidence mingled with diſtruſtfulneſs. They confeſs, that ſo oft as we look unto Chriſt, we find in him full matter to hope well: but becauſe we are always unworthy of thoſe good things that are offered us in Chriſt, they would have us to waver and ſtagger in beholding our own unworthineſs. Briefly, they place conſcience ſo between hope and fear, that it altereth from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courſes: and they ſo compare faith and hope together, that when the one ſpringeth up, the other is preſſed down, when the one ariſeth, the other again falleth. So when Satan ſeeth that thoſe open engines wherewith before time he was wont to deſtroy the aſſuredneſs of faith, do now nothing prevail, he endeavoureth by crooked underminings to overthrow it. But what manner of confidence ſhall that be, which ſhall now and then yield to deſperation? If (ſay they) thou conſider Chriſt, there is aſſured ſalvation: but if thou return to thy ſelf, there is aſſured damnation. Therefore of neceſſity diſtruſt and good hope muſt by enterchangeable courſes reign in thy mind: As though we ought to imagine Chriſt ſtanding a far off, and not rather dwelling within us. For therefore we look for ſalvation at his hand, not becauſe he appeareth afar off unto us, but becauſe he hath graffed us into his body, and ſo maketh us partakers not only of all his good things, but alſo of himſelf. Therefore I turn this their argument againſt themſelves: if thou conſider thy ſelf, there is certain damnation. But becauſe Chriſt with all his good things is by way of communicating ſo given unto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteouſneſs drowneth thy ſins, his ſalvation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthineſs cometh between thee and God, that thy unworthineſs come not in the ſight of God. Briefly, this is the truth: we ought neither to ſeparate Chriſt from us, nor us from him, but with both hands to hold faſt that fellowſhip whereby he hath united himſelf unto us. So the apoſtle teacheth us: (Rom. viii. 10.) The body indeed (ſaith he) is dead by reaſon of ſin: but the Spirit of Chriſt that dwelleth in you, is life for righteouſneſs. According to theſe mens trifling device he ſhould have ſaid, Chriſt indeed hath life with himſelf: but you, as you be ſinners, remain ſubject to death and damnation. But he ſaith far otherwiſe. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deſerve of ourſelves, is ſwallowed up by the ſalvation of Chriſt: and to prove it, he uſeth the ſame reaſon that I have alleged, becauſe Chriſt is not without us, but dwelleth within us, and cleaveth unto us not only with an indiviſible knot of fellowſhip, but with a certain marvellous communion daily more and more groweth with us into one body, till he be made altogether one with us. And yet I deny not, as I have ſaid a little before, that ſometimes there happen certain interruptions of faith, as the weakneſs thereof is among violent ſudden motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thick miſt of temptation the light thereof is choaked, but whatſoever happeneth, it ceaſeth not from endevour to ſeek God.

How wretched ſoever we be in ourſelves, by faith we know that by God's moſt gracious acceptation we are bleſſed.

25. And no otherwiſe doth Bernard argue, when he purpoſely treateth of this queſtion in his fifth Homilie in the dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I ſay) by the benefit of God ſtudying upon the ſoul, me thinks I find in it two things as it were contrary. If I behold the ſoul itſelf, as it is in itſelf and of itſelf, I can ſay nothing more truly of it, than that it is utterly brought to nought. What need I now to reckon up particularly all the miſeries of the ſoul, how it is loaden with ſins, covered with darkneſs, entangled with deceitful enticements, itching with luſts, ſubject to paſſions, filled with illuſions, alway enclined to evil, bent to all kinds of vice, finally full of ſhame and confuſion? Now if all the very righteouſneſs of it being looked upon by the light of truth be found like a cloth ſtained with flowers, then what ſhall the unrighteouſneſs thereof be accounted? If the light that is in us be darkneſs, how great ſhall the

the very darkneſs be? (Matth. vi. 13.) What then? without doubt man is made like unto vanity: man is brought to nought: man is nothing. But how then? is he utterly nothing whom God doth magnify? How then is he nothing, toward whom God's heart is ſet? Brethren, let us take heart again. Though we be nothing in our own hearts, peradventure there may ſomewhat of us lie hidden in the heart of God. O Father of mercies? O Father of the miſerable, how doeſt thou ſet thy heart toward us? For thy heart is where thy treaſure is. But how are we thy treaſure, if we be nothing? All nations are ſo before thee as if they were not, they ſhall be reputed as nothing. Even before thee, not within thee: ſo in the judgment of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pity. Thou calleſt thoſe things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, becauſe thou calleſt thoſe things that are not, and alſo they are becauſe thou calleſt them. For though they are not, in reſpect of themſelves, yet with thee they are, according to that ſaying of Paul, (Rom. ix. 12.) not of the works of righteouſneſs, but of him that calleth. And then he ſaith, that this joining together of both conſiderations is marvellous. Truly thoſe things that are knit together, do not the one deſtroy the other. Which alſo in the concluſion he more plainly declareth in theſe words. Now if with both theſe conſiderations we diligently look upon ourſelves what we be, yea in the one conſideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I think our glorying ſeemeth to be tempered, but peradventure it is more increaſed. Truly it is perfectly ſtabliſhed, that we glory not in ourſelves but in the Lord. If we think thus: If he hath determined to ſave us we ſhall by and by be delivered: now in this we may take courage. But let us climb up into a higher watch tower, and ſeek for the city of God, ſeek for the temple, ſeek for the houſe, ſeek for the ſpouſe. I have not forgotten, but I ſay it with fear and reverence, we, I ſay, are but in the heart of God. We are but by his allowing us, worthy, not by our own worthineſs.

A fear which we ought to nouriſh in our ſelves.

26. Now, the fear of the Lord, whereof commonly in every place witneſs is born to all the ſaints, and which is in ſome places called the beginning of wiſdom, (Prov. i. 7.) and in ſome places wiſdom itſelf, (Pſal. cix. 10. and Prov. xv. 14.) although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double underſtanding. For God hath in himſelf the reverence both of a Father and of a Lord. Therefore he that will truly worſhip him, will endeavour to ſhew himſelf both an obedient ſon and a ſerviceable ſervant unto him. The obedience that is given to him as to a father, the Lord by the prophet calleth honour: the ſervice that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth fear. The Son (ſaith he) honoureth the Father, and the ſervant the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my fear? (Mal. i. 7.) But howſoever he putteth difference between them, thou ſeeſt how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the fear of the Lord be unto us a reverence mingled with that ſame honour and fear. Neither is it any marvel if one mind receive both thoſe affections. For he that conſidereth with himſelf what a father God is unto us, he hath cauſe enough, although there were no hells at all, why he ſhould dread his diſpleaſure more grievouſly than any death. But alſo (ſuch is the wantonneſs of our fleſh to run to licentiouſneſs of ſinning) to reſtrain the ſame by all means we ought therewithal to take hold of this thought, that the Lord under whoſe power we live, abhorreth all iniquity, whoſe vengeance they ſhall not eſcape, that in living wickedly do provoke his wrath againſt themſelves.

What fear it is which perfect charity caſteth out.

27. But that which John ſaith, that fear is not in charity, but perfect charity caſteth out fear, becauſe fear containeth puniſhment, diſagreeth not with this that we ſay. For the wicked fear not God in this reſpect that they dread to incur his diſpleaſure, if they might do it without puniſhment but becauſe they know him to be armed with power to revenge: therefore they ſhake for fear at the hearing of his wrath. (1 John iv. 18.) And alſo they ſo fear his wrath, becauſe they think that it hange-h over them, for that they look every moment when it ſhall fall upon their heads. As for the faithful: they (as is above ſaid) both fear his diſpleaſure more than puniſhment, and are not troubled with fear of puniſhment as if it did hang over their necks, but they are made the more wary not to procure it. So ſaith the Apoſtle when he ſpeaketh to the faithful: Be ye not deceived: for this cometh the wrath of God upon the children of unbelief. He threateneth not that God's wrath will come upon them, but putteth them in mind to think upon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for ſuch wicked doings as he had recited, that they themſelves ſhould not be willing alſo to prove it. Altho' it ſeldom happeneth peneth, that the reprobate be awaked with only and bare threatnings, (Eph. v. 16.) but rather being already groſs and ſtupidly dull with their own hardneſs, ſo oft as God thundereth from heaven they harden themſelves to obſtinacy, but when they are once ſtriken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they are enforced to fear. This fear they commonly call a ſervile fear: and in compariſon ſet it far in oppoſition to free natured and willing fear which becometh children. Some others do ſubtily thruſt in a middle kind, becauſe that ſame ſervile and conſtrained affection ſometime ſo ſubdueth mens minds that they come willingly to the fear of God.

Faith being perſuaded of the good will of God, cannot but perſuade itſelf of all good things, eſpecially eternal life and ſalvation at the hands of God.

28. Now we underſtand, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is ſaid to have reſpect, the poſſeſſion of ſalvation and eternal life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is favourable unto us, it abundantly ſufficeth us to the aſſuredneſs of ſalvation, when he himſelf doth aſſure us of his love. Let him ſhew his face (ſaith the Prophet) and we ſhall be ſafe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to be the ſum of our ſalvation, that God putting away all enmities, hath received us into favour. Whereby they ſhew, that when God is reconciled unto us, there remaineth no peril, but that all things ſhall proſper well with us. Therefore faith having taking hold of the love of God, hath promiſes of the preſent life, and of the life to come, and perfect aſſuredneſs of all good things but that ſame ſuch as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promiſe to it ſelf either the length or honour or wealth of this life, foraſmuch as God willed none of theſe things to be appointed unto us, but is contented with this aſſuredneſs, that God will never fail, howſoever many things fail us that pertain to the maintenance of this preſent life. But the chief aſſuredneſs of faith reſteth in expectation of the life to come, which is ſet out of doubt by the word of God. But whatſoever miſeries and calamities befal unto them whom God loveth, they cannot work the contrary, but that his good-will is perfect felicity. Therefore when we meant to expreſs the ſum of bleſſedneſs, we named the favour of God, out of which ſpring flows unto us all kinds of good things. And this we may commonly note throughout the ſcriptures, that whenſoever mention is made not only of eternal ſalvation, but alſo of any good thing in us, we are always called back to the love of God. For which cauſe David ſaith, Pſal. lxiii. 4. that the goodneſs of God, when it is felt in a godly heart, is ſweeter and more to be deſired than life itſelf. Finally, if all things elſe do flow unto us according to our own wiſhing, and we be uncertain of God's love or hatred, our felicity ſhall be accurſed, and therefore miſerable: but if the favourable face of God do ſhine upon us, even our very miſeries ſhall be bleſſed, becauſe they are turned to helps of our ſalvation. As Paul, when he heapeth up a rehearſal of all adverſities, Rom. viii. 35. yet he glorieth that he was not by them ſeparated from the love of God: and in his prayers he always beginneth at the favour of God from whence floweth all proſperity. Likewiſe David (Pſal. xxiii. 4.) ſetteth the favour of God alone againſt all the terrors that trouble us. Tho' (ſaith he) I ſhall walk in the midſt of the ſhadow of death, I will fear no evils, becauſe thou art with me. And we always feel that our minds do waver, unleſs being contented with the favour of God, they ſeek their peace in it, and have this inwardly fixed in them that is ſaid in the Pſalm, bleſſed is the people whoſe God is the Lord, (Pſal. xxxiii. 12. and the nation whom he hath choſen to him for his inheritance.

Though faith do believe whatſoever God ſpeaketh, yet it principally reſpecteth the promiſe of ſalvation freely offered in the Goſpel.

29. We make the foundation of faith to be the free promiſe of God becauſe faith properly ſtayeth upon it. For though faith doth believe God to be true in all things whether he command or forbid, whether he promiſe or threaten, and alſo obediently receiveth his commandments, and beware of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatnings, yet properly it beginneth at the promiſe, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith ſeeketh for life in God, which is not found in commandments or declarations of penalties, but in the promiſe of mercy and in no other promiſe, but ſuch as is freely given. For the conditonal promiſe, by which we are ſent to our own works, doth no otherwiſe promiſe life, but if we perceive it to ſtand in our ſelves. Therefore if we will not have our faith to tremble and waver, we muſt ſtay it with that promiſe of ſalvation, which is willingly and liberally offered us of the Lord, rather in reſpect of our miſery, than of our own worthineſs. Wherefore the Apoſtle beareth this witneſs of the Goſpel, (Rom. x. 8.) that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commandments and alſo from the promiſes of the law, becauſe there is nothing that can ſtabliſh faith but that liberal embassay, by which God reconcileth the world to himself. Therefore the same apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the gospel together, when he teacheth (Rom. i. 6. and xvi. 17.) that the ministry of the gospel was committed to him unto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth: that in it is revealed the righteousness of God from faith to faith. And no wonder. For since the gospel is the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. v. 18.) there is no other testimony sure enough of God's good will toward us, the knowlege whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest upon the free promise, we do not deny but that the faithful do every way embrace and receive the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercy to be the proper mark of faith. Even as the faithful ought indeed to acknowlege God to be the judge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly have regard unto his merciful kindness: forasmuch as he is described to them to be considered such a one as is loving and merciful, far from wrath, of much goodness, gentle unto all, pouring forth his mercy upon all his works. Psal. lxxxvi. 5. and ciii. lxxxi. 5.

The reasons why the promise of mercy in Christ is put not for the only, yet for the principal object of faith.

30. Neither yet do I regard the barkings of Pighius, or such other dogs, when they find fault with this restraint, as though in dividing faith it did take hold but of one piece thereof. I grant (as I have already said) that the general object of faith (as they term it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put us in hope of favour. Wherefore the apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noah feared the destruction of the world, when it was not yet seen. Heb. xi. If the fear of a punishment shortly to come was the work of faith, then ought not the threatnings to be excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeed true. But the cavillers do unjustly accuse us, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the parts of the word of God. For our meaning is only to shew those two things, first, that faith never stedfastly standeth until it come to free promise: and then that we are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but because it uniteth us to Christ. Both those points are worthy to be noted. We seek such a faith, which may make difference between the children of God and the reprobate, between the faithful and the unbelieving. If a man do believe that God both justly commandeth all that he commandeth, and truly threateneth, shall he be therefore called faithful? Nothing less. Therefore there can be no stedfast stay of faith unless it be grounded upon the mercy of God. But now to what end do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learn the way of salvation? But how doth faith bring salvation but in respect that it graffeth us into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconvenience, if in the definition we do enforce the principal effect thereof, and do join unto the general name, instead of a difference that mark which distinguisheth the faithful from the unbelieving. Finally, the malicious have nothing to find fault withal in this doctrine, but they must wrap up Paul with us in the same blame, who calleth the gospel properly the word of faith. Rom. x. 8.

The consideration of the power of God and of the works which he hath done confirmeth us in faith: yet all vanisheth except we rely upon his word.

31. But hereupon again we gather that which we have before declared, that faith doth no less need the word than the fruit doth need the lively root of the tree, because no other (as David Psal. ix. 11. testifieth) can trust in the Lord, but they that know his name. But this knowlege is not according to every man's imagination, but so far as God himself is witness of his own goodness. Which the same prophet confirmeth in another place, cxix. 43. saying: Thy salvation is according to thy word. Again, I have trusted in thy word, save me. Where is to be noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how salvation followeth. And yet in the mean time we do not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, unless faith sustain it self, it can never give unto God his due honour. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certain slender and common thing of Abraham, (Rom. iv. 21.) that he believed that God which had promised him the blessed seed, was able to perform it. Again in another place, speaking of himself: (2 Tim. i. 18.) I know whom I have believed, and I am sure that he is able to keep that which I have left with him until that day. But if a man weigh with himself how many doubtings of the power of God do oftentimes creep into man's mind, he shall well perceive that they which do highly esteem it as it is worthy, have not a little profited in faith. We all will confess that God is able to do whatsoever he will, but when even the least temptation throweth us down with fear, and amazeth us with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of God's power, when we prefer above it thoſe things, that Satan threateneth againſt God's promiſes. This is the reaſon why Iſaiah, meaning to print into the hearts of the people the aſſuredneſs of ſalvation, doth ſo honourably treat of the infinite power of God. It ſeemeth oft that ſo ſoon as he hath begun to ſpeak of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandereth about in long and ſuperfluous circumſtances, rehearſing how marvellouſly the Lord governeth the frame of heaven and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is here nothing that ſerveth not fitly for the circumſtance of the matter that he ſpeaketh of. For unleſs the power of God whereby he is able to do all things be preſently ſet before our eyes, our ears will hardly hear the word, or will not eſteem it ſo much as it is worth. Beſide that, here is declared his effectual power, becauſe godlineſs (as we have already ſhewed in another place) doth alway apply the power of God to uſe and work, ſpecially it ſetteth before itſelf thoſe works of God, whereby he hath teſtified himſelf to be a father. Hereupon cometh that in the ſcriptures is ſo often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Iſraelites might have learned that God which was once the author of ſalvation, will be an everlaſting preſerver thereof. And David putteth us in mind by his own example, that thoſe benefits which God hath particularly beſtowed upon every man, do afterward avail to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God ſeemeth to have forſaken us, it behoveth us to ſtretch our wits further, that his ancient benefits may recomfort us, as it is ſaid in Pſalm civ. 43. I have been mindful of old days. I have ſtudied upon all thy works, &c. Again, Pſal. lxxvii. 11. I will remember the works of the Lord, and his marvels from the beginning. But becauſe without the word all quickly vaniſheth away that we conceive of the power of God and of his works, therefore we do not without cauſe affirm that there is no faith, unleſs God give light unto it with teſtimony of his grace. But here a queſtion might be moved, what is to be thought of Sarah and Rebecca, (Gen. xv.) both which being moved as it ſeemeth with zeal of faith, paſſed beyond the bounds of the word. Sarah, when ſhe fervently deſired the promiſed iſſue, gave her bondmaid to her huſband. It cannot be denied but that ſhe many ways ſinned, but now I touch only this fault, that being carried away with her zeal, ſhe did not reſtrain herſelf within the bounds of God's word, yet it is certain that that deſire proceeded of faith. (Gen. xxvi.) Rebecca being certified by the oracle of God of the election of her ſon Jacob, procured his bleſſing by evil crafty means: ſhe deceived her huſband the witneſs and miniſter of the grace of God: ſhe compelled her ſon to lie: ſhe by divers guiles and deceits corrupted the truth of God: Finally, in making a ſcorn of his promiſe, ſhe did as much as in her lay, deſtroy it. And yet this act, how much ſoever it was evil, and worthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was neceſſary that ſhe ſhould overcome many offences, that ſhe might ſo earneſtly endeavour to attain that which without hope of earthly profit was full of great troubles and dangers. As we may not ſay that the holy Patriarch Iſaac was altogether without faith, becauſe he being by the ſame oracle of God admoniſhed of the honour transferred to the younger ſon, yet ceaſed not to be more favourably bent to his firſt begotten ſon Eſau. Truly theſe examples do teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet ſo that faith if it be a true faith, hath alway the upper hand. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make void the effect of the bleſſing, ſo neither did it make void her faith which generally reigned in her mind, and was the beginning and cauſe of that doing. Nevertheleſs therein Rebecca ſhewed how ready man's mind is to fall ſo ſoon as he giveth himſelf, never ſo little liberty. But though man's default and weakneſs doth darken faith, yet it doth not quench it: in the mean time it putteth us in mind, how carefully we ought to depend upon the mouth of God, and alſo confirmeth that which we have taught, that faith vaniſheth away, unleſs it be upholden by the word: as the minds both of Sarah and Iſaac and Rebecca had become vain in their crooked wanderings out of the way, unleſs they had been by God's ſecret bridle holden in obedience of the word.

Faith embraceth no promiſe but in Chriſt by whom the thing promiſed is derived from God to us.

32. Again, not without cauſe we include all the promiſes in Chriſt, for as much as in the knowlege of him the apoſtle includeth all the goſpel: (Rom. i. 3.) and in another place he teacheth, 2 Cor. i. 20.) that all the promiſes of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reaſon whereof is ready to be ſhewed. For if God promiſe any thing, he therein ſheweth his good will: ſo that there is no promiſe of his, that is not a teſtimony of his love. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they have great and continual benefits of God's liberality heaped upon them, do thereby thereby wrap themſelves in ſo much the more grievous judgment. For ſince they do neither think nor acknowlege that thoſe things come unto them from the hand of God, for if they acknowlege it, they do not with themſelves conſider his goodneſs, therefore they cannot thereby be better taught of his mercy than brute beaſts, which according to the meaſure of their eſtate, do receive the ſame fruit of God's liberality, and yet they perceive it not. Neither doth it any more make againſt us, that many times in refuſing the promiſes appointed for them, they do by that occaſion procure to themſelves the greater vengeance. For although the effectual working of the promiſes do then only appear, when they have found faith with us, yet the force and natural property of them is never extinguiſhed by our unbelief or unthankfulneſs. Therefore when the Lord by his promiſes doth provoke man not only to receive, but alſo to think upon the fruits of his bountifulneſs, he doth therewithal declare unto him his love. Whereupon we muſt return to this point, that every promiſe is a teſtifying of God's love toward us. But it is out of queſtion, that no man is loved of God but in Chriſt, he is the beloved Son, in whom the love of the Father abideth and reſteth, and then from him poureth it ſelf abroad unto us: (Eph. i. 6.) as Paul teacheth, that we have obtained favour in the beloved one. Therefore it muſt needs be derived and come unto us by means of him. For this cauſe the apoſtle in another place calleth him our peace: (Eph. ii. 14.) in another place he ſetteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly natural kindneſs bound unto us. (Rom. vii. 3 and v. 8.) It followeth then that we muſt caſt our eyes upon him, ſo oft as any promiſe is offered us. And that Paul teacheth no abſurdity, that all God's promiſes whatſoever they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There are certain examples that make for the contrary. For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the prophet the manner how to worſhip God aright, was inſtructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlineſs is praiſed. (2 Kings v. 17.) Cornelius a Gentile and a Roman could ſcarcely underſtand that which was known, not to all the Jews, yea and that very darkly: yet his alms and prayers were acceptable to God, and the ſacrifice of Naaman, by the prophet's anſwer allowed. (2 Kings v. 17.) Which thing neither of them could obtain but by faith. Likewiſe it may be ſaid of the Eunuch to whom Philip was carried, who if he had not had ſome faith, would not have taken upon him the travel and expences of ſo long a journey, to worſhip. (Acts viii. 31.) Yet we ſee, when Philip examined him, how he betrayed his ignorance of the Mediator, And truly I grant that their faith was partly unexpreſſed, not only concerning Chriſt's perſon, but alſo concerning his power and the office committed unto him of the Father. Yet in the mean time it is certain, that they were inſtructed in ſuch principles, as gave them ſome taſte of Chriſt, although but very ſmall. Neither ought this to ſeem ſtrange: for neither would the Eunuch have come in haſte to Jeruſalem from a far country to worſhip an unknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Jewiſh religion ſpend ſo much time, without being acquainted with the firſt grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had been a very fooliſh abſurdity for Eliſha when he taught him of ſmall things, to have ſaid nothing of the principal point. Therefore although there were among them an obſcure knowlege of Chriſt, yet it is not likely that there was no knowlege becauſe they did uſe themſelves in the ſacrifices of the law, which muſt have been diſcerned by the very end of them, that is Chriſt, from the falſe ſacrifices of the Gentiles.

The outward declaration of the word without an inward enlightening by the ſpirit doth not ſuffice either to breed or increaſe faith in us.

33. But this bare and outward declaration of the word of God, ought to have largely ſufficed to make it to be believed, if our own blindneſs and ſtubbornneſs did not withſtand it. But our mind hath ſuch an inclination to vanity, that it can never cleave faſt unto the truth of God, and hath ſuch a dulneſs, that it is always blind and cannot ſee the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing availably, done by the word without the enlightening of the holy Ghoſt. Whereby alſo appeareth, that faith is far above man's underſtanding. Neither ſhall it be ſufficient that the mind be enlightened with the Spirit of God, unleſs the heart be alſo ſtrengthened and ſtabliſhed with his power. Wherein the ſchoolmen do altogether err, who in conſidering of faith do only take hold of a bare and ſimple aſſent by knowlege, leaving out the confidence and aſſuredneſs of the heart. Therefore faith is both ways a ſingular gift of God; both that the mind of man is cleanſed to taſte the truth of God, and that his heart is ſtabliſhed therein. For the holy Ghoſt not only is the beginner of faith, but alſo by degrees increaſeth it, until by it he bring us to the heavenly kingdom. That good thing (ſaith Paul) 2 Tim. i. 14. which was committed to thy keeping, keep in the holy Ghoſt which dwelleth in us. But how Paul ſaith, (Gal. iii. 2.) that the holy Ghoſt is given by the hearing of faith, we may eaſily reſolve it. If there had been but one only gift of the holy Ghoſt, then it had been an abſurdity for him to call the holy Ghoſt the effect of faith, who is the author and cauſe of faith. But when he maketh mention of the gifts with which God beautifies his church, and by encreaſing of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no wonder if he aſcribe thoſe things to faith which maketh us fit to receive them. This is reckoned a moſt ſtrange concluſion, when it is ſaid, that no man but he to whom it is given, can believe in Chriſt. But that is partly becauſe they do not conſider either how ſecret and high the heavenly wiſdom is, or how great man's dulneſs is in conceiving the myſteries of God: and partly becauſe they look not unto that aſſured and ſtedfaſt conſtantneſs of heart, that is to ſay, the chief part of faith.

Our blindneſs before the Spirit open our eyes and the clearneſs of our minds after.

34. But if (as Paul 1 Cor. ii. 11. preacheth) no man knoweth of the will of man, but the ſpirit of man that is within him, then how ſhould man be ſure of the will of God? And if the truth of God be uncertain among us, in thoſe things that we preſently behold with our eye, how ſhould it be aſſured and ſtedfaſt among us there where the Lord promiſeth ſuch things as neither eye ſeeth, nor wit comprehendeth? But herein man's ſharpneſs of underſtanding is ſo overthrown and faileth, that the firſt degree of profiting in God's ſchool, is to forſake his own wit. For by it as by a vail caſt before us, we are hindered that we cannot attain the myſteries of God, (Matth. xi. 15.) which are not diſcloſed but (Luke x. 21.) to little ones. For neither (Matth. xvi. 17.) doth fleſh and blood diſcloſe nor (1 Cor. ii. 14.) natural man perceive thoſe things that are of the Spirit but rather to him the learning of God is fooliſhneſs, becauſe it is ſpiritually to be judged. Therefore herein (Rom. xi. 34.) the help of the holy Ghoſt is neceſſary, or rather herein his power only reigneth. There (1 Cor. ii. 10.) is no man that knoweth the mind of God, or hath been his counſeller: but the holy Spirit ſearcheth out all things, even the deep ſecrets of God, by whom it is brought to paſs, that we know the mind of Chriſt. No man (ſaith he John vi. 43.) can come to me: unleſs my Father that ſent me, draw him. Every one therefore that hath heard and learned of my Father, cometh. Not that any man hath ſeen the Father, but he that is ſent of God. Even as therefore we cannot come unto Chriſt, but being drawn by the Spirit of God: ſo when we are drawn we are lifted up in wit and mind above our underſtanding. For the ſoul enlightened by him, acquireth as it were a new ſharpneſs of underſtanding, by which it may behold heavenly myſteries, with the brightneſs whereof it was before dazled in itſelf. And ſo man's underſtanding receiving brightneſs by the light of the holy Ghoſt, doth never till then truly begin to taſte of thoſe things that belong to the kingdom of God, being before altogether unſavoury and without judgment of taſte to take hold of them. Therefore when Chriſt did notably explain unto two of his diſciples the myſteries of his kingdom, yet he nothing prevailed, until he opened their ſenſes that they might underſtand the ſcriptures. When the apoſtles (Luke xxiv. 27. and 45.) were ſo taught by his divine lips, yet the Spirit of truth muſt be ſent unto them, to pour into their minds the ſame doctrine which they had heard with their ears. (John xvi. 15.) The word of God is like unto the ſun that ſhineth unto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profit among blind men. But we are all in this behalf blind by nature, therefore it cannot pierce into our mind but by the inward teacher the holy Ghoſt, making by his enlightening an entry for it.

The light of faith is the gift of God not beſtowed indifferently upon all men.

35. In another place, when we had to treat of the corruption of nature, we have more largely ſhewed how unfit men are to believe. Therefore I will not weary the readers with repeating the ſame again. Let this be ſufficient that the ſpirit of faith is called by Paul (2 Cor. iv. 13.) faith itſelf, which the Spirit giveth us, but not which we have naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfil in the Theſſalonians (2 Theſſ. i. 11.) all his good pleaſure. and the work of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the work of God and giving it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of appoſition God's good pleaſure, he denieth that it is of man's own motion: and not contented therewith he addeth further, that it is a declaration of God's power: writing to the Corinthians, where he ſaith, that faith dependeth not upon the wiſdom of men, but is grounded upon the power of the holy Ghoſt. He ſpeaketh indeed of outward miracles: but becauſe the the reprobate are blind at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth alſo that inward ſeal, whereof he maketh mention in another place. And God, the more glorioufly to ſet forth his liberality in ſo noble a gift, vouchſafeth not to grant it to all univerſally without difference, but by ſingular privilege giveth it to whom he will. For proof of which, we have alleged teſtimonies before. Of which Auguſtine being a faithful expoſitor, crieth out, that it would pleaſe the Saviour to teach him, and that the very believing itſelf, is of gift and not of deſerving. No man (ſaith he) cometh to me, unleſs my Father draw him, and to whom it is given of my Father. It is marvellous that two do hear, the one deſpiſeth, the other aſcendeth up. Let him that deſpiſeth, impute it to himſelf: let not him that aſcendeth, arrogantly aſſign it to himſelf. In another place. Why is it given to one and not to another? It grieveth me not to ſay it, this is the depth of the croſs. Out of I know not what depth of the judgments of God which we may not ſearch proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I ſee: whereby I can, I ſee not, ſaving that I ſee thus far, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomleſs depth, it is the depth of the croſs. I may cry out with wondering, but not ſhew it in diſputing. Finally, the ſum cometh to this, that Chriſt when he enlighteneth us unto faith by the power of his Spirit, doth therewithal graff us into his body, that we may be made partakers of all good things.

We have not faith as ſoon as the truth is conceived in our minds, except the Spirit ſeal it alſo to our hearts.

36. Now it remaineth that that which the mind hath received, may be further conceived into the heart. For the word of God is not thoroughly received by faith, if it ſwim in the top of the brain, but when it hath taken root in the bottom of the heart, that it may be an invincible defence to bear and repuiſe all the engines of temptations. Now if it be true, that the true underſtanding of the mind is the enlightening thereof, then in ſuch confirmation of the heart, his power much more evidently appeareth, even by ſo much as the diſtruſtfulneſs of the heart is greater than the blindneſs of the judgment: And as it is harder to have the mind furniſhed with aſſuredneſs, than the judgment to be inſtructed with thinking; therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a ſeal, to ſeal up in our hearts thoſe ſame promiſes, the aſſurance of which it firſt imprinted in our judgments, and ſerveth as an earneſt to confirm and eſtabliſh them. Since ye believed (ſaith the apoſtle) Eph. i. ye are ſealed up with the holy Spirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the Spirit the hearts of the faithful are graven as with a ſeal? And how for the ſame reaſon he calleth him the Spirit of promiſe, becauſe he ratifieth the goſpel unto us? Likewiſe to the Corinthians he ſaith, (1 Cor. i. 21. and v. 5.) God who anointed us, who hath alſo ſealed us, and given us the earneſt of his Spirit in our heart. And in another place when he ſpeaketh of confidence, and boldneſs of hoping well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37. Neither have I forgotten that which I ſaid before, the remembrance whereof experience continually reneweth, that is, that faith is toſſed with divers doubtings, ſo that the minds of the godly are ſeldom quiet, or at leaſt do not always enjoy a peaceable ſtate: but with whatſoever engine they be ſhaken, either they riſe up out of the very gulf of temptations, or do abide faſt in their ſtanding. Truly this aſſuredneſs only nouriſheth and defendeth faith, when we hold faſt that which is ſaid in the Pſalms, (Pſalm. xlvi. 3.) The Lord is our protection, our help in trouble, therefore we will not fear, when the earth ſhall tremble, and the mountains ſhall leap into the heart of the ſea. Alſo this moſt ſweet quietneſs is ſpoken of in another place: Pſal. iii. 6. I lay down and ſlept, and roſe again, becauſe the Lord hath ſuſtained me: it is not meant thereby that David was always with one undiſturbed courſe framed to a merry chearfulneſs: but in reſpect that he taſted the grace of God according to his proportion of faith, therefore he glorieth that he without fear deſpiſeth all that ever might diſquiet the peace of his mind. Therefore the ſcripture meaning to exhort us to faith, biddeth us to be quiet. In Iſaiah it is ſaid, (Iſai. xxx. 15.) In hope and ſilence ſhall be your ſtrength. In the Pſalms, (Pſal. xxxvii. 7.) Hold thee ſtill in the Lord, and wait for him. Wherewith agreeth that ſaying of the apoſtle to the Hebrews, chap. x. 36. Patince is needful, &c.

The certainty of grace which we have by faith is more than moral or conjectural.

38. Hereby we may judge how pernicious is that doctrine of the ſchoolmen, that we can no otherwiſe determine of the grace of God towards us, than by moral conjecture as every man thinketh himſelf worthy of it. Truly if we ſhall weigh by our works how God is minded towards us, I grant that we can attain it with any conjecture be it never ſo ſlender: but ſince faith ought to have relation to a ſimple and free promiſe there is left no cauſe of doubting. For with what confidence (I beſeech you) ſhall we be armed, if we ſay that God is favourable unto us upon this condition, ſo that the pureneſs of our life do deſerve it? But becauſe I have appointed one place properly for the diſcuſſing hereof, therefore I will ſpeak no more of them at this preſent, ſpecially foraſmuch as it is plain enough, that there is nothing more contrary to faith, than either conjecture, or any thing near unto doubting. And they do very ill wreſt to this purpoſe, that teſtimony of the preacher which they have oft in their mouths: Eccl. ix. 1. No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or love. For (to ſpeak nothing how this place is in the common tranſlation corruptly turned) yet even children cannot be ignorant what Solomon meaneth by theſe words: that if any man will judge by the preſent ſtate of things, whom God hateth, or whom God loveth, he laboureth in vain, and troubleth himſelf to no profit for his pains: ſince all things happen alike both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth ſacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not always witneſs his love to them to whom he maketh all things happen proſperouſly, nor doth always diſcover hatred to them whom he puniſheth. And this he doth, to condemn the vanity of man's wit, ſince it is ſo ignorant in things needful to be known: as he had written a little before, that it cannot be diſcerned what the ſoul of man differeth from the ſoul of a beaſt, becauſe it ſeemeth to die in like manner. If any man will conclude therefrom that the opinion we hold of the immortality of ſouls ſtandeth upon conjecture; may he not deſervedly be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits, who infer that there is no certainty of God's grace, becauſe we can conceive none by the carnal beholding of preſent things?

It is no preſumption to know the love of God towards us, and his Spirit which is in us.

39. But they allege that it is a point of raſh preſumption, to take upon us an undoubted knowlege of God's will. I would indeed grant it unto them, if we did take ſo much upon us, that we would make the incomprehenſible ſecret purpoſe of God ſubject to the weakneſs of our underſtanding: but when we ſimply ſay with Paul, that we have received not the ſpirit of this world, but the ſpirit that is of God, by whoſe teaching we may know thoſe things that are given us of God, what can they bark againſt it, but they muſt ſlanderouſly ſpeak againſt the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible robbery of God to accuſe the revelation that cometh from him, either to be lying, or unaſſured, or doubtful, what do we offend in affirming that it is aſſured? But they ſay, that this alſo is not without great preſumptuouſneſs that we dare ſo glory of the Spirit of Chriſt. Who would think that their dulneſs were ſo great that would be counted maſters of the world, that they ſo foully ſtumble in the firſt principles of religion? Surely I would not think it credible, unleſs their own writings that are abroad did teſtify it. Paul pronounceth (Rom. viii. 14.) that they only are the children of God, that are moved with his Spirit: and theſe men would have them that are the children of God, to be moved with their own Spirit, and to be without the Spirit of God. Paul teacheth (Rom. viii. 16.) that we call God our father, as the holy Ghoſt miniſtereth that word unto us, which only can bear witneſs to our ſpirit that we are the children of God: Theſe men, although they forbid us not to call upon God, yet do take away his Spirit, by whoſe guidance he ſhould have been rightly called upon. Paul denieth (Rom. viii. 11.) that they are the ſervants of Chriſt, who are not moved with the ſpirit of Chriſt: theſe men find a chriſtianity that needeth not the ſpirit of Chriſt. Paul maketh no hope of the bleſſed reſurrection, unleſs we feel the holy Ghoſt abiding in us: they forge a hope without any ſuch feeling. But perhaps they will anſwer, that they do not deny that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modeſty and humility not to acknowlege it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to try (2 Cor. xiii. 5.) whether they be in the faith, to prove themſelves whether they have Chriſt, whom unleſs a man do acknowlege to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the ſpirit that God hath given us (ſaith John 1 John iii. 24. Iſai. xxxiv. 3.) we know that he abideth in us. And what do we elſe but call the promiſes of Chriſt in doubt, when we will be counted the ſervants of God without his ſpirit, which he hath openly declared, that he would pour out upon all his? Beſides that, we do wrong to the holy Ghoſt, if we do ſeparate from him Faith which is his peculiar work. Since theſe are the firſt leſſons of true religion it is a token of miſerable blindneſs, to accuſe chriſtians of arrogancy, who dare glory of the preſence of the holy Ghoſt, without which glorying Chriſtianity it ſelf doth not ſtand. But they declare by their example how truly truly Chriſt ſaid, (John xiv. 17.) that his ſpirit is unknown to the world, and is only known of them with whom he abideth.

Not only our preſent but our future eſtate by faith certain.

40. And becauſe they will not go about to overthrow the ſtedfaſtneſs of faith by digging only at one mine, they attack it alſo otherwiſe. For they ſay, that although according to our preſent ſtate of righteouſneſs, we may gather a judgment of the grace of God, yet the knowlege of perſeverance to the end abideth in ſuſpence. A goodly confidence of ſalvation forſooth is left unto us, if we judge by moral conjecture, that for a preſent moment we are in favour, and what ſhall become of us to morrow we cannot tell. The Apoſtle teacheth far otherwiſe: I am ſurely perſuaded (ſaith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death nor life, neither things preſent nor things to come, ſhall ſeparate us from the love wherewith the Lord embraceth us in Chriſt. They ſeek to eſcape with a trifling ſolution, ſaying that the Apoſtle had that by ſpecial revelation. But they are holden too faſt to ſlip away ſo. For there he treateth of thoſe good things that commonly come by faith to the faithful, not thoſe that he himſelf ſpecially feeleth. But the ſame Paul in another place putteth us in fear with mention of our weakneſs and unſtedfaſtneſs: Let him that ſtandeth (ſaith he 1 Cor. x. 12.) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not ſuch a fear whereby we ſhould be overthrown, but whereby we may learn to humble ourſelves under the mighty hand of God, as Peter expoundeth (1 Pet. v. 6.) it, Then how againſt order and truth is it to limit the aſſurance of faith to a moment of time, whoſe property is to paſs beyond the ſpaces of this life, and extend further to immortality to come? Since therefore the faithful do impute it to the grace of God, that being enlightened with his Spirit they do by faith enjoy the beholding of the heavenly life: ſo far is ſuch glorying from preſumptuouſneſs, that if any man be aſhamed to confeſs it, he doth therein more betray his extreme unthankfulneſs in unkindly hiding God's goodneſs, than he doth declare his modeſty or ſubmiſſion.

The Apoſtle's definition of faith who termeth it a ſubſtance of things hoped for and a certainty of things unſeen.

41. Becauſe it ſeemed that the nature of faith could not otherwiſe better or more plainly be declared than by the ſubſtance of the promiſe upon which it reſteth as upon its proper foundation, ſo that if the promiſe be taken away, faith by and by falleth down or rather vaniſheth away: therefore we took our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather deſcription of the apoſtle, which he applyeth to his diſcourſe, where he ſaith that faith is a ſubſtance of things to be hoped for, and a certainty of things that are not ſeen. (Heb. xi. 1.) For by this word Hypoſtaſis ſubſtance (for that term he uſeth) he meaneth as it were, an upholding ſtay, whereupon the godly mind leaneth and reſteth. As if he ſhould ſay that faith is a certain and aſſured poſſeſſion of thoſe things that are promiſed us of God, unleſs a man had rather take Hypoſtaſis for truſt, which I diſlike not, altho' I follow that which is more commonly received. Again, to ſignify that even to the laſt day when the books ſhall be opened, (Dan. vii. 10.) they are higher than thoſe things that may be perceived with our ſenſes, or ſeen with our eyes, or handled with our hands, and that the ſame are no otherwiſe poſſeſſed by us, but if we go beyond the capacity of our own wit, and bend our underſtanding above all things that are in the world, yea and climb above ourſelves, he hath therefore added that this aſſuredneſs of poſſeſſion, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not ſeen. For plain appearance (as Paul writeth Rom. viii. 24.) is not hope, neither hope we for thoſe things that we ſee. And when he calleth it a certainty or proof (or as Auguſtin Auguſt. Hom. in Johan. 79, 95. De peccat. merit. & remiſſ. li. 2. cap. 31. hath oft tranſlated it) a conjunction of things not preſent: for in Greek it is Elenchos, he ſaith as much as if he did ſay, that it is an evident ſhewing of things not appearing, a ſeeing of things not ſeen, a plainneſs of dark things: a preſence of things abſent, an open ſhewing of hidden things. For the myſteries of God, ſuch as they be that pertain to our ſalvation, cannot be ſeen in themſelves and in their own nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whoſe truth we ought to be ſo fully perſuaded, that we ought to hold all that he ſpeaketh as it were already done and fulfilled. But how can the mind lift up itſelf to receive ſuch a proof of God's goodneſs, but that it muſt needs be therewith wholly kindled to love God again? For that flowing plenty of ſweetneſs which God hath laid up in ſtore for them that fear him, cannot be truly known, but that it muſt therewithal vehemently move affection; and whoſe affection it once moveth, moveth, it utterly raviſheth and carrieth him beyond himſelf. Therefore it is no wonder, if into a perverſe and crooked heart never entreth this affection, by which being conveyed up into the very heaven, we are ſuffered to come to the moſt ſecretly hidden treaſures of God, and the moſt ſacred privy places of his kingdom, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an unclean heart. For that which the ſchoolmen teach, that charity is before faith and hope, is a mere madneſs. For it is faith only that firſt engendereth charity in us. How much more rightly doth Bernard teach: Lib. 3. Sen. diſt. 25. & ſæpius. Ser. 1. in Annuntiatione. I believe (ſaith he) that the teſtimony of conſcience, which Paul calleth the glory of the godly, conſiſteth in three things. For firſt of all it is neceſſary to believe that thou canſt not have forgiveneſs of ſins, but by the pardon of God: then that thou canſt have no good work at all, unleſs he alſo give it: laſt of all that thou canſt by no works deſerve eternal life, unleſs it alſo be given freely. A little after he addeth that theſe things ſuffice not, but that there is a certain beginning of faith, becauſe in believing that ſins cannot be forgiven but by God, we ought alſo to believe that they are not forgiven us, till alſo we be perſuaded by the teſtimony of the holy Ghoſt, that ſalvation is laid up in ſtore for us: becauſe God forgiveth ſins, he himſelf giveth merits, and he himſelf alſo giveth rewards, that we may not ſtay ſtill in this beginning. But theſe and other things ſhall be treated of in places fit for them. Now let it only ſuffice to know what faith is.

42. Now whereſoever this lively faith ſhall be, it cannot be poſſible but that it hath with it the hope of eternal ſalvation, as an inſeparable companion: or rather that it begetteth or bringeth it forth out of itſelf, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriouſly ſoever we talk of faith, yet we are convicted to have no faith at all. For if faith (as is above ſaid) be an aſſured perſuaſion of God's truth, that it cannot lie unto us nor deceive us, nor become void, then they that have conceived this aſſuredneſs, truly do therewithal look for a time to come that God ſhall perform his promiſes, which in their perſuaſion cannot be but true: ſo that briefly, hope is nothing elſe, but a looking for thoſe things which faith hath believed to be truly promiſed of God. So faith believeth that God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his truth in convenient time. Faith believeth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to ſhew himſelf ſuch a one towards us. Faith believeth that eternal life is given us, hope looketh that it ſhall be one day revealed. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope reſteth, hope nouriſheth and ſuſtaineth faith. For as no man can look for any thing at God's hand, but he that hath firſt believed his promiſes: ſo again the weakneſs of our faith muſt with patient hope and expectation be ſuſtained and cheriſhed, that it fall not as fainting for wearineſs. For which reaſon Paul doth well place our ſalvation in hope. (Rom. viii. 24.) For hope, while it in ſilence, looketh for the Lord, reſtraineth faith that it fall not headlong with too much haſte: hope ſtrengtheneth faith, that it waver not in God's promiſes, nor begin to doubt of the truth of them: hope refreſheth faith that it wax not weary: hope ſtretcheth faith to the uttermoſt bound, that it faint not in the mid courſe, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continually renewing and reſtoring it, maketh it now and then to riſe up freſher than itſelf to continuance. But how many ways the helps of hope are neceſſary to the ſtrengthening of faith, ſhall better appear, if we conſider with how many ſorts of temptations they are aſſaulted and ſhaken, that have embraced the word of God. Firſt, the Lord in deferring his promiſes doth oftimes hold our minds longer in ſuſpenſe than we would wiſh: here it is the office of hope to perform, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promiſes do tarry, (Hab. ii. 3.) yet we ſhould wait ſtill for them. Sometimes he ſuffereth us not only to faint, but alſo ſeemeth to be highly diſpleaſed: here it is much more neceſſary to have hope to help us, that according to that ſaying of another Prophet, (Iſa. viii. 17.) we may ſtill look for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Jacob. (2 Pet. iii. 4.) There ſhall riſe up ſcorners (as Peter ſaith) who will aſk: where is the promiſe of his coming? for as much as ſince the fathers ſlept, all things continue as at the beginning of the creation. Yea the fleſh and the world do whiſper the ſame thing in our our ears. Here muſt faith upheld with ſufferance of hope be holden faſt fixed in beholding of eternity (Pſal. xc. 4.) that it may account a thouſand years like as one day.

The conjunction of faith and hope cauſeth many things to be ſpoken of the one which properly

43. For this conjoining and alliance the ſcripture ſometimes confoundeth the names of faith and hope. For when Peter teacheth (2 Pet. iii. 8.) that we are by the power of God preſerved through through faith, unto the disclosing of salvation, he giveth that unto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we have already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment and strength of faith. Sometimes they are joined together: as in the same Epistle. (1 Pet. i. 21.) That your faith and hope should be in God. But Paul (Phil. i. 20.) to the Philippians out of faith deriveth expectation, because impatiently hoping, we hold our desires in suspense, till God's convenient opportunity be opened. All which matter we may better understand by the xi. chapter to the Hebrews, which I have already alleged. Paul in another place, (Gal. v. 5.) although he speak improperly, yet meaneth the same things in these words: We look in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousness, even because we embracing the testimony of the Gospel concerning his free love, do look for the time when God shall openly shew that which is now hidden under hope. And now it is plain how foolishly Peter Lombard layeth two foundations of hope, that is, the grace of God, and the deserving of works. Hope can have no other mark to be directed unto, but faith: and we have already declared that faith hath one only mark the mercy of God, to which it ought to look (as I may so speak) with both eyes. But it is good to hear what a lively reason he bringeth. If (saith he) thou darest hope for any thing without deservings, that shall not be worthy to be called hope, but presumption. Who (gentle reader) will not worthily abhor such beasts, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deed, if a man have confidence that God is true of his word? For where the Lord willeth us to look for all things at his goodness, they say it is presumption to lean and rest upon it. A master meet for such schollars as he found in the mad school of filthy bablers. But as for us, when we see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceive a hope of savation, let us gladly presume so much upon his truth, as trusting upon his mercy only, casting away the confidence of works, to be bold to hope well. He will not deceive that said: Be it unto you according to your faith. Mat. ix. 29.

CHAP. III.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is treated of repentance.

Out of faith repentance springeth.

ALTHO' we have already partly taught how faith possesseth Christ, and how by it we enjoy his benefits: nevertheless this were yet dark, unless we did also make declaration of the effects that we feel thereby. Not without cause it is said, that the sum of the gospel standeth in repentance and in forgiveness of sins. Therefore leaving out these two points, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shall be but a hungry and imperfect, yea and in manner an unprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth give both unto us, and we obtain both by faith, that is to say, both newness of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I begin to speak of both. Our next passage from faith shall be to repentance, because when this article is well perceived, it shall the better appear how man is justified by faith only and mere pardon, and yet how real holiness of life (as I may so call it) is not separated from free imputation of righteousness. Now it ought to be out of question, that repentance doth not only immediately follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon and forgiveness is therefore offered by the preaching of the gospel, that the sinner being delivered from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sin, and from miserable bondage of vices, may pass into the kingdom of God; truly no man can embrace the grace of the gospel, but he must return from the errors of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that think that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruit out of a tree, they never knew the force thereof, and are moved with too weak an argument to think so.

Their grounds weak who think that repentance goeth before faith.

2. Christ (say they) and John in their preachings do first exhort the people to repentance, (Mat. iii. 2.) and then they afterwards say that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. (chap. iii. 7.) Such commandment to preach, the Apostles received, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. (Acts xx. 21.) But while they superstitiously stick upon the joining together of syllables, they mark not in what meaning the words hang together. For when the Lord Christ and John do preach in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is come near at hand: do they not fetch the cauſe of repentance from mere grace and promiſe of ſalvation? Therefore their words are as much in effect as if they had ſaid: becauſe the kingdom of heaven is come near at hand; therefore repent ye. For Matthew when he hath ſhewed that John ſo preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophecy of Iſaiah, (Iſaiah xl. 3.) concerning the voice crying in the wilderneſs. Prepare the way of the Lord, make ſtraight the paths of our God. But in the prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tidings. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dream a certain mean ſpace of time, wherein it bringeth it out, but we mean to ſhew that a man cannot earneſtly apply himſelf to repentance, unleſs he know himſelf to be of God. But no man is truly perſwaded that he is of God, but he that hath firſt received his grace. But theſe things ſhall be more plainly, diſcuſſed in the proceſs following. Perhaps this deceived them, that many are firſt by terrors of conſcience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they have throughly digeſted, yea before they have taſted the knowlege of grace. And this is the fear at the beginning, which ſome account among virtues, becauſe they ſee that it is near to true and juſt obedience. But our queſtion is not here how diverſly Chriſt draweth us unto him, or prepareth us to the endeavour of godlineſs: only this I ſay, that there can be no uprightneſs found where reigneth not the Spirit which Chriſt received to communicate the ſame to his members. Then according to the ſaying of the Pſalmiſt: (Pſal. cxxx. 4.) With thee is mercifulneſs, that thou mayeſt be feared; no man ſhall ever reverently fear God, but he that truſteth that God is merciful unto him: no man will willingly prepare himſelf to the keeping of the law, but he that is perſwaded that his ſervices pleaſe him: which tenderneſs in pardoning and bearing with faults, is a ſign of fatherly favour. Which is alſo ſhewed by that exhortation of Hoſea, Hoſ. vi. 2. Come let us return to the Lord, becauſe he hath plucked us, and he will heal us: he hath ſtricken us, and he will cure us; becauſe the hope of pardon is uſed as an incitement to make them not to lie dull in their ſins. But their doting error is without all colour of reaſon, who to begin at repentance do appoint certain days to their new converts, during which they muſt exerciſe themſelves in penance: and when thoſe days are once paſt, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Goſpel. I ſpeak of many of the Anabaptiſts, eſpecially thoſe that marvellouſly rejoice to be counted ſpiritual, and their companions the Jeſuits, and ſuch other dregs. Such fruits forſooth that ſpirit of giddineſs bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compaſs of a few days, which a Chriſtian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

Repentance rightly ſaid to conſiſt of two parts, Mortification & Vivification: ſo that Vivification be taken not for the chearfulneſs which the ſoul receiveth when it recovereth out of fear and trouble, but for the purpoſe and deſire which it hath to lead a new life.

3. But certain learned men, even long before theſe times, meaning to ſpeak ſimply and ſincerely of repentance, according to the truth of ſcripture, have ſaid that it conſiſteth of two parts, mortification, and vivification. Mortification they expound to be a ſorrow of the ſoul and fear conceived of the acknowleging of ſin; and of the feeling of the judgmeut of God. For when a man is once brought into knowlege of ſin, then he truly beginneth to hate and abhor ſin; then he heartily diſlikeeth himſelf, confeſſeth himſelf to be miſerable and loſt, and wiſheth himſelf to be another man. Further, when he is touched with ſome feeling of the judgment of God (for the one immediately followeth upon the other) then he lyeth ſtriken and overthrown, then he trembleth, humbled and caſt down, then he is diſcouraged and diſpaireth. This is the firſt part of repentance, which they have commonly called contrition. Vivification they expound to be the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man overthrown with conſcience of ſin, and ſtriken with fear of God, looking afterward unto the goodneſs of God, unto the mercy, favour and ſalvation, that is through Chriſt, raiſeth up himſelf, taketh breath again, recovereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And theſe words, if they have a right expoſition, do aptly enough expreſs the nature of repentance. But where they take vivification for the chearfulneſs, which the mind receiveth being brought into quietneſs from trouble and fear, therein I agree not with them: foraſmuch as it rather ſignifieth a deſire to live holily and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were ſaid, that man dieth to himſelf, to begin to live to God.

Two kinds of repentance, the one of the law, the

4. Some others, becauſe they ſaw this word diverſly taken in ſcripture, have made two ſorts of repentance: and becauſe they ſhould

ſhould make them differently known by ſome mark, they have called one repentance of the law, by which the ſinner wounded with the ſearing iron of ſin, and worn away with fear of the wrath of God, ſticketh faſt in that trouble and cannot wind himſelf out of it. The other repentance they call of the goſpel, by which the ſinner is indeed grievouſly vexed with himſelf, but he riſeth up higher and taketh hold of Chriſt, the ſalve of his ſore, the comfort of his fear, the haven of his miſery. Of the repentance of the law they put thoſe examples: (Gen. iv. 12.) Cain, Saul, and (Mat. xxvii. 4.) Judas. Whoſe repentance when the ſcripture rehearſeth unto us, it meaneth that they acknowleging the grievouſneſs of their ſin, were afraid of the wrath of God, but in thinking upon God only as a revenger and judge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing elſe but a certain entry of hell, whereunto they being entred into this preſent life, began already to ſuffer puniſhment, from the face of the wrath of God's majeſty. The repentance of the goſpel, we ſee in all them, who, being galled with the ſpur of ſin in themſelves, but comforted again and refreſhed with confidence of the mercy of God, are turned unto the Lord. Hezekiah was ſtricken with fear, when he received the meſſage of death: but he (Kings xx.) prayed weeping, and looking unto the goodneſs of God, he took again good confidence unto him. The (Jonah iii. 5.) Ninevites were troubled with the horrible threatning of deſtruction. But they clothed themſelves in ſackcloth and aſhes and prayed, hoping that the Lord might be turned to them, and turned from the fierceneſs of his wrath. David confeſſed that he had too much ſinned in numbering the people: but he ſaid further, (2 Kings ii.) Lord take away the wickedneſs of thy ſervant. He acknowleged his offence of adultery, (2 Kings xii. 13.) when Nathan rebuked him, and did caſt himſelf down before the Lord, but therewithal he alſo looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them, who at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart, but truſting upon the goodneſs of God, they ſaid furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what ſhall we do? (Acts ii. 37.) And ſuch was the repentance of Peter himſelf, who wept indeed bitterly, but he ceaſed not to hope well.

The definition of repentance.

5. Although all theſe things be true, yet the very name of repentance (ſo far as I can learn by the ſcriptures Acts xx. 21. is otherwiſe to be taken. For where they comprehend Faith under repentance, it diſagreeth with that which Paul ſaith in the Acts, that he teſtified to the Jews and Gentiles repentance unto God and faith in Jeſus Chriſt, where he reckoneth repentance and faith as two divers things. What then? Can true repentance ſtand without faith? No: But though they cannot be ſeparated, yet they muſt be diſtinguiſhed. As faith is not without hope, and yet faith and hope are divers things: ſo repentance and faith, although they hang together with one perpetual bond, yet they rather would be conjoined than confounded. And truly I am not ignorant, that under the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning unto God, whereof faith is not the leaſt part, but in what meaning it is ſo comprehended, ſhall moſt eaſily appear when the force and nature thereof ſhall be declared. The name of repentance in Hebrew is derived of converting or returning, in Greek of changing of the mind or purpoſe, and the thing itſelf doth not ill agree with either derivations, whereof the ſum is, that we departing from ourſelves ſhould turn unto God, and putting off our old mind, ſhould put on a new. Wherefore, in my judgment, repentance may thus not amiſs be defined: that it is a true turning of our life unto God, proceeding from a pure and earneſt fear of God, which conſiſteth in the mortifying of the fleſh and of the old man, and in the quickening of the Spirit. In this ſenſe are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the prophets in old time, or the apoſtles afterwards exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this only thing they laboured to perſuade, that, confounded with their own ſins, and pricked with fear of the Lord's judgment, they ſhould fall down and be humbled before him, againſt whom they had offended, and with true amendment return into his right way. Therefore theſe words, (Matth. iii. 2.) To be turned or return unto the Lord, (1 Sam. vii.) To repent, or do penance, are among them uſed without difference in all one ſignification. And therefore alſo the holy hiſtory ſaith, (Luke iii. 8.) that men repent after the Lord, when they that lived wantonly in their own luſts, not regarding him, do begin to follow his word, and are ready at their captain's commandment to go whither he calleth them, and John (Matth. xi. 8.) and Paul (Acts xxvi. 20.) uſed theſe words, to bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, for to lead ſuch a life as may repreſent and teſtify ſuch an amendment in all their doings.

The turning of our lives unto God doth denote an alteration not only of our outward actions, but also, and that especially, of our souls.

6. But before we go any further, it shall be profitable that we do more plainly set out at large the definition that we have made. Wherein there are chiefly three points to be considered. First, when we call it a turning of life unto God, we require a transforming, not only in outward works, but also in the soul itself, which when it hath put off her oldness, then beginneth to bring forth the fruits of works agreeable to her renewing. Which when the prophet goeth about to express, he commandeth them whom he calleth to repentance, to make them a new heart. (Ezek. xviii. 31.) Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew how the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned unto the Lord, teacheth that it be done with all their heart, and with all their soul (which manner of speaking we see often repeated of the prophets) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceive the natural property of repentance than in the fourth of Jeremiah verse third, If thou return to me, O Israel, (saith the Lord) return to me, plow up your arable land and sow not upon thorns. Be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the uncircumcised skins of your hearts. See how he pronounceth that they shall nothing prevail in taking upon them the following of righteousness, unless wickedness be first plucked out of the bottom of their hearts. And to move them thoroughly, he warneth them that they have to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dallying, because he hateth a double heart. Therefore Isaiah (Isa. lxv. 2, 6.) laugheth to scorn the foolish endeavours of hypocrites, who did indeed busily go about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the mean time they had no care to loose the bands of wickedness wherewith they held poor men fast tied. Where also he very well sheweth in what duties unfeigned repentance properly standeth.

The beginning of our conversion unto God is fear.

7. The second point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest fear of God. For, before that the mind of a sinner be enclined to repentance, it must be stirred up with thinking upon the judgment of God. But when this thought is once thoroughly fixed in the mind, that God will one day go up into his judgment seat, to require an account of all our words and actions; it will not suffer the poor man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him up to think upon a new way of life, whereby he may safely appear at that judgment. Therefore oftentimes the scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance maketh mention of the judgment: as in Jeremiah iv. 3. least peradventure my wrath go out as fire, and there be none to quench it, because of the naughtiness of your works. In Paul's (Acts xvii. 30.) sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath born with the times of this ignorance, now he giveth warning to men, that all men every where may repent, because he hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness. And in many other places. Sometimes it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a judge, that sinners should think with themselves, that worse things hang over them if they do not repent in time. You have an example thereof in the xxix. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring and hatred of sin, therefore the apostle (2 Cor. vii. 10.) maketh sorrowfulness, such as is of a godly sort, the cause of repentance. And he calleth that sorrow godly, when we are not only afraid of punishment, but do hate and abhor sin in itself, forasmuch as we understand that it displeaseth God. And no wonder: For unless we be sharply pricked, the slothfulness of our flesh could not be corrected, yea compunctions would not suffice for the dulness and slothfulness thereof, unless God in stretching out his rods should pierce more deeply. This is also an obstinacy which must be beaten down as it were with beetles. Therefore the perverseness of our nature enforceth God to the severity that he useth in threatning, because he should in vain call us alluringly with fair speech while we lie asleep. I recite not the testimonies that commonly offer themselves to be found. The fear of God is in another manner also the beginning of repentance. For though man's life were absolutely furnished with all points of virtues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may indeed be praised of the world, but in heaven it shall be mere abomination, forasmuch as the chief part of our righteousness is to give God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not ourselves to yield us subject to his government.

8. Third-

Repentance conſiſteth in the mortifying of the fleſh and the quickening of the ſpirit.

8. Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that we ſay, that repentance conſiſteth in two parts, that is to ſay, mortifying of the fleſh, and quickening of the Spirit. The prophets do plainly expreſs it, although ſomewhat ſimply and groſly according to the capacity of the carnal people, when they ſay; (Pſal. xxxiv. 15.) Ceaſe from evil and do goodneſs. Again: (Iſa. i. 16.) Be waſhed, be clean, take away the evil of your works from mine eyes: ceaſe to do evil, learn to do well, ſeek judgment, help the oppreſſed, &c. For when they call men away from wickedneſs, they require the death of the whole fleſh, which is ſtuffed full of wickedneſs and perverſeneſs. It is indeed an uneaſy and hard thing to put off ourſelves, and to depart from our natural diſpoſition. Neither can it be thought that the fleſh is thoroughly dead, unleſs all that we have of ourſelves be aboliſhed. But foraſmuch as all the affection of the fleſh is enmity againſt God, the firſt entry to the obeying of his law, is the forſaking of our own nature. Afterwards they (Rom. viii. 4.) expreſs the renewing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteouſneſs, judgment, and mercy. For it were not enough to do thoſe duties rightly, unleſs the mind it ſelf and the heart have firſt put on the affection of righteouſneſs, judgment, and mercy. That is done when the Spirit of God hath ſo infuſed new thoughts and affections, our ſouls firſt waſhed with his holineſs, that they may rightly be counted new. And truly as we are naturally turned away from God, ſo unleſs the forſaking of ourſelves do go before, we can never go toward that which is right. Therefore we are ſo oft commanded to put off the old man, to forſake the world and fleſh, to bid our luſts farewel, and to be renewed in the Spirit of our mind. Moreover the very name of mortification doth put us in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: becauſe we thereby gather that we are not otherwiſe framed to the fear of God, nor do learn the principles of godlineſs, but when we are violently ſlain with the word of the Spirit, and ſo brought to naught; even as though God ſhould pronounce, that to have us to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

True repentance is nothing elſe but regeneration

9. Both theſe things do happen unto us by the partaking of Chriſt. For if we do truly communicate of his death, by the power thereof our old man is crucified, and the body of ſin dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may live no more. If we be partakers of his reſurrection by it we are raiſed up into a newneſs of life, that may agree with the righteouſneſs of God. In one word I expound repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other mark to which it is directed, but that the image of God which was by (Rom. vi. 6.) Adam's offence foully defaced and in a manner utterly blotted out, may be renewed in us. So the apoſtle (2 Cor. iii. 18.) teacheth when he ſaith: but we beholding the glory of God with uncovered face are transformed into the ſame image, out of glory into glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord. Again: Be ye renewed in the Spirit of your mind and put on the new man, which is created according to God in righteouſneſs and holineſs of truth. Again in another place: (Col. iii. 10.) putting on the new man, which is renewed after the knowlege and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration we are by the benefit of Chriſt (1 Cor. vii. 12.) reſtored into the righteouſneſs of God, from which we were fallen by Adam. After which manner it pleaſeth the Lord wholly to reſtore all thoſe whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this reſtoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one year, but by continual, yea and ſometimes ſlow proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the fleſh in his elect, cleanſeth them from filthineſs, and conſecrateth them for temples to himſelf, renewing all their ſenſes to true pureneſs, that they may exerciſe themſelves all their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And ſo much the greater is the lewdneſs of that filthy railer and apoſtate Staphilus, who fooliſhly ſaith, that I confound the ſtate of this preſent life with the heavenly glory, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holineſs and true righteouſneſs. (2 Cor. iv. 4.) As though when any thing is defined, we ſhould not ſeek the whole fulneſs and perfection of it. And yet we deny not place for increaſes: but I ſay that how near any man approacheth to the likeneſs of God, ſo much the image of God ſhineth in him. That the faithful may attain to this, God aſſigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run all their life long.

Whereby Chriſt reſtoreth us unto the righteouſneſs of God, from whence by ſin we were fallen.

10. The children of God therefore are ſo delivered by re- In the regenerate there remaineth

generation from the bondage of ſin, not that having now obtained the full poſſeſſion of liberty, they ſhould feel no more trouble by their fleſh, but that they ſhould have remaining a continual matter of ſtrife, wherewith they may be exerciſed, and not only be exerciſed, but alſo may better learn their own weakneſs. And in this point all writers of ſound judgment agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of evil, from whence continually ſpring deſires that allure and ſtir him to ſin. They confeſs alſo that the ſaints are ſtill ſo holden intangled with that diſeaſe of luſting, that they cannot withſtand but that ſometimes they are tickled and ſtirred either to luſt or to covetouſneſs, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needful to labour much in ſearching what the old writers have thought herein, foraſmuch as only Auguſtine may be ſufficient for it, who hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their judgments. Lib. ad Bonif. 4. Li. 1. & 2 contra Julianum. Therefore let the readers gather of him, ſuch certainty as they ſhall deſire to learn of the opinion of antiquity. But there may ſeem to be this difference between him and us, that he when he granteth that the faithful ſo long as they dwell in a mortal body are ſo holden bound with luſts, that they cannot but luſt, yet dareth not call that diſeaſe ſin, but being content to expreſs it by the name of weakneſs, he teacheth that then only it becometh ſin, when either work or conſent is added to conceit or receiving; that is, when will yielded to the firſt deſire: but we account the very ſame for ſin, that man is tickled with any deſire at all againſt the law of God, yea we affirm that the very corruption that breadeth ſuch deſires in us, is ſin. We teach therefore that there is always ſin in the ſaints until they be unclouhed of the mortal body, becauſe there yet remaineth in their fleſh the perverſeneſs of luſting that fighteth againſt uprightneſs. And yet he doth not always forbear to uſe the name of ſin, as when he ſaith: Ser. 6. de verbis Apoſt. This Paul calleth by the name of ſin, from whence ſpring all ſins unto a fleſhly concupiſcence, This as much as pertaineth to the ſaints, loſeth the kingdom in earth, and periſheth in heaven. By which words he confeſſeth, that the faithful are guilty of ſin, inaſmuch as they are ſubject to the luſts of the fleſh.

How Chriſt is ſaid to purge his church from ſin, and ſin to remain in every member of his church ſo purged.

11. But this that is ſaid, that God purgeth his church from all ſin, that he promiſeth that grace of deliverance by baptiſm, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we refer rather to the guiltineſs of ſin, than to the very matter of ſin. God truly performeth this by regenerating them that are his, that in them that kingdom of ſin is aboliſhed (for the holy Ghoſt miniſtereth them ſtrength, whereby they get the upper hand and are conquerors in the battle) but it ceaſeth only to reign, and not ſo to dwell in them. (Epheſ. v. 26.) Therefore we ſo ſay, that the old man is crucified, and the law of ſin aboliſhed in the children of God. (Rom. vi. 6.) that yet there remain ſome leavings, not to have dominion in them, but to humble them by knowlege in conſcience of their own weakneſs. And we confeſs that the ſame are not imputed, as if they were not: but we affirm that this cometh to paſs by the mercy of God, that the ſaints are delivered from this guiltineſs, who otherwiſe ſhould juſtly be reckoned ſinners and guilty before God. And this ſentence it ſhall not be hard for us to confirm, foraſmuch as there are evident teſtimonies of the ſcripture upon this matter. For what would we have more plain, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romans, chap. vii.? For both we have in another place ſhewed, and Auguſtine proveth by ſtrong reaſons, that Paul there ſpeaketh in the perſon of a man regenerate. I ſpeak not of this, that he uſeth theſe words evil and ſin, that they who will ſpeak againſt us may not cavil againſt thoſe words, but who can deny, that a ſtriving againſt the law of GOD is evil, who can deny a withſtanding of juſtice to be ſin? Finally, who will not grant that there is a fault where is a ſpiritual miſery? But all theſe things are reported of this diſeaſe by Paul. Again, we have an aſſured demonſtration by the law, by which this whole queſtion may eaſily be diſcuſſed. For we are commanded to love God with all our hearts, with all our ſoul, with all our powers. Since all the parts of our ſoul ought to be ſo occupied with the love of God, it is certain, that they ſatisfy not the commandment that conceive in their heart any deſire, be it never ſo little, or ſuffer any ſuch thought at all to enter into their mind, as may withdraw them from the love of God into vanity? For what? are not theſe the powers of the ſoul, to be affected with ſudden motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceive with mind? Therefore, when theſe do open a way for vain or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, do they not ſhew that they are even ſo much much void of the love of God? Wherefore, whoſo confeſſeth not that all the luſts of the fleſh are ſins, and that the ſame diſeaſe of luſting, which they call a feeding, is the well-ſpring of ſin, he muſt needs deny that the tranſgreſſion of the law is ſin.

Our natural deſires are corrupt, not in that they are natural, but in that they are inordinate.

12. If any man think it an abſurdity, that all the deſires wherewith man is naturally moved in affection, are univerſally condemned, whereas they are put into man by God the Author of nature. We anſwer, that we do not condemn thoſe deſires that God hath ſo engraven into the mind of man at the firſt creation, that they cannot be rooted out without deſtroying the very nature of man, but only outragious and unbridled motions that fight againſt the ordinance of God. But now ſince by reaſon of the perverſeneſs of nature all its powers are infected and corrupted, that in all its doings appeareth a continual diſorder and intemperance, becauſe the deſires cannot be ſeparated from ſuch intemperance: therefore we ſay that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to have the whole ſum in fewer words) we teach that all the deſires of men are evil: and we accuſe them to be guilty of ſin, not in that they are natural, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, becauſe no pure or clean thing can come out of a corrupt and unclean nature. And Auguſtine (Ad Bonif.) doth not ſo much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in ſhew, while he ſomewhat too much feareth the envy that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he ſometimes forbeareth to uſe the name of ſin. Yet where he writeth that the law of ſin ſtill remaining in the ſaints, the only guiltineſs is taken away, he plainly ſheweth that he doth not ſo much diſagree from our meaning.

Concupiſcence acknowleged by St. Auguſtine and St. Ambroſe to be ſin: whereunto St. James is not repugnant when he ſaith that concupiſcence after it hath conceived doth bring forth ſin.

13. We will allege ſome other ſentences, whereby ſhall appear what he thought. In the ſecond book againſt Julian: This law of ſin is both releaſed by the ſpiritual regeneration, and abideth in the mortal fleſh, releaſed herein, becauſe the guiltineſs is taken away in the ſacrament whereby the faithful are regenerate: and it abideth, becauſe it worketh the deſires againſt which the faithful do fight. Again, Therefore the law of ſin (which was alſo in the members of ſo great an apoſtle) is releaſed in baptiſm, but not ended. Again, The law of ſin (of which yet remaining the guiltineſs, is in baptiſm diſcharged) Ambroſe called wickedneſs: becauſe it is wickedneſs for the fleſh to luſt againſt the ſpirit. Again, Sin is dead in reſpect of the guiltineſs wherein it held us, and even being dead, it ſtill rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of burial. And yet plainer in the fifth book. As the blindneſs of heart is both a ſin, whereby man believeth not in God: and alſo a puniſhment of ſin, whereby a proud heart is chaſtiſed with worthy correction: and the cauſe of ſin, when any thing is committed by the error of a blind heart: ſo the luſt of fleſh againſt which a good ſpirit luſteth, is both ſin, becauſe there is in it diſobedience againſt the government of the mind: and alſo the puniſhment of ſin, becauſe it is given for recompence to the deſervings of the diſobedient: and the cauſe of ſin in man, when he conſenteth by defection, or in man, when he is born by infection. Here without any doubtful ſpeech he calleth it ſin, becauſe when error was once overthrown, and the truth confirmed, he leſs feared ſlanderous reports. As in the 41 Homily upon John, where doubtleſs he ſpeaketh according to the true meaning of his mind, he ſaith: If in the fleſh thou ſerve the law of ſin, do that which the apoſtle himſelf ſaith: (Rom. vi. 12.) let not ſin reign in your mortal bodies to obey the deſires thereof. He ſaith not, let it not be, but let it not reign. So long as thou liveſt, ſin muſt needs be in thy members at leaſt, let reign be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defend that luſt is no ſin, are wont to object that ſaying of James (James ii.) Luſt, after that it hath conceived, bringeth forth ſin. But this is eaſily confuted. For unleſs we think that he ſpeaketh of only ill works or actual ſins, evil will itſelf, ſhall not be accounted ſin. But where he calleth miſchievous deeds and wicked offences the offſprings of ſin, and giveth unto them the name of ſin, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to luſt, is an evil thing and damnable before God.

The wild imagination of Anabaptiſts teaching that men regenerate ſhould take no care to bridle any diſ-

14. Certain Anabaptiſts in this age, deviſe I know not what mad intemperance inſtead of ſpiritual regeneration: ſaying that the children of God reſtored into the ſtate of innocency, now ought no more to be careful for bridling of the luſt of the fleſh: the ordered desire in themselves, but only follow the conduct of the Spirit which cannot lead them into any evil: so that whatsoever they do in this their state of imagined innocency it is spiritual and good.

that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, under whose guiding they never go out of the way. It were incredible that man's mind could fall to so great madness, unless they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truly it is monstrous. But it is meet that such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldness, that so have persuaded their mind to turn the truth of God unto a lie. Shall all the choice of honesty and dishonesty, right and wrong, good and evil, virtue and vice, be taken away? Such difference (say they) cometh of the cursedness of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So now there shall be no difference between fornication and chastity, plain dealing and subtilty, truth and lying, justice and extortion. Take away vain fear, say they, the Spirit will command thee no evil thing, so that thou boldly and without fear yield thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madness of lusts, have put off all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame unto us, and what spirit do they belch out? For we acknowlege one Christ, and his only Spirit whom the prophets have commended, whom the gospel given us doth preach, of whom we there hear no such thing. That Spirit is no patron of manslaughter, whoredom, drunkenness, pride, contention, covetousness, and guile: but the author of love, chastity, sobriety, modesty, peace, temperance and truth. It is not a giddy spirit, and runneth headlong without consideration through right and wrong, but is full of wisdom, and understanding, that discerneth rightly between just and unjust. It stirreth not unto dissolute and unbridled licentiousness, but maketh difference between lawful and unlawful, and teacheth to keep measure and temperance: but why do we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome fancy, which either themselves have brought forth in a dream, or have received being forged of others: but they reverently seek the knowlege of him at the Scriptures, where these two thinge are taught of him: First that he is given us unto sanctification, that he might bring us into the obedience of God's will, being purged from uncleanness and defilings, which obedience cannot stand, unless lusts be tamed and subdued, whereunto these men would give the bridle at liberty. Secondly, we are taught that we are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are still besieged with many vices and much weakness, so long as we are inclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it cometh to pass, that being far distant from perfection, we have need always to increase somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we have need daily to wrestle with them. Whereupon also followeth, that shaking off sloth and carelessness, we must watch with heedful minds, that we be not compassed unawares, with the snares of our flesh. Unless perhaps we think that we have proceeded further than the apostle (2 Cor. xii. 15.) who yet was wearied of the messenger of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weakness; and who did unfeignedly represent in his flesh that division of the flesh, and of the Spirit.

Seven either effects, causes or properties of repentance reckoned up by th apostle.

15. But whereas the apostle (1 Cor. xi. 7.) in describing of repentance reckoneth seven either causes or effects or parts thereof, he doth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeavour or carefulness, excusing, indignation, fear, desire, zeal, punishment. Neither ought it to seem any absurdity, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effects. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affections joined with repentance: but because, leaving out those questions, we may understand what Paul meaneth, we shall be content with a simple declaration of them. He saith therefore, that of the heaviness which is according to God, ariseth carefulness. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithal stirried up to diligence and heedfulness, to wind himself clearly out of the snares of the devil, to take better heed of his snares, to fall no more from the goverment of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with security. Next is excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the judgment of God, either doth deny that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousness of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in craving of pardon, than in defence of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowlege and confess their faults, do yet use intreating, and that it may take place, they proproteſt by all means that they can, that they have not caſt away the reverence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they ſo excuſe them, as they go not about to prove themſelves righteous and innocent, but only that they may obtain pardon. Then followeth indignation whereby the ſinner fretteth inwardly with himſelf, quarrelleth with himſelf, is angry with himſelf, when he recordeth his own perverſeneſs and his own unthankfulneſs to God. By the name of fear, he meaneth that trembling that is ſtricken into our minds ſo oft as we think both what we have deſerved, and how horrible is the ſeverity of God's wrath againſt ſinners. For we muſt needs then be vexed with a marvellous unquietneſs, which both inſtructeth us to humility, and maketh us more wary againſt the time to come. Now if out of fear do ſpring that carefulneſs, whereof he had ſpoken before, then we ſee with what connexion they hang together. It ſeemeth to me that he hath uſed this word deſire for diligence in our duty and ready chearfulneſs to obey, to which the acknowleging of our own faults ought chiefly to provoke us. And thereunto alſo belongeth zeal, which he joineth immediately next unto it. For it ſignifieth a fearfulneſs, with which we are kindled when we are ſpurred forward with theſe pricking thoughts: what have I done? whither had I thrown my ſelf headlong, if the mercy of God did not help me? The laſt of all is puniſhment; for the more rigorous that we be to ourſelves, and the more ſtrictly that we examine our own ſins, ſo much the more we ought to truſt that God is favourable and merciful unto us. And truly it is not poſſible, but that the ſoul being ſtricken with horror of the judgment of God muſt needs do ſome execution in the puniſhing of itſelf. Truly the godly do feel what puniſhments are ſhame, confuſion, mourning, lothing of themſelves, and other affections that ſpring out of earneſt acknowleging of ſins. But let us remember that there is meaſure to be kept, that ſorrow do not ſwallow us up, becauſe nothing more readily happeneth to fearful conſciences than falling to deſpair. And alſo by that crafty means whomſoever Satan findeth overthrown with dread of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulf of ſorrow, that they may never riſe up again. Truly the fear cannot be too great which endeth with humility, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But always (as the apoſtle teacheth) Heb. xi. 13. the ſinner muſt beware, that while he move himſelf to the lothing of himſelf, he deſpair not, oppreſſed with too great fear, for ſo do we flee away from God who calleth us to him by repentance. Upon which point this leſſon of Bernard (Sermone 11. in Cant.) is very profitable: Sorrow for ſins is neceſſary, if it be not continual. I counſel you ſometimes to return your fault from grievous and painful remembrance of your own ways, and to climb up to the plain ground of chearful remembrance of the benefits of God. Let us mingle honey with wormwood, that the wholſome bitterneſs may bring us health, when it ſhall be drunk tempered with ſweetneſs. And if ye think of yourſelves in humility, think alſo of the Lord in goodneſs.

The fruits of repentance, purging of the heart outward amendment of life and manners. Beſides which there are alſo certain external exerciſes ſerving to humble or to declare that we are humbled, wherein the old writers have two ways gone beyond meaſure.

16. Now it may be alſo perceived what are the fruits of repentance, even the duties of godlineſs towards God, and of charity towards men, and therewithal a holineſs and pureneſs in all our life. Finally, the more earneſtly that any man examineth his life by the rule of God's law, ſo much the ſurer tokens he ſheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghoſt oftentimes, when he exhorteth us to repentance, calleth us ſometimes to all the commandments of the law, ſometimes to the duties of the ſecond table. Altho' in other places after that he hath condemned uncleanneſs in the very fountain of the heart, he deſcendeth afterwards to outward teſtimonies that do ſet out true repentance, of which thing I will hereafter ſet before the reader's eyes a table in the deſcription of a chriſtian life. I will not gather teſtimonies out of the prophets, wherein they partly ſcorn at their follies that go about to appeaſe God with ceremonies, and do ſhew that they are mere mockeries, and partly do teach that outward uprightneſs of life is not the principal part of repentance, becauſe God looketh upon the heart: whoſoever is even meanly exerciſed in the ſcripture, ſhall perceive of himſelf without any other man's putting in mind, that when we have to do with God, we labour in vain, unleſs we begin at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Joel (Joel ii. 13.) ſhall not a little help to the underſtanding of the reſt, where he ſaith: rend your heart and not your garments. Alſo both thoſe points are expreſſed in theſe words of James: (Jam. iv. 8.) cleanſe your hands ye ſinners, and purify your hearts, ye double minded.

Where indeed there is an addition joined to th firſt part, but after is ſhewed the very fountain and beginning, that they muſt wipe away their ſecret filthineſs, that there may be an altar ſet up to God in the very heart. Beſides this there are alſo certain outward exerciſes, which we uſe privately as remedies to humble ourſelves or to tame our fleſh, and publickly for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that puniſhment of which Paul ſpeaketh, for theſe are the properties of an afflicted mind, (2 Cor. vii. 11.) to be in loathſomneſs, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgeouſneſs and all trimming, and to forſake all delights. Then he that feeleth how great an evil is the rebellion of the fleſh, ſeeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreover he that well bethinketh him how grievous a thing it is to have offended the juſtice of God, cannot reſt until he have in his own humility given glory unto God. Such exerciſes the old writers do oftentimes rehearſe, when they ſpeak of the fruits of repentance. But altho' they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers ſhall pardon me, if I ſpeak what I think: it ſeemeth unto me that they ſtand too much upon them. And if any man will wiſely conſider it, I truſt he will agree with me, that they have two ways gone beyond meaſure. For when they ſo much enforced, and with immeaſurable commendation advanced that bodily diſcipline, this indeed they obtained, that the people did the more earneſtly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that which ought to have been of much greater importance. Secondly, in giving puniſhments they were ſomewhat more rigorous than eccleſiaſtical mildneſs may bear, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in another place.

The uſe of weeping, faſting, aſhes, ſackcloth and ſuch like outward things in the action of repentance.

17. But becauſe many when they hear weeping, faſting and aſhes ſpoken of, both often in other places and ſpecially in Joel, they meaſure the chief part of repentance by faſting and weeping, therefore their error is to be taken away. That which is there ſpoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of rending their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance; but weeping and faſting are not joined as continual or neceſſary effects thereof, but are ſpoken of in reſpect of a ſpecial circumſtance. Becauſe he had propheſied, that there hanged over the Jews a moſt terrible deſtruction, therefore he counſelleth them to prevent the wrath of God, not only in repenting, but alſo in uttering tokens of their ſorrow. For as a man ſtanding to be arraigned, uſeth humbly to abaſe himſelf with an overgrown beard, uncombed hair and black apparel, to move the judge to pity: ſo it behoved them when they ſtood accuſed before the judgment ſeat of God in piteous array to beſeech him not to extend his rigour. But although aſhes and ſackcloth did peradventure more fitly agree with thoſe times: yet it is certain, that weeping and faſting ſhould be to a very convenient good uſe among us, ſo oft as the Lord ſeemeth to threaten us with any plague or calamity. For when he maketh any danger to appear, he doth after a certain manner give warning, that he is prepared or armed to revenge. Therefore the prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrymen to weeping and faſting, that is to the ſorrowful manner of accuſed men, whoſe offences he ſaid a little before, were had in examination. Even as the paſtors of the church ſhould not do ill at this day, if when they ſee any ruin hanging over the necks of their people, they would cry out upon them to make haſte to faſting and weeping: ſo that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, always enforce that which is the principal point, that they muſt rend their hearts and not their garments. (Matth. ix. 15.) It is out of doubt, that faſting is not always joined with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miſerable plagues: and therefore Chriſt joineth it with wailing, when he acquitteth the apoſtles from need thereof, until the time that being deprived of his preſence, they ſhould be tormented with grief. I ſpeak of ſolemn faſting. For the private life of the godly ought to be tempered with honeſt ſparing and ſobriety, that in the whole courſe thereof there may appear a certain kind of faſting. But becauſe all this matter ſhall be declared again in the place where we ſhall treat of the diſcipline of the church, therefore I do now the more ſlenderly touch it.

The name of repentance improperly given to the outward teſtification of our penitence: which teſtification by mouth or otherwiſe although God do not always require, yet he doth exact

18. But this one thing I will add here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profeſſion, then it is properly turned from the natural meaning which I have above ſet forth of it. For it is not ſo much a turning unto God as a confeſſion of fault, with a beſeeching of God not to charge them with the pain and guiltineſs. (Matth. xi. 21.) So to do pe-

penance in aſhes and ſackcloth is nothing elſe, than to utter a diſpleaſedneſs when God is angry with us for grievous offences. And this is a public kind of confeſſion, (Luke x. 13.) whereby we condemning ourſelves before the angels and the world, do prevent the judgment of God. For Paul (1 Cor. xi. 13.) rebuking their ſlothfulneſs that tenderly bear with their own faults, ſaith: if we did judge ourſelves, we ſhould not be judged of God. But it is not always neceſſary to make men openly of counſel and witneſſes of our repentance: but to confeſs privately to God is part of a true repentance: which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more unreaſonable than to look to have God to pardon us the ſins in which we flatter ourſelves and do hide them by hypocriſy, leaſt he ſhould bring them to light. And it behoveth us not only to confeſs thoſe ſins which we daily commit, but more grievous offences ought to draw us further, and to call again into our remembrance things that ſeem long ago buried. Which leſſon David (Pſal. li. 5.) giveth us by his example. For being touched with ſhame of his newly-committed fault, he examineth himſelf even to the time when he was in his mother's womb, and confeſſeth that even then he was corrupted and defiled with the filthineſs of the fleſh. And this he doth not to diminiſh the hainouſneſs of his fault, as many hide themſelves in the multitude, and ſeek to eſcape puniſhment by wrapping others with them. But David doth far otherwiſe who with ſimple plainneſs enforceth his fault in ſaying, that being corrupt from his firſt infancy, he hath not ceaſed to heap evils upon evils. Alſo in another place (Pſal. xxv. 9.) he likewiſe ſo examineth his by paſt life, that he craveth mercy of God for the ſins of his youth. And truly then only ſhall we prove our drowſineſs to be ſhaken away from us, if groaning under our burden and bewailing our evils, we aſk relief from God. It is moreover to be obſerved, that the repentance which we are commanded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that lifteth up as it were from death, thoſe who either have filthily fallen, or with unbridled licentiouſneſs have thrown forth themſelves to ſin, or after a certain manner of rebellious revolting, have ſhaken off the yoke of God. For the ſcripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a paſſage or riſing again from death unto life: and when it rehearſeth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other groſs offences. And in like manner Paul (2 Cor. xii. 21.) threateneth mourning unto ſinners who have not done penance for their wantonneſs, fornication and unchaſtity. This difference is to be diligently marked, leaſt while we hear that few are called to penance, a more than careleſs aſſuredneſs ſhould creep upon us, as though the mortifying of the fleſh did no more belong unto us, the care whereof, the corrupt deſires that always tickle us, and the vices that commonly ſpring forth in us, do not ſuffer us to releaſe. Therefore the ſpecial repentance which is required but of ſome, whom the devil hath violently carried away from the fear of God, and faſt bound with damnable ſnares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruption of nature compelleth us to apply throughout all the whole courſe of our life.

How repentance and forgiveneſs of ſins contain the ſubſtance of the goſpel.

19. Now if that be true, which is moſt evidently certain, that all the ſum of the goſpel is contained in theſe two principal points, repentance and forgiveneſs of ſins: do we not ſee, that the Lord doth therefore freely juſtify them that are his, that he may alſo by the ſanctification of his Spirit reſtore them into true righteouſneſs? John the Baptiſt (Matth. iii. 2.) ſent before the face of Chriſt to prepare his ways, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is come near at hand. In calling them to repentance, he did put them in mind to acknowlege themſelves ſinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lord, that they might with all their hearts deſire the mortifying of their fleſh and a new regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdom of God, he called them to faith. For (Matth. i. 4.) by the kingdom of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgiveneſs of ſins, ſalvation, and life, and all that ever we get in Chriſt. Wherefore in the other evangeliſts (Luke iii. 3.) it is written, John came preaching the baptiſm of repentance unto forgiveneſs of ſins. And what is that elſe, but that they being oppreſſed and wearied with the burden of ſins, ſhould turn to the Lord, and conceive good hopes of forgiveneſs and ſalvation? So Chriſt alſo began his preaching: The kingdom of God (Mark i. 15.) is come near at hand: repent ye and believe the goſpel. Firſt he declareth that the treaſures of God's mercy are opened in him, and then he requireth repentance, and laſt of all fidence in the promiſes of God. Therefore when he meant briefly to comprehend the whole ſum of the Goſpel, he ſaid (Luke xxiv. 26.) that he muſt ſuffer and riſe again from the dead, and that repentance and forgiveneſs of ſins muſt be preached in his name. The Apoſtles alſo preached the ſame after his reſurrection, that he was raiſed up by God, to give to Iſrael repentance and forgiveneſs of ſins. Repentance is preached in the name of Chriſt, when men do hear by the doctrine of the goſpel that all their thoughts, their affections, and their endeavours are corrupt and faulty, and that therefore it is neceſſary that they be born again if they will enter into the kingdom of God. Forgiveneſs of ſins is preached when men are taught that Chriſt is made to them redemption, righteouſneſs, ſalvation and life: (1 Cor. i. 30.) in whoſe name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the ſight of God, whereas both theſe graces are received by faith, as I have in another place declared: yet becauſe the goodneſs of God whereby ſins are forgiven is the proper object of faith, therefore it is proper that it be diligently diſtinguiſhed from repentance.

As Repentance openeth us the door unto Chriſt, ſo Chriſtianity muſt lead us on in the way of continual repenting or amending our lives.

20. Now as the hatred of ſin, which is the beginning of repentance, openeth us the firſt entry unto Chriſt, who ſheweth himſelf to none but to miſerable and afflicted ſinners, who groan, labour, are laden, are hungry and thriſty, (Iſai. lxi. 1.) and pine away with ſorrow and miſery: ſo muſt we endeavour toward repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in in Chriſt. (Matth. xi. 5.) For he came to call ſinners, but to repentance: he was ſent to bleſs the unworthy, (Luke iv. 18.) but ſo that every one ſhould turn himſelf from his wickedneſs. The ſcripture is full of ſuch ſayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiveneſs of ſins, (Matth. ix. 14) he likewiſe uſeth to require on our part repentance, ſecretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cauſe to repent of them, Do (ſaith he) judgment and righteouſneſs, becauſe ſalvation is come near at hand. Again, (Act. iii. 26. and v. 31.) there ſhall come to Sion a Redeemer, and to them that in Jacob repent from their ſins. Again, (Iſai. lvi. 1. and lix. 20. and lv. 6.) Seek the Lord while he may be found: call upon him while he is near. Let the wicked forſake his way and the wickedneſs of his thoughts, and be turned to the Lord, and he ſhall have mercy on him. Again, (Act. ii. 38.) Repent, and be converted, that your ſins may be blotted out. Where yet it is to be remarked, that this condition is not ſo annexed as though our repentance were a foundation to deſerve pardon, but rather (becauſe the Lord hath determined to have mercy upon men to this end that they ſhould repent) he teacheth men whither they ſhall travel if they will obtain grace. Therefore ſo long as we ſhall dwell in the priſon of our body, we muſt continually wreſtle with the vices of our corrupt fleſh, yea with our own natural ſoul. Plato (Id cum alib. tum in Phædone multis diſputat.) ſaith in certain places, that the life of a Philoſopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truly ſay, that the life of a Chriſtian man is a perpetual ſtudy and exerciſe of mortifying the fleſh, till it being utterly ſlain, the Spirit of God get the dominion in us. Therefore I think that he hath much profited, who hath learned much to diſlike himſelf: not that he ſhould ſtick faſt in that mire and go no further, but rather that he ſhould haſte and long towards God, that being grafted into the death and life of Chriſt, he ſhould meditate upon a continual repentance: as truly they cannot do otherwiſe, who have a natural hatred of ſin: for no man ever hated ſin, unleſs he were firſt in love with righteouſneſs. This doctrine, as it was moſt ſimple of all others, ſo I thought it beſt to agree with the truth of the ſcripture.

Repentance the gift of God: which gift being denied unto ſome kind of ſinners, the Novatians took thereby occaſion to exclude all from it who ſin after grace once received.

21. Now that repentance is a ſingular gift of God, I think it is ſo well known by the doctrine above taught, that I need not to repeat a long diſcourſe to prove it again. Therefore the church praiſeth and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that he hath given the Gentiles repentance unto ſalvation. (Act. iii. 16.) And Paul commanding Timothy to be patient and mild toward the unbelievers, ſaith: (2. Tim. ii. 25.) If at any time GOD give them repentance that they may repent from the ſnares of the devil. God indeed affirmeth that he willeth the converſion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectual working thereof dependeth upon the Spirit of regeneratoin. Becauſe it were more eaſy to create us men; than of our own power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole courſe of regeneration we are not without cauſe called, the work of God created to good works, which he hath prepared that we ſhould walk in them. Whomſoever the Lord's will is to deliver from death, thoſe he quickeneth with the ſpirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cauſe of ſalvation, but becauſe it is already ſeen that it is unſeparable from faith and from the mercy of God: Since (as Iſaiah teſtifieth) (Iſai. lix. 20.) that there is a redeemer come to him, and to thoſe that in Jacob are returned from their wickedneſs. This truly ſtandeth ſtedfaſtly determined, that whereſoever liveth the fear of God, there the Spirit hath wrought unto the ſalvation of man. Therefore in Iſaiah, (Iſa. lxiii. 17.) when the faithful complain and lament that they are forſaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their hearts were hardened by God. The Apoſtle (Heb. vi. 6.) alſo meaning to exclude Apoſtates from hope of ſalvation, aſſigneth this reaſon, that it is impoſſible for them to be renewed unto repentance: becauſe God in renewing them whom he will not have periſh, ſheweth a token of his fatherly favour, and in a manner draweth them unto him with the beams of his cheerful and merciful countenance: on the other ſide with hardening them, he thundereth againſt the reprobate, whoſe wickedneſs is unpardonable. Which kind of vengeance the Apoſtle (Heb. x. 29.) threateneth to wilful Apoſtates, who when they depart from the faith of the goſpel, do make a ſcorn of God, reproachfully deſpiſe his grace, and defile and tread under feet the blood of Chriſt, yea as much in them is they crucify him again. For he doth not (as ſome fooliſhly rigorous men would have it) cut off hope of pardon from all wilful ſins: but teacheth that Apoſtacy is unworthy of all excuſe: ſo that it is no wonder that God doth puniſh a contempt of himſelf ſo full of ſacrilege, with unappeaſable rigor. For he ſaith (Heb. vi. 4.) that it is impoſſible, that they who have once been enlightened, have taſted of the heavenly gift, have been made partakers of the holy Ghoſt, have taſted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they fall, ſhould be renewed to repentance, crucifying again afreſh, and making a ſcorn of the Son of God. Again in another place: (Heb. x. 25.) If (ſaith he) we willingly ſin after knowlege of the truth received, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment, &c. Theſe alſo are the places, out of the wrong underſtanding whereof the Novatians in old time have gathered matter to play the mad men: with whoſe rigorouſneſs certain good men being offended, believed this to be a counterfeit Epiſtle in the Apoſtle's name, which yet in all parts do truly ſavour of an apoſtolick Spirit. But becauſe we contend with none but with thoſe who allow it, it is eaſy to ſhew, how theſe ſentences do not in the leaſt ſupport their error. Firſt it is neceſſary that the Apoſtle agree with his maſter, who affirmeth that all ſin and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven, except the ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, which is not forgiven neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certain (I ſay) that the Apoſtle was contented with this exception, unleſs we will make him an adverſary to the grace of Chriſt. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no ſpecial offences, but only to one, which proceeding of a deſperate rage, cannot be aſcribed to weakneſs, and openly ſheweth that a man is poſſeſſed of a devil.

The definition of ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt: which ſin proceedeth not of ignorance but of malice.

22. But to diſcuſs this, it behoveth to enquire what is that ſame ſo horrible offence, that ſhall have no forgiveneſs. Whereas Auguſtine in one place deſigneth it an obſtinate ſtiffneſs even unto death, with deſpair of pardon, that doth not well agree with the very words of Chriſt, that it ſhall not be forgiven in this world. For either that is ſpoken in vain, or it may be committed in this life. But if Auguſtine's definition be true, then it is not committed; unleſs it continue even unto death. Whereas ſome others ſay that he ſinneth againſt the holy Ghoſt, who envieth the grace beſtowed upon his brother: I ſee not from whence that is fetched. But let us bring a true definition, which being once proved with ſure teſtimonies, ſhall eaſily by itſelf overthrow all the reſt. I ſay therefore, that they ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt, who deliberately reſiſt the truth of God, with the brightneſs whereof they are ſo dazled, that they cannot pretend ignorance: which they do only to this end to reſiſt. For Chriſt meaning to expound that which he had ſaid, immediately addeth: He that ſpeaketh a word againſt the ſon of man, it ſhall be forgiven him: but he that blaſphemeth againſt the holy Ghoſt, ſhall not be forgiven. (Matth. xii. 32. Mark iii. 29. Luke xii. 10.) And Matthew for the blaſphemy againſt the holy Spirit, putteh the ſpirit of blaſphemy. But how can a man ſpeak a reproach againſt the Son, but it is alſo ſpoken againſt the holy Ghoſt? They that ſtumble unawares againſt the truth of God, not knowing it, who do ignorantly ſpeak evil of Chriſt, having having yet this mind, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed unto them, or once with one word offend him, whom they had known to be the Lor'ds anointed: these men sin against the father and the son. So there are many at this day, who do most hatefully detest the doctrine of the gospel, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the gospel, they would be ready to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is convinced, that it is the word of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holyGhost: forasmuch as they wrestle against the enlightning that is the work of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Jews, (Act. vi. 10.) who when they could not resist the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet endeavoured to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried unto it with zeal of the law, but it appeareth that there were some others that of malicious wickedness did rage against God himself, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, (Matth. ix. 43. and xii. 24.) against whom the Lord inveigheth, who to overthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Belzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemy, when man's boldness of set purpose, dareth to reproach the name of God. Which (1 Tim. i. 13.) Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorantly committed those things through unbelief, for which otherwise he had been unworthy of God's succour. If ignorance joined with unbelief was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowlege is joined to unbelief.

23. But if thou mark it well, thou shalt perceive that the apostle speaketh not of one or other particular fall, but of the universal departing whereby the reprobate do forsake salvation. And it is no marvel, that they whom John (2 John i. 19.) in his canonical Epistle affirmeth not to have been of the elect, from whom they went out, do feel God unappeaseable, for he directeth his speech against them, who imagined, they might return to the christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling them from this false and dangerous opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returning open for them to the communion of Christ, who knowingly and willingly have cast it away: but they cast it not away, that only in dissolute licentiousness of life transgress the word of the Lord, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceit is in these words of falling and sinning. Because the Novatians expound falling to be, if a man being taught by the law of the Lord, that he ought not to steal or to commit fornication, abstaineth not from stealing or fornication. But contrariwise I affirm, that there is a secret comparison of contraries, wherein ought to be repeated all things contrary to that which was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular fault but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostacy of the whole man. Therefore when he saith, (Heb, vi. 4.) they who have fallen after that they have once been enlightened, and have tasted the heavenly gift, and been made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be understood of those who with advised ungodliness have choaked the light of the holy Spirit, have spit out again the taste of the heavenly gift, have estranged themselves from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, have troden under foot the word of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to express that advised purpose of wickedness, in another place afterward he addeth this word by name wilfully. (Heb. x. 16.) For when he saith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that sin willingly after knowlege of the truth received, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continual sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the priesthood of Christ) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the gospel is of set purpose renounced.

To them that sin against the holy Ghost pardon is not denied if they repent, but repentance because they are unworthy of pardon.

24. But whereas some do think it too hard and too far from the tender mercifulness of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching theLord's mercy: that is easily answered. For he doth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turn to the Lord: but he utterly denieth, that they can rise unto repentance, because they are by the just judgment of God stricken with eternal blindness for their unthankfulness. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that afterward he applieth to this purpose the example of Esau, who in vain attempted with howling and weeping to recover his right of the first firſt begotten. And no more doth that threatning of the prophet, when they cry, I will not hear. For in ſuch phraſes of ſpeech is meant neither the true converſion, nor calling upon God, but that carefulneſs of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremity to look unto that which before they careleſly neglected, that there is no good thing for them but in the Lord's help. But this they do not ſo much call upon, as they mourn that it is taken from them. Therefore the prophet meaneth nothing elſe by crying, and the apoſtle nothing elſe by weeping, but that horrible torment which by deſperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to mark diligently, for elſe God ſhould diſagree with himſelf, who crieth by the prophet that he will be merciful ſo ſoon as the ſinner turneth. And as I have already ſaid, it is certain that the mind of man is not turned to better, but by God's grace preventing it. Alſo his promiſe concerning calling upon him, will never deceive. But that blind torment wherewith the reprobate are diverſly drawn, when they ſee that they muſt needs ſeek God, that they may find remedy for their evils, and yet do flee from his preſence, is unproperly called converſion and prayer.

Although God for common examples ſake do ſometimes remit temporal puniſhments upon a counterfeit repentance as in Ahab, yet his wrath without hearty converſion is not turned away.

25. But a queſtion is moved, whereas the apoſtle denieth that God is appeaſed with feigned repentance, how Ahab obtained pardon and turned away the puniſhment pronounced upon him, whom yet it appeareth by the reſt of the courſe of his life to have been only ſtricken amazed with ſudden fear. He did indeed put on ſackcloth, ſcattered aſhes upon him, lay upon the ground, and (as it is teſtified of him) he was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garments when his heart remained thick and ſwoln with malice. Yet we ſee how God is turned to mercy. I anſwer that ſo ſometimes hypocrites are ſpared for a time, but yet ſo that ever the wrath of God lieth upon them, and that is done not ſo much for their ſakes, as for common example. For whereas Ahab had his puniſhment mitigated unto him, what profit got he thereby, but that he ſhould not feel it alive in earth? Therefore the curſe of GOD although it was hidden, yet had a faſt abiding place in his houſe, and he himſelf went into eternal deſtruction. This ſame is to be ſeen in Eſau. For though he had a repulſe, yet a temporal bleſſing was granted him at his weeping. But becauſe the ſpiritual inheritance, by the oracle of God could not reſt but with one of the brethren, when Jacob was choſen and Eſau refuſed, that putting away did exclude the mercy of God: this comfort was left him as a beaſtly man, that he ſhould be fat with the fat of the earth and the dew of heaven. And this is it that I ſaid even now, it ought to be referred to the example of the other, that we ſhould learn the more chearfully to apply our minds and endeavours to repentance, becauſe it is not to be doubted that when we are truly and heartly turned, God will be ready to forgive us, whoſe mercifulneſs extendeth itſelf even to the unworthy, ſo long as they ſhew any grief at all. And therewithal we are alſo taught, how terrible judgment is prepared for all the obſtinate, who now make it a ſport with no leſs ſhameleſs face than iron heart to deſpiſe and ſet at nought the threatnings of God. After this manner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Iſrael, to relieve their miſeries, although their repentance was counterfeit, and their hearts double and falſe, as himſelf in the Pſalm complaineth, (Pſal. lxxviii. 36.) that they by and by returned to their nature, and ſo minded with ſo friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earneſt converſion, or to make them inexcuſable. Yet in releaſing puniſhments for a time, he doth not bind himſelf to a perpetual law thereby, but rather riſeth ſometimes more rigorouſly againſt hypocrites, and doubleth their pains, that thereby may appear how much hypocriſy deſpleaſeth him. But (as I have ſaid) he ſheweth ſome examples of his readineſs to give pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, and their pride may be the more generouſly condemned, that ſtubbornly kick againſt the pricks.

CHAP. IV.

That all that the ſophiſters babble in their ſchools of penance, is far from the pureneſs of the goſpel. Where is treated of confeſſion and ſatisfaction.

NOW I come to diſcuſs thoſe things, which the ſchool ſophiſters have taught of repentance. Which I will run over in as few words as may be, becauſe I mind not to go through all, leaſt this book, which I labour to draw into a ſhort abridgment, ſhould grow to a huge greatneſs. And the ſophiſters have entangled it in ſo many volumes, being a matter otherwiſe not very hard, that a man ſhall hardly find how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. Firſt, in deſining it, they ſhew that they never underſtood what repentance was. For they take hold of certain ſayings of the old writers, which do nothing at all expreſs the nature of repentance, as that to repent is to weep for ſins paſſed, and not to commit ſins to be wept for. (Gregory lib. 4. Sent. diſt. 14. cap. 1.) Again, that it is to lament evils paſſed, and not to commit again other evils to be lamented. Again: that it is a certain ſorrowful revenge, puniſhing in himſelf that which he is ſorry to have committed. (Amb. & refer. illic. & in Decr. Diſt. 3. de pœnitent. c. Pœnit. prior.) Again: that it is a ſorrow of heart, and bitterneſs of ſoul, for the evils that a man hath committed or to which he hath conſented. (Auguſt. refert. ca. diſt. ca. Pœn. poſt.) But, to grant theſe things well ſaid of the fathers (which a contentious man might eaſily enough deny) yet they were not ſpoken to this intent to deſcribe repentance, but only to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they ſhould not fall again into the ſame offences, out of which they had been drawn. But if we chooſe to turn all ſuch titles of commendation into definitions, then others may alſo be adjoined as rightfully as they. As this of Chryſoſtom, repentance is a medicine that deſtroyeth ſin, a gift given from heaven, a marvellous virtue, a grace ſurmounting the force of the law. (Amb. refert. Diſt. 1. Pœn. c. Vera. Pœnit.) Yea and the doctrine which they afterward teach, is ſomewhat worſe than theſe definitions. For they ſtick ſo earneſtly in outward exerciſes, that a man can gather nothing elſe out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a diſcipline and rigorouſneſs that ſerveth partly to tame the fleſh, and partly to chaſtiſe and puniſh vices: but they keep marvellous ſilence of the inward renewing of the mind that draweth with it correction of life. There is indeed much talk among them of contrition and attrition: they torment ſouls with many doubts, and do thruſt into them much trouble and carefulneſs: but when they ſeem to have throughly wounded the hearts, they heal the bitterneſs with a light ſprinkling of ceremonies. And when they have thus curiouſly defined repentance, they divide it into contrition of heart, confeſſion of mouth, and ſatisfaction of work, (Lib. 4. Sen. 6. cap. 1. de Pœnit diſt. 1. c. perfecta pœnitentia.) no more logically than they defined it, although they would ſeem to have waſted all their age in framing of ſyllogiſms. But if a man will go about to prove by the definition (which kind of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may weep for his ſins paſſed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewail his evils paſſed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may puniſh himſelf for that which he was ſorry to have committed, &c. although he do not confeſs with his mouth: how will they maintain their diviſion? For if that true penitent man do not confeſs, then repentance may be without confeſſion. But if they anſwer, that this diviſion is referred to repentance, in reſpect that it is a ſacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is their no cauſe to blame me, but let them lay the fault on themſelves that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truly (according to my groſſneſs) when any thing is diſputed of, do refer all things to the very definition, which is the ſtay and ground of the whole diſputation. But admit that to be their maſter-like licence. Now let us particularly conſider all the parts in order. Whereas I do negligently leap over as trifles thoſe things that they with great gravity of countenance do publiſh for myſteries, I do it not unwittingly, (neither were it very painful for me to confute all that they think themſelves to have deeply and ſubtilly diſputed) but I would think it againſt conſcience to weary the readers with ſuch trifles without any profit. Truly it is eaſy to know by the queſtions which they move and toſs, and wherewith they miſerably incumber themſelves, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our ſin

pleaſeth God, when obſtinacy endureth in others. Again: whether the puniſhments laid upon man by God, do avail to ſatisfaction. Again: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly ſins: where they foully and wickedly define, that penance is daily done but for venial ſins. Likewiſe they very much torment themſelves with a groſs error, upon the ſaying of Jerom, that repentance is a ſecond board after ſhipwreck. Wherein they ſhew that they never waked from their brutiſh dulneſs, to feel ſo much as a far off the thouſandth part of their faults.

We ſhould never attain to any quietneſs of mind if that which the ſchoolmen have taught concerning contrition were true.

2. But I would the readers ſhould note, that here is not a quarrel about the ſhadow of an aſs, but the moſt earneſt matter of all others is treated of, that is to ſay, forgiveneſs of ſins. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart, confeſſion of mouth, and ſatisfaction of work: they do therewithal teach that thoſe three things are neceſſary to the obtaining forgiveneſs of ſins. But if it behove us to know any thing at all in our religion, this truly behoveth us moſt of all, I mean to underſtand and know well by what means, with what law, upon what condition, with what eaſineſs or hardneſs the forgiveneſs of ſins is obtained, If this knowlege is not very plain and certain, the conſcience will have no reſt at all, no peace with God, no confidence or aſſurance, but continually trembleth, wavereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and flieth the ſight of God. But if the forgiveneſs of ſins depend upon thoſe conditions to which they do bind it, then nothing is more miſerable, nothing in a more lamentable caſe than we. They make contrition the firſt part of obtaining pardon, and they require that to be a true contrition, that is to ſay perfect and full: but in the mean time they do not determine when a man may be aſſured, that he hath to the full meaſure perfectly performed this contrition. Truly I grant that every man ought diligently and earneſtly to enforce himſelf, with bitterly weeping for his ſins, to whet himſelf more and more to a lothing and hatred of them. For this is a ſorrow not to be repented of, that breedeth repentance unto ſalvation. But when there is ſuch a bitterneſs of ſorrow required as may proportionally anſwer the greatneſs of the fault, and ſuch as may in ballance counterpoiſe with the truſt of pardon, here the poor conſciences are marvellouſly tormented and troubled, when they ſee themſelves charged with a due contrition of ſins, and do not ſo attain the meaſure of that due, that they can determine with themſelves, that they have duly performed ſo much as they duly ought. If they ſay that we muſt do as much as lieth in us, then come we ſtill to the ſame point that we were at before: for how dare any man aſſure himſelf that he hath employed all his force to bewail his ſins? So when the conſciences having long wreſtled with themſelves, and long been exerciſed with battles, do at length find no haven to reſt in, yet ſomewhat to eaſe themſelves, they enforce themſelves to a ſorrow, and wring out tears to make perfect their contrition.

3. But if they ſay that I ſlander them: let them come forth and ſhew any one man, that by ſuch doctrine of contrition hath not been either driven to deſpair, or hath not ſet for his defence a counterfeiting of ſorrow inſtead of true ſorrow, againſt the judgment of God. We have alſo ourſelves ſaid in one place, that forgiveneſs of ſins never cometh without repentance, becauſe none but the afflicted and wounded with a ſenſe of ſins, can ſincerely call upon the mercy of God: but we have therewithal further ſaid, that repentance is not the cauſe of the forgiveneſs of ſins. As for thoſe torments of ſouls, which they ſay muſt be performed of duty, we have taken them away: we have taught the ſinner not to look upon his own contrition nor his own tears, but to faſten both his eyes upon the only mercy of God. (Iſa. lxi.) We have only put him in mind that Chriſt called the labouring and loaden, when he was ſent to publiſh glad tidings to the poor, to heal the contrite in heart, to preach remiſſion to captives, to deliver priſoners, and to comfort them that mourn. (Luke iv. 18.) From which ſhould be excluded both the Phariſees, who filled with their own righteouſneſs, do not acknowlege their own poverty, and alſo the deſpiſers who careleſs of God's wrath do ſeek no remedy for their evils. For ſuch do not labour, nor are loaden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captive. But there is great difference between teaching a man to deſerve forgiveneſs of ſins with due and full contrition, which the ſinner can never perform: and inſtructing him to hunger and thirſt for the mercy of God, that by the acknowleging of his own miſery, by his own unquietneſs, wearineſs and captivity, it may be ſhewed him, where he ought to ſeek for relief, reſt and liberty: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himſelf, to give glory to God.

The grounds of Popiſh confeſſion.

4. Concerning confeſſion, there hath been always great ſtrife between the Canoniſts and the ſchool divines: while the one ſort affirm, that confeſſion is commanded by the ſpecial commandment of God, and the other ſort deny it and ſay, that it is commanded only by the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable ſhameleſneſs of theſe divines, who have corrupted and violently wreſted as many places of ſcripture, as they alleged for their purpoſe. And when they ſaw that they could not ſo obtain that which they required, they who would be thought more ſubtile than the reſt eſcaped away with this ſhift, that confeſſion came from the law of God, in reſpect of the ſubſtance of it, but afterward received form of the law poſitive. Even as the fooliſheſt ſort among the lawyers do ſay, that citations came from the law of God, becauſe it is ſaid: Adam where art thou? (Gen. iii. 9.) And likewiſe exceptions, becauſe Adam anſwered as it were by way of exception ſaying: The wife that thou gaveſt me, &c. But that both citations and exceptions received the form given them by the civil law. But let us ſee by what arguments they prove this confeſſion, either formed or unformed to be the commandments of God. The Lord (ſay they) ſent the leprous men to the prieſts. But what? ſent he them to confeſſion? who ever heard it ſpoken, that the Levitical prieſts were appointed to hear confeſſions? (Deut. xvii. 8.) Therefore they fly to allegories, And ſay, It was commanded by the law of Moſes, that the prieſts ſhould diſcern between leproſy and leproſy: ſin is a ſpiritual leproſy therefore it is the prieſts office to pronounce upon it. Before that I anſwer them, I aſk this by the way, If this place makes them judges of the ſpiritual leproſy? why do they draw to them the knowlege of natural and fleſhly leproſy? This forſooth is not to mock with the ſcriptures. The law giveth to the Levitical prieſts the knowlege of the leproſy, therefore let us take it upon us. Sin is a ſpiritual leproſy, therefore let us alſo be examiners of ſin. Now I anſwer: ſince the prieſthood is removed, it is neceſſary that the law be removed alſo. All prieſthoods are removed to Chriſt, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him only all the right and honour of prieſthood is alſo removed. If they love ſo well to follow allegories, let them ſet Chriſt before them for the only prieſt, and heap upon his judgment-ſeat the free juriſdiction of all things: this we can eaſily be contented to ſuffer. Moreover their allegory is very unfit, that placeth among the ceremonies that law which is merely politic. Why then did Chriſt ſend the leprous men to the prieſts? That the prieſts ſhould not cavil that he did break the law that commanded the man healed of the leproſy, to be ſhewed before the prieſts and purged with offering of ſacrifice: therefore he commanded the leprous men being cleanſed, to do that which belonged to the law. Go (ſaith he) and ſhew yourſelves to the prieſt, and offer the gift that Moſes hath commanded in the law that it ſhould be for a witneſs unto them. And truly this miracle ſhould have been a witneſs unto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed. (Matth. xxiv. 14.) Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witneſſes of Chriſt's miracles? (Matth. x. 18.) Chriſt leaveth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But becauſe they ſtill dally with it, therefore this work is for a witneſs unto them. So in another place: this goſpel ſhall be preached in all the world, for a witneſs to all nations. Again: ye ſhall be led before kings and governors, for a witneſs to them, that is, that in the judgment of God they may be more ſtrongly convinced. But if they had rather follow Chryſoſtome: he alſo teacheth that Chriſt did this for the Jews ſake that he ſhould not be accounted a breaker of the law. (Hom. 12. de muliere Chananæa.) Altho in ſo clear a matter I am aſhamed to allege the witneſs of any man: whereas Chriſt pronounceth that he leaveth the right of the law whole to the prieſts as to the profeſſed enemies of the goſpel, who were always bent to carp againſt it, if their mouth had not been ſtopped. Wherefore that the Popiſh ſacrificing prieſts may ſtill keep this profeſſion, let them openly take part with them who muſt of neceſſity be reſtrained by force, that they ſpeak not ill againſt Chriſt. For this doth not belong to his true miniſters.

Chriſt's commanding to looſe the bonds from Lazarus whom he raiſed out of the grave frivolouſly alleg-

5. They bring their ſecond argument out of the ſame fountain, that is from an allegory, as though allegories were of great force to confirm any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not prove that I can make a fairer ſhew of them for my ſide, than they

they can for theirs. They say, the Lord commanded his disciples, that when Lazarus was raised up, they should unbind and loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the disciples: and it is much more likely that he said it to the Jews who stood by him, that the miracle might be made the more evident without suspicion of fraud, and his power appear the greater, that without any touching, with his word only he raised up dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongful opinion from the Jews, desired them to roll away the stone, to feel the stink, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the only power of his word, and then first to feel him living. And this is the judgment of Chrysostom. (Ser. contra. Judæos, Gentiles & hæretic.) But let us grant that this was spoken to the disciples: what will they get thereby? that the Lord gave his apostles power to loose. But how much more fitly and more handsomely might these things be applied by way of allegory, to say that by this sign the Lord meant to instruct his faithful, to loose them that he had raised up: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sins that he had forgotten: that they should not condemn them for sinners whom he had acquitted: that they should not reproach men with those things that he had forgiven: that they should not be rigorous to punish, nor lightly offended, where he is merciful and easily entreated to spare? Truly nothing ought to move us more to readiness to forgive, than the example of the judge who threateneth that he will be unappeasable to them that are too rigorous, and ungentle. Now let them go and boast of their allegories.

Auricular confession weakly proved either by their acknowleging of their sins whom John did baptize, or by St. James his willing men to make their mutual confessions.

6. But now they join more near hand with us, when they fight (as they think) with open sentences. They that came to John's baptism, did confess their sins, and James willeth that we confess our sins one to another. No marvel if they that would be baptised did confess their sins, for it was said before that John preached the baptism of repentance, and baptised in water unto repentance. Whom should he then have baptized, but them that had confessed themselves sinners? Baptism is a token of the forgiveness of sins; and who should be admitted to this token but sinners, and they that acknowlege themselves to be such? Therefore they confessed their sins, that they might be baptized. And not without a cause doth James bid us confess one to another. But if they did mark what followeth next after, they would understand, that also maketh little for them. Confess (saith he) one to another your sins, and pray one for another. He joineth together mutual confession and mutual prayer. If we must confess to priests only, then must we also pray for priests only. Yea, what and if it might follow of the words of James, that only priests might confess? for when he willeth that we should confess one to another, he speaketh only to them that may hear the confessions of others: his word is in Greek Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turns, or (if they so like best to term it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so interchangeably none can confess, but they that are meet to hear confessions. Which prerogative since they vouchsafe to grant only to priests, we do also put over the office of confessing to them only. Therefore away with such triflings, and let us take the very meaning of the apostle which is simple and plain: that is, that we should lay our weakness one in another's bosom to receive mutual counsel, mutual compassion, and mutual comfort one of another: then that we being naturally privy to the weakness of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then allege James against us: who do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can confess God's mercy, unless he have first confessed his own misery. Yea we rather pronounce him accursed that doth not before God, before his angels, before the church, yea and before all men confess himself a sinner. For the Lord hath concluded all under sin, that all mouths might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he only justified and exalted.

Auricular confession a mere human constitution not grounded upon any divine law.

7. But I marvel with what face they dare affirm, that the confession whereof they speak is of the law of God: the use whereof we grant indeed to be very ancient, but such as we are able to prove in old time to have been at liberty. Truly even their own chronicles declare, that there was no certain law or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient law they would rather have taken hold thereof, than have been contented with the decree of the council of Lateran, and ſo made themſelves to be laughed at, even of children. In other things they ſtick not to make forged decrees, which they father upon the moſt ancient councils, that they may with the reverence of antiquity dazle the eyes of the ſimple. In this point, it came not in their mind to thruſt in ſuch a falſe pack. Therefore by their own witneſs, there are not yet paſſed three hundred years ſince Innocent the third laid that ſnare upon men, and charged them with neceſſity of confeſſion. But, to ſpeak nothing of the time: the very barbarouſneſs of the words diminiſheth the credit of that law. For where theſe good fathers command every one of both kinds, male and female, once every year to confeſs all his ſins to his own prieſt, pleaſant men do merrily take exception, that in this commandment are contained only Hermaphrodites, and ſay that it belongeth not to ſuch a one as is either male or female only. Since that time, a more groſs beaſtlineſs hath bewrayed it ſelf in their ſcholars, who cannot expound what is meant by his own prieſt. Whatſoever all the popes hired bablers do prate, we hold both that Chriſt was never the author of this law that compelleth men to reckon up their ſins, and alſo that their paſſed a thouſand and two hundred years from the reſurrection of Chriſt before that any ſuch law was made. And ſo, that this tyranny was then firſt brought in, when all godlineſs and learning being deſtroyed, the viſiors of paſtors had without choice taken all licentiouſneſs upon them. Moreover there are evident teſtimonies both in hiſtory and other ancient writers, which teacheth that this confeſſion was a politic diſcipline required by the Biſhiops, not a law made by Chriſt or his apoſtles. I will allege but one out of many, which ſhall be a plain proof thereof. Sozomenus reporteth (Tripart. hiſt. lib. 9.) that this conſtitution of Biſhops was diligently kept in all the weſt churches, but eſpecially at Rome. Whereby he ſheweth that it was no univerſal ordinance of all churches. But he ſaith that there was one of the prieſts peculiarly appointed to ſerve for this office. Whereby he doth ſufficiently confute that which theſe men do falſly ſay of the keys given for this uſe univerſally to the whole order of prieſthood. For it was not the common office of all prieſts, but the ſpecial duty of ſome one that was choſen thereunto by the Biſhop. The ſame is he, whom at this day in all cathedral churches they call Penitentiary, the examiner of hainous offences, and ſuch whereof the puniſhment pertaineth to good example. Then he ſaith immediately after, that this was alſo the manner at Conſtantinople, till a certain woman feigning that ſhe came to confeſſion, was found ſo to have coloured under that pretence the diſhoneſt company that ſhe uſed with a certain deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holineſs and learning, biſhop of that church, took away that cuſtom of confeſſing. Here, here let theſe aſſes lift up their ears. If auricular confeſſion were the law of God, how durſt Nectarius repel and deſtroy it? Will they accuſe for an heretic and ſchiſmatic Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the conſenting voices of all the old fathers? But by the ſame ſentence they muſt condemn the church of Conſtantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confeſſing was not only let ſlip for a time, but alſo diſcontinued even till within the time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemn of apoſtacy not only the church of Conſtantinople, but alſo all the eaſtern churches which have neglected that law, which (if they ſay true) is inviolable and commanded to all chriſtians.

In the church of Conſtantinople auricular confeſſion taken by St. Chryſoſtom for no ſuch thing, as whereunto all men ſhould ſtand bound.

8. This abrogation Chryſoſtom, who was alſo biſhop of Conſtantinople doth in ſo many places evidently teſtify, that it is a wonder that they dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (ſaith he thy ſins that thou mayſt do them away, if thou be aſhamed to tell any man the ſins that thou haſt done, tell them daily in thy ſoul. I do not ſay, confeſs them to thy fellow ſervant, that may reproach thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confeſs thy ſins upon thy bed, that there thy conſcience may daily recognize her evils. Again: (Ser. de Pœnit. & confeſſ.) but now it is not neceſſary to confeſs when witneſſes are preſent: let the examination of thy ſins be done with thy thought: let this judgment be without witneſs: let only God ſee thee confeſſing. Again: (Hom. 5. de incomprehen. Dei natura. contra. Anomæos.) I do not lead thee into a ſtage of thy fellow ſervants, I do not compel thee to diſcloſe thy ſins to men, rehearſe and utter thy conſcience before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the beſt ſurgeon, and aſk ſalve of him. Shew them to him who will reproach thee with nothing, but will moſt gently heal thee. Again: (Hom. 4. de Lazaro.) Tell no man, leaſt he reproach thee, for neither is it to be confeſſed to thy fellow ſervant, that may utter it abroad, but to the Lord. To the Lord ſhew thy wounds who hath care of thee, who is both gentle and a phyſician. Afterward he bringeth in God ſpeaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the midſt of a ſtage and call many witneſſes, tell thy ſin to me alone privately that I may heal thy ſore. Shall we ſay that Chryſoſtom did ſo raſhly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliver men's conſciences from theſe bonds wherewith they are bound by the law of God? not ſo. But he dare not require that as of neceſſity, which he doth not underſtand to be commanded by the word of God.

9. But that the matter may be made the plainer and eaſier, firſt we will faithfully rehearſe, what kind of confeſſion is taught by the word of God: and then we will alſo declare their inventions, but not all (for who could draw dry ſuch an infinite ſea?) but only thoſe wherein they comprehend the ſum of their ſecret confeſſion. Here I am loath to rehearſe how oft the old tranſlator hath given in tranſlation this word confeſs inſtead of praiſe: which the groſſeſt unlearned men commonly know: ſaving that it is good to have their preſumptuouſneſs bewrayed, who give away that which was written of the praiſes of God, to their own tyrannical commandment. To prove that confeſſion availeth to cheer the minds they thruſt in that place of the Pſalm: (Pſal. xiii. 5.) In the voice of rejoicing and confeſſion. But if ſuch change may ſerve, then we ſhall have what we liſt, proved by what we liſt. But ſeeing they are ſo far paſt ſhame, let the godly readers remember that by the juſt vengeance of God they have been caſt into a reprobate mind, that their preſumption ſhould be the more deteſtable. But if we will reſt in the ſimple doctrine of the ſcripture, we ſhall not be in danger of any ſuch deceits to beguile us. For there is appointed one order of confeſſing, that foraſmuch as it is the Lord that forgiveth, forgetteth, and putteth away ſins, therefore we ſhould confeſs our ſins to him for to obtain pardon, he is the phyſician, therefore let us ſhew our diſeaſes unto him. It is he that is grieved and offended, therefore let us ſeek peace at his hand. He is the knower of hearts, and privy to all thoughts therefore let us make haſte to pour out our hearts before him. Finally, it is he that calleth ſinners, therefore let not us delay to come to him. I have (ſaith David) Pſal. li. 5. made my ſin known unto thee, and have not hidden my unrighteouſneſs. I have ſaid, I will confeſs againſt me my unrighteouſneſs to the Lord, and thou haſt forgiven the wickedneſs of my heart. Such is the other confeſſion of David. Have mercy upon me O God, according to thy great mercy. And ſuch is the confeſſion of Daniel: (Dan. ix. 5.) We have ſinned, Lord we have done perverſly, we have committed iniquities and have been rebellious in ſwerving from thy commandment. And ſuch are the other confeſſions that are commonly found in ſcripture, the rehearſal whereof would almoſt fill a great volume. If we confeſs our ſins (ſaith John) 1 Joh. i. 9. the Lord is faithful to forgive us our ſins. To whom ſhall we confeſs? even to him: that is, if we fall down with a troubled and humbled heart before him, if heartily accuſing and condemning ourſelves before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodneſs and mercy.

10. He that heartily and before God ſhall embrace this confeſſion, ſhall undoubtedly have both a tongue ready to confeſs, ſo oft as it ſhall be needful for him to publiſh the mercy of God before men, and not only to whiſper the ſecret of his heart to one man, and once and in his ear: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world ſimply to rehearſe both his own ſhame and the magnificence and glory of God. After this manner when David was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the ſting of conſcience, and confeſſed his ſin before both God and man. I have (ſaith he) 2 Sam. xii. 13. ſinned againſt the Lord, that is to ſay, now I allege nothing for my excuſe, I uſe no ſhifts, but that all men may judge me a ſinner, and that the ſame thing which I would not have had ſecret from the Lord, may be alſo open to men. Therefore a willing confeſſion before men always followeth the ſecret confeſſion that is made to God, ſo oft as it is profitable for the glory of God or for the humbling of ourſelves. For this reaſon the Lord in old time ordained among the people of Iſrael, (Levit. xvi. 19.) that the prieſt ſhould firſt ſpeak the words, and the people ſaying after him ſhould openly confeſs their iniquity in the church. For he foreſaw that this help was neceſſary for them, that every man might be the better brought to a juſt acknowleging of himſelf. And it is meet that with the confeſſion of our own miſery we ſhould among ourſelves, and before all the world glorify the goodneſs and mercy of our God.

11. And it is convenient that this kind of confeſſion be both ordinary in the church, and al-

ſo extraordinarily uſed in ſpecial manner, if it happen at any time the people to be guilty of any general fault. Of this ſecond kind we have an example in that ſolemn confeſſion which all the people uſed by the means and guiding of Ezra and of Nehemiah. (Nehe. i. 7.) For whereas that long baniſhment, the deſtruction of the city and temple, the diſſolving of religion, was the puniſhment of the common revolting of them all: they could not acknowlege the benefit of deliverance in ſuch ſort as was meet, unleſs they did firſt condemn themſelves. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole congregation ſome few ſometimes be innocent. For ſince they are the members of a feeble and diſeaſed body, they ought not to boaſt of healthfulneſs. Yea it is not poſſible but they muſt alſo themſelves gather ſome infection and bear part of the blame. Therefore ſo oft as we are afflicted, either with peſtilence or war, or barrenneſs or any other plague: if it be our duty to fly to mourning, to faſting, and to other ſigns of guiltineſs: then confeſſion it ſelf, whereupon all theſe things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confeſſion, beſides that it is commended by the Lord's own mouth, there is no wiſe man that conſidering the profit thereof, dare diſallow it. For whereas in all holy aſſemblies we make our appearance in the ſight of God and the angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our acknowleging our unworthineſs? But that (ſome man will ſay) is done by every prayer. For ſo oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confeſs our ſins. I grant. But if you conſider how great is our careleſneſs, or drowſineſs, or ſluggiſhneſs, you will grant me that it ſhould be a profitable ordinance, if by ſome ſolemn uſe of confeſſion, the chriſtian common people ſhould be exercifed to humbling themſelves. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Iſraelites, was part of the nurture of the law, yet in ſome manner it alſo belongeth to us. And truly we ſee that this uſe is in well ordered churches profitably obſerved, that every ſunday the miniſter ſhould rehearſe a form of confeſſion in the name of himſelf and of all the people, wherein he accuſeth all of wickedneſs and craveth pardon of the Lord. Finally, with this key the gate to prayer is opened as well privately to every man as univerſally to all men.

12. Moreover the ſcripture alloweth two forms of private confeſſion, one that is made for our own ſake, whereof that ſaying of James is ſpoken, that we ſhould confeſs our ſins one to another, (Jam. v. 16.) for his meaning is, that diſcloſing our wickedneſſes one to another, we ſhould help one another with mutual counſel and comfort. The other form is to be uſed for our neighbours ſake, to appeaſe him and reconcile him unto us, if he have in any thing been offended by us. Now in the firſt kind of confeſſion, although James in this hath aſſigned no man by name, into whoſe boſom we ſhould unload ourſelves, leaveth us a free choice to confeſs to him that ſhall ſeem meeteſt unto us of all the flock of the church: yet we ought principally to chooſe the paſtors, becauſe they are for the moſt part in compariſon of the others to be judged meeteſt. I ſay that they are meeteſt in compariſon of the reſt, becauſe the Lord appointeth them by the very calling of their miniſtry, at whoſe mouth we ſhould be inſtructed to ſubdue and correct our ſins, and alſo may receive comfort: by truſt of pardon. For as the office of mutual admoniſhing and reproving is committed to all men, yet it is ſpecially enjoined to the miniſters. So when as we all ought to comfort and confirm one another in confidence of God's mercy: yet we ſee that the miniſters to aſſure our conſciences of the forgiveneſs of ſins, are ordained as it were witneſſes and pledges therefore, in ſo much that they are ſaid to forgive ſins and looſe ſouls. When thou heareſt this to be aſcribed unto them, think that it is for thy profit. Therefore let every one of the faithful remember this to be his duty, if he be privately ſo vexed and troubled with the feeling of ſins that he cannot wind out himſelf, without help of another, not to neglect the remedy that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his relief to uſe the private confeſſion to his own paſtor: and for his comfort to crave the private help of him, whoſe duty it is both publicly and privately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the goſpel. But always this moderation is to be uſed, where God appointeth no certainty, not to bind conſciences with a certain yoke. Hereupon followeth that ſuch confeſſion ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to thoſe only that ſhall underſtand themſelves to have need of it. Then even they that uſe it for their need, ſhould not be compelled by any commandment, or trained by any deceit, to reckon up all their ſins, but ſo far, as they ſhall think it

neceſſary for them, that they may receive ſound fruit of comfort. Faithful paſtors ought not only to leave this liberty to the churches, but alſo to maintain it, and ſtoutly ſtand in defence of it, if they will have tyranny abſent from their miniſtry and ſuperſtition from the people.

Particular men bound to confeſs their faults unto men againſt whom they have offended.

13. Of the other ſort of confeſſion Chriſt ſpeaketh in Matthew. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembreſt that thy brother hath any thing againſt thee, leave thy gift there, and go, and firſt be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For ſo charity that hath been impaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowleging and craving pardon of the offence that we have committed. Under this kind is contained their confeſſion that have ſinned even to the offending of the whole church. (Mat. v. 23.) For if Chriſt maketh ſo great a matter of the private offence of one man, to forbid from holy myſteries all them that have ſinned againſt their brother, till they be with juſt amends reconciled: how much greater reaſon is it, that he who hath offended the church with any evil example, ſhould recover the favour of the church with acknowleging his fault? So was the Corinthian (2 Cor. ii. 6.) received again to the communion, when he had yielded himſelf obedient to correction. Alſo this form of confeſſion was uſed in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (ſaith he) in due time, and then they come to confeſſion, and by laying on of the hands of the biſhop and the clergy, they receive leave to come to the communion. Any other order or form of confeſſing, the ſcripture utterly knoweth not, and it is not our duty to bind conſciences with new bonds, whom Chriſt moſt ſharply forbiddeth us to bring in bondage. In the mean time I do not ſo much ſpeak againſt it, that the ſheep ſhould not preſent themſelves to their ſhepherd when they mean to be partakers of the holy ſupper, this I would moſt gladly have every where obſerved. For both they that have a troubled conſcience, may from thence receive ſingular profit, and they that are to be admoniſhed do by that means prepare place for admoniſhment, but ſo always that tyranny and ſuperſtition be away.

14. In theſe three kinds of confeſſion, the power of the keys hath place: that is, either when the whole church with ſolemn acknowleging of their faults crave pardon: or when a private man, that by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the unquietneſs of his conſcience, doth need help of the miniſter, diſcloſeth his weakneſs unto him. But there are diverſe ways of taking away offence, becauſe although thereby alſo peace of conſcience is provided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred ſhould be taken away, and mens minds knit together with a bond of peace. But this uſe that I have ſpoken of is not to be deſpiſed, that we may the more willingly confeſs our ſins. For when the whole church ſtandeth as it were before the judgment ſeat of God, confeſſing it ſelf guilty, and hath only refuge unto the mercy of God: it is no ſlender or light comfort to have there preſent Chriſt's ambaſſador, having commandment of reconciliation, of whom they may hear abſolution pronounced unto them. Here the profitableneſs of the keys is worthily commended, when this embaſſage is performed rightly, and with ſuch order and religiouſneſs as beſeemeth it. Likewiſe when he that had in a manner eſtranged himſelf from the church, receiveth pardon and is reſtored into brotherly unity: how great a benefit is it that he underſtandeth himſelf to be forgiven by them, to whom Chriſt hath ſaid: (Mat. xviii. 19.) To whomſoever ye forgive ſins in earth, they ſhall be forgiven in heaven. And of no leſs effectualneſs and profit is private abſolution, when it is aſked by them that have need of ſome ſpecial remedy to relieve their weakneſs. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he who heareth the general promiſes that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth nevertheleſs in ſome doubt, and hath ſtill an unquiet mind, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: and the ſame man, if he hath diſcloſed to his miniſter the ſecret ſore of his mind, and heareth peculiarly directed to himſelf that ſaying of the goſpel, (Mar. ix. 2.) Thy ſins are forgiven thee, be of good hope, ſtabliſheth his mind unto aſſuredneſs and is delivered from that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we ſpeak of the keys, we muſt take heed that we dream not of a certain power ſeparated from the preaching of the goſpel. In another place we ſhall have occaſion more fully to declare this matter again, where we ſhall treat of the government of the church: and there ſhall we ſee that all the power to bind and to looſe, which Chriſt hath given to his church, is bound to the word. But this is moſt true in the myſtery of of the keys, the whole force whereof ſtandeth in this, this, that the grace of the gospel be publicly and privately sealed up in the hearts of the faithful, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which cannot be done but only by preaching.

15. But what say the Romish divines? They decree that every one of either kind, so soon as they come to the years of discretion, must yearly once at the least confess all their sins to their own priest: and that their sin is not forgiven, unless they have firmly conceived an intent to confess it: which intent if they perform not when occasion is offered that they may do it, there is now no more entry open for them into Paradise. And that the priest hath the power of the keys, wherewith he may loose and bind a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vain. (Mat. xviii. 19.) Whatsoever ye bind, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselves. Some say that there is but one key in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowlege, that it is indeed requisite for a good use, but that it is only as an accessary and is not essentially joined with the other. Some others, because they saw this to be too much an unbridled licence, have reckoned up two keys, discretion and power. Others again, when they saw the lewd boldness of priests to be restrained by this moderation, have forged other keys, that is to say, authority, of discerning which they should use in giving determinate sentence: and power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: and that knowlege standeth by as a counseller. But they dare not simply expound this binding and loosing to be to forgive and put away sins: because they hear the Lord crying out in the prophet: (Isa. xliii. 11. and 25.) It is I, and none other but I, It is I, it is I that put away thy sins, O Israel. But they say it is the priest's office to pronounce who are bound or loosed, and to declare whose sins are forgiven or retained, and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolveth and retaineth sins, or by sentence when he excommunicateth and receiveth again to partaking of the sacraments. Finally, when they understand that they are not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be objected against them, that oftentimes their priests do bind and loose men unworthy, who are not therefore bound or loosed in heaven; then (which is their last refuge) they answer that the giving of the keys must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his judgment seat such sentence as the priest shall be allowed, as hath been justly pronounced, according as the deservings of him that is bound or loosed, did require. Moreover, they say, that these keys are given by Christ to all priests, and are delivered to them by their bishops, at the time of their promoting to priesthood: but the free use of them remaineth only with such as do exercise ecclesiastical offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended priests have indeed the keys, but rusty and bound up. And they that say these things may well seem modest and sober in comparison of the rest, who upon a new anvil have forged new keys with which they say the treasure of the church is locked up. These keys we shall hereafter try in place fit for it.

16. Now I will in few words answer to every one of these particularly. But at this present I speak not by what right or what wrong they bind the souls of the faithful with their laws, forasmuch as we will consider that when place serveth. But where they charge men with a law of reckoning up all their sins: where they say that sin is not forgiven but upon condition, if there be an intent conceived to confess it: where they bable that there remaineth no entry into Paradise, if an occasion of confessing be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all sins be reckoned up? But David, (who as I think) had well studied upon the confession of his sins, yet cried out: who can understand his errors? Lord cleanse me from my secret sins. (Psal. xix. 13.) And in another place. (Psal. xxxviii. 5.) My iniquities have passed above my head, and like a weighty burden have waxed heavy above my strength. Truly he understood how great was the bottomless depth of our sins: how many were the sorts of our mischievous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did bear, and how long a tail she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon up a register of them, but out of the depth of evils, he cried unto the Lord: I am overwhelmed, I am buried and choaked, the gates of hell have compassed me, let thy hand draw me out, who am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may think upon the numbring of his sins, when he seeth that David can make no number of his?

17. With

The misery wherewith their ſouls were vexed which had a care and did make a conſcience of confeſſing in ſuch ſort as the church of Rome required.

17. With this butchery, the ſouls that have been touched with any feeling of God, have been moſt cruelly vexed. Firſt, they called themſelves to account: then they divided ſins into arms, into boughs, into branches, and into twigs, according to theſe men's rules: then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumſtances. And ſo the matter went a little forward. But when they had proceeded a little further, then was on each ſide ſky, and on each ſea, no haven, no ſafe road: the more that they had paſſed over, the greater heap alway did thruſt itſelf into their ſight, yea they roſe up as high mountains, and there appeared no hope, not ſo much as after long compaſſings, any way to eſcape. And ſo they did ſtick faſt between the ſacrifice and the ſtone, and at laſt found no other iſſue but deſperation. Then theſe cruel butchers, to eaſe the wounds that themſelves had made, laid certain gentle plaiſters, that every man ſhould do as much as he could. But new cares again roſe up, yea new torments did ſlay the ſilly ſouls, as to think: I have not employed time enough, I have not endeavoured myſelf with ſuch diligence as I ought, I have paſſed over many things by negligence, and the forgetfulneſs that cometh by negligence is not excuſable. Then were there miniſtered other plaiſters to aſſwage ſuch pains, as, Repent thee of thy negligence: if it be not altogether careleſs, it ſhall be pardoned. But all theſe things cannot cloſe up the wound, and are not ſo much eaſement of the evil, as poiſon covered with honey, that they ſhouldnot with their bitterneſsoffend at the firſt taſte but enter into the bowels before that they be perceived. Therefore this terrible ſaying alway calleth upon them and ſoundeth in their ears: confeſs thy ſins. And this horror cannot be appeaſed but by aſſured comfort. Here let the readers conſider, how impoſſible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole year, and to gather together what ſins they have done every day: foraſmuch as experience proveth to every man, that when at evening he ſhall reckon up the faults but of one day, his memory is confounded therewith, ſo great a multitude and diverſity preſenteth itſelf. For I ſpeak not of groſs and blockiſh hypocrites that think they have done ſufficiently, if they have noted three or four of the greateſt ſins: but I ſpeak of the true worſhippers of God, who when they ſee themſelves oppreſſed with the examination that they have made, do add alſo this ſaying of John: (1 John iii. 20) If our own heart accuſe, God is greater than our heart: and ſo they quake for fear at the ſight of the judge, whoſe knowlege far ſurmounteth our underſtanding.

The confeſſing of all our ſins a thing impoſſible, neither is the confeſſing of them if it were poſſible ſo neceſſary that without it all men are excluded from heaven.

18. But whereas a great part of the world reſted themſelves upon ſuch flatteries, wherewith ſo deadly a poiſon was tempered, this came not ſo to paſs, becauſe they believed that God was ſatisfied, or becauſe they themſelves were fully ſatisfied: but the anchor caſt as it were in the mid-ſea, ſhould reſt a little from failing, or as a way-faring man weary and fainting, ſhould lie down in the way. I labour not much in proving this. For every man may be witneſs to himſelf, I will in a ſhort ſum ſhew, what manner of law this was. Firſt, ſimply it is impoſſible, and therefore it can do nothing but deſtroy, damn, confound, and caſt into ruin and deſperation. And then when it hath led ſinners from the true feeling of their ſin, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themſelves. For while they are wholly buſied in reckoning up of their ſins, in the mean time thy forget the ſecret ſink of vices, their hidden iniquities, and inward filthineſs, bythe knowlege whereof they ſhould chiefly have weighed their miſery. But this is a moſt certain rule of confeſſion, to acknowlege and confeſs the bottomleſs depth of our evil to be ſo great as paſſeth our underſtanding. After this rule we ſee that the Publican's confeſſion was made, (Luke xviii. 13.) Lord be merciful to me a ſinner: as if he ſhould ſay: All that ever I am, I am altogether a ſinner, and I cannot attain with knowlege or expreſs with tongue the greatneſs of my ſins: let the bottomleſs depth of thy mercy ſwallow up the bottomleſs depth of my ſin. But when thou wilt ſay, what, are not all our ſins to be confeſſed? is no confeſſion acceptable to God, but that which is knit up in theſe two words, I am a ſinner? No, but rather we muſt endeavour ourſelves as much as in us lieth, to pour out our heart before the Lord, and not only in one word confeſs ourſelves ſinners, but alſo truly and heartily acknowlege ourſelves to be ſuch: and with all our thought record, how great and diverſe is our filth of ſins, not only that we are unclean, but what, how great, and in how many parts is our uncleanneſs: not only that we are debtors, but with how great debts we are loaden, and how many ways charged: not only that we are wounded, but alſo with how many and deadly ſtrokes we are wounded. With this acknowleging when the ſinner hath wholly poured out himſelf before God, let him earneſtly and ſincerely think, that yet there remain more ſins, and that the ſecret corners of their evils are ſo deep that they cannot be throughly diſcloſed. And he crieth out with David: (Pſal xix. 13.) Who underſtandeth his errors? Lord cleanſe me from my hidden ſins. Now where they affirm that ſins are not forgiven but with an intent of confeſſing firmly conceived, and that the gate of paradiſe is ſhut againſt him that neglecteth occaſion offered when he may be confeſſed, God forbid that we ſhould grant them that. For there is no other forgiveneſs of ſin, than always hath been. It is not read that all they who have confeſſed their ſins in the ear of ſome prieſt, have obtained forgiveneſs of ſins at Chriſt's hand. And truly they could not confeſs, where there were neither any prieſts confeſſors, nor any confeſſing at all. And in many ages after, this confeſſion was unheard of, at which time ſins were forgiven without this condition. But that we may not need to diſpute longer about this, as about a doubtful matter, the word of God is plain, which abideth for ever: Whenſoever the ſinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. (Ezek. xviii. 20.) He that dare add any thing to this word, bindeth not ſins, but the mercy of God. For whereas they ſay, that judgment cannot be given but when the cauſe is heard, we have a ſolution in readineſs, that they do preſumptuouſly taken that upon themſelves, who have made themſelves judges. And it is a marvel that they do ſo boldly frame to themſelves ſuch principles, as no man in his right judgment will grant. They boaſt that the office of binding and looſing is committed to them, as though it were a certain juriſdiction joined with inquiſition. Moreover their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authority was unknown to the apoſtles. Neither doth it belong to the prieſt, but to him who deſireth abſolution, to know certainly whether the ſinner be looſed or no: foraſmuch as he that heareth can never know whether the reckoning be juſt and perfect. So ſhould there be no abſolution but ſuch as is reſtrained to his words that is to be judged. Moreover the whole order of looſing ſtandeth of faith and repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowlege of man, when ſentence muſt be given upon another man. It followeth therefore that the aſſurance of binding and looſing is not ſubject to the judgment of an earthly judge: becauſe the miniſter of the word, when he doth his office, cannot give abſolution but conditionally: but that this is ſpoken for the ſins ſake, whoſe ſins ye forgive, &c. that they ſhould not doubt that the pardon which is promiſed by the commandment and word of God, ſhall be ratified in heaven.

19. Therefore it is no marvel we condemn, and deſire to have utterly taken away this auricular confeſſion, a thing ſo peſtilent and ſo many ways hurtful to the church: but if it were a thing of itſelf indifferent, yet for as much as it is to no uſe nor profit, and hath given cauſe to ſo many wickedneſſes, ſacrileges and errors, who will not think that it ought to be preſently aboliſhed? They do indeed reckon up ſome good uſes, which they boaſt upon as very profitable, but theſe are either falſe or of no value at all. One only they commend with a ſingular prerogative, that ſhame is a great puniſhment to him that confeſſeth, whereby the ſinner both is for a time to come made more circumſpect, and preventeth the puniſhment of God in puniſhing himſelf. As though we did not humble a man with ſhamefaſtneſs enough when we call him to that high judgment ſeat of heaven. I mean to the hearing of God. It is forſooth very well profited, if for ſhame of one man's knowlege we ceaſe to ſin, and are not aſhamed to have God witneſs of our evil conſcience. Although the very ſame is alſo moſt falſe, for it is to be ſeen that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiouſneſs to ſin, than when men having made confeſſion to a prieſt, think that they may wipe their mouth and ſay, I did it not. And not only they are made all the year long the bolder to ſin? but all the reſt of the year bearing themſelves bold upon confeſſion, they never ſigh unto God, they never return to themſelves, but heap ſins upon ſins, till they vomit up all at once as they think, And when they have once vomited them up, they think themſelves diſcharged of their burden, and that they have taken away from God the judgment that they have given to the prieſt, and that they have brought God in forgetfulneſs when they have made the prieſt privy. Moreover who doth merrily ſee the day of confeſſion at hand? Who goeth to confeſſion with a chearful heart, and cometh not to it rather againſt his will, and as it were drawing backward, like as if he were taken by the neck and drawn to priſon? unleſs peradventure it be the very prieſts, that uſe joyfully to delight themſelves with mutual rehearſals of their doings, as it were with merry tales: I will not defile much paper with monſtrous abominations whereof auricular confeſſion ſwarmeth full. Only this I ſay, if that holy man did not unwiſely, that for one rumour of fornication took away confeſſion out of the church, yea out of the remembrance of his flock, then we are thereby put in mind what is needful to be done at this day upon infinite whoredoms, adulteries, inceſts, and bawderies.

Authority granted to bind and looſe is no authorizing of Popiſh prieſts, to abſolve in ſuch ſort as they do.

20. Where the confeſſioners allege for this purpoſe the power of the keys and do thereupon ſet the poupe and prore of their kingdom, as the proverb is: it is to be ſeen how much they ought to avail. Then (ſay they) are the keys given without cauſe? Is it ſaid without cauſe: Whatſoever you looſe upon earth, ſhall be alſo looſed in heaven? (Matth. xviii. 18.) Do we then make the word of Chriſt void? I anſwer there was a weighty cauſe why the keys ſhould be given, as both I have even now already declared, and ſhall more plainly ſhew again when I come to treat of excommunication. But what if I do with one ſword cut off the hold of all that they require, that is, with ſaying, that ſacrificing prieſts are not the vicars nor ſucceſſors of the apoſtles? But this ſhall alſo be treated of in another place: but now they raiſe up an engine whereby they wouldmoſt of all defend themſelves, and thereby may all their building be overthrown. For Chriſt did not give his apoſtles the power to bind and looſe, before that he gave them the holy Ghoſt. Therefore I ſay, that none have the power of the keys that have not firſt received the holy Ghoſt. I deny that any man can uſe the keys but having the holy Ghoſt going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trifling ſay, that they have the holy Ghoſt. But indeed they deny it, unleſs peradventure they feign (as they do feign indeed) the holy Ghoſt to be a vain thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they ſhall not be believed. And by this engine they are utterly overthrown, that of whatſoever door they boaſt that they have the key, a man may alway aſk them whether they have the holy Ghoſt who is the judge and governor of the keys. If they anſwer that they have, then they may be aſked again, whether the holy Ghoſt may err. This they will not be glad to ſpeak expreſly, although they crookedly utter the ſame by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no prieſts have power of the keys which do commonly without conſideration looſe thoſe things that the Lord would have to be bound, and bind thoſe things that the Lord commanded to be looſed.

21. Whereas they ſee themſelves convinced by moſt clear experiments, that they do without choice looſe and bind the worthy and unworthy, they uſurp a power without knowlege. And though they dare not deny that knowlege is requiſite for a good uſe, yet they write that the very power is given to evil diſpoſers of it. But this is the power, whatſoever thou bindeſt or looſeſt in earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in heaven. Either the promiſe of Chriſt muſt lie, or they that have this power do well bind and looſe. Neither may they dally and ſay, that the ſaying of Chriſt is limited according to the deſervings of him that is bound or looſed. And we alſo confeſs, that none can be bound or looſed, but they that are worthy to be bound or looſed. But the meſſengers of the goſpel and the church have the word, by which they meaſure this worthineſs, in this word the meſſengers of the goſpel, may promiſe to all men forgiveneſs of ſins in Chriſt by faith, they may proclaim damnation unto all and upon all that embrace not Chriſt. (1 Cor. vi. 9.) In this word the church pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, thieves, manſlayers, covetous men, unjuſt men, have no part in the kingdom of God, and bindeth ſuch with moſt ſure bonds. With the ſame word the church looſeth them whom it comforteth being repentant. But what power ſhall this be, not to know what is to be bound or looſed, and not to be able to bind or looſe without knowlege? Why then do they ſay that they looſe by authority given unto them, when the looſing is uncertain? What have we to do with this imaginative power, if their be no uſe for it? But I have already proved that either there is no uſe of it, or ſo uncertain an uſe as may be accounted for none at all. For whereas they confeſs that their are many prieſts who do not rightly uſe the keys, and that the power without lawful uſe is of no effect. Who ſhall aſſure me that he of whom I am looſed is a good uſer of the keys? If he be anevil uſer of them what hath he elſe but ſuch an empty diſpoſing of them, as to ſay, what is to be bound or looſed in thee I know not, for as much as I want the right uſe of the keys, but if thou deſerve, I looſe thee. But ſo much might do, I will not ſay a lay-man (for they could not bear that with patient ears) but a Turk or a devil, for it is as much as to ſay, I have not the word of God the ſure rule of looſing, but there is power given me to looſe thee, if thy deſervings be ſo. We ſee therefore what they meant, when they defined the keys to be the authority of diſcerning, and power of executing? and that knowlege is adjoined for a counſellor, and like a counſellor ſerveth for a good uſe: undoubtedly even they deſired to reign at their own will, licentiouſly without God and his word.

for

22. If any man take exception and ſay, that the lawful miniſters of Chriſt ſhall be no leſs doubtful in their office, becauſe the abſolution that hangeth upon faith ſhall alway remain doubtful: and then that ſinners ſhall either have none or a cold comfort, becauſe the miniſter himſelf who is no competent judge of their faith, cannot be aſſured of their abſolution: we have an anſwer thereunto in readineſs. For they ſay that no ſins are forgiven by the prieſt, but ſuch whereof himſelf hath been the hearer: ſo by their opinion, the forgiveneſs hangeth upon the judgment of the prieſt, and if he do not wiſely diſcern who are worthy of pardon, the whole doing is void and of none effect. Finally the power whereof they ſpeak, is a juriſdiction adjoined to examination, whereunto pardon and abſolution is reſtrained. In this point is found no ſure ground, but rather it is a bottomleſs depth. For where the confeſſion is not ſound, the hope of pardon is alſo lame, and then the prieſt himſelf muſt needs ſtick in ſuſpence while he cannot tell, whether the ſinner doth faithfully reckon up all his evil deeds. Finally (ſuch is the ignorance and rudeneſs of prieſts) the moſt part are no fitter to do this office, than a ſhoemaker to plow the ground, and the reſt in a manner all ought worthily to ſuſpect themſelves. Hereupon therefore riſeth the perplexity and doubtfulneſs of the pope's abſolution, becauſe they will have it grounded upon the perſon of the prieſt, and not only that, but alſo upon his knowlege, that he may judge only of things informed, examined and proved. Now if a man ſhould aſk of theſe good doctors, whether a ſinner be reconciled to God, when ſome ſins are forgiven: I ſee not what they have to anſwer, but that they ſhall be compelled to confeſs that all is unprofitable, that the prieſt pronounceth of the forgiveneſs of thoſe ſins that he hath heard rehearſed, ſo long as the other ſins are not delivered from condemnation. On the behalf of him that confeſſeth how hurtful carefulneſs holdeth his conſcience bound, appeareth hereby that when he reſteth upon the prieſts diſcretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainly by the word of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and clear from all theſe abſurdities. For the abſolution is conditional, that the ſinner ſhould truſt that God is merciful unto him, ſo that he ſincerely ſeek the cleanſing of his ſins in the ſacrifice of Chriſt, and obey the grace offered him. So he cannot err, who according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is given him in inſtructions by the word of God. And the ſinner may embrace a ſure and clear abſolution, when that ſimple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Chriſt, according to that general doctrine of our maſter himſelf. (Matth. ix. 29.) Be it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath been wickedly deſpiſed in the papacy.

Things ſpoken of the goſpel and of excommunication wreſted to the maintenance of auricular confeſſion, vain devices concerning the abſolution of them that confeſs, corrupt injunctions of penalties and ſatisfactions laid upon them that are abſolved.

23. How fooliſhly they confound thoſe things that the ſcripture teacheth of the power of the keys, I have promiſed that I will ſpeak in another place, and there ſhall be a more convenient place for it, when I come to treat of the government of the church. But let the readers remember that thoſe following things are wreſted to auricular and ſecret confeſſion, which are ſpoken by Chriſt partly of the preaching of the goſpel, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they object that the power of looſing is given to the apoſtles, which prieſts may uſe in forgiving ſins acknowleged unto them, it is plain that they take a falſe and fooliſh principle, becauſe the abſolution that ſerveth faith, is nothing elſe but a witneſs of pardon taken out of the free promiſe of the goſpel. As for the other confeſſion, that hangeth upon the diſcipline of the church, it pertaineth nothing to ſecret ſins but rather to example, that common offence of the church may be taken away. But whereas they ſcrape together here and there teſtimonies, to prove that it ſufficeth not to confeſs ſins either to God only or to lay-men, unleſs a prieſt be the hearer of them, their travel therein is but fooliſh and ſuch as they may be aſhamed of. For when the ancient fathers counsel sinners to unburden themselves to their own pastor, it cannot be expounded of a particular rehearsal which was not then in use. Then Lombard and such like (such was their siniſter dealing) seem of set purpose to have given themselves to feigned books, by pretence whereof they might deceive the simple. They do indeed truly confess, that because absolution always accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although he have not yet confessed, and therefore that then the priest doth not so much forgive sins as pronounce and declare them forgiven. Altho' in the word of declaring they slily bring in a gross error, thrusting in a ceremony instead of a doctrine. But whereas they patch unto it, that he is absolved in the face of the church who hath already obtained pardon before God: they do inconveniently draw to the peculiar use of every particular man, that which we have already said to be appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they deprave and corrupt moderation, adding another manner of forgiving with an enjoining of penalty and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claim to their own sacrifices a power to part that in halves which God hath in all places promised us whole together. For when he simply requireth repentance and faith, this partition or exception is a very robbery of God. For it is in effect as much as if the priest taking upon him the person of a tribune, should become intercessor to God, and would not suffer God of his mere liberality to receive him into favour, that hath lyen prostrate before the tribunes seats and there hath been punished.

Auricular confession an human constitution, established in most corrupt times of the church, bringing some to despair and some to be careless, impossible to be defended or coloured by any shift in the world.

24. The whole sum cometh to this point, that if they will make God the author of this counterfeit confession, therein is their falshood condemned, as I have proved them false forgers in the few places that they allege. But since it is evident that it is a law made by men, I say that it is both tyrannical and made injuriously against God, who binding men's consciences to his word, will have them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessity prescribed of that thing which the Lord appointed to be free, I say that this is a sacrilege not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgive sins, wherein our salvation consisteth. Moreover I have shewed that this tyranny was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthy barbarousness. I have also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth down headlong into desperation the poor souls in whomsoever abideth a fear of God: or where there reigneth carelessness, it delighteth them with vain flatteries, and so maketh them negligent. Last of all I have declared, that whatsoever mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and deprave pure doctrine, and hide ungodliness with deceitful colours.

25. The third place in repentance they assign to satisfaction, whereof all that ever they babble may be overthrown with one word. They say that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to abstain from his former evils, and change his behaviour into better, unless he make satisfaction to God for those things that he hath done: and that there are many helps by which we may redeem sins, as weepings, fastings, obligations and the works of charity. With these we must win the Lord to be favourable, with these we must pay our debts to the righteousness of God, with these we must make amends for our faults, with these we must deserve pardon. For although by the greatness of his mercy he hath forgiven our fault, yet by the discipline of his justice he retaineth the pain, and that this is the pain that must be redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they say cometh to this point, that we do indeed obtain pardon of our sins by the mercifulness of God, only by means of the merits of our works, by which the offence of our sins are recompensed, and due satisfaction is thereby fully made to God's righteousness. Against such lies, I set the free forgiveness of sins, than which there is nothing more evidently spoken of in the scripture. (Tit. iii. 5.) First, what is forgiveness, but a gift of mere liberality? For the creditor is not said to forgive, that acknowlegeth by acquittance that the money is paid, but he that without any payment willingly of his own liberality cancelleth the debtor's bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? with what confidence therefore do they set up their satisfaction, that are stricken down with so mighty a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Isaiah, (Isa. xliii. 15.) It is I, it is I, that do put away iniquities for mine own sake, and will not be mindful of thy sins: doth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgiveness only from his goodness? Moreover whereas the whole scripture beareth this witness of Christ, that forgiveness of sins is to be received by his name, (Acts x. 43.) doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then do they teach that it is received by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they deny that they give this to satisfactions, although they say that the same are used as helps by way of means. For whereas the scripture saith: By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we allege nothing of our own, but rest upon the only commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirmeth (2 Cor. v. 19.) that God is reconciling the world to himself in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sins, he immediately sheweth the mean and manner how, because he that was without sin, was made sin for us.

The faith which holdeth Christ to be the propitiation for our sins cannot stand with that doctrine which teacheth satisfaction to be made by us for sins committed after baptism.

26. But such is their perverseness) who say that both forgiveness of sins and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in baptism received into the favour of God by Christ: that after baptism we must rise again by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profiteth nothing, but so far as it is distributed by the keys of the church. Neither do I speak of a doubtful matter, forasmuch as they have in their writings betrayed their own filthiness, and not one or two of them, but all the schoolmen universally. For their master after he had confessed that Christ had paid the penalty of sins upon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, (1 Pet. ii. 24.) they immediately correct his saying with adding this exception, that in baptism all temporal penalties of sins are released, but after baptism they are diminished by the help of penance, that so the cross of Christ and our penance may work together. (Lib. 3. Sentent. dist. 9.) But John (1 John. ii. 2. and 12.) saith far otherwise, if any man sin, we have an advocate with the father, even Jesus Christ, who is the propitiation for our sins, I write unto you children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake. Truly, he speaketh to the faithful, to whom when he setteth forth Christ to be the propitiation of sins, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God (being displeased) may be made favourable and appeased. He doth not say: God was once reconciled unto you by Christ, now seek you other means, but he maketh him a perpetual advocate, alway to restore us by his intercession into the favour of his Father: a perpetual propitiation, by which our sins may be cleansed away. For this is ever true that the other John said: (John i. 36.) Behold, the Lamb of God, behold him that taketh away the sins of the world. He taketh them away (saith he) himself and none other, that is to say, forasmuch as he alone is the Lamb of God, he alone is the oblation for sins, he alone the propitiatory sacrifice, he alone the satisfaction. For whereas the right and power to forgive belongeth properly to the Father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the son, as we have already seen: Christ is here set in another degree, who taking upon himself the pain due unto us, hath taken away our guiltiness before the judgment of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shall no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, unless the same honour remain whole with him, which they do wrongfully take to themselves that go about to appease God with their own recompensings.

They cannot yield unto Christ that honour which they should nor find that peace in their own consciences which they might who rest any thing upon the force of their own satisfactions

27. And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may have his due honour kept unto him whole and undiminished: and that the conscience being assured of the forgiveness of sin, may have peace with God. Isaiah saith, (Isa. liii. 4.) that the father hath laid the iniquities of us all upon his Son that we should be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other words saith: (1 Pet. ii. 24.) that Christ did in his body bear our sins upon the tree. Paul writeth that sin was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sin for us. (Rom. viii. 3.) That is to say, that the force and curse of sin was slain in Christ's body, when he was given to be a sacrifice, upon whom the whole heap of our sins with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadful judgment of God, and condemnation of death should be cast. Here those triflings are in no case to be heard. that after the first purging, every one of us doth none otherwise feel the effectualness of the sufferings of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactory repentance: but so oft as we fall, we are called back to the only ſatisfaction of Chriſt. Now ſet before thee their peſtilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the firſt forgiveneſs of ſins: that if we fall afterwards, to obtain that, a ſecond forgiveneſs our works do work with grace. If theſe things may have place, do theſe things that are here before aſſigned to Chriſt remain ſafe unto him? It is a marvellous great difference, between this that our iniquities are laid upon Chriſt, that they are cleanſed in him, and this that they are cleanſed by our own works: between this that Chriſt is the procuring cauſe of mercy, and this that God muſt be made merciful by works. But if we ſpeak of pacifying the conſcience: what pacification ſhall this be for a mans conſcience, to hear that his ſins are redeemed by ſatisfactions? When ſhall he certainly know the meaſure of his ſatisfaction? Therefore he will always doubt whether God be merciful or not, he will alway be vexed, and alway quake for fear. For they that reſt upon light petty ſatisfactions, do too contemptuouſly eſteem the judgment of God, and do little conſider how great is the grievouſneſs of ſin as we ſhall declare in another place. But although we grant they may redeem ſome ſins with juſt ſatisfaction: yet what will they do when they are oppreſſed with ſo many ſins, for ſatisfaction whereof an hundred lives although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot ſuffice? Beſide that, all the places where the forgiveneſs of ſins is affirmed, do not belong to younglings, but to the already regenerate children of God, and them that have been long nouriſhed in the boſom of the church. That embaſſage which Paul ſo honourably extolleth, (2 Cor. v. 20.) I beſeech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled unto God, is not directed to ſtrangers, but to them that had been already regenerate. But he, bidding ſatisfactions farewel, ſendeth them to the croſs of Chriſt. So when he writteth to the Coloſſians, (Coloſ. i. 20.) that Chriſt by the blood of the croſs hath pacified all things in heaven or in earth, he reſtraineth not this to the only moment wherein we are received into the church, but extendeth it to our whole courſe. Which eaſily appeareth by the proceſs of the text, where he ſaith, that the faithful have a redemption by the blood of Chriſt, that is forgiveneſs of ſins. Albeit it is ſuperfluous to heap together more places, that readily offer themſelves to be found.

28. Here they flee to the ſanctuary of the fooliſh diſtinction, that ſome ſins are venial, and ſome deadly: that for deadly ſins is great ſatisfaction due, that venial ſins are purged with more eaſy remedies, as with ſaying of the Lords prayer, with ſprinkling of holy water, with abſolution at the maſs. Thus they mock and trifle with God. But whereas they have always in their mouth venial and deadly ſin, yet they could never diſcern the one from the other, ſaving that they make ungodlineſs and uncleanneſs of heart a venial ſin. But we (as the ſcripture, the rule of right and wrong teacheth us) do pronounce, that the reward of ſin is death, and that the ſoul that ſinneth is worthy of death. (Rom. vi. 2. Ezek. xviii. 2. Rom. viii. 1.) But the ſins of the faithful are venial, not becauſe they do not deſerve death, but becauſe by the mercy of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Jeſus, becauſe they are not imputed: becauſe they are taken away by pardon. I know how unjuſtly they ſlander this our doctrine. For they ſay, that it is the Stoicks ſtrange concluſion, concerning the equality of ſins. But they will eaſily be convinced by their own mouth. For I demand of them, whether among the very ſame ſins that they confeſs to be deadly, they do not acknowlege one to be greater than another. It doth not therefore immediately follow, that ſins are equal, becauſe they are altogether deadly. When the ſcripture definitively ſaith, that the reward of ſin is death, that the obedience of the law is the way of life, and that the tranſgreſſion of the law is death, they cannot eſcape this ſentence. What end of ſatisfying then will they find in ſo great a heap of ſins? If the ſatisfaction of one day be the ſatisfaction of one ſin, while they are about that one ſatisfaction, they commit many ſins, ſince the juſteſt man paſſeth no one day wherein he falleth not many times. (Prov. xxiv. 16.) Now when they ſhall prepare themſelves to make ſatisfaction for the ſins, they ſhall heap up great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of ſatisfying being cut off, what do they reſt upon? how dare they ſtill think of ſatisfying?

God doth not remit our ſins and leave the penalties ſtill without our own ſatisfaction take them away to be endured.

29. They go about to extricate themſelves: but (as the Proverb is) the water ſtill cleaveth upon them. They forge a diſtinction of fault and penalty. They confeſs that the fault is forgiven by the mercy of God, but that when the fault is forgiven, the penalty remaineth which the righteouſneſs of God requireth to be paid: and that ſatisfactions do properly belong to the releaſe of the penalty. Good God what a ſkipping lightneſs is this? now they confeſs that the forgiveneſs of the fault lieth freely open for men, which at other times they teach men to deſerve by prayers and weepings, and all other kinds of preparations. But yet ſtill all that is taught us in the ſcripture concerning the forgiveneſs of ſins, doth directly plead againſt this diſtinction. Which although I think that I have already more than ſufficiently confirmed, yet I will add ſome other teſtimonies wherewith theſe winding ſnakes may be holden ſo faſt, that they ſhall not be able once to fold in the top of their tail. This is the new teſtament which the Lord hath covenanted with us in Chriſt, that he will not remember our iniquities. (Jer. xxxi. 31.) What he meant by theſe words, we learn by another prophet, where the Lord ſaith: (Ezek. xviii. 24.) If the righteous turn away from his righteouſneſs, I will not remember all his righteouſneſſes. If the wicked depart from his wickedneſs, I will not remember all his iniquities. Where he ſaith that he will not remember their righteouſneſs, (Iſai. xxxviii. 17.) that is as much as to ſay, that he will have no regard of them in reſpect to reward them. Therefore not to remember ſins, is as much as not to call them to puniſhment. The ſame thing is called in another place to caſt it behind his back, (Iſai. xliv. 22.) to wipe it away like a cloud, to drown it in the bottom of the ſea, (Mich. vii. 19.) not to impute it (Pſal. xxxii. 12.) and to hid it. (Pſal. lii. 2.) By ſuch manners of ſpeech the holy Ghoſt doth plainly expreſs his meaning unto us, if we would apply unto him willing ears to learn. Truly, if God do puniſh ſins, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to judgment, he doth not hid them: if he examine them, he doth not caſt them behind his back: if he look upon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if he ſift them, he hath not caſt them into the bottom of the ſea. And in this manner doth Auguſtine expound it in plain words. If God hath covered ſins, then he will not look upon them: if he will not mark them, then he will not puniſh them: if he will not know them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he ſay that ſins were covered, but that they ſhould not be ſeen? What was meant by this that God did ſee ſins, but that he did puniſh them? But let us hear alſo out of another place of the prophet, upon what conditions the Lord forgiveth ſins. If (ſaith he) your ſins be as ſcarlet, they ſhall be made white as ſnow: (Iſai. i. 18.) if they be red like crimſon, they ſhall be as wool. And in Jeremiah we read thus: (Jer. l. 20.) In that day the iniquity of Jacob ſhall be ſought for, and ſhall not be found: the ſin of Judah, and it ſhall not be. Becauſe I will be favourable to the remnants that I ſhall preſerve. Wilt thou briefly underſtand what is the meaning of theſe words? Weigh on the other ſide what is meant by theſe ſpeeches: that the Lord doth bind up iniquities in a ſack, doth gather them into a bundle and lay them up, and doth grave them with an iron pen in an adamant ſtone. (Job xiv. 17. Hoſ. xiii. 12. (Jer. xvii. 1.) If they ſignify (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance ſhall be given for recompence, then is it alſo not to be doubted, but that by contrary ſentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompenſing of vengeance. Here I muſt beſeech the readers not to hearken to my gloſſes, but only that they will ſuffer the word of God to take ſome place.

Chriſt in bearing our ſins ſuffered, and God in pardoning them doth remit the puniſhment we had thereby deſerved.

30. What, I pray you, hath Chriſt done for us, if we are ſtill liable to ſuffer puniſhment for our ſins? For when we ſay that he bare all our ſins in his body upon the tree, (1 Pet. ii. 24.) we mean nothing elſe thereby, but that he ſuffered all the pain and puniſhment that was due unto our ſins. And the ſame hath Iſaiah more lively declared, where he ſaith: the chaſtiſement (or correction) of our peace was upon him. (Iſa. liii. 5.) What is the correction of our peace but the puniſhment due to ſin: and which we would have ſuffered before we could have been reconciled to God, unleſs he had ſtood in our room? Here you ſee plainly, that Chriſt ſuffered the pains due to ſin, to deliver them that are his from them. And ſo oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Chriſt, he uſeth to (Rom. iii. 24.) call it in Greek Apolutroſin, whereby he meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the very price and ſatisfaction paid for our redemption. After which manner (1 Cor. i. 30.) he ſaith, that Chriſt gave himſelf Antilutron, a price of ranſom for us. What propitiation is there with the Lord (ſaith Auguſtine) but ſacrifice? And what ſacrifice is there, but that which is offered for us in the death of Chriſt? But that which is appointed in the law of Moſes for cleanſing the offence of ſin, ſtrengtheneth ſtrengtheneth our argument. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that manner of ſatisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in ſacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth moſt diligently and in moſt exact order ſent out all the ceremonies of expiation. How cometh it to paſs, that he commandeth us to make amends for our faults committed, with no works at all, but requireth only ſacrifice for ſatisfaction? Becauſe his will is to declare, that there is only one kind of ſatisfaction, whereby his wrath is appeaſed? For the ſacrifices that the Iſraelites did then offer, were not judged of as they were the works of men, but were eſteemed by their truth, that is to ſay, by the only ſacrifice of Chriſt. But what manner of recompence the Lord receiveth of us, (Hoſea xiv. 3.) hath very well expreſſed it in few words. Thou ſhalt (ſaith he) take away iniquity, O God. Lo, here is forgiveneſs of ſins. And we ſhall pay thee the calves of our lips: Lo, here is ſatifaction. I know that they would ſubtilly ſlip away, when they make a diſtinction between everlaſting, and temporal pains. But when they teach that temporal pain is any kind of puniſhment that God inflicteth as well on the body as the ſoul, except everlaſting death, this reſtraining of it doth little help them. For the places that we have above recited, do expreſly mean this, that God receiveth us into favour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the pain we had thereby deſerved. And ſo oft as David or the other prophets do aſk pardon of ſin, they alſo pray to be releaſed from the pain. Yea, the very feeling of God's judgment doth drive them thereto. Again, when they promiſe mercy at the Lord's hand, they in a manner always ſet forth the puniſhment due to ſin, and the forgiveneſs thereof, truly, when the Lord in (Ezekiel xxxvi. 22. and 21.) pronounceth that he will make an end of the captivity in Babylon, and that for his own ſake, not for the Jews ſake, he doth ſufficiently ſhew that both are of his free gift. Finally, if we are delivered by Chriſt from the guilt of ſin, the pains that ariſe therefrom muſt needs ceaſe.

Places of Scripture ſuppoſed to prove that except we ourſelves do ſatisfy God, our ſins are puniſhed after they are remitted.

31. But foraſmuch as they alſo arm themſelves with teſtimonies of Scripture, let us ſee what manner of arguments thoſe are that they allege. David (ſay they) being rebuked by Nathan the prophet of adultery and manſlaughter, received pardon of his ſin, (2 Sam. xii. 13.) yet he was afterward puniſhed by the death of his ſon that he had gotten by that adultery. We are taught to redeem with ſatisfactions ſuch pains as were to be extended after the ſin was forgiven. For Daniel (Dan. iv. 27.) adviſeth Nebuchadnezzar to break off his ſins by righteouſneſs, and his iniquities by ſhewing mercy to the poor. And Solomon writeth (Prov. xvi. 6. and x. 12.) that by mercy and truth iniquity is purged. And in another place, that charity covereth a multitude of ſins. Which ſentence Peter alſo confirmeth. (1 Pet. iv. 8.) Again in (Luke vii. 47.) the Lord ſaith of the woman that was a ſinner, that many ſins are forgiven her, becauſe ſhe hath loued much. How perverſly and wrongfully do theſe men ever weigh the doings of God. But if they had obſerved (as they ſhould not have overlooked it) that there are two kinds of God's judgment, they would have ſeen in this rebuking of David, another manner of puniſhment, than ſuch as might be thought to tend to revenge. But becauſe, it is very neceſſary for us all to know whereunto thoſe chaſtiſements have reſpect, wherewith God correcteth us for our ſins, and how much they differ from thoſe examples wherewith he purſueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation, therefore I think it will not be beſide our purpoſe to explain it a little. And to make it plain, let us call the one kind of judgment, the judgment of revenge, the other of chaſtiſement. It is to be underſtood, that God puniſheth his enemies with the judgment of revenge, that he uſeth his wrath againſt them, confoundeth, deſtroyeth, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let us take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his puniſhing is joined with his indignation: with the judgment of chaſtiſement he dealeth not ſo cruelly, as to be angry: he doth not puniſh to deſtroy, neither ſendeth he down his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly puniſhment or vengeance, but correction and admoniſhment. The one he doth as a judge, the other as a father. For the judge when he puniſheth an evil doer, he hath a regard to the offence, and puniſheth the very fault: when the father ſomewhat rigorouſly correcteth his child, he doth it not to be revenged on him, or to puniſh him, but rather to teach him, and make him more cautious for the time to come. Chryſoſtom in a certain place uſeth a ſimilitude ſomewhat different from this, but yet it cometh to the ſame point. The ſon (ſaith he) is beaten, and the ſervant alſo: but the one is puniſhed as a bond ſervant, becauſe he hath offended, and the other is chaſtiſed as a freeman and as a ſon, needing correction.

rection. To the one his correction ſerveth for reproof and amendment, to the other for a ſcourge and puniſhment.

God puniſheth his enemies in wrath, his children in love.

32. But that we may have the whole matter ſhortly and in a ready ſum, let this be the firſt of two diſtinctions. Whereſoever puniſhment is to revenge, there the curſe and wrath of God ſheweth itſelf, which he always preſerveth the faithful from. Contrariwiſe, chaſtiſement is both a bleſſing of God, and a teſtimony of his love, as the ſcripture teacheth. This difference is commonly every where ſufficiently expreſſed in the word of God. For whatſoever afflictions the wicked ſuffer in this preſent life, therein is painted out unto us as it were a certain entry to hell, from whence they already ſee a far off their eternal damnation: and they are ſo far from being amended or profiting thereby, that rather by ſuch a beginning they are prepared to the moſt cruel torments that at laſt abideth for them. But the Lord in chaſtiſing, correcteth his ſervants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confeſs that to be ſmitten with his rod, was profitable unto them for inſtruction. But as we read every where that the ſaints ſuffered the laſt kind of puniſhments with patience, ſo they have alway prayed to eſcape the firſt kind of ſcourges. Chaſtiſe me Lord (ſaith Jeremiah x. 24. 25.) but in thy judgment, not in thy wrath, leſt thou deſtroy me. Pour out thy wrath upon the nations that have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name. And David ſaith, (Pſal. vi. 1. and xxxviii. 1.) Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thy anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrary, that oftentimes it is ſaid, that the Lord is angry with his people, when he puniſheth their ſins. As in (Iſa. xii. 1.) I will confeſs to thee O Lord, becauſe thou haſt been angry with me: thy wrath is turned, and thou haſt comforted me. Again Habakkuk ſaith (Hab. iii. 2.) in the midſt of wrath remember mercy. And (Micah vii. 9.) I will bear the wrath of the Lord, becauſe I have ſinned againſt him. Where he putteth us in mind not only that they who are juſtly puniſhed, do not prevail by murmuring againſt him, but alſo that the faithful receive comfort in their ſorrow, by conſidering the intention of God. For after the ſame manner it is ſaid that he doth defile his own inheritance which yet (we know) he will never defile. But that is ſpoken not in reſpect of the purpoſe or meaning of God that puniſheth, but of the vehement ſorrow which they feel who ſuffer any of his ſeverity whatſoever it be. Yet he not only puniſheth his faithful with ſuch rigor, but ſometimes ſo woundeth them, that they think themſelves not far from the damnation of hell. Whereby he teſtifieth that they have deſerved his wrath, and ſo it behoveth that they ſhould loath themſelves for their ſins, and be ſtirred up to a greater care to appeaſe God, and haſten them to crave pardon. But even in the very doing thereof he ſheweth a more evident teſtimony of his fatherly kindneſs than of his wrath. For the covenant continueth that was made with us in our true Solomon: the truth whereof he that could diſcern, hath affirmed, that it ſhall never be made void. If (ſaith he Pſal. lxxxix. 31.) his children forſake my law, and walk not in my judgments: if they defile my ſtatutes, and keep not my commandments; I will viſit their ſins with a rod and with ſtripes: but I will not take away my mercy from him. Of which mercy to make us aſſured, he ſaith, (2 Sam. vii. 14.) that the rod wherewith he will correct the poſterity of Solomon, ſhall be of men, and ſtripes of the children of men: by which clauſes when he meaneth moderation and lenity, he therewith ſecretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreme and deadly horror, who feel the hand of God to be againſt them. How great regard he had to this lenity in chaſtiſing Iſrael, he ſheweth in the prophet (Iſa. xlviii. 10.) I have purged thee (ſaith he) in the fire: but not as ſilver, for then thou ſhouldſt have been all conſumed. Albeit he teacheth that chaſtiſements ſerve to cleanſe them, but he further ſaith, that he uſeth the ſame ſo temperately, that they be not altogether conſumed by them. And this is needful. For the more that every man reverently feareth God, and followeth after godlineſs, ſo much the more he is afraid to bear his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groan under his ſcourges, yet becauſe they weigh not the cauſe, but rather turn their back both to their own ſins and the judgment of God, by that inſenſibility they acquire a hardneſs: or becauſe they murmur and kick againſt him, and make an uproar againſt their judge, that furious ſudden rage aſtoniſheth them with madneſs and fury. But the faithful being admoniſhed by his correction, immediately ſit down to conſider their ſins, and being ſtricken with dread and horror, they flee humbly to pray to him for pardon, and unleſs the Lord did aſſwage theſe ſorrows wherewith they torment themſelves, they

they would faint a hundred times even under the ſmalleſt tokens of his wrath.

God puniſheth the wicked to be revenged on them for having ſinned, but correcteth his children to make them careful not to ſin.

33. Then let this be the ſecond diſtinction, that when the reprobate are ſtriken with the ſcourges of God, they do already after a certain manner begin to ſuffer pains by his judgment, and though they ſhall not eſcape unpuniſhed, for that they have not taken heed to ſuch tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not puniſhed to make them come to a better mind: but to their great hurt, that they ſhould prove God to be a judge and revenger. But his children are beaten with rods, not that they ſhould thereby be puniſhed of God for their ſins, but that they ſhould thereby profit to amendment. Therefore we think they rather have reſpect to the time to come, than to the time paſt. This I had rather expreſs in Chryſoſtom's words (In ſerm. de pœnit. & confeſſ.) than mine own. For this end (ſaith he) God doth lay pain upon us, not puniſhing our ſins paſt, but correcting us againſt the time to come. And ſo ſaith Auguſtine: that which thou ſuffereſt, that for which thou lamenteſt, is a medicine to thee and not pain, a chaſtiſement not damnation. Put not away the ſcourge, if thou wouldſt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Know ye brethren that all this miſery of mankind, which the world groaneth under is medicinal ſorrow, and not a penal ſentence, &c. Theſe quotations I thought proper to adduce leaſt the manner of ſpeaking I have uſed above, ſhould ſeem new and unuſual. And hereunto ſerve all the complaints full of indignation wherewith the Lord oftentimes doth expoſtulate concerning the unkindneſs of his people, for that they ſtiffly deſpiſed all puniſhments. In Iſaiah (Iſa. i. 5.) he ſaith: to what purpoſe ſhould I ſtrike you any more: from the ſole of the foot to the crown of the head, there is no place whole. But becauſe the prophets are full of ſuch ſayings, it is ſufficient to have briefly ſhewed that God doth puniſh his church with no other intention, but that it ſhould be tamed and amend. Therefore when he caſt Saul out of the kingdom, he puniſhed him to revenge (1 Sam. xv. 23.) When he took from David his young ſon, he corrected him to amendment. (2 Sam. xii. 18.) In this ſenſe is that ſaying of Paul to be underſtood, (1 Cor. xi. 32.) we are judged of the Lord, we are corrected that we ſhould not be damned with this world: that is, when we who are the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heavenly Father, this is not a pain wherewith we ſhould be confounded, but only a chaſtiſement whereby we ſhould be inſtructed. In which point Auguſtine is plainly on our ſide. For he teacheth (Lib. de peccat. merito, ac remiſ. 2 cap. 33. & 34.) that the like pains wherewith men are chaſtiſed by God, are diverſly to be conſidered: becauſe to the holy ſaints they are battles and exerciſes after the forgiveneſs of their ſins, to the reprobate they are without forgiveneſs, the pains of their wickedneſs. In which place he rehearſeth what pains were laid upon David and other godly men, and ſaith, that they tend to this end, that their godlineſs ſhould by ſuch humbling of them, be exerciſed and proved. And where Iſaiah ſaith, (Iſa. xl. 2.) that the Jews had their iniquity forgiven them, becauſe they had received full chaſtiſement at the Lord's hand: this doth not prove that the pardon of ſins dependeth upon the full ſuffering of the pain: but it is in effect as much as if he had ſaid: Becauſe ye have already ſuffered pains enough, and by the grievouſneſs and multitude thereof are pined away with long mourning and ſorrow, therefore it is now time that receiving the tidings of mercy, your hearts ſhould rejoice, and know me to be your father. For there God took upon himſelf the perſon of a Father, who repenteth him even of his juſt ſeverity, when he is compelled ſharply to correct his ſon.

The miſeries whereunto we are ſubject would ſwallow us up if we did not know that he who afflicteth us doth it as a father not as a judge.

34. It is neceſſary that believers be furniſhed with ſuch thoughts as thoſe in their afflictions. It is time that judgment began at the houſe of the Lord, in which his name is called upon. (1 Pet. iv. 17. and Jer. xxv. 29.) What ſhould the children of God do, if they believed that ſeverity of God which they feel to be his vengeance? For he who being ſtriken by the hand of God, imagineth God a puniſhing judge, cannot think of him but as angry and an enemy unto him, and deteſt the fatherly rod of God as a curſe and damnation. Finally, he can never be perſuaded that God loveth him, who thinks him ſo inclined toward him, that he ſtill intends to puniſh him. But he only profiteth under the rod of God, who thinks him angry at his ſins, but merciful and loving to himſelf. For otherwiſe that muſt needs happen, which the prophet (Pſal. lxxxviii. 15.) complaineth that he felt, where he ſaith. Thy wrath, O God hath paſſed over me: thy terrors have oppreſſed me. Alſo that which Moſes writeth, (Pſal. xc. 7, 8, 9.) For we are conſumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled, Thou haſt ſet our iniquities before thee, our ſecret ſins in the light of thy countenance. For all our days are paſſed away in thy wrath: we ſpend our years as a tale that is told. On the other ſide David (Pſal. xciv. 12.) ſaith thus of his fatherly chaſtiſements, to teach us, that the faithful are rather helped than oppreſſed thereby: bleſſed is the man whom thou haſt corrected O Lord, and haſt inſtructed in thy law, to give him quiet from evil days, while a pit is digged for the ſinner. Truly it is a hard temptation, when God ſparing the unbelievers and winking at their faults, ſeemeth more rigorous againſt them that are his own. Therefore he gave them a cauſe of comfort, the inſtruction of the law, whereby they might learn, that it is done to provide for their ſalvation when they are called again into the way, and the wicked are carried headlong into their errors, whoſe end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the pain be everlaſting or continues for a time. For war, famine, peſtilence, and ſickneſs, as the judgment of eternal death are the curſes of God: when they are laid upon men, to be the inſtruments of the Lord's wrath and vengeance againſt the reprobate.

Neither that which David ſuffered after his ſin was forgiven, nor that which Adam and his poſterity even they whoſe iniquities are done away do endure, is ſuſtained to the end that God may be recompenced with pain for ſin.

35. Now (as I think) all men, may perceive whereunto tendeth that chaſtiſement of the Lord upon David: even to be an inſtruction that God is grievouſly diſpleaſed with manſlaughter and adultery, againſt which he ſhewed ſo great indignation in his beloved and faithful ſervant: that David ſhould be taught to be no more ſo bold to do the like deeds: and not to be a pain whereby he ſhould make a certain recompence to God. And ſo are we to judge of the other kind of correction whereby the Lord puniſheth his people with a ſore peſtilence, for David's diſobedience whereinto he was fallen in numbering the people. For he did indeed freely forgive to David the guiltineſs of his ſin: but becauſe it was to be a public example to all ages, and alſo to humble David, that ſuch a hainous offence ſhould not remain unpuniſhed; he therefore moſt ſharply chaſtiſed him with his rod. Which mark alſo we ought to have before our eyes in the univerſal courſe of mankind. For whereas after we have obtained pardon, we yet ſuffer the miſeries that were laid upon our firſt parent for pain of ſin: we find ourſelves by ſuch exerciſes admoniſhed, how grievouſly God is diſpleaſed with the tranſgreſſion of his law: that being thrown down and humbled with the knowlege of our own miſerable eſtate, we may the more fervently aſpire after true bleſſedneſs. But he is very fooliſh who thinks that the calamities of this preſent life are laid upon us for the guiltineſs of ſin. And that I think was the meaning of Chryſoſtome when he wrote thus. (Hom. 3. de provid. ad Stargirium.) If God do therefore lay pains upon us, that he may call us perſevering in ſin to repentance, then when repentance is once ſhewed, the pain will be ſuperfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for every man's nature, ſo he handleth one man more roughly, and another with more loving tenderneſs. Therefore where he intendeth to inform us that he will not always puniſh (Jer. v. 3.) he reproacheth the hard hearted and obſtinate people of Iſrael, who being ſtricken yet made not an end of ſinning. In this ſenſe he complaineth, (Hoſ. vii. 7.) that Ephraim was a cake ſcorched on the one ſide, and raw on the other, becauſe his corrections did not pierce into their minds, that the people having their vices boiled out, might be made meet to receive pardon. Truly he that ſo ſpeaketh, ſheweth, that ſo ſoon as a man hath repented, God will ſoon be appeaſed: and that by our ſtiffneſs only, he is forced to that rigour in chaſtiſing our faults, which would have been prevented by a willing amendmcnt. Yet foraſmuch as we all are ſo hard hearted and ſtiff necked, as univerſally to need chaſtiſement: it ſeemed good to him being a moſt wiſe Father, to exerciſe all without exception with a common ſconrge, all their life long. But it is very ſtrange why they fix their eyes only upon the example of David, and are not moved with ſo many examples, in which they may behold free forgiveneſs of ſins. It is read (Luke xviii. 14.) that the Publican went out of the temple juſtified. There followed no pain. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, (Luke xxii. 61.) we read of his tears (ſaith Ambroſe) not of his ſatisfaction. And the man ſick of the palſy heard it ſpoken to him: riſe, thy ſins are forgiven thee. There was no pain laid upon him. All the abſolutions that are rehearſed in the ſcripture, are ſet out as given freely. Out of this great number of examples a rule ſhould rather have been made, than

Daniel counſelling Nebuchadnezar to redeem his ſins with righteouſneſs, and Solomon teaching that charity hideth a number of ſins, did not mean that either the one or the other is any ſatisfaction to God for ſin.

36. Daniel in his exhortation (Dan. iv. 27.) where he counſelleth Nebuchadnezzar to redeem his ſins with righteouſneſs, and his iniquities with pitying of the poor: his meaning was not to ſay that righteouſneſs and mercy are ſatisfactory to God, and a redemption from pains (for God forbid that there were any redemption except by the blood of Chriſt) but refers this word redeeming rather to men than to God: as if he had ſaid, O king, thou haſt uſed an unrighteous and violent government, thou haſt oppreſſed the humble, thou haſt ſpoiled the poor, thou haſt hardly and unjuſtly handled thy people: for thy unjuſt exactions, for thy violence and oppreſſion, now render to them mercy and righteouſneſs. Likewiſe Solomon ſaith, (Prov. x. 12.) that with charity the multitude of ſins is covered: not before God, but among men. For thus runs the whole verſe: hatred raiſeth up contentions, but charity covereth all iniquity. In which verſe, as his manner is, he doth by a compariſon of contraries, compare the evils that ariſe from hatred, with the fruits of charity: in this ſenſe, they that mutually hate, do bite, bark at, reproach and rail at each other, and turn all things to the worſt, but they that mutually love, conceal many things among themſelves, wink at, and pardon many things one to another: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, and aſſiſteth them with admonition rather than gall them with reproaches. And it is not to be doubted that Peter quoteth this place in the ſame ſenſe, (1 Pet. iv. 8.) unleſs we will accuſe him of depraving and falſely wreſting the ſcripture. But where he teacheth that ſin is purged by mercifulneſs and liberality, he doth not mean that a recompence is thereby made for ſin before the face of the Lord, ſo that God being appeaſed by ſuch ſatisfaction doth releaſe them from the pain that otherwiſe he would have laid upon them, but after the accuſtomed manner of the ſcripture he declareth that they ſhall find him merciful unto them who forſaking their former vices and iniquities, turn to him by godlineſs and truth: as if he ſhould ſay, that the wrath of God doth ceaſe and his judgment reſt, when we ceaſe from our ſins. Neither doth he there deſcribe the cauſe of pardon, but rather the manner of true converſion. As many times the prophets declare that hypocrites do in vain peſter God with forged ceremonious uſages inſtead of repentance, whereas it is uprightneſs of life with the duties of charity that delighteth him. As alſo the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews commending liberality and gentleneſs, (Heb. xiii. 16.) teacheth that ſuch ſacrifices pleaſe God. And when Chriſt taunting the Phariſees (Matth. xxiii. 25. and Luke xi. 39.) who minding only the cleanſing of diſhes, neglected purity of heart, commanded them to give alms that all might be clean: he did not thereby exhort them to make ſatisfaction: but only taught what manner of cleanneſs pleaſeth God. Of which kind of ſpeech we have treated in another place.

The love which the woman to whom many ſins were forgiven ſhewed towards him who did forgive her, was not a cauſe, but a proof of her pardon.

37. As touching that place of Luke, (Luke vii. 35.) no man who hath with ſound judgment read the parable which our Lord doth there recite, will make any controverſy thereupon. The Phariſee thought with himſelf, that the Lord did not know the woman, which he had ſo eaſily received into his preſence. For he thought that Chriſt would not have received her, if he had known her to be ſuch a ſinner as ſhe was. And thereby he concluded that Chriſt was not a prophet who could be deceived in ſuch a manner. The Lord to ſhew that ſhe was no ſinner to whom her ſins were already forgiven, ſpoke this parable. There were two debtors to one creditor upon uſury: the one owed fifty, the other owed five hundred, both had their debts forgiven them. Which of them owed moſt thanks? the Phariſee anſwered: he to whom moſt is forgiven. The Lord replied: learn hereby that this womans ſins are forgiven her, becauſe ſhe hath loved much. In which words (as you ſee) he maketh not her love the cauſe, but the proof of the forgiveneſs of her ſins. For they are derived by a ſimilitude from that debtor, to whom five hundred was forgiven, to whom he did not ſay that therefore it was forgiven, becauſe he had loved much: but therefore loved much, becauſe it was forgiven. And hereunto muſt that ſimilitude be applied in this manner: thou thinkeſt this woman to be a ſinner: but thou oughteſt to know that ſhe is none ſuch, for as much as her ſins are forgiven her. And that her ſins are forgiven her, her love ought to prove unto thee, whereby ſhe rendered thanks for this benefit. It is an argument gathered from the following effect, whereby any thing is proved by ſigns enſuing. By what means ſhe obtained forgiveneſs of her ſins, the Lord openly teſtifieth: thy faith, ſaith he, hath ſaved thee. Therefore we obtain forgiveneſs by faith: by charity we give thanks, and teſtify the kindneſs of the Lord.

The fathers though ſpeaking ſomewhat hardly concerning ſatisfaction, do notwithſtanding mean far otherwiſe than theſe new ſatisfactioners.

38. As for thoſe things that are commonly found in the writings of the Fathers concerning ſatisfaction, they little move me. I ſee indeed that many of them, (I will ſpeak plainly) in a manner all whoſe books remain, have either erred in this point, or ſpoken too crabbedly and hardly: but I will not grant that they were ſo rude and unſkilful as to write thoſe things in that ſenſe in which the new ſatisfactioners read them. Chryſoſtome in one place writeth thus: where mercy is required examination ceaſeth: where mercy is aſked, judgment is not rigorous: where mercy is craved, there is no place for pain: where there is mercy, there is no inquiſition. Where there is mercy, the anſwer is pardon. Which words howſoever they are wreſted, yet they can never be made to agree with the tenets of the ſchoolmen. In the book of eccleſiaſtical doctrines, which is fathered upon Auguſtine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the cauſe of ſins, and not to grant an entry to their ſuggeſtions. Whereby it appeareth that the doctrine of ſatisfaction that was ſaid to be given in recompence of ſins committed, was even in thoſe times laughed to ſcorn: for as much as they refer all ſatisfaction to a carefulneſs in abſtaining from ſin in time to come. I will not allege that which the ſame Chryſoſtome ſaith, (Hom. 10 in Gen. Enchi. ad Laurentium.) that he requireth no more of us, but that we ſhould confeſs our ſins unto him with tears; ſince ſuch ſentences are many times found in his writings and others. Auguſtine indeed in ſome places calleth works of mercy, remedies to obtain forgiveneſs of ſins: but that no man might ſtumble at that little word, he himſelf preventeth it in another place. The fleſh of Chriſt (ſaith he) is the true and only ſacrifice for ſins, not only theſe ſins that are wholly put away in baptiſm, but alſo theſe that afterwards creep in by weakneſs: for which the whole church crieth out at this day, forgive us our treſpaſſes. (Matth. vi. 12.) And they are forgiven by that ſacrifice alone.

39. They have for the moſt part called ſatisfaction, not a recompence to be rendered to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had been excommunicate (when they would be received again to the communion) did aſcertain the church of their repentance. For there was joined unto theſe ſatisfactions, when they repented, certain faſtings and other things, whereby they might perſuade men that they were truly and heartily weary of their former life, or rather to blot out the remembrance of their former doings: and ſo they were ſaid to make ſatisfaction not to God, but to the church. Which is alſo expreſſed by Auguſtine in theſe words in his Enchiridion to Laurence. (Cap. 65. and is rehearſed in the Decrets. cap. in actionibus de pœnit. diſtin. 1.) Out of that ancient cuſtom the confeſſions and ſatisfactions that are at this day uſed, took their beginning. Truly very viperous births, by which it is come to paſs, that there remaineth not ſo much as a ſhadow of that better form. I know that the fathers do ſometimes ſpeak ſomewhat hardly, and as I ſaid even now, I do not deny that perhaps they erred herein. But thoſe things that were beſprinkled with a few ſpots, when they are once handled with theſe men's unwaſhed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we muſt contend with the authority of the fathers: good God what old writers do they thruſt upon us? A good part of thoſe wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched up his patched ſentences, is gathered out of the filthy dreams of certain Monks that are carried about under the name of Ambroſe, Jerom, Auguſtine, and Chryſoſtom. As about this preſent queſtion he taketh in a manner all out of Auguſtine's book of repentance, which is fooliſhly botched of good and bad by ſome ſcraper together. It beareth indeed the name of Auguſttne, but ſuch a book that no man being but meanly learned, would vouchſafe to acknowlege for his. But I do not very narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would eaſe of that tedioufneſs. For to me it would not be very hard, and yet very plauſible to bewray to their great ſhame thoſe things that they have heretofore boaſted upon as myſteries: but becauſe my purpoſe is to teach things uſeful, therefore I paſs them over.

CHAP. V.

Of the ſupplements which they add to ſatisfactions, as pardons and purgatory.

The world even wittingly abuſed by pardons.

OUT of this doctrine of ſatisfactions do flow indulgences or pardons. For they ſay that which our power wanteth to make ſatisfaction, is ſupplied by theſe pardons. And they run ſo far, mad that they define them to be the diſtribution of the merits of Chriſt and of the martyrs, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his bulls. But although they have more need of Hellebore to purge their frantic brains, than arguments to anſwer them, ſo it is not worth the labour to ſtand upon confuting ſuch trifling errors, which are already ſhaken with many powerful arguments, and of themſelves decay, and bend toward falling: yet becauſe a ſhort confutation of them will be profitable to ſome who are ignorant, I will not altogether omit it. That pardons have ſo long ſtood ſafe and have ſo long been unpuniſhed, having been uſed with ſo outragious and furious licentiouſneſs: this may ſerve to teach us in how dark a night of errors, men in certain ages paſt have been drowned. They ſaw themſelves openly and barefacedly ſcorned by the Pope and his bull-bearers, gainful markets to be made of the ſalvation of their ſouls, the price of ſalvation to be valued at a few pence, and that nothing was to be freely given: that by this pretence they are ſpunged of offerings to be filthily ſpent upon brothels, bawds and banqueetings, that the greateſt publiſhers of pardons are the greateſt deſpiſers of them, that this monſter doth daily more and more with greater licentiouſneſs overrun the world, and grow into outrage, and that there is no end, new traſh daily brought, and new money gotten. Yet with high reverence they received, they worſhipped and bought pardons, and ſuch as ſaw ſomewhat further, yet thought them to be godly cheats, whereby men might be beguiled with ſome profit: at length, ſince the world ſuffered itſelf to be ſomewhat wiſer, pardons wax cold, and by little and little become frozen, till they utterly vaniſh away.

The ground of pardons is the merit of ſaints than which nothing can be more oppoſite to the merits of Chriſt.

2. But foraſmuch as many who ſee the filthy gamings, deceits, thefts, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners have formerly mocked and beguiled us, yet do not ſee that fountain of ungodlineſs from whence they ſpring: it is neceſſary to ſhew not only of what theſe pardons are, but alſo what they are, when they are cleanſed from all ſpots. They call the treaſure of the church, the merits of Chriſt and the holy apoſtles and martyrs. The chief keeping of this barn (as I have already touched) they feign to be delivered to the biſhop of Rome, that he ſhould have the diſtribution of ſo great gifts, that he might both give them by himſelf, and alſo grant a power to others to give them. Hereupon proceed from the Pope ſometimes plenary pardons, ſometimes pardons for certain years: from the cardinals, pardons for a hundred days: from biſhops, pardons for forty days. But they are (as I may naturally deſcribe them) the profaning of the blood of Chriſt, Satans mockery, to lead away chriſtians from the grace of God, from the life that is in Chriſt, and to turn them from the true way of ſalvation. For how can the blood of Chriſt be more filthily prophaned, than when it is denied to ſuffice to the remiſſion of ſins, to reconciliation and ſatisfaction, unleſs it being withered and waſted, ſhould by pardons be ſupplied and perfected? The law and all the prophets (ſaith Peter Acts x. 43.) bear witneſs of Chriſt, that by him forgiveneſs of ſin is to be received: pardons give remiſſion of ſins by Peter, Paul and the martyrs. The blood of Chriſt ſaith John, (1 John ii. 7.) cleanſeth us from ſin: pardons do make the blood of martyrs the waſhing away of ſins. Chriſt (ſaith Paul 2 Cor. v. 21.) who knew no ſin, was made ſin for us, that is, the ſatisfaction of ſin, that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him: pardons place the ſatisfaction of ſins in the blood of martyrs. Paul cried out and teſtified to the Corinthians, (1 Cor. i. 13.) that only Chriſt was crucified and died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul and others died for us. In another place (Acts xx. 18.) he ſaith that Chriſt purchaſed the church with his blood: the pardons appoint another price of purchaſe in the blood of martyrs. The apoſtle ſaith, (Heb. x. 14.) that Chriſt with one oblation made perfect for ever them that were ſanctified: the pardons cry out the contrary, and ſay, that ſanctification is made per-perfect by the martyrs, which otherwise was not sufficient. John saith (Rev. vii. 14.) that all the saints washed their garments in the blood of the Lamb: the pardons teach men to wash their garments in the blood of saints.

The evident testimonies of Leo and Augustine against their own vain allegations for the deserts of saints applicable unto others.

3. Leo bishop of Rome, writeth (Ep. lxxxi.) notably well to the Palestines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of many saints hath been precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath been the propitiation of the world. The righteous received, but gave no crowns: and in the courage of the faithful are given examples of patieuce, not gifts of righteousness. For their deaths were every one singular to themselves, and none of them did by his end pay the debt of another, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised up again. Which sentence (as it was worthy to be remembred) he repeated in another place. (Ep. xcv.) There can nothing more plain be required to destroy this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no less fitly to the same effect, Tract. in Joan 83. Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the blood of no martyr is shed for the forgiveness of sins. Which thing Christ hath done for us, neither hath he therein done that for us, that we should follow him, but hath given it to us to rejoice upon. Again in another place, Lib. 4. ad Bonif. cap. 4. As the son of God only was made the son of man, to make us with him the sons of God: so he hath taken upon himself the punishment without sin, that we by him might without righteousness, obtain grace not due unto us. Truly though all their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacrileges and blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemy than all the rest. Let them remember whether these are not their decrees: that the martyrs have by their death done more to God, and deserved more, than was needful for themselves: and that they had remaining so great plenty of deservings, as did also overflow unto others: and therefore, least so great goodness should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, and both these are made the treasure of the church, for the remission and satisfaction of sins. And the saying of Paul (Col. i. 24.) is to be understood in this sense: I supply in my body those things that are wanting of the sufferings of Christ for his body, which is the Church. What is this else but to leave Christ only his name, to make him but a common petty saint, that can scarcely be distinguished among the multitude from the rest? He only, should be preached, he only set forth, he only named, he only be looked unto, when the obtaining of the forgiveness of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are treated of: but let us hear their curtailed arguments. Lest the blood of the martyrs should be shed in vain, (say they) therefore let it be employed to the common benefit of the church. Is it so? Is it no profit to glorify God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their blood? by despising this present life, to testify that they sought for a better? by their constancy to strengthen the faith of the church, and overcome the stubbornness of their enemies? But this is the truth of the matter: they will acknowlege no profit from the death of the martyrs, if Christ only be the propitiation, if he only died for our sins, if he only was offered up for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might have obtained the crown of victory, although they had died in their beds. And whereas they have fought even to the shedding of their blood, it would not agree with the justice of God to leave the same barren and and fruitless. As though God could not tell how to increase in his servants their glory, according to the measure of his gifts. But the church receiveth profit enough, when it is by their triumphs encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

St. Paul words of supplying that which wanted in Christ's sufferings maliciously wrested to this purpose.

4. But how maliciously do they wrest that place of Paul (Col. i. 24.) where he saith, that he supplieth in his body those things that are wanting of the sufferings of Christ; for he doth not refer the supplying of the defect to the work of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation; but to those afflictions wherewith all the members of Christ, that is to say, all believers must be exercised as long as they live. He saith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he daily suffereth in his members what he once suffered in himself. Christ vouchsafeth to do us so great honour, as to reckon and account our afflictions his own. When Paul addeth these words, for the Church, he meaneth not for the redemption, reconciliation, and satisfaction of the church, but for the edifying and profit of the church. As in another place he saith, (2 Tim. ii. 10.) that he suffereth all things for the elects sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. And he wrote to the Corinthians, (2 Cor. i. 6.) that he endured all the troubles that he suffered, for their comfort and salvation. And immediately in the same place he explaineth himself, when he saith further, that he was made a minister of the church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed unto him, to preach the gospel of Christ. If they yet require another expositor, let them hear Augustine. (On Psal. xvi.) The sufferings of Christ (saith he) are in Christ only as in the head: and both in Christ and the church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member saith, I supply in my body that which wanteth in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore if thou whatsoever thou be that heareſt this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same was wanting in the sufferings of Christ. But whereunto the sufferings of the apostles taken for the church of Christ do tend, he explaineth in another place where he saith: Tract. in Joan. 47. Christ is to me the gate unto you: because ye are the sheep of Christ bought with his blood: acknowleging your price, which is not paid by me, but preached by me. Then he addeth, as he hath given his soul, so ought we to give our souls for our brethren, to promote their peace, and confirm their faith. These are Augustine's words. But God forbid, that Paul should have thought that any thing was wanting in the sufferings of Christ, as to all fulness of righteousness, salvation and life, or that he meant to add any thing thereunto, who so plainly and honourably preacheth, (Rom. v. 15.) that the abundance of grace was so largely poured out by Christ, that it far surmounted all the force of sin. By it only all the saints have been saved, and not by the merits of their own life or death as Peter expressly testified. (Act. xv. 11.) so that he would slander God and Christ, who should place the acceptance of any saint any where else than in the mercy of God alone. But why do I tarry hereupon any longer, as upon a matter doubtful, since the very exposing of such monstrous errors is a sufficient confutation of them?

Whence the gracious indulgence of Christ which should be published by preaching of the gospel began to be folded up in parchment and lead.

5. Now (to pass over such abominations) who taught the pope to inclose in lead and parchment the grace of Jesus Christ, which the Lord appointed to be distributed by the word of the gospel? Truly either the gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered us in the gospel, with all abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merits, with all his righteousness, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul testifieth where he saith, (2 Cor. i.) that the word of reconciliation was delivered to the ministers, whereby they might use this form of message as if Christ were giving exhortation by them: we beseech you, be ye reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sin, to be made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. And believers know of what value that common partaking of Christ is, which (as the same apostle declareth) is offered us to be enjoyed in the gospel. On the contrary pardons bring out of the storehouse of the pope, a certain pittance of grace, and fasten it to lead and parchment, yea and to a certain place, and separate it from the word of God. If any man should ask whence this abuse took its rise: it seems to have proceeded from this, that when formerly penitents were loaded with more rigorous satisfactions than they could bear, they who felt themselves oppressed above measure with the penance enjoined them, begged of the Church a release; and the mitigation granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the church to God, and said that they were recompences whereby men might redeem themselves from the judgment of God, then they also made these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatory remedies, to deliver us from deserved punishments. As for these blasphemers that we have recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can have no colour at all.

The foresaid ground being taken away purgatory which is built thereupon falleth.

6. Now let them no more trouble us with their purgation, because it is with this ax already broken, hewed down and overthrown from the very foundation. For I do not agree with some men, who think it best to dissemble in this point, and to make no mention of purgatory, whence (as they say) great contentions arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I think such trifles worthy to be negligently passed over, if they did not account them serious matters. But because purgatory is built on many blasphemies, and is still upheld with new blasphemies, and raiseth up many and grievous offences, it is not to be winked at. This peradventure might after a sort have been dissembled for a time, that it was invented by curious and bold rashness without the word of God: that men believed it by I know not what revelations, feigned by the craft of satan; that for the confirmation of it, certain places of scripture were foolishly wrested. Yet the Lord alloweth not mens presumption to break into the secret places of his judgments, and hath severely forbidden men to enquire for the truth at dead men, neglecting his word, nor permitteth his word to be so irreverently defiled. Let us grant, that all those things might for a while have been born with, as of no great importance. But when the purging away of sin is sought for else where than in the blood of Christ, when satisfaction is ascribed to any other thing, then it is dangerous not to speak against it. Therefore we must cry out not only with a loud voice, but also with open mouth, and declare, that purgatory is a damnable device of satan, that it maketh void the cross of Christ, that it bringeth an intolerable scandal upon the mercy of God, that it weakeneth and overthroweth our faith. For what else is purgatory acccording to them, but the satisfaction that the souls of men departed do pay after their death? So that overthrowing the doctrine of satisfaction, purgatory is immediately overthrown by the very roots. But if in our former discourse it is sufficiently evident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfaction, propitiatory sacrifice, and cleansing for the sins of the faithful: then purgatory is a meer and horrible blasphemy against Christ? I pass over those robberies derogatory to the mercy of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences it breedeth in religion, and innumerable other things, which have flowed from the same spring of ungodliness.

7. But it is proper to rescue from their abuse such places of scripture as they falsly allege in defence of purgatory. They say when the Lord affirmeth that the sin against the holy Ghost shall not be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come, he thereby sheweth that there is a forgiveness of some sins in the world to come. But who seeth not our Lord in that place speaketh of the fault of sin? Now if it be so, what is that to their purgatory; since according to their opinion pain is there suffered for those sins, whereof they do not deny that the fault is forgiven in this present life? But that they may no more carp against us, they shall have yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from so hainous wickedness, he thought it not enough to say that it should never be forgiven, but the more to amplify it, he useth a division, wherein he comprehendeth both the judgment that every mans conscience feeleth in this life, and the last judgment that shall be openly pronounced at the resurrection: as though he had said: Be as much afraid of malicious rebellion, as of present damnation. For he who shall wilfully endeavour to quench the light of the holy Ghost, shall not obtain pardon, neither in this life which is allowed to sinners for their conversion, nor in the last day when the lambs shall be separated by the angels of God from the goats, and the kingdom of heaven cleansed from all offences. They also allege that parable out of Matthew: (Matth. v. 25, 26.) Agree with thine adversary, lest he deliver thee to the judge, and the judge to the officer, and thou be cast into prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, until thou hast paid the uttermost farthing. If in this place the judge signify God, and the adversary the devil, the officer, the angel, and the prison purgatory, I will gladly yield the argument unto them. But if it be evident to all men, that Christ intended there to shew how many dangers and mischiefs they expose themselves to, who will rather obstinately pursue the extremity of the law, than deal according to equity and right, and to exhort his disciples the more earnestly to walk according to equity; where then will purgatory be found?

Other proofs alleged out of St. Paul, the book of Revelation and the book of Maccabees.

8. They fetch an argument out of the saying of Paul, (Phil. ii. 10.) where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heaven, earth, and under the earth, shall bow to Christ. For they take it for granted, that those under the earth cannot there mean those who are adjudged to eternal damnation. Therefore it must be the souls lying in pain in purgatory. They do not reason ill, if the apostle by kneeling meant true godly worship. But since he teacheth only, that there is a dominion given to Christ, whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what proof is there to the contrary, but that we may by those under the earth understand the devils, who shall be brought before the judgment seat of God, to acknowlege him as their judge with fear and trembling? Like as Paul himself expoundeth the same prophecy in another place. (Rom. xiv. 10, 11.) All (saith he) shall be brought before the judgment judgment ſeat of Chriſt. For it is written, as I live, every knee ſhall bow to me, &c. But we may not ſo expound that text in the Revelation. (Revel. v. 13.) I heard all creatures, both theſe that are in heaven, and thoſe that are upon the earth, and theſe that are under the earth, and thoſe that are in the ſea, and all thoſe that are in them, I heard them all ſay to him that ſitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, bleſſing, and honour, and glory, and power for ever and ever. That I readily grant, but what creatures do they think are here mentioned? For it is certain, that therein are contained creatures both without reaſon and without ſenſe. Whereby nothing elſe is affirmed, but that all parts of the world, from the higheſt top of the heavens to the very centre of the earth, do in their manner declare the glory of their Creator. As for that which they allege out of the hiſtory of the Maccabees, (2 Mac. xii. 43.) I will not vouchſafe to anſwer it, leſt I ſhould ſeem to reckon that work in the number of the ſacred writings. But ſay they Auguſtine Contra Gaudent. epiſt. 2. cap. 23. received it for canonical. But firſt, in what reſpect did he receive it? The Jews (ſaith he) eſteem not the writing of the Maccabees as they do the law, the prophets, and the Pſalms, which the Lord himſelf hath witneſſed as of his witneſſes, ſaying: (Luke xxiv. 44) It was neceſſary that all things ſhould be fulfilled that are written in the law, and the Pſalms, and prophets concerning me. But it hath been received by the church not unprofitably, if it be ſoberly read or heard. And Hierome ſaith without any heſitation that the authority thereof is of no force to prove any point of doctrine. And it evidently appeareth by that old book, which goeth under the name of Cyprian, concerning the expoſition of the creed, that it had no place in the old church. But why do I here ſtrive without cauſe? As though the author himſelf did not ſufficiently ſhew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craveth pardon, if he hath ſpoken any thing wrong. Truly he who confeſſeth that his writings need pardon, ſaith plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghoſt. Beſide that, the godlineſs of Judas is praiſed for no other cauſe but becauſe he had an aſſured hope of the laſt reſurrection, when he ſent an offering for the dead to Jeruſalem. Neither doth the writer of that hiſtory ſay that what Judas did was to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of eternal life with all the faithful, who had died for their country and religion. This action was not without ſuperſtition and prepoſterous zeal, but they are worſe than fools, who apply a ſacrifice of the law ſo far down as unto us: ſeeing we know that things ceaſed by the coming of Chriſt, that were then in uſe.

The fire whereof St. Paul ſpeaketh to the Corinthians is no purgatory fire.

9. But they think they have an invincible bulwark in Paul, which cannot be ſo eaſily ſhaken. If any man (ſaith he) build upon this foundation, gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, timber, hay, ſtubble, the Lord ſhall ſhew every man's work what it is: becauſe it ſhall be revealed in fire, and the fire ſhall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work do burn, it ſhall ſuffer loſs, but he ſhall be ſafe, but as through the fire. What fire (ſay they) can that be, but the fire of purgatory? by which the filthineſſes of ſin are cleanſed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdom of God? But the moſt part of the fathers thought it to be another fire, that is to ſay, trouble or the croſs, by which the Lord trieth them that are his, that they ſhould not remain in the filthineſs of the fleſh: and that is much more probable, than that it relates to purgatory; yet I do not agree with theſe men, becauſe I think I have attained a certain and much plainer expoſition of that place. But before that I mention it, I would have them anſwer me, whether the apoſtles and all the ſaints were obliged to go through this fire of purgatory? I know they will ſay, no. For it would not anſwer them if they muſt have been purged, whoſe merits they imagine overflow above meaſure to all the members of the church. But the apoſtle affirmeth it. For he doth not ſay that the works of ſome ſhall be proved but the works of all. Neither is this my argument, but Auguſtine's who confuteth that expoſition. And (what is yet more abſurd) he doth not ſay, that they ſhall paſs through the fire for all works: but if they have faithfully built the church, they ſhall receive their reward when their work is examined with fire. Firſt, we ſee that the apoſtle uſed a metaphor, when he called the doctrines invented by men, wood, hay, and ſtubble. And the metaphor hath an apparent reſpect to this, for as wood ſo ſoon as it is put in the fire, conſumeth and waſteth, ſo thoſe doctrines cannot continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that ſuch a trial cometh of the holy Ghoſt. Therefore to follow the true intention of his metaphor, and match the parts together with juſt relation to each other, he called the trial of the holy Ghoſt, fire. For the more that gold and ſilver are purified by fire, ſo much the ſurer proof they have of their goodneſs and fineneſs: ſo the Lord's truth, the more ſtrictly it is weighed with ſpiritual examination, ſo much the greater confirmation and credit it receiveth. As hay, wood, and ſtubble put in the fire, are ſuddenly conſumed, ſo the inventions of men, not authorized by the word of God, cannot bear the trial of the holy Ghoſt, but fall away and periſh. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hay, and ſtubble, becauſe like wood, hay, and ſtubble, they are burnt with fire, and deſtroyed: and theſe are not deſtroyed or driven away but by the Spirit of the Lord: hence it followeth that the holy Ghoſt is that fire wherewith they ſhall be proved, whoſe proof Paul, according to the common uſe of the ſcripture, calleth, the day of the Lord, when he doth any way ſhew his preſence to men. But then his face principally ſhineth, when his truth ſhineth upon us. Now have we proved, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the trial of the holy Ghoſt. But ſay they, how are they ſaved by fire, who ſuffer loſs of their work? That will not be hard to underſtand, if we conſider of what kind of men he ſpeaketh. For he ſpeaketh of thoſe builders of the church, who keeping the true foundation, build diſagreeing matter upon it, that is to ſay, they who not ſwerving from the principal and neceſſary articles of faith, err in ſome points that are ſmaller and leſs dangerous, mingling their own inventions with the truth of God. Such I ſay, muſt ſuffer loſs of their work, having their devices deſtroyed; but they are ſaved, yet ſo as by fire: not that their ignorance and error is allowed before the Lord, but becauſe they are cleanſed from them by the grace and power of the holy Ghoſt. Therefore they who have debaſe the purity of God's word with this filthy doctrine of purgatory, muſt needs ſuffer loſs of their work.

The occaſion whence prayer for the dead firſt roſe, which yet doth not prove the ſouls of the dead, which were prayed for to be in purgatory.

10. But they ſay, it hath been an ancient cuſtom in the church. Paul anſwered this objection when he comprehended his own time in that ſentence, where he ſaith, that all they muſt ſuffer loſs of their work, who in the building of the church, lay any thing upon the foundation that doth not agree with it. Therefore when the adverſaries object againſt me, that it hath been uſed above a thouſand and three hundred years, to pray for the dead: I aſk them again, by what word of God, by what revelation, by what example was it done? For here they not only want teſtimonies of ſcripture but alſo all the examples of holy men that we there read of, ſhew no ſuch thing. Of mourning and the order of funerals there are ſometimes found many and long accounts: but of prayers we ſee not one word; and the greater the importance of the matter, the more expreſsly ought it to have been ſpoken of. But the very oldeſt fathers who prayed for the dead, ſaw that herein they wanted both the commandment of God, and lawful example. Why then durſt they do ſo? In this I ſay, they did ſuffer ſomewhat as men: and therefore I affirm that what they did, ought not to be drawn into example. For whereas the faithful ought not to undertake any thing, but upon being convinced in their conſcience, as Paul teacheth: this aſſurance is principally to be expected in prayer. And it is likely that they were led to it by ſome reaſon: they ſought ſome comfort to relieve their ſorrow: and it ſeemed unnatural not to ſhew before God ſome teſtimony of their love toward the dead. How man's mind is inclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Alſo the received cuſtom was like a burning brand to ſet men's minds on fire. We know that with all nations, and in all ages there were funerals performed for the dead, and their ſouls yearly purged. For though Satan beguiled fooliſh men with theſe deceits: yet he took occaſion to beguile them by a true principle; that death is not a deſtruction, but a paſſage out of this life into another. And there is no doubt, but that even ſuperſtition condemneth the Gentiles before the judgment ſeat of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they profeſs to believe. Now chriſtians, becauſe they would not appear worſe than heathens, were aſhamed that they did nothing for the dead, as though they were annihilated by death. Hence came that ill judged care: becauſe if they were ſlow in looking to the funerals, in banqueetings and offerings, they thought they were in danger of a great reproach. And that which firſt proceeded from a wrong following the example of the heathens, was ſo multiplied by new additions, that it is now the principal holineſs of Popery, to help the dead in diſtreſs. But the ſcripture giveth a much better and more perfect comfort, when it teſtifieth, (Rev. xiv. 13.) that the dead are bleſſed who die in the Lord. And it addeth a reaſon; becauſe from thenceforth they reſt from their labours. And we ought not ſo tenderly to purſue our own affection and love, as to ſet up a wrong manner of praying in the church. Truly he that hath but little knowlege may ſoon perceive that all which is read in the fathers concerning this cuſtom, was done to bear with with the common uſage, and the ignorance of the people. They themſelves alſo, I grant, were carried away into this error, even as an inconſiderate eaſineſs of belief is wont to rob mens minds of judgment. But yet the very reading of them doth ſhew, how doubtingly they commend prayers for the dead. Auguſtine in his book of confeſſions, reporteth that Monica his mother earneſtly deſired, that ſhe might be remembered in celebrating the ſervice at the altar. An old wife's requeſt, which the ſon never examined by the rule of the ſcripture, but according to his natural affection would have it allowed by others. As for the book that he wrote of care for the dead, it containeth ſo many doubts, that by right it ought with the coldneſs thereof to quench the heat of ſo fooliſh a zeal: and if any man deſire to be an advocate for dead men, truly by his cold arguments and conjectures it will relieve them from that care who were careful before. For this is one pillar of it, that this action is not to be deſpiſed, becauſe it is a cuſtom grown into uſe, that the dead ſhould be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, that it is a charitable thing to help the dead: yet we muſt ſtill hold by a rule which cannot deceive: that it is not lawful for us in our prayers to uſe any expreſſions of our own, but our requeſts muſt be made ſubject to the word of God: becauſe in his will he hath appointed what he will have us to aſk. Now whereas the whole law and the goſpel doth not ſo much as in one ſyllable give a liberty to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuſe of our calling upon God to attempt more than he commandeth us. But that our adverſaries may not boaſt that they have the ancient church for a companion in their error: I ſay there is a great difference between them and it. They uſed a memorial of the dead, leſt they ſhould ſeem to have caſt away all care of them: but they did therewithal confeſs that they doubted of their ſtate. As for purgatory, they affirmed nothing, concerning it, held it for a thing uncertain. The Papiſts require to have that which they have dreamed about purgatory, to be without queſtion believed as an article of faith. The ancient church ſlenderly and to paſs it lightly over, did in the communion of the holy ſupper commend their dead to God. The Papiſts do continually call upon the care of the dead, and with importunate praiſing it, make it preferable above all dutiful works of charity. Yea, and it would not be hard for us to bring forth ſome teſtimonies of the fathers which manifeſtly overthrow all thoſe prayers for the dead, which were then uſed. As this of Auguſtine, (Hom. in Joan. 456.) when he teacheth that all men look for the reſurrection of the fleſh and eternal glory, and that every man receiveth the reſt that followeth after death, if he be worthy thereof when he dieth: and therefore he teſtifieth, that all the godly do immediately after death enjoy that bleſſed reſt as well as the prophets, apoſtles, and martyrs. And if their condition be ſuch, what I beſeech you will our prayers avail them? I paſs over the groſſer ſuperſtitions, wherewith they have bewitched the minds of the ſimple: which yet are ſo innumerable and for the moſt part ſo monſtrous, that they have no honeſt pretence to excuſe them. Alſo I paſs by thoſe filthy buyings and ſellings which they practiſed, while the world was in ſuch groſs and ſtupid ignorance. For I ſhould never make an end, and becauſe the reader without any rehearſal of them, hath here ſufficient ground, whereupon he may ſtabliſh his conſcience.

CHAP. VI.

An order for framing our lives neceſſary to be gathered out of the ſcriptures

WE have already ſaid, that the end whereunto regeneration tendeth is, that in the life of the faithful there ſhould appear an agreement and conſent between the righteouſneſs of God and their obedience: and that ſo they ſhould confirm the adoption, whereby they are received as his children. But although his law contain in it ſelf that newneſs, whereby the image of God is reſtored in us, yet becauſe our dulneſs hath need of many helps, therefore it will be profitable to collect out of diverſe places of the ſcripture an order for framing our life ſo that they who are deſirous to amend, may not wander out of the way in their endeavour. Now when I take upon me the framing of a chriſtian man's life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a wide and ſpacious field, the greatneſs whereof would fill a long volume, if I would abſolutely treat of it in all its points. For we ſee to what great length the exhortatory orations of every one of the fathers have run, every one of which is written on one ſeveral virtue; neither is that done with too much idle babling. For whatſoever virtue a man purpoſe to diſplay in an oration, he ſtill runneth out into ſuch largeneſs by the copiouſneſs of the matter. that a man will not ſeem to have diſcourſed well upon it, unleſs he hath ſpoken much. But my intention is not to ſtretch ſo far the inſtitution of life, which I promiſe miſe to teach, as peculiarly to go through every ſpecial virtue, and give ſome exhortations. Let ſuch things be ſought for in other mens writings, and eſpecially out of the Homilies of the ancient fathers. It will be enough for me to ſhew an orderly courſe, whereby a believer may be directed to a right mark for framing his life, and briefly to point out a certain univerſal rule, by which he may try what his duties are. There may perhaps come a more proper time for me to make declamations, or I will leave that to other, which I my ſelf am not able to do. I naturally love brevity, and may be if I would ſpeak more at large on theſe things, it would not ſuit well with me. And tho' a longer manner of teaching were never ſo pleaſing, yet I have no inclination to put it in practice. But the courſe of this preſent work requireth me to treat a ſimple doctrine with as great ſhortneſs as I can. As the philoſophers have their certain ends of right and honeſty, from which they derive particular duties, and all the virtues: ſo the ſcripture is not without its order in this matter: but hath a goodly and well ordered diſpoſition, and much more certain than all the ſyſtems of the philoſophers. With this only difference, that they (being vainglorious) have diligently endeavoured to attain an exquiſite plainneſs of order, to ſhew the readineſs of their wit. But becauſe the Spirit of God, taught without curious affectation, it hath not ſo exactly nor continually kept an orderly courſe: which yet as heſometimes uſeth it, doth thereby ſufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected by us.

The firſt entrance unto newneſs of life is the love of holineſs, wherewith to enflame us we are taught that God is holy.

2. This inſtruction that the ſcripture teacheth, whereof we now ſpeak, conſiſteth chiefly of two parts. The firſt is, that there is poured and brought into our minds a love of righteouſneſs, to which otherwiſe by nature we are not inclined. The ſecond, that there is a rule preſcribed unto us, that will not ſuffer us to go out of the way in following righteouſneſs. In the commendation of righteouſneſs it hath both very many and very good reaſons: ſome of which we have here before ſpoken of in diverſe places, and other ſome we ſhall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation can it better begin, than when it putteth us in mind that we muſt be holy becauſe God is holy? For when we were ſcattered abroad like ſtraying ſheep, and diſperſed abroad in the hurry of the world, he gathereth us together a gain, to join us in one flock with himſelf. When we hear mention made of our joining with God, let us remember that holineſs muſt be the bond thereof. Not that by any merit in our holineſs we come into communion with him: (but rather we muſt firſt cleave unto him, that being endued with his holineſs, we may follow whither he calleth) becauſe it greatly belongeth to his glory, that he have no fellowſhip with wickedneſs and unrighteouſneſs. Therefore alſo the ſcripture teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought always to have reſpect unto, if we will anſwer God that calleth us. For to what purpoſe was it, that we ſhould be drawn out of the wickedneſs and filthineſs of this world, if we allow ourſelves all our life long to wallow in them ſtill; Moreover it alſo admoniſheth us that if we would be reckoned among the people of God, we muſt dwell in the holy city Jeruſalem; which as he hath hallowed it to himſelf, ſo it is unlawful to prophane it by the uncleanneſs of the inhabitants. From hence came theſe ſayings, (Pſal. xxxv. 8. xv. 2. and xxiii.) that they ſhall have a place in the tabernacle of God that walk without ſpot, and ſtudy to follow righteouſneſs, &c. Becauſe it is not meet that the ſanctuary wherein he dwelleth ſhould be like a ſtable full of filthineſs.

Another motive unto holineſs is the holineſs of Chriſt which God hath ſet to be our pattern.

3. And the better to ſtir us up, the ſcripture ſheweth that God the Father as he hath joined us to himſelf in Chriſt, ſo he hath given us a pattern in him, after which he would have us to be faſhioned. Now let them find me a better ſyſtem among the philoſophers, who think that the philoſophy concerning morals, is only framed orderly among them. They when they exhort us to virtue, adduce nothing elſe but that we ſhould live agreeably to nature. But the ſcripture bringeth its exhortations from the true ſource, when it not only teacheth us to refer our life to God, the author of it, to whom it is bound: but alſo when it hath taught that we are departed from the true original and ſtate of our creation, it immediately addeth, that Chriſt by whom we are again brought into favour with God, is ſet before us for an example, that we ſhould imitate him in our life. What can a man require more effectual than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this only thing? For if the Lord hath by adoption made us his children upon this condition, that our life ſhall reſemble Chriſt the bond of our adoption: if we do not follow after righteouſneſs, we do not only only by this moſt ſinful breach of our allegiance depart from our Creator, but alſo deny Chriſt to be our Saviour. And the ſcripture afterwards exhorteth us from all the benefits of God, which are there recorded unto us, and from all the parts of our ſalvation; and ſheweth (Mal. i. 6.) that ſince God hath ſhewed himſelf a father unto us, we deſerve to be condemned for our unthankfulneſs, if we do not likewiſe (Eph. v. 1.) on our part act as his children unto him. Since Chriſt hath cleanſed us with the waſhing of his blood, and hath made us partakers of this cleanſing by baptiſm, it is not ſeemly that we ſhould be ſpotted with any new filth. Since he hath graffed us into his body, we muſt carefully take heed that we defile not ourſelves with any ſpot or blemiſh who are his members. Seeing he who is our head, is aſcended into heaven, it behoveth us that laying aſide earthly affections, we do with all our ſoul aſpire heaven-ward: Since the holy Ghoſt hath dedicated us temples to God, we muſt endeavour that God's glory may be honourably diſplayed by us, neither muſt we do any thing whereby we may be prophaned with the filth of ſin: ſince both our ſoul and our body are ordained to heavenly incorruption and an unperiſhing crown, we muſt diligently labour that they may be kept pure and uncorrupted unto the day of the Lord. Theſe (I ſay) are the beſt laid foundations whereon to build a man's life, and are ſuch that the like cannot be found among the philoſophers, who in commendation of virtue do never aſpire above the natural dignity of man.

4. And here it is proper to ſpeak to them, who having nothing but the title and badge of Chriſt, would yet be called chriſtians. But with what face do they boaſt of his holy name: ſince none have any fellowſhip with Chriſt, but they who have received a true knowlege of him out of the word of the goſpel? But the apoſtle ſaith, (Eph. iv. 21, 23.) that all they have not rightly learned Chriſt, who are not taught that they muſt caſt away the old man which is corrupted according to the deceitful luſts, and have not put on Chriſt. Therefore it is proved that they falſely, yea and wrongfully pretend to the knowlege of Chriſt, although they can eloquently and roundly talk of the goſpel. For it is not a doctrine of the tongue, but of the life: and is not conceived as other learning by the underſtanding and memory, but is then only received when it poſſeſſeth the whole ſoul, and findeth a ſeat and place in the moſt inward affections of the heart. Therefore either let them ceaſe, (to the ſcandal of religion) to boaſt of that which they are not, or let them ſhew themſelves worthy ſcholars for Chriſt their maſter. We have given the firſt place to the doctrine wherein our religion is contained, becauſe our ſalvation beginneth at it: but the ſame muſt be poured into our heart, and appear in our lives, yea and transform us unto it, that it be not unfruitful unto us. If the philoſophers are juſtly angry with them, and do with ſhameful reproach drive them from their company, who profeſſing an art that ought to be the rule of life, turn it into a ſophiſtical babling: with how much better reaſon may we deteſt theſe trifling ſophiſters, who are contented to roll the goſpel upon the top of their tongues, the effectual working whereof ought to pierce into the innermoſt affections of their heart, reſt in the ſoul, and alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortations of philoſophy.

Though chriſtians are far from attaining unto, yet they ought to be earneſt in following after the perfect righteouſneſs which is ſet before them in the goſpel.

5. Yet do I not require that the behaviour of a chriſtian ſavour of nothing but the abſolute goſpel: which nevertheleſs both were to be wiſhed and we ought to endeavour after it. But I do not ſo ſtrictly require a goſpel-like perfection, that I would not acknowlege him for a chriſtian that hath not yet attained unto it. For thus all men would be excluded from the church, ſince there is no man found that is not very far diſtant from it, and many have hitherto but a little way proceeded toward it, who yet would be unjuſtly rejected. What then? let that goſpel perfection be ſet for a mark before our eyes, to which alone all our endeavours may be directed. Let that be appointed the goal for us to run and travel unto. For it is not lawful for thee to make a partition with God, to take upon thee part of thoſe things that are commanded in his word, and to leave part at thine own choice. For firſt of all he every where commendeth integrity as the chief part of worſhipping him: by which word he meaneth a pure ſimplicity of mind, that is without all deceitful hypocriſy and guile: againſt which a deceitful heart is ſet in oppoſition: as if it ſhould be ſaid, that the beginning of living uprightly is ſpiritual, when the inward affections of the mind are without hypocriſy dedicate to God to walk in holineſs and righ-righteouſneſs. But becauſe no man in this earthly priſon of the body hath ſo great ſtrength as will enable him to run on in his chriſtian courſe as he ought to do, and the far greater number are ſo weak, that with ſtaggering and halting, yea and creeping upon the ground, they advance but ſlowly forward. Let us every one go on according to the meaſure of his little power, and proceed on the journey we have begun. No man will go ſo untowardly, but will every day gain ſome ground, though it be but little. Therefore let us not ceaſe to travel ſo, that we may continually proceed ſomewhat in the way of the Lord. And let us not deſpair from our ſmall progreſs in our journey; for tho' the ſucceſs anſwer not our expectation, yet we have not loſt all our labour when this day ſurpaſſeth yeſterday: if with pure ſimplicity we look forward unto the mark, and long to be at the end of our courſe, not foothingly flattering our ſelves, nor tenderly bearing with our own ſins, but by a conſtant endeavour labouring ſtill to become better and better, till we attain to the perfection of goodneſs: which indeed we ought to ſeek for and follow all our life long: but we ſhall then only attain it, when being unclothed from the weakneſs of the fleſh, we ſhall be received into full fellowſhip with God the ſource of all good.

CHAP. VII.

The firſt beginning of a new life, is the reſigning over ourſelves unto God.

THOUGH the law of the Lord is moſt fitly diſpoſed to order and frame a man's life, yet it ſeemed good to the holy Spirit to inſtruct men with a more exact courſe to the ſame rule that he hath ſet forth in his law. And the beginning of that courſe, is this, that it is the duty of believers to yield their bodies to God a living, holy and acceptable ſacrifice (Rom.xii. 1.) and that therein conſiſteth the true worſhipping of him. Hereupon, he taketh occaſion to exhort men, that they do not conform themſelves to the faſhion of this world, but be transformed in the renewing of their minds that they may prove what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we conſecrate and dedicate ourſelves to God: that we ſhould from thence forth think, ſpeak, imagine, or do nothing but to his glory. For any thing that is conſecrated, cannot be applied to unholy uſes, without great wrong done unto him. If we be not our own: but the Lord's, it is plain what ſins are to be avoided, and whereunto all the actions of our life are to be directed. We are not our own: therefore let neither our own reaſon nor our own will bear the ſway in our counſels and actions. We are not our own: therefore let us not make this the end to which our actions tend, to ſeek that which may be expedient for us according to the fleſh. We are not our own: therefore as much as we can, let us forget ourſelves and all things that are our own. On the other ſide, we are God's: therefore let us live and die to him. We are God's: therefore let his wiſdom and will govern all our actions. We are God's: therefore let all the parts of our life tend toward him as their only lawful end. Oh! how much hath he profited, who having learned that he is not his own, hath taken from himſelf the rule and government of his thoughts and actions and given it to God? For as the obeying of ourſelves is one of the moſt deadly poiſons whereby many are deſtroyed; ſo it is the only haven of ſafety, neither to know nor will any thing of ourſelves, but only to follow the direction of God. Let this therefore be the firſt ſtep, that man depart from himſelf, that he may apply all the ſtrength of his mind to the obeying of the Lord. I call not that obeying which conſiſteth in obedience of the word, but that whereby the mind of man, being freed from from the ſenſuality of the fleſh, yieldeth itſelf wholly to the will of God. Of this change of the heart (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) becauſe it is the firſt entry into life, all the philoſophers were ignorant, For they make reaſon the only governeſs of man: they think ſhe only ought to be heard: finally to her only they give and aſſign the rule of our manners. But the chriſtian philophy commandeth her to give place, and to yield and be ſubject to the holy Ghoſt: ſo that man may not live unto himſelf, but bear Chriſt living and reigning in him.

The next degree of righteouſneſs is to ſeek thoſe things that are of God, ſincerely

2. Hence followeth this other point, that we muſt not ſeek our own things, but thoſe things that are according to the will of the Lord, and ſerve to the advancement of his glory. This is

is alſo a proof of our great profiting; if in a manner forgetting ourſelves, and altogether deſpiſing any regard of ourſelves, we labour to employ our thoughts on God and his commandments. For when the ſcripture commandeth us to neglect all ſelfiſh regard to our own intereſt, it doth not only raze out of our minds the covetouſneſs of ſeeking for power and favour among men: but alſo rooteth out ambition and all deſire of worldly glory, and other more ſecret plagues: Truly a chriſtian muſt be ſo faſhioned and diſpoſed, as to think throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this manner if he examine all his actions by God's will and word, he will reverently direct unto him the earneſt bent and diligence of his mind. For he who hath learned to look up unto God in all his actions will thereby be turned away from all vain thoughts. This is that forſaking of ourſelves, which Chriſt even from the firſt beginning of his inſtructions gave ſo earneſtly in charge to his diſciples: which when it hath once gotten poſſeſſion of the heart, leaveth no room either for pride, diſdainfulneſs, or vain glorious boaſting, neither for covetouſneſs, filthy luſts, riotouſneſs, daintineſs, or for thoſe other evils that ariſe from a love of ourſelves. On the contrary, where this ſelf-denial reigneth not, there either moſt filthy vices boil up without ſhame, or if there be any remains of virtue, it is corrupted with a perverſe deſire of vain glory. For ſhew me a man, if thou canſt, who unleſs he hath forſaken and denied himſelf according to the commandment of our Lord, will of his own free will walk righteouſly among men. For all who have not been poſſeſſed with this feeling, if they have followed virtue, have done it only for the praiſe of men. And all the philoſophers who moſt zealouſly affirmed that virtue was to be deſired for its own ſake, were puffed up with ſo great pride, that it appeared they deſired virtue for nothing elſe, but that they might have ſomething to be proud of. But God is ſo little pleaſed, either with theſe purſuers of fame, or with thoſe ſwelling boaſts, that he declareth they have already received their reward in this world, and ſaith harlots and Publicans are nearer the kingdom of heaven, than them. And yet we have not throughly declared with how many and great ſtops man is hindered from that which is right, ſo long as he doth not forſake himſelf. For it was truly ſaid in times paſt, that there is a world of vices hidden in the ſoul of man. And thou canſt find no other remedy, but denying thy ſelf, and neglecting all regard of thy own intereſt, thou incline thy mind to ſeek thoſe things that the Lord requireth of thee, and ſeek them only becauſe they pleaſe him.

3. In another place (Tit. ii. 11, 12, 13, 14.) Paul doth more plainly, though ſhortly, go through all the parts of a well ordered life, ſaying: The grace of God that bringing ſalvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching us, that denying ungodlineſs, and worldly luſts, we ſhould live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly in this preſent world, looking for that bleſſed hope and glorious appearing of the great God, and of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, who gave himſelf for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himſelf a peculiar people zealous of good works. For after he hath ſet forth the grace of God to encourage them; to make ready the way for us to worſhip God, he taketh away two ſtops that do moſt hinder us, that is to ſay, ungodlineſs, whereunto we are naturally too much inclined, and worldly luſts, which extend further. And under the name of ungodlineſs, he not only meaneth ſuperſtition, but alſo comprehendeth all that diſagreeth with the true fear of God. And worldly luſts are in effect, as much as the affections of the fleſh. Therefore he commandeth us in reſpect of both the tables of the law, to deny all our own knowlege, and to forſake all that our own reaſon and will inclineth us to. And all the actions of our life he reduceth into three parts, ſobriety, righteouſneſs, and godlineſs: and ſobriety without doubt ſignifieth chaſtity and temperance, as well as a pure, moderate, and ſparing uſe of temporal things, and patient bearing of poverty. Righteouſneſs containeth all the duties of equity, to give every man his own. The third is godlineſs, which ſeparateth us from the pollutions of the world, and by true holineſs joineth us unto God. Theſe things, when they are joined together by an indiſſoluble union, make a full perfection. But as nothing is more difficult, than forſaking carnal reaſon, yea ſubduing and renouncing its deſires, to give up ourſelves to God and our brethren, and to purſue an angelic life in this ſinful ſtate upon earth: therefore Paul, to diſentangle our minds from all theſe ſnares, calleth us back to the hope of a bleſſed immortality, admoniſhing us not to ſtrive in vain: becauſe as Chriſt hath once appeared as our Redeemer, ſo at his laſt coming, he will then ſhew the fruit of that ſalvation which he hath purchaſed. And thus he driveth away the enticements that blind and hinder us from aſpiring as we ought, to the heavenly glory: he alſo teacheth us that as men abſent from our home in this world, we muſt labour ſo that the heavenly inheritance and abode be not loſt or fall away from us.

The denial of our ſelves hath relation partly to men but chiefly to God.

4. Now in theſe words we perceive, that ſelf-denial hath partly a reſpect to men, and partly, but chiefly to God. For when the ſcripture commandeth us (Rom. xii. 20. and Phil. ii. 3.) ſo to behave ourſelves towards all men, that we prefer them before ourſelves in honour, that we faithfully employ ourſeves wholly to procure their conveniency: it commandeth ſuch things as our mind is not able to receive, till we diveſt ourſelves of our natural feelings. With ſuch blindneſs do we all run into ſelf love, that every man thinketh he hath juſt cauſe to advance himſelf, and to deſpiſe all others in compariſon of himſelf. If God hath given us any good gift, by and by valuing ourſelves thereon, we aſſume courage, and not only ſwell, but in a manner burſt with pride. The vices wherewith we abound we carefully conceal from others, and flatter ourſelves that they are light and ſmall, and ſometimes embrace them for virtues. And if the ſame good gifts, which we praiſe in ourſelves, or appear better in others, leaſt we ſhould be compelled to give place to them, we do by our envy deface, and find fault with them. If there are any faults in them, we are not contented ſeverely and ſharply to mark them, but alſo odiouſly to exaggerate them. Hence ariſeth that inſolence, that every one of us, as though he were privileged above the common eſtate of mankind, would be higher than the reſt, and careleſly and proudly makes light of every man, or deſpiſes them as his inferiors. The poor yield to the rich, baſe people to gentlemen, ſervants to their maſters, unlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not nouriſh within himſelf ſome opinion of his own excellency. Thus every man by flattering himſelf, beareth a certain kingdom in his breaſt. For preſumptuouſly taking upon themſelves ſomewhat whereby to pleaſe themſelves, they judge of the capacity and manners of other men. But if any debate or contention ariſe, then their pride appeareth. For many make a ſhew of great meekneſs, ſo long as they find all things gentle and mild: but how many are they who keep that continual courſe of modeſty, when they are ſtirred up to anger? And there is no other remedy for this, but that the moſt hurtful plague of a fondneſs, for ſuperiority and ſelf-love be rooted out of the bottom of their hearts, and this is only effected by the doctrine of the ſcripture. For there we are taught, that we muſt remember that the good gifts which God hath given us, flow not from any good in us, but the free gift of God, whereof if any be proud, they betray their own unthankfulneſs. Who maketh thee to excel? Paul ſaith, if thou haſt received all things, why doeſt thou boaſt as if they were not given thee: and again, that we muſt by a continual acknowleging of our faults, call ourſelves back to humility. So there will remain in us nothing to be proud of, but much matter to abaſe ourſelves. Again, whatſoever gifts of God we ſee in other men, we are commanded ſo to reverence and eſteem them, that we alſo honour thoſe men in whom they are. For it were a great wickedneſs in us, to take from them that honour, which God hath vouchſafed to give them. As for their faults, we are taught to wink at them, not to ſooth them with flattering, but we muſt not triumph over them for their faults, to whom we ought to bear good will and honour. So will it come to paſs, that with what man ſoever we have to do, we will behave ourſelves not only temperately and modeſtly, but alſo in a gentle and friendly manner. Nor will any man ever attain true meekneſs, except he hath a heart capable of abaſing himſelf, and reverencing others.

It is not poſſible we can do our duty to others except we have firſt denied ourſelves. And it is our duty to profit others with whatſoever God hath beſtowed on us.

5. How hard is it for thee to do thy duty in ſeeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou ſhalt herein labour in vain, unleſs thou throw off a regard for thyſelf, and in a manner put off thyſelf. For how can thou perform theſe things that Paul teacheth are the works of charity, unleſs thou forſake thyſelf, to give thyſelf wholly to others. Charity (ſaith he 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5.) ſuffereth long, and is kind; charity vaunteth not itſelf, charity envieth not, is not puffed up, ſeeketh not her own, is not eaſily provoked, &c. And this one thing being required, that we ſeek not our own things, we will do no ſmall violence to our nature, which ſo forcibly inclineth us to a love of ourſelves, that we cannot eaſily or careleſly neglect ourſelves and our own intereſt, to watch over and take care of the intereſt of our neighbour, yea to depart from our own right and reſign it to another. But the ſcripture, to lead us as it were by the hand to this duty, warneth us that whatever gracious gifts we obtain of the Lord, they are committed to our truſt upon this condition, that they ſhall be uſed to the common benefit of chriſtians: and therefore the true uſe of all God's graces is a liberal and bountiful communicating of them to others. There could not be a more certain rule laid down, nor a more forcible exhortation uſed for obſerving the ſame, than this; thereby we are taught that all the gifts we have, are the gifts of God delivered, and committed to our truſt upon this condition, that they ſhall be ſubſervient to the intereſt of our neighbours. But the ſcripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of man's body are endued. No member hath its power for itſelf, nor applieth it to its own private uſe; but poureth it forth into the other members of the ſame body, and hath no profit there from, but ſuch as ariſeth from the common advantage of the whole body. So whatſoever a godly man is able to do, he ought to do it for his brethren, not providing ſelfiſhly for his own intereſt, but doing it in ſuch a manner, that his will may be inclined to the common edification of the church. Let this therefore be the rule of our kindneſs and charity: that whatſoever God hath beſtowed upon us, whereby we may help our neighbour, we are the ſtewards thereof, and bound to render an account of the diſpoſal thereof. And the only right way of diſpoſing it is that which is tried by the rule of love. Hereby we ſhall always not only join an endeavour for other mens advantage with the care of our own intereſt, but alſo prefer it to our own. And that we might not be ignorant that this is the true rule of diſpoſing all the gifts which we receive of God, even under the ceremonial law, he gave the ſame command even in the ſmalleſt gifts of his liberality. For he commanded (Exod. xxii. 29. and xxiii. 19.) the firſt fruits of corn to be offered unto him, whereby the people might acknowlege that it was unlawful for them to take any fruit of the goods that were not firſt conſecrate to him. If the gifts of God be then ſanctified unto us; when we have with our own hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is plain that it is an abuſe of his gifts when ſuch a dedication is not practiſed. But it is vain for thee to go about to enrich the Lord by communicating to him any of thy goods. Therefore ſince thy liberality cannot extend unto him, as the prophet ſaith, (Pſal. xvi. 3.) thou muſt uſe it towards his ſaints that are on earth. Therefore in (Heb. xiii. 16.) alms are compared to holy oblations, that they may now be correſpondent to theſe under the law.

6. But that we may not be weary with doing good (which otherwiſe muſt needs come quickly to paſs) that other muſt be adjoined which the apoſtle ſpeaketh of (1 Cor. xiii. 4.) that charity ſuffereth long. The Lord commandeth to do good to all univerſally, a great part of whom are unworthy, if they be conſidered by their own deſerving. But here the ſcripture helpeth with a very good rule (Gal. vi. 10.) when it teacheth us that we muſt not look upon men as to what they deſerve of themſelves, but muſt conſider that the image of God is in all men, to which we owe all honour and love. And this is moſt diligently to be regarded in them who are of the houſhold of faith, becauſe it is renewed and reſtored in them by the ſpirit of Chriſt. Therefore whatever man thou light upon, that needeth thy help, thou haſt no cauſe to withdraw thyſelf from doing him good. If thou ſayeſt he is a ſtranger: the Lord hath given him a mark, which ought to be familiar unto thee, when he forbiddeth thee to deſpiſe thine own fleſh. If thou ſayeſt he is baſe and unworthy; the Lord hath ſheweth him to be one, to whom he hath vouchſafed to give the beauty of his image. If thou ſayeſt that thou doſt not owe him for any thing that he hath done for thee: God hath ſet him as it were in his place in reſpect of whom, thou knoweſt by how many and great benefits he hath bound thee unto him. If thou ſayeſt that he is unworthy that thou ſhouldeſt labour for his ſake: the image of God whereby he is recommended unto thee, is ſo worthy that thou ſhouldeſt give thy ſelf and all that thou haſt unto it. But if he have not only deſerved no good at thy hand, but alſo provoked thee by wrongs and injuries: even this is no juſt cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt ceaſe both to love him and do for him the dutiful works of charity. Thou wilt ſay, he hath deſerved far otherwiſe of me. But hath not the Lord deſerved? Who when he commanded thee to forgive every thing wherein any man hath offended thee, ordereth the ſame to be imputed to himſelf. Truly this is the only way to arrive at this perfection which is ſo much againſt the corrupt nature of man; it is very hard for men, to love them that hate us, to recompence evil with good, to render bleſſings for reproaches: but we muſt remember that we are not to regard the malice and ill will of men, but to obſerve the image of God in them, who defacing and blotting

To do works of Charity is nothing, except they be done charitably.

7. Therefore this mortification will only take place in us, when we perform the duties of charity. But he doth not discharge them aright who only doth all the dutiful works of charity, although he leave none of them undone, but he who doth them out of sincere affection and love. For it may happen, that a man may fully perform every outward duty which he oweth to men: and yet may be far from performing it aright. For you may see some that would seem very liberal, who yet give nothing but either with a proud and disdainful air, or with surly words upbraid them who receive it. And we are arrived at such a degree of hardness of heart in this unhappy world, that almost no alms are given by any man, or at least by the most part of men, without reproaching. Which would not have been allowed among the very heathens. But of christians somewhat more is required than to shew an outward cheerfulness in the countenance, and make their actions appear lovely with gentle words. First they must put themselves in the place of the person who they see needs their help, and then pity their case, as if they themselves felt and suffered it: so that they may be moved by the same feeling of mercy and gentleness, even as they would be to help themselves. He who is thus inclined to help his brethren, will not defile his own actions with any arrogance or upbraiding, but also will not despise his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his help, nor trample upon him as his slave; no more than we use to reproach a sick member, for easing whereof the whole body laboureth, or think it especially obliged to the other members, because it hath gotten more help than it hath repaid. For it is thought monstruous to deny that a common interchanging of duties between the members of the same body, is not a free kind of gift, but rather a payment of that which they owe to each other by the law of nature. And from this way of reasoning it will follow, that he must not think himself discharged, who hath performed one kind of duty, as is commonly done; as when a rich man hath given any thing of his own, he leaveth other duties to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather every man ought to think thus with himself, that he is always debtor to his neighbours, and that he must not desist from his liberality, till his ability fail, which how large soever it be, must be measured by the rule of charity.

The principal part of denying ourselves, is wholly to depend upon the favour and blessing of God, without any reckoning on or prizing worldly things.

8. Now let us more fully declare the principal part of forsaking ourselves, which we already said has a respect to God. We have said much of it already, which would be superfluous to rehearse again: it shall be sufficient to treat of it so far as it disposeth us to quietness of mind and patience under sufferings. First therefore in seeking the ease or quiet of this present life, the scripture calleth us thereto, that resigning ourselves and our concerns to the Lord's will, we must yield unto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To covet wealth and honours, to acquire authority, to heap up riches, to gather together all such follies as serve for pomp and show, our lust is outragious, and our greediness infinite. On the other side we have such a great fear and hatred of poverty, a low estate and condition, that it provoketh us to use every method whereby we may escape them. Hereby we may see, how unquiet a mind they have, how many shifts they attempt, with what studies they weary themselves, who frame their life after their own devices, to attain those things that their ambition or covetousness requireth, and to escape poverty and reproach. Therefore the godly must take care, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them neither desire, hope for, or think upon any other means of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldly trust to it. For howsoever the flesh think itself sufficient, when she either laboureth by her own diligence, or endeavoureth by her own study, or is assisted by the favour of men, to the attaining of honour and wealth: yet it is certain, that all these things are nothing, and that we shall not prevail by wit or labour, but in so far as the Lord shall prosper both. But on the other side his blessing findeth away through all hinderances, to make every thing go on with us to a joyful and prosperous end. Then though we may obtain any glory or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked get great honour and riches) yet as they upon whom resteth the curse, feel no part of real felicity, we can obtain nothing without his blessing that will not incline us to sin: and that is not to be coveted, which maketh men more miserable.

9. Therefore

He who knoweth himself and his estate to depend wholly upon the blessing of God, will neither seek to advance himself by unlawful means, nor immoderately desire to be advanced, nor impatiently murmur at any thing which happeneth.

9 If therefore we believe that all the means of prosperous success and such as is to be wished, consisteth only in the blessing of God, which being wanting, all kinds of miseries and calamities must happen unto us: this remaineth also, that we do not greedily endeavour to obtain wealth and honours trusting to our own wit or diligence, not depending on the favour of men, nor trusting upon a vain imagination of fortune, but that we always look unto the Lord, to be led by his guidance to whatsoever lot he hath provided. And it will thereby come to pass, that we will not violently catch at riches and pursue honours, by wrong, by guile and crafty means, extortion, by doing injury to our neighbours, but will only seek such a fortune as may not lead us aside from our integrity. For who can hope for the assistance of God's blessing amidst frauds, extortions, and other subtile means of wickedness? For as God's blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doth rightly; so it restraineth all them who desire it, from crooked thoughts, and corrupt doings; and moderateth our desires that we burn not with an insatiable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what countenance can any man trust to be assisted by God, to obtain those things that he desireth against his word? For God forbid, that he should give the help of his blessing to that which he curseth with his own mouth. Last of all, though affairs succeed not according to our wish and hope, yet we will be restrained from impatience, and from cursing our condition whatever it be: because we know that we murmur against God, at whose will riches and poverty, baseness and honours are disposed. Briefly, he that dependeth in such a manner as is aforesaid upon the blessing of God, will neither by cunning craft hunt for those things that men most outragiously covet, by which craft he knoweth he will not prevail: nor if any thing happen prosperously will he impute it to himself, his own diligence, endeavour or fortune, but will assign it to God the author thereof. But if while other mens estates do flourish, he go but slowly forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will bear his ill fortune with greater quietness and moderation of mind, than a worldly man will bear a small good success, which is not altogether so good as he desired: because he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than on the highest top of wealth and authority: because he reckoneth that his affairs are so ordered by God as shall be most conducive to his salvation. So we see that David (Psal. cxxxi. 1, 2.) was thus minded, and yielded himself to be ruled by God, where he declareth himself to be like a weaned child, and that he exerciseth not himself in things great or marvellous.

The quiet contentment of mind which ariseth unto men in the manifold casual miseries of this life, if they be once assured not that fortune doth blindly toss, but that God doth providently dispose their whole estate.

10. And godly minds ought to have that quietness and patience not only consisting in this: but it must also extend to all chances whereunto our present life is subject. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himself, but he who hath resigned himself up wholly to the Lord, and suffereth all the parts of his life to be governed by his will. He who is so disposed whatsoever happen, will neither think himself, miserable, nor will with envy complain against God of his fortune. How necessary this affection is, will appear, if we consider to how many chances we are subject. Divers kinds of diseases trouble us, sometimes the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometimes we are sharply vexed with the calamities of war, sometimes frost or hail destroying the hopes of the year, bringeth barrenness, on the land and produceth a dearth: sometimes our wife, parents, children, or kinsfolk are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these are things at the happening whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, have heaven and light in execration, murmur against God, and (as they are eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of injustice and cruelty: but a believer may even in these providences behold the merciful kindness and fatherly tenderness of God. Therefore altho' he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolk slain, yet he will not cease to praise God, but will rather comfort himself with this thought: yet the grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my house will not leave it desolate. Or if when his corn is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frosts, or beaten down with hail, he seeth famine at hand, yet he will not despair, nor speak despitefully of God, but will rest in this hope, we are yet in the Lord's protection, and the sheep of his pasture: (Psal. lxxix. 14.) he therefore will find us food even in the greatest scarcity.

Or if he be troubled with ſickneſs, even then he will not be diſcouraged with ſuch bitterneſs of ſorrow, as to burſt out into impatience and quarrel with God: but conſidering the juſtice and tenderneſs of God's correction, he will bear it with patience. Finally, whatſoever ſhall happen, becauſe he knoweth it is ordained by God, he will take it with a well pleaſed and thankful mind, leſt he ſhould ſtubbornly reſiſt his authority, into whoſe power he hath yielded himſelf and all that is his. Therefore let the fooliſh and miſerable comfort of the heathens be far from a believer's heart, who to ſtrengthen their minds againſt adverſity, imputed the ſame to fortune; with whom they counted it fooliſh to be angry, becauſe ſhe was blind and unadviſed, who thus wounded both the deſerving and undeſerving. For on the contrary this is the rule of godlineſs, that God is the judge and governor both of proſperity and adverſity, and that his hand ſmiteth not with unadviſed ſudden rage, but with moſt orderly juſtice dealeth among us both good and evil things.

CHAP. VIII.

Of bearing the croſs, which is a part of the forſaking of our ſelves.

He who forſaketh himſelf muſt arm himſelf to endure a troubleſome eſtate of life, wherein there is notwithſtanding this comfort, we go no other way than Chriſt himſelf hath troden before us.

BUT a godly mind muſt yet climb up higher, even to that whereunto Chriſt calleth his diſciples, that every one take up his croſs. For all whom the Lord hath choſen and vouchſafed to receive into his company, muſt prepare themſelves to a hard troubleſome and unquiet life, and full of many and divers kinds of inconveniencies. For it is the will of our heavenly Father, to exerciſe them in this manner, that he may have a true proof of them that are his. Beginning at Chriſt, his firſt begotten Son, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Chriſt was the beſt beloved Son above the reſt, and in whom the Father's mind was fully pleaſed, (Mat. iii. 17. and xvii. 5.) yet we ſee he was not tenderly nor gently handled: ſo that it may be truly ſaid, he was not only exerciſed with a perpetual croſs ſo long as he lived on earth, but that all his life was nothing elſe but a kind of continual croſs. The apoſtle ſheweth the cauſe thereof, that he might learn obedience by thoſe things that he ſuffered: why then ſhould we think to free ourſelves from that eſtate, whereunto it behoved Chriſt our head to be ſubject, eſpecially ſince he became ſubject thereunto for our ſake, to ſhew us an example of patience in himſelf? Therefore the apoſtle ſaith, that this is the appointed end of all the children of God, to be faſhioned like unto him. Whereupon alſo in hard and ſharp providences, which are reckoned adverſities and evils, ariſeth a great comfort unto us, that we communicate with the ſufferings of Chriſt: that as he out of a ſea of troubles entred into the heavenly glory, ſo we may by divers tribulations be brought into the ſame glory. (Act. xiv. 22.) For ſo ſaith Paul himſelf, (Philip. iii. 10.) that when we learn the communicating of his afflictions, we do alſo conceive the power of his reſurrection: and when we are made conformable to his death, we are ſo prepared to the fellowſhip of of his glorious riſing again. How much may this avail to aſſuage all the painfulneſs of the croſs, that the more we are afflicted with adverſities, ſo much the more ſurely is our fellowſhip with Chriſt confirmed? by communicating whereof, our ſufferings are not only bleſſed unto us, but alſo do much help us in the furtherance of our ſalvation.

Affliction neceſſary for us not only as for Chriſt to teſtify our obedience unto God, but further alſo to bring us to a ſenſible feeling of our own imbecillity and weakneſs.

2. Beſides that our Lord had no need to take upon him and bear the croſs, but only to teſtify and prove his obedience to his Father: but we for divers cauſes have need to lead our life under a continual croſs. Firſt, (as we are naturally bent to attribute all things to the fleſh) unleſs our weakneſs be ſhewed us as it were before our eyes, we readily eſteem our own ſtrength above its due meaſure, and doubt not that whatſoever happen, it will continue unbroken and unconquered againſt the moſt ſevere aſſaults. Whereby we are carried into a fooliſh and vain confidence of the fleſh, and truſting thereupon, we ſtubbornly wax proud againſt God himſelf, as though our own power without his grace was ſufficient for us. This arrogance he can no way better bear down, than when he proveth unto us by experience, not only how feeble, but alſo how frail we

we are. Therefore he afflicteth us either with ſhame, poverty, loſs of children, ſickneſs, or other calamities, which we being unable to bear of ourſelves, do immediately ſink down under them. And being ſo humbled we learn to call upon his ſtrength, which only maketh us to ſtand upright under the heavy burden of afflictions. Yea the moſt godly men, how well ſoever they know that they ſtand only by the grace of God and not by their own ſtrength, are too confident of their own ſtrength and conſtancy, unleſs by the trial of the croſs, he bring them into a more inward knowlege of themſelves. Thus ſlothfulneſs crept in on David: (Pſal. xxx. 6, 7.) I ſaid in my proſperity I ſhall never be moved, Lord, by thy favour thou haſt made my mountain to ſtand ſtrong: thou didſt hide thy face and I was troubled. For he confeſſeth that by ſluggiſhneſs in proſperity his ſenſes were dulled, and that not regarding the grace of God, upon which he ſhould have depended, he leaned unto himſelf, to promiſe himſelf perpetual continuance. If this happened to ſo great a prophet: which of us ought not to be fearful, that we may guard againſt the like? Therefore whereas in proſperity they flatter themſelves with an opinion of great conſtancy and patience, when they are once humbled with adverſity, they learn that their former opinion was but hypocriſy. The faithful (I ſay) being admoniſhed by ſuch examples of their weakneſs, do thereby gain humility, that being diveſted of the falſe confidence of the fleſh, they may have recourſe to the grace of God. And when they once apply to his grace, they feel the preſence of God's ſtrength, which is abundantly ſufficient to help them.

Affliction by teaching us how feeble we are of ourſelves, cauſeth us to reſt only upon God. This breedeth patience, whereby an experience ariſeth of God's upholding them that rely upon him, which trial of his goodneſs in things paſt, eſtabliſheth the hope confirmed: foraſmuch as we would be very unthankful, not to look for the ſame faithfulneſs in God as to things to come, that they had already by experience proved to be conſtant and ſure. We ſee now how many good things come unto us in one knot by the croſs. For the croſs overthrowing the falſe opinion that we have of our own ſtrength, and diſplaying our hypocriſy which blindeth us, it ſhaketh away all hurtful confidence in the fleſh, and teacheth us being ſo humbled to reſt upon God only, by which it cometh to paſs, that we are neither oppreſſed nor fall down. And after victory followeth hope, inſomuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promiſed eſtabliſheth the credit of his truth for the time to come. Truly although, there were no other reaſons but theſe, it appeareth how much the exerciſe of the croſs is neceſſary for us. For it is a matter of no ſmall importance, to have the love of thy ſelf wiped away, that thou mayeſt thoroughly know thine own weakneſs; to feel thine own weakneſs, that thou mayſt learn to diſtruſt thy ſelf; to diſtruſt thy ſelf, that thou mayeſt remove thy confidence from thy ſelf and place it upon God, to reſt with confidence of heart upon God, that being upholden by his help, thou mayeſt continue unconquered to the end: to ſtand faſt by his grace, that thou mayeſt underſtand that he is true in his promiſes: to know by experience the truth of his promiſes, that thy hope may be ſtrengthened thereby.

3. And this is that which Paul teacheth, (Rom. v. 3.) that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience. For whereas God hath promiſed to the faithful that he will be preſent with them in their troubles, they feel the ſame to be true, when they ſtand patiently being upheld by his hand, which by their own ſtrength they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a proof by experience to believers, that God when need requireth, will indeed perform the help that he hath promiſed. And thereby alſo is their credit of his truth for things to come, and increaſeth hope.

4. The Lord hath alſo another end in afflicting his people, to try their patience, and inſtruct us to obedience. Not that they can perform any other obedience toward him, than what he giveth them: but ſo it pleaſeth him by open examples to make it approved by witneſſes, and to ſhew the graces that he hath beſtowed upon his ſaints, that they ſhould not be idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into light the ſtrength of the patience and conſtancy, wherewith he hath furniſhed his ſervants, it is ſaid that he trieth their patience. And hence came theſe ſayings: (Gen. xxii. 1.) that God tempted Abraham, and had a proof of his godlineſs, by this, that he refuſed not to offer up in ſacrifice his own and only Son. Therefore Peter teacheth, (1 Pet. i. 7.) that that our faith is tried in troubles, as gold is tried in a furnace. And who can ſay that it is not expedient, that the moſt noble gift of patience, which a faithful man hath received of his God, ſhould be brought forth into uſe, that it may be made certainly known and manifeſt? For otherwiſe men will not eſteem it according to its worth. Now if God himſelf doth right when he furniſheth matter to ſtir up the virtues that he hath given to his faithful, that they ſhould not lie hidden, yea lie unprofitable and periſh: then is there good reaſon for the afflictions of the ſaints, without which their patience would be nothing. I ſay alſo that by the croſs they are inſtructed to obedience, becauſe they are thereby taught to live not after their own wiſh, but after the will of God. Truly if all things ſhould flow unto them after their own mind, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearſeth (De vita beata cap. 15.) that this was an old proverb, when they exhorted any man to bear adverſity, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only, man truly entred under the yoke of God, when he yielded his hand and back to God's correction. Now if it be moſt righteous, that we ſhould in all things ſhew our ſelves obedient to our heavenly Father, then we ought not to refuſe, that he ſhould by all means accuſtom us to yield obedience unto him.

5. But yet we do not perceive how neceſſary this obedience is for us, unleſs we alſo conſider, how fond the fleſhly mind is to ſhake off the yoke of God, ſo ſoon as it hath been but a little while delicately and tenderly handled. The ſame happeneth unto the fleſh which chanceth to ſtubborn horſes, which if they be a few days pampered idly, they cannot afterward for fierceneſs be tamed, neither do they know the rider, to whoſe government they were ſomewhat before obedient. And this is continually in us that God complaineth to have been in the people of Iſrael, (Deut. xxxii. 15.) that being well fed and covered with fatneſs, we kick againſt him that fed and nouriſhed us. The liberality of God ſhould indeed have allured us to conſider and love his goodneſs, but for as much as our depraved nature is ſuch, that we are always corrupted with his tender uſage, it is more than neceſſary for us, to be reſtrained by ſome diſcipline, that we run not outragiouſly into ſuch a ſtubborn wantonneſs. And that we ſhould not grow fierce with an unmeaſurable abundance of riches, that we ſhould not wax proud being lifted up with honours, that we ſhould not become inſolent, being puffed up with other good gifts, either of the ſoul, body, or fortune, the Lord himſelf, as he ſeeth it to be expedient, preventeth it, and with the remedy of the croſs ſubdueth and bridleth the fierceneſs of our fleſh, and that divers ways, as he knoweth what is neceſſary for every man. For all are not alike ſick of the ſame diſeaſes, nor do alike need of hard healing. And hence it may be obſerved how ſome are exerciſed with one kind of croſs, and ſome with another. But whereas the heavenly phyſician handleth ſome more gently, and purgeth ſome with ſharper remedies, when he intendeth to provide for the health of all: yet he leaveth none free or untouched, becauſe he knoweth that all are diſeaſed without exception.

6. Moreover our moſt merciful Father needeth not only to prevent our weakneſs, but many times to correct our paſt offences. Therefore ſo oft as we are afflicted, the remembrance of our by paſt life ought immediately to enter into our mind: and without doubt we will find that we have done ſomewhat worthy of chaſtiſement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to patience upon the acknowleging of ſin. For the ſcripture giveth us a far better conſideration, when it ſaith, that the Lord correcteth us with adverſity, that we ſhould not be damned with this world. Therefore we ought even in the very ſharpneſs of tribulations to acknowlege the kindneſs and goodneſs of our Father toward us, foraſmuch as even then he ceaſeth not to further and promote our ſalvation. For he doth afflict, not to deſtroy or kill us, but rather to deliver us from the condemnation of the world. That thought ſhould lead us to that, which the ſcripture teacheth in another place: (Prov. iii. 11, 12.) my ſon deſpiſe not the Lord's correction, nor weary when thou art rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, and embraceth him as a father doth his child. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duty rather to ſhew ourſelves obedient children and willing to learn, than with obſtinacy to act like deſperate men, that are hardened by their wicked doings? The Lord deſpiſeth us, unleſs he call us back by correction when we are fallen away from him: ſo that the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews rightly ſaith (Heb. xii. 8.) that we are baſtards, baſtards, and not children if we be without correction. Therefore we are very froward, if we cannot ſuffer his correction when he thereby declareth his good will, and the care that he hath for our ſalvation. This the ſcripture teacheth to be the difference between the unbelievers and the faithful, that the unbelievers as the bond ſlaves of their own rooted and hardened wickedneſs, are made worſe and more obſtinate by chaſtiſement; whereas the faithful, like children having an honeſt freedom of nature, do thereby profit to repentance. Now muſt thou chuſe of which number thou wilt be. But becauſe I have ſpoken of this matter in another place, I am contented to touch it briefly, and therefore make an end.

7. Moreover it is a ſingular comfort, when we ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs. For then we ought to think, how great an honour God vouchſafeth to grant us, that he diſtinguiſheth us with the peculiar mark of his ſoldiers. I mean not that they only ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs, who ſuffer for the defence of the goſpel, but alſo all they who are perſecuted for any defence of righteouſneſs. Whether therefore in maintaining the truth of God againſt the lies of Satan, or in taking in hand the defence of good men and innocents againſt the wrongs of the wicked, we are obliged to incur the diſpleaſure and hatred of the world, whereby our life, goods, or reputation, may come into danger: let it not be grievous or loathſome unto us to employ our ſelves for God, neither let us think ourſelves miſerable in doing thoſe things for which he hath with his own mouth pronounced us bleſſed. (Matth. v. 5.) Poverty indeed, if it be conſidered in it ſelf, is miſerable: likewiſe baniſhment, a contemptuous eſtate, impriſonment and ſhame: Finally, death is the laſt and worſt of all calamities. But when the favour of God ſhineth upon us, there is none of all theſe misfortunes but it improveth to our felicity. Therefore let us rather be content with the teſtimony of Chriſt, than with the falſe eſtimation of the fleſh. So ſhall it come to paſs, that we ſhall rejoice as the apoſtles did, when God ſhall account us worthy to ſuffer reproach for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our ſelves clear in our conſciences, we are by the wicked and fraudulent dealings of ungodly men ſpoiled of our goods: we are indeed brought thereby to poverty among men, but we thereby lay up a treaſure in heaven before God If we be thruſt out of our houſes, we are the more inwardly received into the houſhold of God. If we are vexed and deſpiſed, we take ſo much the deeper root in Chriſt. If we be branded with reproach and ſhame, we have ſo much the more honourable a place in the kingdom of God. If we are ſlain, thereby is an entry opened for us unto a bleſſed immortality. Let us be aſhamed to eſteem theſe things leſs, upon which the Lord hath ſet ſo great a price, than the ſhadowy and fickle enticing pleaſures of this preſent life.

Patience doth not extinguiſh the feeling of that bitterneſs which is in trouble, but vanquiſheth the troubleſome vexation which is felt.

8. Since therefore the ſcripture doth with theſe and like admonitions give ſufficient comfort for the ſhame or calamities that we ſuffer for the defence of righteouſneſs, we are too unthankful if we do not gladly and chearfully receive them at the Lord's hand, eſpecially ſince this is the croſs, moſt properly belonging to the faithful, whereby Chriſt will be glorified in us. As alſo Peter teacheth. (1 Pet. iv. 12.) But it is more grievous to gentle natures to ſuffer ſhame than a hundred deaths, therefore Paul expreſsly warneth us, (1 Tim. iv. 10.) that we ſhould not only ſuffer perſecutions, but alſo reproaches, becauſe we truſt in the living God. As in another place, (2 Cor. vi. 8.) he teacheth us after his example to walk through ill report and good report. Yet there is not required of us ſuch a chearfulneſs as may take away all feeling of bitterneſs and ſorrow, the patience of the ſaints under their croſſes would be no patience, unleſs they ſhould be both tormented with ſorrow and vexed with grief. If there were no difficulty in bearing poverty, no pain in ſickneſs, no grief in ſhame, no horror in death, what courage or temperance were it to bear them inconſiderately? But when every one of theſe doth with the natural anguiſh thereof afflict our hearts; herein doth the courage of a believer ſhew itſelf, it being tried with the feeling of ſuch anguiſh, which how grievouſly ſoever he be troubled with it, yet by valiantly reſiſting he overcometh it: his patience ſheweth itſelf herein, if being ſharply provoked, he is yet ſo reſtrained by the fear of God, that he burſt not out into any kind of ſinful reſentment. His chearfulneſs appeareth herein, if being wounded with ſadneſs and ſorrow, he reſteth upon the ſpiritual comfort of God.

The patience which God requireth in afflictions is not a senseless want of grief.

9. This conflict, which believers sustain against the natural feelings of sorrow, while they study for patience and temperance, Paul hath very well described in these words. (2 Cor. iv. 8, 9.) We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. You see that to bear the cross patiently, is not to be altogether astonished, and without all feeling of sorrow: as the stoicks formerly foolishly described a brave man, to be such an one, as putting of the nature of man, was alike moved in prosperity and adversity, in a sorrowful and joyful estate, yea such a one as like a stone was moved with nothing: and what have they profited with this high wisdom? They have delineated such an image of wisdom as never was found, nor ever will be found among men: But rather while they coveted to have too exact and precise a patience, they have taken away all the use of patience out of man's life. And at this day also among christians there are a new kind of stoicks, who reckon it a fault not only to groan and weep, but also to be sad and careful. But these strange conclusions do commonly proceed from idle men, who busying themselves rather in speculation than with action, can do nothing but contrive such new angled doctrines. But we have nothing to do with that stupid philosophy, which our master and Lord hath condemned not only by his word, but also by his example: for he mourned and wept both at his own and other mens adversities. The world (saith he John xvii. 20.) shall rejoice, but you shall mourn and weep. And that no man might find fault therewith, by his open proclamation, (Matth. v. 4.) he hath pronounced them blessed that mourn. And no wonder. For if all weeping be condemned, what shall we judge of the Lord himself, out of whose body dropped bloody tears? If all fear is to be branded with infidelity, what shall we think of that quaking fear wherewith we read that he was so much oppressed? If all sadness be disliked, how shall we like this, when he confesseth that his soul was sorrowful even unto death. (Luke xxii. 44.)

10. This I thought good to speak for this end, to call godly minds from despair, that they should not altogether forsake the study of patience, because they cannot put off the natural affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make patience a senseless stupidity, and of a valiant and constant man, a stock. For the scripture giveth to the saints the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with the weight of their adversities, that yet they are not overcome nor cast down with them, when they are pricked with anguish, that they are still delighted with spiritual joy: when they are so distressed with grief, that yet they assume new courage being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet that repugnancy abideth still in their hearts, that natural sense escheweth and dreadeth those things which it knoweth to be contrary to it: but the love of godliness travelleth even through all those difficulties to attain an obedience to God's will. This repugnancy the Lord expressed when he said thus to Peter: (John xxi. 18.) When thou wast young thou didst gird thy self and didst walk whither thou wouldst: but when thou art old, another shall gird thee and lead thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorify God by his death, was drawn unwillingly and resisting unto it; else his martyrdom should have had but small praise. But tho' he did with great chearfulness of heart obey the commandment of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly drawn by two sorts of wills. For when he did by himself consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being striken with the horror thereof, he would gladly have escaped it. On the other side, when it came into his mind, that he was called unto it by the commandment of God, then conquering and overcoming fear, he gladly, yea and chearfully took it upon him. This therefore we must endeavour if we will be the disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reverence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue all contrary affections to an obedience to his commands. So shall it come to pass, that with whatsoever kind of cross we be vexed, even in the greatest anguish of mind, we shall constantly preserve our patience. For adversities have their sharpness, wherewith we will be tormented: when we are afflicted with sickness, we shall both groan and be disquieted and desire health: being oppressed with poverty, we shall be troubled with the stings of anxious care and sorrow: in the like manner will we be affected with grief for shame, contempt and injury, and pay the tears of nature at the burial of our friends: but this will always be the conclusion. It is the Lord's will. Therefore let us follow it. Yea even in the midst of the anguish anguiſh of ſorrow, in the midſt of mourning and tears this thought muſt needs come between, to incline our heart to bear chearfully the very ſame things, by reaſon whereof it is ſo moved.

11. But for as much as we have drawn the chief cauſe of bearing our croſs, from the conſideration of the will of God, we muſt in a few words define the difference between philoſophical and chriſtian patience. Truly very few of the philoſophers attained to ſo high a reaſon, as to underſtand that the hand of God doth exerciſe us by afflictions, and to think that God is in this behalf to be obeyed. But they bring no other reaſon, but we muſt do ſo of neceſſity. What is this elſe, but to ſay that thou muſt yield unto God, becauſe thou ſhalt ſtrive in vain to wreſtle againſt him? For if we obey God, only out of neceſſity, then if we could eſcape, we would ceaſe to obey. But the ſcripture commandeth us to conſider another thing in the will of God, that is to ſay, firſt his juſtice and equity, then the care of our ſalvation. Theſe therefore are the chriſtian exhortations to patience, whether poverty, baniſhment, impriſonment, ſhame, ſickneſs, loſs of parents, or children, or any other like things grieve us, we muſt always remember that none of theſe things, happen, but by the will and providence of God, and that he doth nothing but in moſt juſt order: For why? do not our innumerable and daily offences deſerve to be chaſtiſed more ſharply: and with more grievous correction, than what the merciful kindneſs of God layeth upon us? Is it not moſt equitable, that our fleſh be ſubdued, and made acquainted as it were with the yoke, that it do not wantonly grow wild according to its nature? Is not the righteouſneſs and truth of God worthy, that we ſhould ſuffer pain for it? But if there appear an undoubted righteouſneſs in our afflictions, we cannot without unrighteouſneſs either murmur or wreſtle againſt it. We do not now hear that cold ſong: We muſt give place, becauſe we muſt do ſo of neceſſity, but we hear a lively leſſon and full of the moſt perfect perſuaſion, we muſt obey, becauſe it is unlawful to reſiſt: we muſt ſuffer patiently, becauſe impatience is a ſtubborneſs againſt the righteouſneſs of God. But now, becauſe that only is worthy to be loved by us, which we know to be for our ſafety and benefit, our heavenly father doth this way alſo comfort us, when he affirmeth, that even when he afflicteth us with the croſs, he provideth for our ſalvation. But if it be certain that troubles are uſeful for us, why ſhould we not receive them with a thankful and well pleaſed mind? Therefore in bearing them patiently, we do not forcibly yield to neceſſity, but quietly conſent to our own advantage. Theſe thoughts (I ſay) prove that as much as our minds are grieved in the croſs with a natural feeling of anguiſh, ſo much they are cheered with ſpiritual gladneſs. Whereupon alſo followeth thankſgiving, which cannot be without joy. But if the praiſe of the Lord and thankſgiving proceed from nothing but a cheerful and joyful heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the ſame praiſing of God and thankſgiving in us: hereby appeareth how neceſſary it is that the bitterneſs of the croſs be tempered with ſpiritual joy.

CHAP. IX.

The miſeries of this life muſt teach us not to ſeek our happineſs here.

BUt with whatſoever kind of troubles we are diſtreſſed, we muſt always look to this end, to accuſtom ourſelves to the contempt of this preſent life, and thereby be ſtirred up to the meditation of the life to come. For, becauſe God very well knoweth how much we are by nature inclined to the love of this world, he uſeth a moſt proper mean to draw us back, and make us ſhake off our ſluggiſhneſs, that we ſhould not cleave too faſt to that love. There are none of us who do not want to appear to breathe after and endeavour all their life long for a bleſſed immorality. For we are aſhamed not to excel brute beaſts: whoſe condition would be nothing inferior to ours, unleſs there remained to us a hope of eternity after death. But if you examine the devices, ſtudies, and doings of every man, you will find nothing therein but what ſavours of the earth. Hence ariſeth that ſenſleſneſs, that the eyes of our mind being dazled with the vain gliſtering of riches, power, and honours, are ſo darkned that they cannot ſee far. Our heart alſo being poſſeſſed with covetouſneſs, ambition, and luſt, is ſo weighed down, that it cannot riſe up higher. Finally, all our ſoul being ſo entangled with the enticements of the fleſh ſeeketh its felicity in earth. The Lord to remedy this evil, doth with continual examples of miſery teach us the vanity of this preſent life. Therefore that they may not promiſe themſelves in this life a ſound and quiet peace, he ſuffereth them to be many times diſquieted and troubled either with wars, tumults, robberies, or other injuries. That they may not with too much greedineſs, gape for periſhing and tranſitory riches, or reſt in the riches they already poſſeſs, he ſometimes with baniſhment, ſometimes with barrenneſs of the earth, ſometimes with fire, ſometimes by other means bringeth them to poverty, or at leaſt confineth them within due bounds. That they may not with too much eaſe take pleaſure in the bleſſings of marriage, he either vexeth them with the frowardneſs of their wives, humbleth them with ill children, or puniſheth them with want of iſſue. But if in all theſe things he tenderly beareth with them; yet leaſt they ſhould either ſwell with vain glory, or immeaſurably rejoice with fooliſh confidence, he doth by diſeaſes and dangers ſhew them, how unſtable, and vaniſhing all tranſitory and periſhing the things of this life are. Then only therefore we rightly profit under the diſcipline of the croſs when we learn that this life, when it is conſidered in itſelf, is unquiet, troubleſome, and innumerably various ways miſerable, and in no point fully bleſſed: and that all thoſe which are reckoned the good things thereof are uncertain, fickle, vain, and periſhing, and many evils mixed with them. And hereupon we conclude, that nothing is to be ſought or hoped for here but ſtrife: and that when we think of our crown, then we muſt lift up our eyes to heaven. For we muſt believe, that our mind is never truly raiſed up to the deſire and meditation of the life to come, unleſs it firſt think with contempt upon this preſent life.

Our dulneſs to learn the frail eſtate of this preſent life.

2. For between theſe two there is no medium, the earth muſt either become vile in our ſight, or hold us bound with an intemperate love of it. Therefore if we have any thought of eternity, we muſt diligently endeavour to looſe ourſelves from theſe fetters. Now becauſe this preſent life hath many flattering pleaſures wherewith to allure us, a great ſhew of pleaſantneſs, grace and ſweetneſs, wherewith to delight us; it is very neceſſary for us to be now and then called away, that we be not bewitched with ſuch allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done, if we did here enjoy a continual flow of good things and happineſs, ſince we cannot by a continual feeling of its evils be ſufficiently awakned to conſider the miſery thereof? Not only the learned know, but alſo the common people have no Proverb more common than this, that man's life is like a ſmoke or ſhadow: and becauſe they ſaw it to be a thing very uſeful to be known, they have ſet it out with many notable ſentences. But there is nothing we either more negligently conſider, or leſs remember. For we go about all things here as though we could ſecure to ourſelves an immortality on earth. If there be a corps carried to burial, or if we walk among graves, then, becauſe there is an image of death before our eyes, I grant we do wondrouſly well diſcourſe like philoſophers upon the vanity of this life. Altho' we do not even that continually, for many times all theſe things will nothing move us. But when it happeneth that our philoſophy laſteth a while, yet ſo ſoon as we turn our backs, it vaniſheth away, and leaveth no trace at all of remembrance behind it: finally, it paſſeth away as clapping of hands upon a ſtage at any pleaſant ſight. And we forgetting not only death, but alſo that we are ſubject to death, as though we had never heard any report thereof, fall into a careleſs certainty of an earthly immortality. If any man in the mean time tell us of the proverb, that man is a creature but of a day's continuance, we grant it indeed: but ſo heedleſly, that ſtill the thought of everlaſting continuance reſteth in our mind. Who therefore can deny, that it is very profitable for us all, not only to be admoniſhed in words, but by all the examples of experience, to be convinced of the miſerable eſtate of this earthly life? foraſmuch as even when we are convinced, we ſcarcely ceaſe to ſtand amazed with perverſe and fooliſh admiration of it, as tho' it contained the uttermoſt end of all good things. But if it be neceſſary that God inſtruct us, it is our duty likewiſe on our part to hearken to him when he calleth and awaketh us from our lethargy, that deſpiſing the world we may with all our hearts endeavour to the meditation of the life to come.

We muſt not ſo deſpiſe the life which we enjoy in this world that the eſtimation of thoſe good things which God doth

3. But let believers accuſtom themſelves to ſuch a deſpiſing of this preſent life, as may neither beget a hatred thereof, nor any unthankfulneſs toward God. For this life, however full it is of various miſeries, is yet worthily reckoned among the

the bleſſings of God. Therefore if we do not acknowlege it as a benefit of God, we are guilty of no ſmall unthankfulneſs towards him. But eſpecially it ought to be a teſtimony of God's good will to believers, foraſmuch as it is wholly directed to, and intended for the furtherance of their ſalvation. For before he openly deliver unto us the inheritance of eternal glory, his will is to ſhew himſelf a Father unto us by ſome ſmaller inſtances; and theſe are the benefits which he daily beſtoweth upon us. Since therefore this life ſerveth to make us underſtand the goodneſs of God, ſhall we diſdain it as though it had not a crumb of goodneſs in it? We muſt therefore put on this feeling and affection, to reckon it among the gifts of his goodneſs that are not to be refuſed. For though their wanted teſtimonies of ſcripture, of which there are many moſt plainly refering thereto, yet nature itſelf doth exhort us to give thanks to the Lord, for that he hath brought us into the light of it, that he granteth us the uſe of it, that he giveth us all neceſſary helps for the preſervation of it. And this is a much greater reaſon, if we conſider that we are after a certain manner in this world prepared for the glories of his heavenly kingdom. For the Lord hath ordained that they who at laſt ſhall be crowned in heaven, muſt fight certain battles in earth, that they ſhould not triumph, till they had overcome the hard adventures of the battle, and obtained the victory. Then another reaſon is, that we do by diverſe benefits begin therein to taſte the ſweetneſs of God's liberality, that our hope and deſire ſhould be whetted for the full revelation thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of God's clemency, that we live in this earthly life, for which as we are bound unto him, ſo we ought to be mindful and thankful for it: then we ſhall in its proper ſeaſon come to conſider the miſerable eſtate thereof, to this end that we may be delivered from too much greedineſs of it, whereunto as I have before ſaid, we are of ourſelves naturally inclined.

This life is not ſimply to be lothed but in compariſon of the life to come.

4. Now whatſoever is taken from the wrong deſire of this life, ought to be added to the deſire of a better life. I grant indeed that they thought truly, who thought it beſt not to be born, and the next, to die quickly. For what could they being deſtitute of the light of God and true religion, ſee therein but unhappineſs and miſery? And they acted not without reaſon, who mourned and wept at the births of their friends, and ſolemnly rejoiced at their burials, but they did it without profit, becauſe being without the right doctrine of faith, they did not ſee how that may turn to the advantage of the godly, which is of itſelf neither bleſſed nor to be deſired: and ſo they ended their judgment with deſpair. Let this therefore be a mark to believers in judging of this mortal life, that when they underſtand it to be of itſelf nothing but miſery, they may reſort wholly and more freely and readily to the eternal life to come. When we come to this compariſon, then this preſent life may not only be ſafely neglected, but alſo utterly deſpiſed and lothed in compariſon of the other. For if heaven be our country, what is this earth elſe but a place of baniſhment? If our departure out of this world be an entering into life, what is the world but a grave? To abide in it, what is it elſe but to be drowned in death? If to be delivered from the body is to be ſet at perfect liberty, what is the body elſe but a priſon? If to enjoy the preſence of God is the higheſt ſum of our felicity, is it not miſerable to want it? But till we are eſcaped out of the world, we wander abroad from the Lord. (2 Cor. v. 6.) Therefore if this earthly life be compared with the heavenly life, doubtleſs it ought to be deſpiſed and troden under foot. But it is never to be hated, but in reſpect that it holdeth us in ſubjection to ſin, and yet that hatred is not properly to be laid upon our life. But however it be, yet we muſt be ſo affected either with wearineſs or hatred of it, that deſiring the end thereof, we may at the ſame time be ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it, ſo that our wearineſs muſt be far from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place allotted us in battle, wherein the Lord hath placed us, which we muſt keep till he call us away. Paul indeed lamenteth (Rom. vii. 24.) his ſtate, that he is detained in the bonds of the body longer than he wiſhed, and ſighed with fervent deſire of his redemption: nevertheleſs to obey the commandment of the Lord, he profeſſed himſelf ready to both, becauſe he acknowlegeth himſelf, to be under this obligation to God, to glorify his name, either by death or life: and that it belongs to God to determine what is moſt expedient for his glory. Therefore if we muſt live and die to the Lord, (Phil. i. 23.) let us leave to his will the time of our life and death, but ſo that we be ſtill fervent in deſire of death, and

be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and deſpiſe this life in compariſon of the immortality to come, and wiſh to forſake it when it ſhall pleaſe the Lord to call us from it, becauſe of the bondage of ſin.

5. But it is monſtrous, that inſtead of this deſire of death, many who boaſt themſelves to be Chriſtians, are ſo afraid of it, that they tremble at every mentioning of it, as a thing betokening a misfortune and unhappineſs. Truly it is no wonder, if our natural ſenſe quake for fear when we hear of our diſſolution. But this is not tolerable, that there is not in a believer's mind ſuch a light of goodneſs, that ſhould with greater comfort overcome and ſuppreſs that fear, how great ſoever it be. For if we conſider that this unſtedfaſt, faulty, corruptible, frail, withering, and rotten tabernacle of our body, is diſſolved for this reaſon, that it may afterward be reſtored again to a ſtedfaſt, perfect, uncorruptible and heavenly glory: ſhall not faith compel us fervently to deſire that which nature feareth; if we conſider that by death we are called home out of baniſhment, to inhabit our country, as a heavenly country, ſhall we obtain no comfort thereby? but there is nothing in the creation which doth not wiſh always to preſerve its exiſtence? I grant this, and therefore I affirm, that we ought to look forward unto the immortality to come, where we may attain ſuch a permanent ſtate as appeareth no where in this earth. For Paul doth very well teach, (2 Cor. v. 1, 2, 3.) that believers ought to go chearfully to death: not becauſe they would be unclothed, but becauſe they deſire to be new clothed. Shall brute beaſts, (Rom. viii. 19.) yea and lifeleſs creatures, even ſtocks and ſtones, knowing their preſent vanity, earneſtly look for the reſurrection, that they may with the children of God be delivered from vanity, and ſhall we who are endued with the light of reaſon, and beyond reaſon, enlightned with the Spirit of God, when it agreeth with our notions of a future exiſtence, not lift up our minds beyond the periſhing things of this earth? But it belongeth neither to my preſent purpoſe, nor to this place, to ſpeak againſt this perverſeneſs. And in the beginning I have already profeſſed that I would not here take upon me the large handling of common places. I would adviſe ſuch timorous minds to read Cyprian's book of mortality, unleſs they were meet to be ſent to theſe philoſophers, that they may thereby be aſhamed when they ſee what contempt of death thoſe men ſhewed. But let us hold this as a certain truth, that no man hath improved well in Chriſt's ſchool, but he who doth joyfully look both for the day of his death and the laſt reſurrection. For Paul deſcribeth all the faithful by this mark, (Tit. ii. 13.) and it is alſo common in the ſcripture, to call us to this temper of mind as oft as it would expreſs a ground of perfect gladneſs. Rejoice (ſaith the Lord Luke xxi. 28.) and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh. Is it reaſonable I pray you, that the thing which he inclined to be of ſo great force to raiſe up joy and cheerfulneſs in us, ſhould breed nothing but ſorrow and diſcouragment? If it be ſo, why do we ſtill boaſt of him as of our ſchoolmaſter? Let us therefore get a ſounder mind, and howſoever the blind and ſenſeleſs deſires of the fleſh ſtrive againſt it, let us not ſcruple or heſitate to wiſh for the coming of the Lord, not only with wiſhing, but alſo with groaning and ſighing, as a thing moſt happy of all others. For he ſhall come as our redeemer, to draw us out of this boundleſs gulf of evils and miſeries, and lead us into that bleſſed inheritance of his life and glory.

We cannot but be troubled in mind till we turn our eyes from beholding the preſent face of things that are, unto the conſideration of that which is to come.

6. This is certainly true: that all the nations of the faithful, ſo long as they dwell on earth, muſt be as ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter, that they may be faſhioned like Chriſt their head. Therefore they will be in a moſt lamentable caſe, unleſs they have their minds raiſed up to heaven, and ſurmount all that is in the world, and look beyond the preſent face of things. On the contrary when believers have once raiſed their minds above all earthly things, altho' they ſee the wealth and honours of the wicked flouriſhing, though they ſee them enjoying quiet peace, tho' they ſee them proud in magnificence and ſumptuouſneſs of all things, though they ſee them ſwimming in plenty of all delights, nay tho' they be ſpoiled of their ſubſtance by their oppreſſion, tho' they ſuſtain reproachful dealings by their pride, tho' they be robbed by their covetouſneſs, tho' they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will eaſily ſupport themſelves in ſuch adverſities. For that day will be always before their eyes, when the Lord ſhall receive his faithful into the quiet of his kingdom, when he ſhall wipe away all tears from their eyes, (Iſai. xxv. 8. and Revel. vii. 17.) when he ſhall cloth them with the robe of glory and and gladneſs, when he ſhall feed them with the unſpeakable ſweetneſs of his dainties, when he ſhall advance them to the fellowſhip of his high eſtate: finally when he ſhall vouchſafe to communicate his happineſs with them. But theſe wicked ones who have flouriſhed on earth, he ſhall throw into extreme ſhame, he ſhall change their delights into torments, their laughing and mirth into weeping and gnaſhing of teeth, he ſhall diſquiet their peace with terrible torments of conſcience, he ſhall puniſh their daintineſs with unquenchable fire, and ſhall put their heads in ſubjection to thoſe godly men, whoſe patience they have abuſed. For it is a righteous thing with God, (as Paul teſtifieth 2 Theſ. i. 6.) to recompence tribulation to them that trouble the godly, when the Lord Jeſus ſhall be revealed from heaven. This truly is our only comfort, which if it be taken away, we muſt of neceſſity either deſpair, or flatteringly delight ourſelves with the vain comforts of the world to our own ruin and deſtruction. For even the prophet confeſſeth (Pſal. lxxiii. 2, 17.) that his feet ſtaggered, when he tarried too long upon conſidering the preſent proſperity of the wicked: and that he could not otherwiſe ſtand ſtedfaſt, but when he entered into the ſanctuary of God, and turned his eyes to the laſt end of the godly and the wicked. To conclude, in one word, then only the croſs of Chriſt triumpheth in the hearts of the faithful over the devil, fleſh, ſin, and the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the reſurrection.

CHAP. X.

How we ought to uſe this preſent life, and the helps thereof.

The uſe of things which ſerve for this preſent life is neither ſo ſtrict as ſome, nor ſo looſe as others have imagined.

BY ſuch introductions the ſcripture doth alſo inform us what is the right uſe of earthly bleſſings: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing a rule of life. For if we muſt live, we muſt alſo uſe the neceſſary helps to life: neither can we avoid even thoſe things that ſeem rather to ſerve for delight, than neceſſity. Therefore we muſt keep a mean that we may uſe them with a pure conſcience, either for neceſſity or for delight. That mean or medium the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that are his, a certain journey through a ſtrange country, by which they travel toward the kingdom of heaven. If we muſt but paſs through the earth, doubtleſs we ought ſo far to uſe the good things of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our journey. Therefore Paul (1 Cor. vii. 30, 31.) doth not unprofitably counſel us ſo to uſe this world, as though we uſed it not: and to buy poſſeſſions with ſuch a mind as they uſe to be ſold. But becauſe the road through this world is ſlippery, and ſo ſteep on both ſides, that it quickly maketh us fall, let us labour to faſten our feet there, where we may ſtand ſafely. For there have been ſome that otherwiſe were good and holy men, who when they ſaw that intemperance and riot continually raged with unbridled luſt, unleſs very cloſely reſtrained, and were deſirous to correct ſo great a miſchief, they could find no other way, but allowed man to uſe the benefits of the earth, only, ſo far as neceſſity required. This was indeed a pious advice, but they were too ſevere. For, (which is a very dangerous thing) they put ſtraiter bonds upon conſciences, than thoſe wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they explained neceſſity to be an abſtinence from all thoſe things that a man can live without. And ſo by their opinion, a man durſt ſcarcely take any more food than bread and water. And ſome are yet more ſevere: as it is read of Crates the Theban, who threw his goods into the ſea, becauſe if they were not deſtroyed, he thought that he ſhould be deſtroyed by them. Many at this day, while they ſeek a pretence whereby their intemperance in the uſe of outward things may be excuſed, and while they go about to prepare a way for the fleſh to riot in wantonneſs, do take that as a thing allowed, which I do not grant them, i. e. that this liberty is not to be reſtrained with any limitation of meaſure, but that it is to be left to every man's conſcience to uſe as much as he ſeeth to be lawful for him. Truly I confeſs that conſciences neither ought nor can in this point be bound by certain and preciſe forms of laws. But foraſmuch as the ſcripture teacheth general rules of lawful uſe, we muſt ſurely meaſure the uſe according to theſe rules.

2. Let this be a principle: that in the uſing of Gods gifts we depart not from his intention, when it is referred to that end,

God having made things not only for neceſſity but

unto

alſo for delight, there is no cauſe why men for whom they are made, may not uſe them as well to the one as the other.

unto which the author himſelf created and appointed them for us, for as much as he created them for our good, and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keep a righter way than he who ſhall diligently look unto this end. Now if we conſider to what end he hath created meats, we ſhall find that he meant to make proviſion not only for neceſſity, but alſo for delight and pleaſure. So alſo in apparel, beſide neceſſity he appointed another end, which is comelineſs and decency. In herbs, trees. and fruits, beſide diverſe profitable uſes, there is alſo a pleaſantneſs of ſight, and ſweetneſs of ſmell. For if this were not true, the prophet (Pſal. civ. 15.) would not reckon it among the benefits of God, that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that oil maketh his face to ſhine, the ſcripture would not every where, to ſet forth his liberality, inform us that he hath given all ſuch things to men. And the very natural qualities of things do ſufficiently ſhew to what end, and how far we may uſe them. Hath the Lord given flowers ſo many various beauties as they preſent to our eyes: hath he given them ſuch a ſweetneſs of ſavour as naturally floweth into our noſtrils: and ſhall it be unlawful either for our eyes to be pleaſed with thoſe beauties, or for our ſmelling to feel that ſweetneſs of ſavour? what? hath he not made ſuch a difference of colours, for this end, that ſome one may be more acceptable than another? what? hath he not given to gold, ſilver, ivory, and marble, a ſpecial grace and beauty wherefore they might be prized as more precious than other metals or ſtones? Finally, hath he not made many things agreeable unto us without any neceſſary uſe?

Our acknowledging with thankfulneſs that all good things are received at the hands of God, bridleth the exceſſive abuſe of meats, apparel, furniture, and all things needful unto life.

3. Therefore away with that unnatural philoſophy, which in granting us no uſe of the creatures, but what ariſeth purely from neceſſity, doth not only in a niggardly manner deprive us of the lawful uſe of God's liberality, but alſo cannot take place, unleſs it firſt have ſpoiled man of all his ſenſes and made him a block. But on the other ſide we muſt with no leſs diligence provide a curb for the luſts of the fleſh, which if they be not brought into order, overflow beyond all due meaſure: and it hath (as I ſaid) its defenders, who under pretence of an allowed liberty do grant unto it all things. This is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be acknowleged, that all things are created for this end, that we ſhould know the author of them, and give him thanks for his tender kindneſs toward us, Where is thy thankſgiving, if thou ſo gluttonouſly fill thy ſelf with dainty meats or with wine, that thou art either made ſtupid and ſenſeleſs, or unfit to perform the duties of religion and of thy calling? Where is thy acknowleging of God, if thy fleſh by a too great abundance, and boiling in filthy luſts, do with her uncleanneſs infect thy mind, that thou canſt not ſee any thing that is right or honeſt? In apparel, where is thy thankfulneſs to God, if with the coſtly gorgeouſneſs thereof we fall into an admiration of ourſelves, and diſdain others: or with the neatneſs and cleanlineſs of it, we prepare ourſelves to unchaſtity? Where is thy acknowleging of God, if our mind be fixed upon the gayneſs of our apparel? For many ſo give up all their ſenſes to bodily delights, that the mind lieth overwhelmed and as it were buried under them, many are ſo delighted with marble, gold and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, they are as it were turned into metals, and are like unto painted images. The ſmell of the kitchen, or ſweetneſs of ſavour ſo engroſſeth the ſenſes of ſome, that they can neither ſmell or reliſh any thing that is ſpiritual. And the ſame may alſo be obſerved in the reſt of the ſenſes. Therefore it is certain that hereby the licentiouſneſs of abuſing God's mercies is ſomewhat reſtrained, and that rule of Paul confirmed, (Rom xiii. 14.) that we make no proviſion for the fleſh, to fulfil the luſts thereof, to which if we grant too much, they boil out above meaſure and temper.

The light eſtimation of this preſent life, and the earneſt meditation of immortality cutteth off the too great care which men have of outward things.

4 But there is no ſurer nor readier way than that which is laid down to us by that contempt of this preſent life, and the meditation of heavenly immortality. For thereupon followeth two rules: the one is that they who uſe this world, ſhould be ſo minded as though they uſed it not, they that marry wives, as tho' they did not marry: they that buy, as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. (1 Cor. vii. 31.) The other, that they ſhould learn, as well to bear poverty, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. He who commandeth thee to uſe this world as though thou didſt not uſe it, doth cut off not only the intemperance of gluttony in meat and drink, and too much daintineſs, ſumptuouſneſs, pride, haughtineſs, and nicety in diet, building, and apparel, but alſo all cares and affections that may either withdraw, or hinder thee from thinking of the heavenly life, or from ſtudy to improve thy mind. But this was long ago truly ſaid by Cato: that there is great carefulneſs in trimming our body, and great careleſneſs of virtue. And it is an old proverb, that they who are too much buſied in the care of their body are commonly careleſs of their ſoul. Therefore, although the liberty of believers in outward things is not to be reſtrained to a certain form, yet truly it muſt be ſubject to this law, to indulge their own affections very little, but on the contrary ſtill to be calling upon themſelves, with a conſtant reſolution of mind, to cut off all ſhew of ſuperfluous plenty, and much more to reſtrain all riotous exceſs, and to take diligent heed, that they do not make to themſelves hinderances of thoſe helps which God hath beſtowed on them.

A mind contented to want, and perſuaded that it ſtandeth accountable to God for things received, will eaſily moderate itſelf in the uſe of earthly things.

5. The other rule muſt be, that they who have but a ſmall and ſlender ſhare of riches, may learn to want them patiently, that they be not anxiouſly ſtirred up to an immoderate deſire of them; and they who preſerve this patience have not a little profited in the Lord's ſchool: and he who hath not at leaſt ſomewhat improved in this leſſon, can ſcarcely have any thing whereby to prove himſelf a ſcholar of Chriſt. For beſide this, that moſt part of the other vices accompany the deſire of earthly things, he who beareth poverty with impatience, doth for the moſt part betray the contrary diſeaſe in a great meaſure. I mean hereby, that he who will be aſhamed of a poor coat, will be proud of a coſtly one: he that will not be content with a ſcanty ſupper, will be diſquieted with the deſire of a daintier, and would alſo intemperately abuſe thoſe dainties if he had them: he that hardly and unquietly beareth a low and baſe eſtate, will not abſtain from pride, if he attain any honour. Therefore let all who have an unfeigned zeal of godlineſs, endeavour to learn by the apoſtle's example, (Phil. iv. 12.) to be full, and to be hungry, to have ſtore and to ſuffer want. The ſcripture hath alſo a third rule, whereby it moderateth the uſe of earthly things, of which we have ſpoken ſomewhat already, when we treated of the precepts of charity. For the ſcripture declareth that all earthly things are given us by the bounty of God, and appointed for our convenience, that they are as things delivered us to keep, whereof we muſt one day give an account. We muſt therefore ſo diſpoſe of them, as if this ſaying were continually ſounding in our ears, give an account of thy ſtewardſhip. At the ſame time let this alſo come into our mind, who it is that aſketh ſuch an account, even he who hath ſo much commended abſtinence, ſobriety, honeſt ſparing, and modeſty; and abhorreth riotous ſumptuouſneſs, pride, oſtentation, and vanity, who alloweth no other diſpoſing of our goods, but ſuch as is joined with charity: who hath already with his own mouth condemned all thoſe delightful things that either withdraw a man's mind from chaſtity and purity, or cloud his reaſon with darkneſs.

The conſideration of that whereunto God hath called us, is the laſt rule and the beſt direction for the guidance of all actions to which we are incident in this life.

6. Laſt of all, this is to be obſerved, that the Lord commandeth every one of us in all the actions of his life, to have an eye to his calling. For he knoweth with how great unquietneſs man's reaſon exalteth itſelf, with how much lightneſs it is carried hither and thither, how greedy his ambition is to hold divers things at once. Therefore that all things might not be confounded by our folly and raſhneſs, he hath appointed to every man his duty in the ſeveral ſtations of life. And that no man may run raſhly beyond his bounds, he hath named all ſuch kinds of life, vocations. Therefore every man's ſeveral kind of life, is unto him as it were his ſtation appointed him by God, that they ſhould not all their life uncertainly wander about. And this diviſion is ſo neceſſary, that all our actions are meaſured thereby in his ſight, and oftentimes contrary to the judgment of man's reaſon and philoſophy. There is no action accounted more noble, even among the philoſophers, than for a man to deliver his country from tyranny: yet by the voice of God's judgment the private man is openly condemned that layeth hands upon a tyrant. But I will not tarry upon the rehearſing of examples. It is ſufficient if we know that the calling of the Lord is in every thing the beginning and foundation of well-doing: to which he who doth not ſubmit himſelf, ſhall never obſerve a right way in his actions. He may peradventure venture ſometimes do ſomething ſeemingly worthy of praiſe: but whatſoever that appear in the ſight of men, it will be rejected before the throne of God: moreover there will not be an harmonious agreement in the parts of his life. Therefore our life will then be beſt framed, when it ſhall be directed to this mark: for then, no man hurried away by his own raſhneſs will attempt more than his calling will allow, becauſe he knoweth that it is not lawful to paſs beyond his bounds. He who is a man of a low eſtate, will contentedly live a private life, leſt he ſhould forſake the rank wherein God hath placed him. Again this will be no ſmall relief to our cares, labours, griefs and other burdens, when a man knoweth that in all theſe things, God is his guide. The more chearfully will the magiſtrate execute his office; the houſholder will bind himſelf to his duty: every man in his kind of life will bear and paſs through the inconveniencies, cares, tedioufneſs, and anguiſhes thereof: when they are perſuaded that every man's burden is laid upon him by God. Hereupon alſo will ariſe ſingular comfort, foraſmuch as there ſhall be no work ſo filthy and vile, (if it be ſuch a one as thou obeyeſt thy calling in it) but it ſhineth and is moſt precious in the ſight of God.

CHAP. XI.

The matter of juſtification the chiefeſt ſtay whereby religion is upheld.

I Think I have already ſufficiently ſhewed, that there remaineth for men being condemned by the law only one help to recover ſalvation: again, what faith is, and what benefits of God it beſtoweth upon man, and what fruits it bringeth forth in him. The ſum of all which was this, that Chriſt is given us by the goodneſs of God, and we conceive and poſſeſs him by faith, by partaking of whom we receive principally two graces: the firſt is, that being reconciled to God by his innocence, we may now inſtead of a judge have a merciful father in heaven: the ſecond, that being ſanctified by his Spirit, we muſt devote ourſelves to innocence, and purity of life. As for regeneration, which is the ſecond grace, we have already ſpoken of it as much as ſeemed to be ſufficient. The manner of our juſtification was therefore leſs touched, becauſe it was neceſſary for our purpoſe, firſt to underſtand how faith, by which alone we receive freely imputed righteouſneſs by themercy ofGod is inſeparable from good works; and alſo what are the good works of the ſaints, whereupon part of this queſtion treateth. Therefore they are firſt to be throughly diſcuſſed, and ſo handled that we muſt always remember that this is the chief ſtay for ſupporting our religion, that we may be the more careful and heedful about it. For unleſs thou firſt know, in what ſtate thou art with God, and what his judgment is of thee: as thou haſt no ground to ſtabliſh thy ſalvation, ſo haſt thou alſo none to awaken in thee reverent fear toward God. But the neceſſity of this knowlege ſhall better appear by knowlege itſelf.

What it is to be juſtified before God, what by works, what by faith, and that juſtification conſiſteth of two parts, forgiveneſs of ſins and imputation of Chriſt's righteouſneſs,

2. But that we may not ſtumble at the entry, (which we would do if we ſhould begin a diſputation concerning a thing unknown) let us firſt declare what is meant by theſe ſayings, man to be juſtified before God, to be juſtified by faith or by works. He is ſaid to be juſtified before God, who is pronounced by the judgment of God both juſt and accepted for his own righteouſneſs ſake. For as wickedneſs is abominable before God, ſo a ſinner cannot find favour in his eyes, in reſpect that he is a ſinner, or ſo long as he is accounted ſuch a one. Therefore whereſoever ſin is, there alſo appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is juſtified, who is not accounted a ſinner, but a juſt man, and by reaſon thereof he ſtandeth faſt before the judgment ſeat of God when all ſinners fall. As if an innocent perſon be brought to be arraigned before the ſeat of a righteous judge, when judgment is given according to his innocence, he is ſaid to be juſtified before the judge: ſo he is juſtified before God, who being exempt out of the number of ſinners, hath God a witneſs and an affirmer of his righteouſneſs. Therefore after the ſame manner a man is ſaid to be juſtified by works, in whoſe life there is found ſuch purity and holineſs, as may deſerve the teſtimony of righteouſneſs before the throne of God: or he that with the uprightneſs of his works is able to anſwer and ſatisfy God's judgment. On the contrary he is ſaid to be juſtified by faith, who being being excluded from the righteouſneſs of works, doth by faith take hold of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the ſight of God, not as a ſinner, but as righteous. So we ſimply expound juſtification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiveth us into favour and accepteth us for righteous. And we ſay that the ſame conſiſteth in the forgiveneſs of ſins, and an imputation of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt.

3. For confirmation hereof there are many and evident teſtimonies of ſcripture. Firſt it cannot be denied, that this is the proper and common ſignification of the word. But becauſe it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it will be enough to put the readers in mind of them, for they may of themſelves eaſily obſerve them. But I will bring forth ſome, where this juſtification that we ſpeak of is expreſly treated of by name. Firſt, where Luke ſaith (Luke vii. 29.) that the people when they had heard Chriſt did juſtify God. And where Chriſt pronounceth (Luke vii. 35.) that wiſdom is juſtified of her children: he doth not mean there, that they do give righteouſneſs, for that always remaineth perfect with God, although all the world ſhould endeavour to take it away from him: nor in this place alſo to make the doctrine of ſalvation righteous, which is always ſo of itſelf. But both theſe ſpeeches are as much in effect, as to aſcribe to God and his doctrine the praiſe which they deſerve. Again when Chriſt reproaches the Phariſees, (Luk. xvi. 15.) that they juſtified themſelves, he doth not mean that they obtained righteouſneſs by well doing, but did vain-gloriouſly ſeek for the fame of righteouſneſs, whereof indeed they were void. They who are ſkilful in the Hebrew tongue do better underſtand the ſenſe of this phraſe: in which language they are not only called evil doers, that are guilty in their conſcience of any wicked action, but alſo they that come in danger of judgment or condemnation, For when Berſheba ſaith (1 Kings i. 21.) that ſhe and Solomon ſhall be counted offenders, ſhe doth not therein acknowlege any offence, but complaineth that ſhe and her ſon ſhall be ſo affronted, as to be numbered among the reprobate and condemned. But by the proceſs of the text it eaſily appeareth, that the ſame word in Latin alſo, cannot otherwiſe be taken but by way of relation, and not to ſignify any quality. But as concerning the matter that we are now in hand with, where Paul ſaith, (Gal. iii. 8.) that the ſcripture did foreſee, that God would juſtify the Gentiles by faith, what can any man underſtand thereby, but that God doth impute righteouſneſs by faith? Again, when he ſaith (Rom. iii. 26.) that God juſtifieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Chriſt, what other meaning can be thereof, but by the benefit of faith to deliver them from the damnation which their wickedneſs deſerved? And he ſpeaketh more plainly in the concluſion, when he cried out thus, (Rom. viii. 33, 34.) Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth: It is Chriſt that died, yea rather that is riſen again, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us. It is as much in effect as if he ſhould ſay, Who ſhall accuſe them whom God acquitteth? Who ſhall condemn them whoſe patron Chriſt is, and defendeth them? To juſtify therefore is nothing elſe, but to acquit him who was accuſed, from guilt, allowing his innocence. Since therefore God doth juſtifiy us by the interceſſion of Chriſt, he doth acquit us, not by allowing of our own innocence, but by imputation of righteouſneſs, that we may be counted for righteous in Chriſt, who are not righteous in ourſelves. So in the xiii. chapter of the Acts, 38, and 39. ver. in Paul's ſermon: by him is forgiveneſs of ſins preached unto you, and by him all that believe are juſtified from all things, from which ye could not be juſtified by the law of Moſes. You ſee that after forgiveneſs of ſins, juſtification is added in place of an expoſition. You ſee plainly that it is taken for abſolution, you ſee that it is taken away from the works of the law, you ſee that it is the mere beneficial gift of Chriſt, you ſee that it is received by faith. Finally, you ſee that there is a ſatisfaction ſpoken of, where he ſaith that we are juſtified from our ſins by Chriſt. So when it is ſaid (Luke xvii. 14.) that the Publican came juſtified out of the Temple, we cannot ſay that he obtained righteouſneſs by any merit in his works. This therefore is ſaid, that after pardon of his ſins was obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approving of his works, but by God's free abſolution. Wherefore Ambroſe ſaith very well, (On Pſal. cxviii. Homil. 10.) when he calleth the confeſſion of ſins a lawful juſtification.

Juſtification expreſt in ſcripture by acceptation into favour, defined by pardon in

4. But to leave ſtriving about the word: if we look upon the thing itſelf, as it is deſcribed unto us, there will remain no more doubt. For truly Paul doth expreſs juſtification by the name of accepta-

tion, when he ſaith (Eph. i. 5.) Having predeſtinated us unto the adoption of children by Jeſus Chriſt, to himſelf according to the good pleaſure of his will, to the praiſe of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved. For the ſame is meant by it, that is ſaid in another place, (Rom. iii. 24.) that God doth freely juſtify. In the iv. chap. to the Romans, he firſt calleth it an imputation of righteouſneſs, and ſticketh not to ſay that it conſiſteth in forgiveneſs of ſins. That man (ſaid he Rom. iv. 6. 7.) is called by David a bleſſed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteouſneſs without works, as it is written: Bleſſed are they whoſe iniquities are forgiven, &c. Truly he there doth treat not of one part of juſtification, but of all juſtification wholly. And he teſtifieth that D vid in that place makes a definition of juſtification, when he pronounceth that they are bleſſed to whom is imputed the free forgiveneſs of ſins. Whereby it appeareth that this righteouſneſs whereof he ſpeaketh, is by this compariſon ſimply oppoſed as contrary to guilt. But for this purpoſe, that is the beſt place, (2 Cor. v. 18.) where he teacheth that this is the ſum of the meſſage of the goſpel, that we ſhould be reconciled to God: becauſe it is his will to receive us into favour through Chriſt, in not imputing our ſins unto us. Let the readers diligently weigh the whole proceſs of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of expoſition, that Chriſt who was without ſin, was made ſin for us, to expreſs the manner of our reconciliation, doubtleſs he meaneth nothing elſe by the word reconciling but juſtifying. And that which he ſaith in another place, (Rom. v. 19.) that we are made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt, could not agree together, unleſs we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without ourſelves.

Oſianders opinion concerning juſtification.

5. But where as Oſiander hath brought in, I know not what monſter of eſſential righteouſneſs, whereby, although his will was not to deſtroy free righteouſneſs, yet he hath wrapped it within ſuch a miſt, as darkeneth pious minds, and depriveth them of the earneſt feeling of the grace of Chriſt: therefore ere I proceed to other things, it is worth my labour to confute this fooliſh error. Firſt this ſpeculation floweth from mere and greedy curioſity. He doth indeed heap together many teſtimonies of ſcripture, to prove that Chriſt is one with us, and we one with him, which needeth no proof: but becauſe he keepeth not his bond of unity, he layeth a ſnare for himſelf. But we who hold that we are made all one with Chriſt by the power of his ſpirit, may eaſily undo all his knots. He had conceived a certain thing very near to the opinion of Manicheus, to deſire to convey the ſubſtance of God into men. Hereupon ariſeth another invention of his, that Adam was faſhioned after the image of God, becauſe even before the fall, Chriſt was ordained the pattern of the nature of man. But becauſe I would be ſhort, I will keep cloſe to the matter that I have preſently in hand. He ſaith that we are one with Chriſt. That we grant. But we deny that the ſubſtance of Chriſt is mingled with ours. Moreover we ſay that this principle, that Chriſt is righteouſneſs to us, becauſe he is an eternal God, the fountain of righteouſneſs and the very ſelf righteouſneſs of God, is wrongfully dr wn in to defend his falſhoods. The readers will pardon me, if I do now but touch theſe things, which the order of teaching requireth to be deferred unto another place. But although he excuſe himſelf, by ſaying he meaneth nothing elſe by the name of eſſential righteouſneſs, but to reſiſt this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Chriſt's ſake: yet he plainly expreſſeth that he is not contented with the righteouſneſs which is purchaſed for us by the obedience and ſacrifice of Chriſt, but feigneth that we are ſubſtantially righteous in God, as well by ſubſtance as by quality poured into us. For this is the reaſon why he ſo earneſtly affirmeth, that not only Chriſt, but alſo the Father and the holy Ghoſt do dwell in us. Which although I grant to be true, yet I ſay that he wrongfully wreſteth it. For he ſhould have conſidered the manner of dwelling; that is, that the Father and the holy Ghoſt are in Chriſt, and as the fulneſs of the Godhead dwelleth in him, ſo do we poſſeſs a whole God in him. Therefore all that he ſaith ſeparately of the Father and the holy Ghoſt, tendeth to no other end but to draw the ſimple from Chriſt. And then he thruſteth in a mixture of ſubſtances, whereby God pouring himſelf into us, doth make us as it were a part of himſelf. For he reckoneth it almoſt a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghoſt, that we grow into one with Chriſt, and that he is our head, and we his members, unleſs his very ſubſtance be mingled with ours. But in ſpeaking of the Father and the holy Ghoſt (as I have ſaid) he doth more openly betray what he thinketh, even this, that we are juſtified not by the grace of the Mediator alone, and that righteouſneſs ouſneſs is not ſimply or perfectly offered us in his perſon, but that we are made partakers of the righteouſneſs of God, when God is eſſentially made one with us.

Oſiander's firſt error, that juſtifying righteouſneſs is not a free imputation of holineſs, but an holineſs, which the ſubſtance of God remaining in us doth work.

6. If he ſaid no more, but that Chriſt in juſtifying us, is by an eſſential conjunction made ours: and that not only he is our head, in that he is man, but alſo that the ſubſtance of the divine nature is poured into us: he ſhould with leſs hurt feed himſelf daintily, and peradventure ſo great a contention ſhould not have been raiſed about this fooliſh error. But ſince this beginning is like the cuttle fiſh who by caſting out of black and thick blood hideth her many tails, we muſt needs earneſtly reſiſt, unleſs we will wittingly and willingly ſuffer that righteouſneſs to be taken from us, which only giveth us confidence to glory of our ſalvation. For in all this diſcourſe, the name of righteouſneſs, and this word juſtifying, extend to two parts: that to be juſtified, is not only to be reconciled to God by a free pardon, but alſo to be made righteous; that righteouſneſs is not a free imputation, but a holineſs and uprightneſs, which the ſubſtance of God remaining in us doth breathe into us. Then he ſtrenuouſly denieth, that Chriſt is our righteouſneſs, in reſpect that being a prieſt he did by a ſatisfactory purging away of our ſins appeaſe his Father's wrath againſt us, but in reſpect that he is eternal God and life. To prove the firſt point, that God doth juſtify not only by forgiving, but alſo by regenerating, he aſketh, whether doth God leave them whom he juſtifieth, ſuch as they were by nature, changing nothing of their vices. The anſwer hereto is very eaſy: that as Chriſt cannot be torn in parts, ſo theſe two things which we receive together and conjunctly in him, that is to ſay righteouſneſs and ſanctification, are inſeparable. Therefore whom ſoever God receiveth into favour, he doth alſo therewith give them the ſpirit of adoption, by the power whereof he faſhioneth them anew after his image. But if the brightneſs of the ſun cannot be ſeparated from the heat thereof, ſhall we therefore ſay that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heat? There is nothing more fit for this purpoſe, than this ſimilitude, the ſun with his heat giveth life and fruitfulneſs to the earth, with his beams he giveth light and brightneſs. Here is a mutual and inſeparable conjunction: yet reaſon forbiddeth us to convey or attribute to the one that which is peculiar to the other. The like abſurdity is in this confuſion of two ſorts of graces, which Oſiander truſteth in. For becauſe God doth indeed renew them to the obſerving of righteouſneſs, whom he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Oſiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they are all one, and the ſelf ſame thing. But tho' the ſcripture joineth them both together, yet doth it mention them ſeparately, and diſtinctly, that the manifold grace of God may the better appear unto us. For that ſaying of Paul is not ſuperfluous, (1 Cor. i. 30.) that Chriſt is made unto us righteouſneſs and ſanctification. And whenſoever he reaſoneth to prove that we are called to holineſs and purity, by the ſalvation purchaſed for us by the fatherly love of God, and by the grace of Chriſt, he plainly declareth that it is one thing to be juſtified, and another to be made new creatures. But when Oſiander cometh to the ſcripture, he corrupteth as many places as he allegeth. Where Paul ſaith that faith is accounted for righteouſneſs to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that juſtifieth the ungodly, (Rom. iv. 5.) he expoundeth it to make righteous. With the ſame boldneſs, he depraveth all the fourth chapter to the Romans, and ſticketh not with a like falſe gloſs to corrupt that place which I even now cited, who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? it is God that juſtifieth: where it is plain that he ſpeaketh ſimply of guiltineſs and acquitting, and the meaning of the apoſtle dependeth upon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Oſiander is found a very fooliſh diſputant as well in making uſe of ſuch a reaſon, as in citing teſtimonies of ſcripture. Neither doth he ſpeak more juſtly of the name of righteouſneſs, in ſaying, that faith was accounted to Abraham for righteouſneſs, after that embracing Chriſt (which is the righteouſneſs of God, and God himſelf) he excelled in many rare graces, whereby it appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteouſneſs that is there mentioned, belongeth not to the whole courſe of his calling: but rather the holy Ghoſt teſtifieth, that although the graces of Abraham were ſingularly excellent, and that by a long perſeverance in the exerciſe of them, he had at length increaſed them: yet he did no other way pleaſe God, but by this, that he received by faith the grace offered in the promiſe. Whereupon it followeth, that in juſtification there is no place for works, as Paul very juſtly affirmeth.

Juſtification granted by Oſiander to be thro' believing, if that belief be taken for Chriſt which is believed.

7. As for what Oſiander objecteth, that the power of juſtifying is not in faith of itſelf, but in reſpect that it receiveth Chriſt, I willingly grant it. For if faith did juſtify of itſelf, or by inward force, as they call it, and as it is always weak and imperfect, it could not effect our juſtification but in part, and ſo ſhould that juſtification be imperfect, which could procure us but part of our ſalvation. As for us, we imagine no ſuch thing, but in properly ſpeaking, we ſay that God only juſtifieth: and then we attribute the ſame to Chriſt, becauſe he was given unto us for righteouſneſs. And faith we compare as it were to a veſſel; for except we come empty, and with our whole ſoul crave the grace of Chriſt, we cannot be able to receive Chriſt. Whereupon we conclude that we do not take from Chriſt the power of juſtifying, when we teach that he is firſt received by faith, before his righteouſneſs be received. But yet I do not admit the falſe compariſons of this ſophiſter, when he ſaith that faith is Chriſt: as if an earthen pot were a treaſure, becauſe gold is hidden in it. For the reaſon is not unlike, for faith although it be by itſelf of no worth or value, may juſtify us in bringing us to Chriſt, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I ſay that faith, which is only the inſtrument to receive righteouſneſs, is very improperly conjoined with Chriſt who is the material cauſe, and both the author and miniſter of ſo great a benefit. Now this doubt is alſo ſolved. How this word faith ought to be underſtood when we treat of juſtification.

Chriſt is our righteouſneſs in reſpect only of his Godhead, according to Oſianders doctrine.

8. In the receiving of Chriſt he goeth further: for he ſaith, that the inward word is received by the miniſtration of the outward word, thereby to draw us from the prieſthood of Chriſt and the perſon of the Mediator to his outward Godhead. As for us, we divide not Chriſt, but we ſay that he is the ſame eternal word of God, who reconciling us to God in his fleſh, gave us righteouſneſs: and we confeſs that otherwiſe he could not have fulfilled the office of Mediator, and purchaſed us righteouſneſs, unleſs he had been eternal God. But this is Oſiander's doctrine, whereas Chriſt is both God and man, he ſays that he was made righteouſneſs to us, in reſpect of the nature of his Godhead, and not of his manhood. But if this properly belong only to the Godhead, then it will not be peculiar to Chriſt, but common with the Father and the holy Ghoſt, for as much as there is not one righteouſneſs of the one, and another of the other. Moreover, that which was naturally from eternity, cannot be properly ſaid to be made to us. But although we grant this, that God was made righteouſneſs for us: how ſhall it agree that that which is ſet between, is made of God? Truly that properly belongeth to the perſon of the Mediator: which though he contain in himſelf the nature of the Godhead, yet here he is ſpecially ſignified by his proper title, by which he is ſeparately and diſtinctly to be diſcerned from the Father and the holy Ghoſt. But he fooliſhly triumpheth in that one word of Jeremiah, xxiii. 6. where he promiſeth that the Lord Jehovah ſhall be our righteouſneſs, but out of that he can infer nothing, but that Chriſt who is righteouſneſs, is God openly ſhewed in the fleſh. In another place we have it told us, out of Paul's ſermon, (Acts xx. 18.) That God purchaſed to himſelf the church with his blood, if any man conclude thereupon, that the blood wherewith ſins were purged was divine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can endure ſo groſs an error? But Oſiander thinketh that with this childiſh and ſophiſtical argument he hath gained his point, he boaſteth, he leapeth for joy, and ſtuffeth many leaves full with his big words: when yet there is a plain and ready ſolution for it, by ſaying, that the word Jehovah when he is made the iſſue of David ſhall be the righteouſneſs of the godly: but Iſaiah teacheth (Iſa. liii. 11.) in what ſenſe we are to underſtand this ſaying: By his knowlege ſhall my righteous ſervant juſtify many. Let us obſerve that the Father ſays, he giveth to the Son the office of juſtifying: he addeth a cauſe, for that he is juſt, and ſetteth the manner or mean as they call it in the doctrine whereby Chriſt is known. For it is a more proper expoſition to take this word Daah, knowlege, paſſively. Hereupon I conclude firſt that Chriſt was made righteouſneſs when he did put on the form of a ſervant: ſecondly, that he did juſtify us in that he ſhewed himſelf obedient to his Father: and that therefore he doth not this for us according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of diſpenſation committed unto him. For although God alone is the fountain of righteouſneſs, and we are made righteous by no other means but by partaking of him: yet becauſe we are by an unhappy diſagreement eſtranged from his righteouſneſs, and therefore as we cannot ſave ourſelves by any righteouſneſs of our own, we muſt of neceſſity have recourſe to this remedy, even that Chriſt may juſtify us by the power of his death and reſurrection.

How Chriſt doth juſtify as man, and how as God.

9. If he object that this is a work of ſuch excellency, that it is above the nature of man, and therefore can only be aſcribed to the nature of God, the firſt I grant: but in the ſecond I ſay he is fooliſhly deceived. For although Chriſt could neither cleanſe our ſouls with his blood, nor appeaſe his Father with his ſacrifice, nor acquit us from guilt, nor execute the office of a prieſt, unleſs he had been true God, becauſe the ſtrength of the fleſh had been too weak for ſo great a burden: yet it is certain that he performed all theſe things according to his nature of manhood. For if it be demanded how we are juſtified, Paul anſwereth, (Rom. v. 19.) by the obedience of Chriſt. But did he any otherwiſe obey than by taking upon him the ſhape of a ſervant? whereupon we conclude that righteouſneſs was given us in his fleſh. Likewiſe in the other words (which I wonder that Oſiander is not aſhamed to allege ſo often) he placeth the fountain of righteouſneſs no where elſe but in the fleſh of Chriſt. Him that knew no ſin he made ſin for us, that we might be the righteouſneſs of God in him. Oſiander with full mouth extolleth the righteouſneſs of God, and triumpheth as though he had proved that it is his fancied ghoſt of eſſential righteouſneſs: when the words ſound far otherwiſe, that we are righteous by the cleanſing made by Chriſt. Very young diſciples in Chriſt's ſchool cannot be ignorant that the righteouſneſs of God is taken for the righteouſneſs that God alloweth us, as in John x. 34. where the glory of God is compared with the glory of men. I know that is ſometimes called the righteouſneſs of God, whereof God is the author, and which God giveth us: but though I ſhould ſay nothing, readers who have their judgment ſound will perceive that nothing elſe is meant in this place, but that we ſtand upright before the judgment ſeat of God, being upheld by the cleanſing ſacrifice of Chriſt's death. And there is not ſo great an importance in the word itſelf, provided that Oſiander would agree with us in this point, that we are juſtified in Chriſt, in this reſpect that he was made a propitiatory ſacrifice for us, which cannot agree with his nature of Godhead. After which ſort, when Chriſt meaneth to ſeal the righteouſneſs and ſalvation that he hath brought us, he ſetteth before us an aſſured pledge thereof in his fleſh. He doth indeed call himſelf the lively bread, but expreſſing the manner here, he addeth that his fleſh is verily meat, and his blood is verily drink. Which manner of teaching is ſeen in the ſacraments, which although they direct our faith to whole Chriſt, and not to half Chriſt, yet they do therewithal teach that the matter of righteouſneſs and ſalvation remaineth in his fleſh: not in as much as he is only man, he either juſtifieth or quickeneth of himſelf, but becauſe it pleaſed God to ſhew openly in the mediator that which was hidden and incomprehenſible in himſelf. Whereupon I am wont to ſay, that Chriſt is as it were a fountain ſet open for us, out of which we may draw that which otherwiſe ſhould without any benefit have lain hid in that cloſe and deep ſpring which riſeth up unto us in the perſon of the Mediator. In this manner and in this ſenſe, I do not deny that Chriſt as he is God and man doth juſtify us, and that this is the work of the Father and the holy Ghoſt as well as his. Finally, that the righteouſneſs whereof Chriſt maketh us partakers, is the eternal righteouſneſs of the eternal God, provided he yield to the ſure and plain reaſons which I have alleged,

Although we are not juſtified unleſs Chriſt dwell in our hearts, yet it is not the eſſential poſſeſſing of Chriſt as God which juſtifieth us.

10. Now that he may not with his ſophiſtical arguments deceive the ignorant, I grant that we want this incomparable benefit, till Chriſt be made ours. Therefore we place that conjunction of the head and the members, the dwelling of Chriſt in our hearts, and that myſtical union, in the higheſt degree: that Chriſt being made ours, may make us partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not behold him a far off out of ourſelves, that righteouſneſs may be imputed unto us, but becauſe we have put on him, and are graffed into his body: finally becauſe he hath vouchſafed to make us one with him, therefore we glory that we have a fellowſhip of righteouſneſs with him. Hence Oſiander's abuſe and ſophiſtical arguments is confuted, where he ſaith that we count faith righteouſneſs, as though we robbed Chriſt of his right, when we ſay that we come by faith empty to him, to give room to his grace, that he only may fill us. But Oſiander refuſing this ſpiritual union and conjunction, ſtrengthens himſelf by joining with true chriſtians, and odiouſly calleth them all Zwingalins, who who do not ſubſcribe to his whimſical error, concerning eſſential righteouſneſs: becauſe they do not think that Chriſt is ſubſtantially eaten in the Lord's ſupper. As for me, I count it a great glory to be reproached by ſo proud a man, and one ſo much attached to his own errors. Yet he hath not attacked me only, but alſo other writers well known to the world, whom he ought to have modeſtly reverenced. That doth not move me, which meddleth not with my own private cauſe: and I handle this cauſe ſo much the more ſincerely as I am free from all corrupt affection. Whereas therefore he ſo importunately requireth eſſential righteouſneſs, and the eſſential dwelling of Chriſt in us, it tendeth to this end, firſt that God ſhould with a groſs mixture pour himſelf into us, as he feigneth a fleſhly eating of Chriſt in the Lord's ſupper: ſecondly that God ſhould breathe his righteouſneſs into us, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for according to his opinion, this righteouſneſs is as well God himſelf, as the goodneſs, holineſs, or purity of God. I will not ſpend much labour in wiping away the teſtimonies he brings, which he wrongfully wreſteth from the heavenly life unto this preſent ſtate. Through Chriſt (ſaith Peter 2 Pet. i. 4.) are given unto us exceeding great and precious promiſes, that by theſe you might be made partakers of the divine nature: as if we were now ſuch perſons as the goſpel promiſeth we ſhall be, at the laſt coming of Chriſt: yea John tells us, (1 John iii. 2.) that we ſhall then ſee God as he is, becauſe we ſhall be like unto him. Only I thought good to ſhew my readers, that I purpoſely paſs over theſe trifles: not becauſe it is hard to confute them, but that I incline not to be tedious in an unneceſſary work.

11. But in the ſecond point lurketh more poiſon, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I think I have already ſufficiently proved, that although this doctrine were not ſo hurtful, yet becauſe it is cold and fruitleſs, and of itſelf ſo vain that it dwindleth away, it ought deſervedly to be diſagreeable to ſound and godly readers. But this is an intolerable wickedneſs, under pretence of a double righteouſneſs, to weaken the certain aſſurance of ſalvation, and to carry us above the clouds, that we ſhould not embrace by faith the grace of propitiation, and call upon God with quiet minds. Oſiander deſpiſeth them who teach that this word juſtifying is a law term, becauſe we muſt be righteous indeed. And he abhorreth nothing more than to ſay, that we are juſtified by free imputation. But, if God do not juſtify us by acquitting and pardoning, what meaneth that ſaying of Paul, (2 Cor. v. 19.) God was in Chriſt reconciling the world to himſelf, not imputing to men their ſins? for, him that had done no ſin, he made ſin for us, that we might be the righteouſneſs of God in him. Firſt I gain thus much, that they are judged righteous that are reconciled to God. The manner how is declared, for God juſtifieth by forgiving, and in another place juſtification is ſet as contrary to accuſation, which comparing of them as contraries, doth clearly ſhew that it is a phraſe borrowed from the uſe of the law. And there is no man who tho' he have but very little ſkill in the Hebrew tongue, if he have a ſober head, is ignorant that this phraſe came from thence, whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Now where Paul ſaith (Rom. iv. 7. and Pſal. xxxii. 1.) that David deſcribed the righteouſneſs without works, in theſe words, bleſſed are thoſe whoſe ſins are forgiven: let Oſiander anſwer me whether this be a full definition or but half a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the prophet for a witneſs, as though he taught that forgiveneſs of ſins is but a part of righteouſneſs, or that being connected with any other thing it contributeth to the juſtifying of man: but includeth a complete righteouſneſs in free forgiveneſs, pronouncing the man bleſſed, whoſe ſins are covered, to whom God hath forgiven iniquities, and to whom he imputeth no tranſgreſſions. He thereby meaſures and judges ſuch a man's happineſs becauſe he is not this way righteous indeed, but by imputation. Oſiander takes exception and ſaith, that this would reflect diſhonour upon God, and is contrary to his nature, if he ſhould juſtify them who remain ſtill in their ſins. But we muſt remember, as I have already ſaid, that the grace of juſtifying is not ſeparated from regeneration though they be different things. But becauſe it is more than ſufficiently known by experience, that ſome remnants of ſin ſtill lurk and remain in the righteous, of neceſſity they are juſtified in a very different manner, from that whereby they are reformed into a newneſs of life. For this laſt point of reformation, God begins in his elect, and through the whole courſe of their life, by little and little, and ſometimes ſlowly proceedeth in it, that they may be always afraid, leſt they fall into condemnation. But he juſtifieth them not by piece-meal, but ſo that they may freely, as clothed with the purity and holineſs

of Christ, appear in heaven. For no portion of righteousness could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with us, because we are righteous in his sight without exception. Whence it followeth, that the doctrine of justification is biassed, yea, overturned from the very foundation, when any doubts are raised in mens minds, when the trust and confidence of our salvation is shaken, when our freedom, and a holy boldness in prayer is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillity with spiritual joy is not established. Whereupon Paul (Gal. iii. 18.) concluding by an argument from contraries, proveth that the inheritance is not by the law. For by this means faith would be made void, which if it have respect to works, is overthrown, because none even the most holy persons will therein find whereupon to trust. This difference of justifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two sorts of righteousness) is very well expressed by Paul: for speaking of his real righteousness only, or of the uprightness wherewith he was endued, (which Osiander calleth essential righteousness) he lamentably crieth out (Rom. vii. 24.) O Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? But flying to that righteousness which is grounded upon the mercy of God alone, Rom. viii. 33. he gloriously triumpheth over both life, death, reproaches, hunger, sword, and all adversities. Who shall accuse the elect of God whom he justifieth? for I am surely persuaded, that nothing shall separate us from his love in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath not such a righteousness which of itself is fully sufficient to save him, before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knew himself, to be in and made him a little before bewail his estate, could not lessen nor any way hinder his confidence and glorying in the righteousness procured by Christ. This difference is sufficiently known, and so familiar to all believers, who groan under the burden of sin, that yet with victorious confidence, they surmount all their fears. As for what Osiander objecteth, that it disagreeth with the nature of God, it falleth upon himself. For although he cloathes the holy saints with a double righteousness, as it were with a furred garment, yet he is obliged to confess that without forgiveness of sins, they can never please God. If that be true, then at least let him grant, that they who are not righteous in themselves, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how far shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousness: shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? truly he shall doubt and waver to this and that side, because he dare not assume to himself so much righteousness as will be necessary to establish his confidence. It is happy that he who would bind God to a law, is not judge of this cause. But this saying of the psalmist (Psal. li. 4.) will remain unshaken, that thou (viz. God,) mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest. But how great and daring is their presumption to condemn the judge of all the earth when he freely acquitteth, that they may destroy the strength of God's answer to Moses (Exod. xxxiii. 19.) I will shew mercy upon whom I will shew mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God silenced with this saying, tended not to this end, that he would spare none, but that he would acquit altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of an offence. And we say that they who were lost have their sins buried, and so are justified before God: because, as God hateth sin, so he can love none but them whom he justifieth. But this is a wonderful manner of justifying, that they who are covered with the righteousness of Christ need not be afraid of the condemnation which they have deserved; and when they justly condemn themselves, they are accounted righteous, without any righteousness in themselves.

The foolish objections which Osiander gathereth against them who hold a man justified not by the righteousness which Christ worketh in us, as he is God, but which we have by his death and resurrection as he is man.

12. But the readers had need to be warned, that they take good heed to the mystery which he boasteth that he will not hide from them. For after he hath long and largely laboured to prove that we do not obtain the favour of God by the imputation of the righteousness of Christ only, because it would be impossible for him to count them righteous who are not righteous, (I use his own words) at length he concludeth that Christ was given unto us for righteousness, not in respect of his nature of manhood, but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousness cannot be found but in the person of the Mediator, yet it is the righteousness not of man but of God, he doth now twist his rope made up of two righteousnesses, but he plainly taketh away the office of justifying from Christ's nature of manhood. But it is worthy our observation to notice how he disagreeth with himself. It is ſaid in the ſame place, that Chriſt was made unto us wiſdom, which belongeth to none but to the eternal word. Therefore Chriſt as he is man is not wiſdom. I anſwer that the only begotten Son of God was indeed his eternal wiſdom, but in Paul's writings (Col. ii. 3.) that name is given him in different ways, becauſe all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowlege are laid up in him. That therefore which he had with his Father, he diſcloſed unto us: and ſo that which Paul ſaith is not referred unto the eſſence of the Son of God, but to our uſe, and is rightly applied to Chriſt's nature of manhood: becauſe although (John viii. 12.) he ſhone as a light in darkneſs, before he put on fleſh, yet it was a hidden light till the ſame Chriſt came forth in the nature of man, the ſhining Sun of righteouſneſs, and who calleth himſelf the light of the world. Alſo it is fooliſhly objected by Oſiander, that the power of juſtifying is far above both angels and men: for as much as this dependeth not upon the worthineſs of any creature, but upon the ordinance and appointment of God. If angels will take upon them to ſatisfy God, they cannot prevail, becauſe they are not appointed thereunto. But this ſingularly belonged to Chriſt being man, (Gal. iii. 13.) who was made ſubject to the law, to redeem us from the curſe of the law. Alſo he doth abuſively find fault with them who deny that Chriſt is our righteouſneſs according to his nature of Godhead, that they leave but one part of Chriſt, and (which is worſe) make two Gods, becauſe though they confeſs, that God dwelleth in us, yet they ſay again that we are not righteous by the righteouſneſs of God. For though we call Chriſt the author of life, in reſpect that he ſuffered death to deſtroy him that had the power of death, (Heb. ii. 14.) we do not immediately take away that honour from whole Chriſt as he was openly manifeſted God in the fleſh, but we only make a diſtinction how the righteouſneſs of God is conveyed unto us, that we may enjoy it. In which point Oſiander hath too groſsly erred. Neither do we deny that what is openly given us in and through Chriſt, proceedeth from the ſecret grace and power of God: neither do we ſtrive againſt this, that the righteouſneſs which Chriſt giveth us is the righteouſneſs of God that proceedeth from God: but we ſtedfaſtly maintain this truth, that we have righteouſneſs and life in and by the death and reſurrection of Chriſt. I paſs over that heaping together of places which he ought to be aſhamed of, wherewith he hath tediouſly plagued his readers without choice and without common-reaſon, to prove that whereever mention is made of righteouſneſs, there we ought to underſtand this eſſential righteouſneſs. As where David calleth upon the righteouſneſs of God to help him: whereas he doth above a hundred times, Oſiander ſticketh not to corrupt ſo many ſentences. And the other objection is nothing ſtronger, that, that is properly and juſtly called righteouſneſs, whereby we are inclined to do rightly, but that God only worketh in us both to will and to perform. (Phil. ii. 13.) For we do not deny, that God reformeth us by his Spirit unto holineſs of life and righteouſneſs: but we muſt firſt of all take notice whether he doth this by himſelf and immediately, or by the hand of his Son, with whom he hath left all the fulneſs of his holy Spirit, that with his abundant ſtore he ſhould ſupply the neceſſities and wants of his members. Moreover, although righteouſneſs come unto us out of the ſecret fountain of the Godhead, yet it followeth not that Chriſt who ſanctified himſelf in the fleſh for our ſakes, (John xvii. 19.) was righteouſneſs unto us according to his nature of Godhead. No leſs fooliſh is that which he ſaith, that Chriſt himſelf was righteous by the righteouſneſs of God. Becauſe unleſs the will of his Father had moved him, he could not himſelf have fully executed the office committed unto him. For though we have ſaid in another place that all the merits of Chriſt himſelf proceed from the mere good will of God, yet that expreſſion no way ſupporteth that whimſical thing, wherewith Oſiander bewitcheth both his own and ſimple men's eyes. For who would ſuffer a man to draw this concluſion, that becauſe God is the fountain and beginning of our righteouſneſs, therefore we are eſſentially righteous, and the eſſence of God's righteouſneſs dwelleth in us? In redeeming the church Iſaiah ſaith, chap. lix. 17. God put on righteouſneſs as a breaſtplate: but did he ſo ſpoil Chriſt of his armour, which he had given him, to hinder him from being a perfect redeemer? the prophet means nothing elſe by this expreſſion, but that God borrowed nothing which he had not within himſelf, and that he was not aſſiſted by any foreign aid to redeem us. Which thing Paul briefly expreſſeth in other words, (Rom. iii. 26.) ſaying that he gave us ſalvation to declare his righteouſneſs. But this doth not overthrow that which he teacheth in another place, (Rom. v. 19.) that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally, whoever compoſeth a double righteouſneſs, thereby to

13. But foraſmuch as many men imagine righteouſneſs to be made up of faith and works, let us firſt ſhew this alſo, that the righteouſneſs of faith and works do ſo differ, that when the one is eſtabliſhed, the other muſt needs be overthrown. The apoſtle ſaith, (Phil. iii. 8.) that he eſteemed all things as dung, that he might win Chriſt, and find in him the righteouſneſs that is of God by faith, not having his own righteouſneſs which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Jeſus Chriſt. You ſee that here is a compariſon of contraries, and that it is declared that he who will obtain the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, muſt forſake his own righteouſneſs. Therefore in another place he ſaith, (Rom. x. 3.) that this was the cauſe of ſtumbling to the Jews, that going about to eſtabliſh their own righteouſneſs, they did not ſubmit themſelves unto the righteouſneſs of God. If in eſtabliſhing our own righteouſneſs we ſhake away the righteouſneſs of God, therefore to obtain God's righteouſneſs our own muſt be utterly aboliſhed. And he ſheweth the ſame thing, when he ſaith, (Rom. iii. 27.) that our boaſting is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Whereupon it followeth, that as long as there remaineth any righteouſneſs of works, how little ſoever it be, there ſtill remaineth ſome matter for us to glory upon. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteouſneſs of works can no wiſe be coupled with the righteouſneſs of faith. To this purpoſe he ſpeaketh ſo plainly in his epiſtle to the Romans, chap. iv. 2. that he leaveth no room for ſophiſtical arguments or evaſive ſhifts: If (ſaith he) Abraham was juſtified by works, he hath whereof to glory. And immediately he addeth: but not before God. It followeth therefore that he was not juſtified by works. Then he bringeth another argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to works, that is done of debt and not of grace; therefore it does not flow from any merit of works. Wherefore farewel their dream, who imagine a righteouſneſs made up of faith and works mingled together.

14. Theſe cavilling diſputants think that they have a ſhift, who make a ſport and paſtime of wreſting the ſcripture, to their vain arguments. For they expound works in that place to be thoſe actions which men not yet regenerate perform only literally, and by the endeavour of free will unaſſiſted by the grace of Chriſt: and ſay that they belong not to ſpiritual works. So according to their opinion a man is juſtified both by faith and works: and that the works are not his own, but the gifts of Chriſt, and the fruits of regeneration. For they ſay that Paul ſpake ſo for no other reaſon, but to convince the Jews, who truſting to their own works, fooliſhly preſumed to claim a righteouſneſs to themſelves, ſince the Spirit of Chriſt alone doth give it to us, and not any endeavour by our own corrupt nature. But they do not obſerve that in the compariſon of the righteouſneſs of the law, and the righteouſneſs of the goſpel, which Paul adduceth in another place, all works are excluded with what titles ſoever they are adorned. For he teacheth (Gal. iii. 12.) that this is the righteouſneſs of the law, that he ſhall obtain ſalvation, who hath performed that which the law commandeth: and that this is the righteouſneſs of faith, if we believe that Chriſt died and is riſen again. Moreover we ſhall hereafter ſhew in its proper place, that ſanctification and righteouſneſs are ſeparate and diſtinct benefits of Chriſt. Whereupon it followeth that even ſpiritual works come not into the account, when the power of juſtifying is aſcribed to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I even now alleged) that Abraham had any thing whereupon to glory before God, becauſe he was not made righteous by works: this ought not to be reſtrained to the literal and outward kind of virtues, or to the endeavour of free will. But though the life of the Patriarch Abraham was ſpiritual and in a manner angelic, yet he had not a ſufficient merit of works to purchaſe righteouſneſs to himſelf before God.

15. The ſchoolmen teach a little more groſly who mix their preparations with the righteouſneſs which is by faith: but theſe do leſs infect the ſimple and ignorant with corrupt doctrine, who under a pretence of Spirit and grace obſcure and hide the mercy of God, which only is able to appeaſe trembling conſciences. We confeſs with Paul, that the doers of the law are juſtified before God: but becauſe we are all far from keeping the law, hereupon we conclude, that the works which ſhould moſt of all have contributed to our righteouſneſs, do not help us, becauſe

we want them. As for the common papiſts or ſchoolmen, they are in this point doubly deceived: both becauſe they call faith an aſſuredneſs of conſcience in looking for a reward at the hand of God for our own deſervings, and alſo becauſe they explain the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteouſneſs, but the holy Ghoſt helping our endeavours after holineſs. They read in the apoſtle (Heb. xi. 6.) that he who cometh to God, muſt firſt believe that there is a God, and then that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him. But they do not obſerve what is the manner of ſeeking. And that they are deceived in the name of grace, is plainly proved by their own writings. For Lombard (*Sent. lib.*3.*diſt.*16.cap. 2.) expoundeth, that juſtification by Chriſt is given us two ways. Firſt (ſaith he) the death of Chriſt doth juſtify us, when by it charity is ſtirred up in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the ſame death ſin is deſtroyed, by which Satan held us captive, ſo that now he hath not whereby to condemn us. You ſee how he conſidereth the grace of God principally in juſtification, only to be ſo far aſſiſting to us, as we are directed to good works by the grace of the holy Ghoſt. He would forſooth have followed the opinion of Auguſtine: but he followeth him a far off, and goeth far out of the way from rightly following him: becauſe if Auguſtine ſpoke any thing plainly he hath darkened it: if there be any thing in Auguſtine not very impure, he corrupteth it. The ſchoolmen have ſtill erred from bad to worſe, till with a head long fall at length they are rolled down into a Pelagian error. And the very words of Auguſtine, or at leaſt his manner of ſpeaking is not altogether proper to be adopted. For though he very well and juſtly taketh from man all praiſe of righteouſneſs, and aſſigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to ſanctification, whereby we are renewed unto newneſs of life by the holy Ghoſt.

The righteouſneſs of faith ſpoken of in ſcripture turneth men's eyes from their own works to the free goodneſs of God, which pardoneth ſin, and cauſeth ſinners to feel the mercy whereby they are pardoned, and in Chriſt made righteous.

16. But the ſcripture, when it ſpeaketh of the righteouſneſs of faith, leadeth us to a very different end, that is to ſay, that turning us away from looking upon our own works, we ſhould only look unto the mercy of God and perfection of Chriſt. For it teacheth this order of juſtification, that firſt God vouchſafeth to embrace man being a ſinner, with his meer and free goodneſs, conſidering nothing in him but miſery, whereby he may be moved to mercy, becauſe he ſeeth him altogether naked and void of good works, bringing from his own inexhauſtible mercy the cauſe to do him good: then he moveth the ſinner himſelf by a ſenſe of his goodneſs, who deſpairing upon his own works, caſteth the whole of his ſalvation upon God's mercy. This is the feeling of faith, by which the ſinner cometh into poſſeſſion of his ſalvation, when he acknowlegeth that he is reconciled to God by the doctrine of the goſpel: that obtaining forgiveneſs of ſins by means of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, he is juſtified: and although he be regenerate by the ſpirit of God, he thinketh upon the conſtant righteouſneſs laid up for him, not in the good works to which he applieth himſelf, but in the only righteouſneſs of Chriſt. When theſe things are every one particularly weighed, they will give a perfect declaration of our opinion and judgment on the matter. Although they might be better diſpoſed in another order than they are ſet forth. But that is of little conſequence; provided they are connected together in ſuch a manner, that we may have the whole matter truly declared and certainly proved.

The difference which St. Paul to the Romans putteth between the righteouſneſs of the goſpel and of the law, excludeth works from that juſtification which is through faith.

17. Here it is proper to remember the relation that we have before ſaid is between faith and the goſpel: it is ſaid that faith juſtifieth, becauſe it receiveth and embraceth the righteouſneſs offered in the goſpel. And as it is ſaid to be offered by the goſpel, thereby all conſideration of works is excluded. Which Paul declareth many times elſewhere, but moſt plainly in two places. For, to the Romans, comparing the law and the goſpel together; he ſaith, the righteouſneſneſs which by the law is after this manner, The man that doth theſe things ſhall live in them. But the righteouſneſs which is by faith offereth ſalvation, if thou believe in thy heart and confeſs with thy mouth the Lord Jeſus, and that the Father hath raiſed him up from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the goſpel, that the law giveth righteouſneſs to works, and the goſpel giveth free righteouſneſs without the help of works? it is a place, well worth our obſervation, which may deliver us out of many per-perplexing doubts, if we understand that the righteousness which is given us by the gospel, is free from all the conditions of law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once, with great seeming contrariety, set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as in this saying, (Gal. iii. 18.) if the inheritance be of the law, then it is not of the promise: and all the rest of the same chapter is to the same purpose. I own the law itself hath also its promises. Therefore there must of necessity be, in the promises of the gospel, something contrary to, and different from the promises of the law, unless we confess that the comparison is very foolish and absurd. But what difference will this be unless it is that the promises of the gospel are freely given, and upheld by the mercy of God alone, whereas the promises of the law depend upon the condition of works? Neither let any man here take exception against me, and say, that in this place the righteousness is rejected, which men would by their own strength, and free will compel God to receive? because Paul without any exception teacheth (Rom. iii. 23.) that the law in commanding profiteth nothing: because there is no person, not only among the common multitude, but even among the most perfect, that fulfilleth it. Love undoubtely is the chief point of the law: when the Spirit of God disposeth our hearts thereunto, why is it not a cause of righteousness to us, but because even in the saints it is imperfect, and therefore deserveth no reward.

18. The second place is this, (Gal. iii. 11, 12.) But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, is evident: for the just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith: but the man that doth them shall live in them. How could this argument otherwise be consistent, unless we agree upon this point, that works come not into the account of faith, but are to be altogether separated from it? The law (saith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because works are required to the righteousness thereof. Therefore it followeth that works are not required to the righteousness of faith. By this relation it appears that they who are justified by faith, are justified beside the merit of works, yea without the merit of works, because faith receiveth that righteousness which the gospel giveth. And the gospel differeth from the law in this point, that it doth not annex righteousness to works, but placeth it in the mercy of God alone. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romans, (Rom. iv. 2.) that Abraham had nothing to glory upon, because faith was imputed to him for righteousness, and he addeth a confirmation, because there is room for the righteousness of faith, when there are no works to which a reward is due. Where works are (saith he) a due reward is rendered unto them: and that which is given to faith is freely bestowed. For the very meaning of the words which he useth in that place serve to prove the same. Whereas he adjoineth within a little after, that we obtain the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he concludeth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is received by faith: and how cometh that, but because faith without any help of works resteth wholly upon the mercy of God? And in the same sense without doubt he teacheth in another place, (Rom. iii. 21.) But now the righteousness of God without the law, is manifested being witnessed by the law and the prophets: because excluding the law, he saith, that it is not assisted by works, and that we obtain it not by working, but by coming empty that we may receive it.

This doctrine carped at without cause which teacheth justification by faith only; excluding thereby not only ceremonial but moral works also.

19. By this time the reader will perceive with what equity these wrangling disputants do at this day object against our doctrine, when we say, that man is justified by faith only. They dare not deny that a man is justified by faith because it is so often found in scripture: but because this word, only, is never expressed, they cannot abide to have such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these words of Paul, (Rom. iv. 2.) where he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely given? How can a free gift agree with works? And with what sophistical arguments will they invalidate that which he saith in another place, (Rom. i. 17.) that the righteousness of God is revealed in the gospel? If righteousness be revealed in the gospel, surely there is contained in the gospel not a divided or half righteousness, but full and perfect righteousness. Therefore the law hath no place therein. And they ground their opinion not only upon a false, but also a foolish shift about this exclusive word, only. Doth not he perfectly enough give all things to faith only, who taketh all things from works? What, I pray you mean these sayings, (Rom. iii. 21. and 24.) that righteousness was manifested nifeſted without the law: that man is juſtified freely and without the works of the law? Here they have a witty ſhift to eſcape with, which although they did not invent it themſelves, but borrowed it from Origen and ſome of the old writers, yet it is very fooliſh and abſurd; they ſay that the ceremonial works of the law, not the moral, are excluded. Do they think that the apoſtle dreamed when he alleged theſe places (Gal. iii. 10, 12.) to prove his ſaying? The man that ſhall do theſe things ſhall live in them: and, curſed is every one that fulfilleth not all things that are written in the book of the law to do them. Unleſs they be mad they will not ſay that life was promiſed to the obſervers of ceremonies, or a curſe threatned only againſt the breakers of them. If theſe places are to be underſtood of the moral law, there is no doubt that moral works alſo are excluded from the power of juſtifying. To the ſame purpoſe ſerve theſe arguments which he uſeth: (Rom. iii. 20.) Therefore by the deeds of the law, there ſhall no fleſh be juſtified in his ſight; for by the law is the knowlege of ſin. (Rom. iv. 15.) Becauſe the law worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteouſneſs. Becauſe the law cannot make the conſcience aſſured, therefore alſo it cannot give righteouſneſs. Becauſe faith is imputed unto righteouſneſs, therefore righteouſneſs is not a reward of work, but is given not being due. Becauſe we are juſtified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off, Gal. iii. 21, 22. If there had been a law given, which could have given life, verily righteouſneſs would have been by the law: but the ſcripture hath concluded all under ſin, that the promiſe by faith of Jeſus Chriſt, might be given to them that believe. Let them now fooliſhly ſay, if they dare, that theſe things are ſpoken of the ceremonial and not of the moral law: but even children would hiſs at ſo great an impudence. Therefore let us maintain this for a certain truth, that the whole law is ſpoken of, when the power of juſtifying is taken away from the law.

Neither can works juſtify though they be highly eſteemed; becauſe the value of them depends only upon God's allowance, neither doth love give unto faith the force where-by it is able to juſtify.

20. But if any man wonder why the apoſtle uſeth ſuch an addition, not being content with only naming works: the reaſon is ready to be ſhown for it. For, though works be ſo highly eſteemed, yet God alloweth that value by his permiſſion, rather than from any worth in themſelves. For who can boaſt before God of any righteouſneſs in his works, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claim any reward as due unto them, but ſuch as he hath promiſed? They therefore enjoy this favour by the bounty of God, that they are counted worthy both of the name, and reward of righteouſneſs: and any value they are allowed is only for this cauſe, when the purpoſe of him who doth them is by them to ſhow his obedience to God. Wherefore the apoſtle in another place, (Gal. iii. 17.) to prove that Abraham could not be juſtified by works, alledgeth that the law was given almoſt four hundred and thirty years after the covenant was made. Ignorant people would laugh at ſuch an argument that there might be righteous works befor the publiſhing of the law. But becauſe he knew that there was no ſuch value in works, but by the the teſtimony and allowance of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confeſſed and acknowleged, that before the law they had no power to juſtify. We underſtand why he namely expreſſeth the works of the law, when he intendeth to take away juſtification from any works, becauſe an argument may be drawn from works, but from nothing elſe, altho' ſometimes he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he ſaith, (Rom. iv. 6.) that by the teſtimony of David bleſſedneſs is aſſigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteouſneſs without works. Therefore they cannot with all their evaſive arguments, hinder us from ſtrengthening our notion of juſtification by the uſe of this general excluſive word, Only. And they in vain ſeek that trifling ſubtilty, that we are only juſtified by that only faith which worketh by love, ſo that our righteouſneſs muſt ſtand upon love. We grant indeed with Paul, (Gal. v. 6.) that no other faith juſtifieth, but that which effectually worketh with charity or love: but faith deriveth not its power of juſtifying from that effectualneſs of charity. Yea, it juſtifieth by no other means, but becauſe it bringeth us in to the communicating of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. Or elſe all that which the apoſtle ſo earneſtly preſſeth would fall to nought. To him that worketh (ſaith he, Rom. iv. 4, 5.) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that juſtifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteouſneſs. Could he ſpeak more plainly than by ſaying, that there is no righteouſneſs by faith except where there are no works to which any reward is due; and that then only faith is imputed unto righteouſneſs, when righteouſneſs is given by grace that is not due.

Sin putteth enmity between man and God: so that except it be pardoned, we cannot be joined unto him.

21. Now let us examine how true that is, which is said in the definition, that the righteousness of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth only in the forgiveness of sins. We must always return to this principle, that the wrath of God abideth upon all men, as long as they continue in their sins; which Isaiah hath very well expresst in chap. lix. 1, 2. in these words: The hand of the Lord is not shortened, that it cannot save: nor his ear heavy that he cannot hear: but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you that he will not hear. We hear that sin hath made a division between man and God, and turned away God's face from the sinner. Nor can it otherwise be. For it is contrary to his righteousness to have any fellowship with sin. Wherefore the apostle teacheth (Rom. v. 8.) that man is an enemy to God till he be restored into favour by Christ. Therefore whomsoever the Lord receiveth into union with him, he is said to justfy him because he can neither receive him into favour, nor unite him with himself, till of a sinner he make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiveness of sins. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himself be judged by their works, they should be found still to be sinners, who yet must be free and clean from sin. It is certain therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but because they are cleansed by having their sins wiped away by forgiveness, that such a righteousness may in one word be called the forgiveness of sins.

Righteousness and reconciliation unto God do mutually contain the one the other, and are attained unto, when our sins are not imputed.

22. Both these are most clearly to be seen by these words of Paul, which I have already cited. (2 Cor. v. 19.) God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their sins to them, and he hath given unto us the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the sum of his message, (2 Cor. v. 21.) that he who knew no sin was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Here he nameth righteousness and reconciliation without any distinction that we may perceive that the one is mutually contained in the other. And he teacheth that the manner to attain this righteousness is when our sins are not imputed unto us; therefore do not any longer doubt, how God doth justify us, when you hear that he reconcileth us to himself by not imputing unto us our sins. So to the Romans (chap. iv. 6.) he proveth by the testimony of David, that righteousness is imputed to man without works, because David pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiven, whose sins are covered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by blessedness he there meaneth righteousness: and seeing he affirmeth the same to consist in the forgiveness of sins, there is no reason why we should define it otherwise. Therefore Zacharias the father of John the Baptist singeth, (Luke i. 77.) that the knowlege of salvation consisteth in the forgiveness of sins. Which rule Paul followeth in his sermon which he made to the people of Antioch concerning the sum of salvation, as Luke reporteth it, (Acts xiii. 38, 39.) concluding in this manner: by him forgiveness of sins is preached unto you, and every one that believeth in him is justified from all these things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses. The apostle so closely connecteth the forgiveness of sins with righteousness, that he sheweth them both to be the same thing. From which he justly reasoneth, that righteousness is freely given unto us, which we obtain by the loving kindness of God. Neither ought it to seem a strange or unusual saying, that believers are righteous before God, not by works, but by free acceptation: since it is so oft found in the scripture, and also the old authors do sometimes speak so. For Augustine saith thus in one place (De civit. Dei cap. 27.) The righteousness of the saints in this world consisteth rather in forgiveness of sins, than in the perfection of their virtues. Wherewith agreeth that notable sentence of Bernard (Serm. 23. in cant. Ser. 22.) Not to sin is the righteousness of God: but the righteousness of man, is the merciful kindness God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to us righteousness in absolution, and therefore that they only are righteous who have obtained pardon by mercy.

The righteousness of Christ imputed unto us maketh us righteous.

23. Hereupon also followeth this, that only by the means of Christ's righteousness, we obtain justification before God. Which is as much in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himself, but because the righteousness of Christ is by imputation communicated unto him, which deserves to be carefully observed: for thereby that trifling error vanisheth away, to

ſay that man is juſtified by faith, becauſe faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is ſo contrary to the doctrine above taught, that they can never be made to agree together. For there is no doubt that he is void of his own righteouſneſs, who is taught to ſeek righteouſneſs without himſelf. This the apoſtle affirmeth moſt plainly (2 Cor. v. 21.) when he writeth that he who knew no ſin was made for us a propitiatory ſacrifice to cleanſe away ſin, that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him. You ſee that our righteouſneſs is not in us but in Chriſt, and that we have a right unto it, only by this title, becauſe we are partakers of Chriſt, becauſe we poſſeſs all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that in another place he teacheth, (Rom. viii. 3.) that ſin was condemned of ſin in the fleſh of Chriſt, that the righteouſneſs of the law might be fulfilled in us: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but that which we obtain by imputation. For the Lord Chriſt doth in ſuch a way communicate his righteouſneſs with us, that after a certain wonderful manner, he infuſeth the ſtrength thereof into us, ſo much as pertaineth to the judgment of God. It appeareth that he meant no otherwiſe, by the other ſentence which he had ſpoken a little before. (Rom. v. 19.) As by the diſobedience of one man many were made ſinners, ſo by the obedience of one man many are made righteous. What is it to place our righteouſneſs in the obedience of Chriſt, but to affirm that hereby only we are accounted righteous, becauſe the obedience of Chriſt is imputed unto us as if it were our own? Therefore I think that Ambroſe (Lib. 2. de Jac. & vita beata.) hath excellently well ſhewed how there is an example of this righteouſneſs in the bleſſing of Jacob. For Jacob not having of himſelf deſerved the pre-eminence of the firſt begotten ſon, concealed himſelf in the apparel of his brother, and being clothed in his brother's coat that ſavoured of a moſt ſweet ſmell, he crept into the favour of his Father, and received the bleſſing to his own advantage, in the perſon of another: ſo we lie hid under the precious purity of Chriſt our elder brother, that we may get a teſtimony of our righteouſneſs in the ſight of God. The words of Ambroſe are theſe. Whereas Iſaac ſmelt the ſavour of the garments, peradventure this is meant thereby, that we are not juſtified by works, but by faith: becauſe fleſhly weakneſs hindereth works, but the brightneſs of faith which meriteth forgiveneſs of ſins, overſhadoweth the errors of our actions. And truly ſo it is. For, that we may appear before the face of God unto ſalvation, it is neceſſary for us to ſmell ſweetly with his odour, and to have our faults covered and hid with his perfection.

CHAP. XII.

That we may be fully perſuaded of the freeneſs of juſtification, we muſt lift up our minds to the judgment ſeat of God.

The cauſe of men's preſuming ſo much upon the righteouſneſs of their own works, is their not conſidering what an exact purity it muſt be that will anſwer the law when it comes to be ſtrictly examined before the judgment ſeat of God.

THOUGH it appeareth by moſt evident teſtimonies, that all theſe things are true, yet we will not clearly perceive how neceſſary they are, until we have ſet before our eyes thoſe things that ought to be the grounds of all this diſputation. Firſt therefore let us remember this, that we intend not to ſpeak of the righteouſneſs of a worldly judicial court, but of the heavenly judgment ſeat: and that we ſhould not meaſure by our own ſmall portion, by what uprightneſs of works God's judgments may be ſatisfied. But it is ſurprizing to ſee with what raſhneſs and boldneſs it is commonly debated. Yea, and it is to be ſeen that none do more boldly or with fuller mouths (as the ſaying is) talk about the righteouſneſs of works, than they who are either openly wicked, or are ready to burſt with inward vices. This comes to paſs, becauſe they think not upon the righteouſneſs of God, which if they had the leaſt ſenſe of, they would never mock in ſo groſs a manner. And truly it is too lightly regarded, when it is not acknowleged to be ſuch, and ſo perfect, that nothing is imputed unto it but what is every way whole and abſolute, and defiled with no impurity, and acknowleged to be ſuch as never was, nor ever will be found in man. It is indeed eaſy and ready for every man in ſchools to talk vainly upon the worth that is in works to juſtify men: But when they appear in the ſight of God, they muſt avoid ſuch dalliance, becauſe God acteth in earneſt, and alloweth alloweth no trifling ſtrife about words. To this, to this I ſay, we muſt apply our minds, if we will profitably enquire after true righteouſneſs, how we will anſwer the heavenly judge when he calleth us to account. Let us conſider him to be a judge, not ſuch a one as our own underſtandings imagine; but ſuch a one as he is deſcribed in ſcripture, with whoſe brightneſs the ſtars ſhall be darkened, by whoſe ſtrength the hills melt away, by whoſe wrath the earth is ſhaken, by whoſe wiſdom the wiſe are taken in their ſubtilty, by whoſe purity all things are proved impure, whoſe righteouſneſs angels are not able to bear, who maketh the innocent not innocent, whoſe vengeance when it is once kindled pierceth to the bottom of hell. If he (I ſay) ſit to examine men's actions, who ſhall appear with confidence before his throne? who ſhall dwell with devouring fire? ſaith the prophet, Iſaiah xxxiii. 14. 15. Who ſhall abide with continual burnings? he that walketh in righteouſneſs and ſpeaketh truth, &c. But let ſuch a one come forth, whoever he be. But the anſwer ſheweth that none dare come forward. For this terrible ſaying ſoundeth to the contrary. (Pſal. cxxx. 3.) Lord if thou mark iniquities, Lord, who ſhall abide it? truly all muſt immediately periſh, as it is written in another place: (Job iv. 17. 18, 19, 20.) Shall mortal man be more juſt than God? ſhall a man be purer than his maker? Behold he putteth no truſt in his ſervants; and his angels he chargeth with folly: how much leſs in them that dwell in houſes of clay, whoſe foundation is in the duſt, who are cruſhed before the moth? they are deſtroyed from the morning until the evening. Behold among his ſaints there is none faithful, and the heavens are not clean in his ſight: how much more is man abominable and unprofitable, who drinketh in iniquity as water? I grant indeed that in the book of Job, mention is made of a righteouſneſs that is higher than the keeping of the law. And it is good to underſtand this diſtinction: becauſe although a man did ſatisfy the law, yet he could not ſtand the trial of that righteouſneſs that paſſeth all ſenſes. Therefore although Job be clear in his own conſcience, yet he is amazed, and not able to ſpeak becauſe he ſeeth that even angelic holineſs cannot appeaſe God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore will at this time paſs over that righteouſneſs which I have ſpoken of, becauſe it is incomprehenſible: but only this I ſay, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than ſenſeleſs if ſo many curſes wherewith the Lord hath willed us to be awakened do not torment us with horrible fear, and among others this general curſe, Curſed is every one that doth not abide in all the things that are written in the book. Finally all this diſcourſe ſhall be but unſavoury and cold, unleſs every man own himſelf guilty before the heavenly judge, and willingly throw down and abaſe himſelf, being careful how he may be acquitted.

How righteous ſoever we be in compariſon of other men, this in the ſight of God is not able to make us blameleſs.

2. To this, to this I ſay, we ſhould have lift up our eyes, to learn rather to tremble for fear, than vainly to rejoice. It is indeed eaſy, ſo long as the compariſon extendeth no further than men, for every man to think himſelf to have ſomewhat which others ought not to deſpiſe. But when we riſe up to have reſpect unto God, then ſuddenly that confidence falleth to the ground and cometh to nought. And in the ſame caſe altogether is our ſoul in reſpect of God, as man's body is in reſpect of the heaven. For the ſight of the eye, ſo long as it continueth in viewing things that lie near unto it, doth ſhew of what piercing force it is, but if it be once directed up to the ſun, then being dazled and impaired by the too great brightneſs thereof, it feeleth no leſs weakneſs in beholding the ſun, than it felt ſtrength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let us not deceive ourſelves with a vain confidence, although we reckon ourſelves either equal or ſuperior to other men: for that is nothing to God, by whoſe will this knowlege is to be tried. But if our wildneſs cannot be corrected by theſe admonitions, he will anſwer us as he ſaid to the Phariſees: (Luke xvi. 15.) you are they who juſtify yourſelves before men: but that which is highly eſteemed among men is abominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boaſt of thy righteouſneſs among men, while God from heaven abhorreth it. But what ſay the ſervants of God that are truly inſtructed with his Spirit? (Pſal. cxliii. 2.) enter not into judgment with thy ſervant, for in thy ſight ſhall no man living be juſtified. Another ſaith, (Job. ix. 2, 3.) although ſomewhat in a different meaning: How ſhould man be juſt with God? if he will contend with him, he cannot anſwer one of a thouſand. Here we are now plainly informed what is the righteouſneſs of God, that it is ſuch as can be ſatisfied with no works of men, who when he examineth us of a thouſand offences, we cannot purge ourſelves of one. Such a righteouſneſs had that chosen instrument of God, Paul conceived to himself, when he professed (1 Cor. iv. 4.) that he knew nothing, by himself, and he says, I am not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

St. Augustine and St Bernard how far from looking to be justified by their own works.

3. And such examples are to be found not only in the scriptures, but also all godly writers shew that they were of this mind. Augustine saith, (Ad Boni. li. 3. ca. 5.) all the godly who groan under this burden of corruptible flesh, and the weakness of this life, have this only hope, that we have one Mediator Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins. And he addeth further, if this be their only hope, where is the confidence of works? For when he calleth it the only confidence, he cutteth off thereby every thing else. And Bernard saith, (Super. Cant. ser. 61.) where is safe and settled rest and assurance for the weak, but in the wounds of our Saviour? and I dwell so much the surer therein as he is mighty to save. The world tempteth, the body is burdened, and the devil lieth in wait: I do fall, not because I am built upon the sure rock: I have sinned a grievous sin, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be overtroubled, because I will remember the wounds of the Lord. And hence he concludeth, therefore my only merit is the Lord's shewing of mercy, I am not utterly void of merit, so long as he is not without mercy. But if the mercies of the Lord are many, then I have as many merits. Shall I sing mine own righteousness? Lord I will remember only thy righteousness; for that is my righteousness, because Christ is made unto me righteousness of God. Again in another place, (In Psal. qui habitat ser. 15.) This is the whole merit of man, to place all his hope in him that saveth the whole man. Likewise where he comforts himself on the peace of mind which the sense of God's righteousness procured, he saith let God's glory remain undiminished: it will be well with me, if I have peace, I renounce boasting altogether, lest I wrongfully assume to my self what is not my own, and lose that which is offered me. And more plainly in another place (In Cant. ser. 13.) he saith: why should the church be careful about merits when it hath a surer and safer way to glory on the purpose of God? there is no cause why thou shouldst ask, by what merits we hope for good things, especially when you hear God saying by the prophet, (Ezek. xxxvi. 22, and 32.) I will do it, not for your sakes, but for mine holy name's sake. It is a sufficient merit to know that merits are not sufficient for salvation. But as it is sufficient merit, not to presume on our own merits, so to be without merits sufficeth to judgment. And as he useth the word merits instead of good works we must bear with the custom. But the whole of his purpose was to make such hypocrites afraid, as wildly rage and licentiously sin against the grace of God. As he afterward explaineth himself, saying: happy is the church that wanteth neither merits without presumption, nor presumption without merits. It hath something whereupon to presume, but not merits. It hath merits, only to deserve, not to presume. Is not the very not presuming a deserving? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, having great matter to glory upon, even the many mercies of the Lord.

Men who are judged by their own worthiness be they never so holy, shall be found unholy.

4. This is the truth. Exercised consciences perceive this to be the only sanctuary of safety, wherein they may safely rest themselves when they have to do with the judgment of God. For if the stars that seem most bright in the night season, lose their brightness, when the sun appears, what think ye will become even of the greatest innocence of man, when compared with the purity of God? For it will be a most severe examination, that shall pierce into the most hidden thoughts of the heart, and (as Paul saith 1 Cor. iv. 5.) shall bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the secret counsels of the heart, which shall compel the lurking and unwilling conscience to utter all these things which are now written. The devil our accuser will press us, who is privy to all the wicked actions he hath tempted us to commit. There the outward pompous shew of good works which are now only esteemed, shall not profit us. Then only purity of mind shall be required. Wherefore that hypocrisy, whereby every man knoweth himself guilty before God, yet boasteth himself of it, before men, but also that with which every man deceiveth himself before God (as we are all naturally inclined, and flatter ourselves) will then fall down confounded, however proud it be now, with more than drunken boldness. They who will not now turn their mind to look on these things, may indeed for a time sweetly and pleasantly frame a righteousness to themselves, but it is such a righteousness as shall by and by be shaken at the judgment of God: as great riches heaped up in a dream vanish vaniſh from men when they awake. But they who earneſtly as it were in the ſight of God, enquire after the true rule of righteouſneſs, ſhall certainly find, that all the works of men, if they be judged by their own worth, are nothing but droſs and dung: and what is accounted righteouſneſs among mankind is mere wickedneſs before God: that what is judged purity, is uncleanneſs: that what is reckoned glory, is but ſhame.

The partial and blind affection which we bear unto ourſelves when we are our own judges, makes us fooliſhly imagine that ſuch as we are, ſo we ſhall appear when God judgeth us muſt be ſhaken off.

5. From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grieve us to deſcend to look to upon ourſelves without flattery or blind affection of love. For it is no marvel if we be all ſo blind in this behalf, foraſmuch as none of us doth beware of the peſtilent tenderneſs toward himſelf, which (as the ſcripture crieth out) naturally ſticketh faſt in us all. To every man (ſaith Solomon) his own way is right in his own eyes. Again. All the ways of man ſeem clean in his own eyes. But what? is he acquitted by this blindneſs? no, but (as he further ſaith in the ſame place) the Lord weigheth the hearts, that is to ſay, while man flattereth himſelf by reaſon of an outward maſk or righteouſneſs that he beareth in reſemblance, in the mean time the Lord with his ballance examineth the hidden uncleanneſs of the heart. Therefore ſince we profit nothing with ſuch flatteries, let us not wilfully mock ourſelves to our own deſtruction. But that we may try ourſelves rightly, we muſt neceſſarily call back our conſcience to the judgment ſeat of God. For we do altogether need his light to diſcloſe the ſecret foldings of our perverſeneſs, which otherwiſe lie too deeply hidden. For then and never till then, we ſhall clearly perceive what is meant hereby: that man being rottenneſs and a worm, abominable and vain, who drinketh in wickedneſs as water, is far from being juſtified before God. For who ſhould make that clean that is conceived of unclean ſeed? not one man. (Job xv. 16.) Then ſhall we alſo find that by experience, which Job ſaid of himſelf? (Job xiv. 4.) If I will go about to ſhew my ſelf innocent, mine own mouth ſhall condemn me: (Job ix. 20.) If I will ſhew my ſelf righteous: it will prove me wicked. For that is not meant of one age only, but of all ages, which the prophet in old time complained of Iſrael, that all went aſtray like ſheep, that every one turned aſide to his own way. (Iſa. liii. 6.) For he there comprehendeth all them, to whom the grace of redemption ſhould come. And the righteouſneſs of this examination ought to proceed ſo far, till it ſubdue us, ſo that we are fully thrown down withal, and by that means prepare us to receive the grace of Chriſt. For he is deceived who thinketh himſelf able to receive the enjoying of this grace, until he have firſt thrown down all haughtineſs of mind. This is a known ſaying: that God confoundeth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

We can neither be righteous till we be humble nor humble as long as we make any reckoning or account at all of our own righteouſneſs.

6. But what way is there to humble ourſelves, but that we being altogether needy and empty, ſhould give place to the mercy of God? For I do not call it humbleneſs, if we think that we have any thing remaining with us. And hitherto they have taught a very hurtful hypocriſy who have joined theſe two things together, that we muſt think humbly of our ſelves before God, and that we muſt make ſome account of our own righteouſneſs. For if we confeſs to God things contrary to what we think, we do wickedly lie unto him: but we cannot think as we ought, without immediately confeſſing that what ſeemed moſt to our honour muſt be troden under foot. Therefore when you hear in the prophet, (Pſal. xviii. 27.) that ſalvation is prepared for the humble, and abaſement for the eyes of the wicked: firſt think, that there is no way open to ſalvation, until thou haſt laid aſide all pride and taken to thee perfect humility: then conſider, that humility conſiſts not in a certain modeſty whereby thou giveſt over to the Lord a hair breadth of thine own right: as among men, they are called humble, who neither preſumptuouſly advance themſelves, nor reproachfully triumph over others, though perhaps they value themſelves upon their own excellence: but rather in an unfeigned ſubmiſſion of a mind caſt down with a ſenſe of thy own miſery and want. For it is deſcribed every where in the word of God. When the Lord ſaith thus in Zephaniah (Zeph. iii. 11. 12.) I will take away out of the midſt of thee, them that rejoice in thy pride, and I will alſo leave in the midſt of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they ſhall truſt in the name of the Lord: doth he not there plainly ſhew who the humble are? even they that are afflicted with a ſenſe of their own poverty. On the other ſide he calleth them proud, who rejoice without bounds, becauſe men in proſperity are apt to rejoice without meaſure. But to the humble whom he purpoſeth to ſave, he leaveth nothing but to truſt in the Lord. And likewiſe it is ſaid in Iſaiah lxvi. 2. Whom ſhall I look unto, even to him that is poor and of a contrite ſpirit, and trembleth at my word? Again, (Iſa. lvii. 15.) Thus ſaith the high and lofty one, that inhabiteth eternity, whoſe name is holy, I dwell in the high and holy place, with him alſo that is of a contrite and humble ſpirit, and to revive the ſpirit of the humble and the heart of the contrite ones. When thou ſo often heareſt the word contrition, underſtand thereby ſuch a wounded heart as alloweth not a man who is caſt down on the ground to riſe again. With ſuch contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the ſaying of God be advanced with the humble: if that be not done, thou ſhalt be brought low with the mighty hand of God to thy ſhame and diſgrace.

7. And our beſt ſchoolmaſter the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thinking it not enough to expreſs it in words, hath alſo given us in a parable the image of true humility as it were in a picture. For he ſheweth a Publican ſtanding a far off, not daring to lift up his eyes to heaven, ſmiting upon his breaſt, praying in this wiſe: God be merciful to me a ſinner. Let us not think theſe are tokens of falſe and hypocritical modeſty, that he dare not look up to heaven, nor come nearer, that with ſmiting his breaſt he confeſſeth himſelf a ſinner: but know that they are proofs of an inward affliction. On the other ſide he placeth the Phariſee who thanketh God that he is not as other men are, either an oppreſſor, or an unrighteous man, or an adulterer; becauſe he faſted twice on the ſabbath, and gave tithes of all he poſſeſſed. He doth with open confeſſion acknowlege that the righteouſneſs which he hath is the gift of God: but becauſe he confidently truſteth that he is righteous, he departeth without God's favour; and abhorred by him; whereas the Publican by acknowleging of his wickedneſs is juſtified. By this we may ſee what high value is put on our humbling ourſelves in the preſence of God: that the heart cannot be open to receive his mercy, unleſs it be firſt void of all opinion of its own worth. When this contrary opinion hath poſſeſſed the heart, it ſhutteth up the way for God's mercy to enter. And that no man may doubt hereof, Chriſt was ſent by his Father into the earth with this commiſſion, (Iſa. lxi. 1, 2, 3.) to bring glad tidings to the poor, to heal the contrite in heart, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the priſon to them that are bound, and to comfort all that mourn: to give them beauty for aſhes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praiſe for the ſpirit of heavineſs. According to this commiſſion, (Matth. xi. 28.) he calleth none but them that labour and are heavy laden, to partake of his bounty. And in another place (Matth. ix. 13.) he ſaith: I came not to call the righteous, but ſinners.

Both pride and careleſneſs muſt be avoided.

8. If therefore we will obey the call of Chriſt, let all arrogance and careleſneſs depart far from us. Arrogance proceedeth from a fooliſh perſwaſion of our own righteouſneſs, when a man thinketh he hath ſomething by the merit whereof he may be commended before God, careleſneſs may be even without any perſwaſion of the merit of our good works. For many ſinners, being intoxicated with the ſweetneſs of vice do not think upon the judgment of God, and lie as it were ſenſeleſly ſtupified with drowſineſs, that they do not aſpire after the mercy offered them. But we muſt ſhake off ſuch ſlothful indifference, as well as lay aſide all vain confidence in our ſelves, that we may without any hinderance flee to Chriſt, that being empty and hungry we may be filled with his good things. For we ſhall never ſufficiently truſt in him, unleſs we utterly diſtruſt ourſelves; we ſhall never ſufficiently raiſe up our courage in him, unleſs it be firſt caſt down in ourſelves. We ſhall never ſufficiently have conſolation in him, unleſs we be firſt miſerable in ourſelves. Therefore we are only meet to take hold of and obtain the favour of God, when caſting away all truſt in ourſelves, and truſting only upon the aſſurance of his goodneſs, and (as Auguſtine ſaith, De verbis Apoſt. cap. 8.) forgetting our own deſervings, we embrace the gift of Chriſt. Becauſe if he ſought for any merits in us, we would not obtain his gifts. Wherewith Bernard very well agreeth, (Ser. 15. in Cant.) comparing proud men to unfaithful ſervants, who arrogantly claim any thing, be it never ſo little to their own deſerts: becauſe they wrongfully aſſume to themſelves the praiſe of grace paſſing by them, as if a wall ſhould ſay that it gives birth to the ſun beam which it receiveth through a window. But, not to dwell longer hereon, let us take a ſhort but a general and ſure rule, that he is prepared to ſhare of the fruits of God's mercy who hath utterly emptied himſelf,

I will

I will not ſay of his righteouſneſs, which is none at all, but of the vain and empty ſhadow of righteouſneſs. Becauſe every man ſo far hindereth his receiving of the liberality of God in as much as he truſteth to any thing in himſelf.

CHAP. XIII.

That there are two things to be obſerved in free juſtification.

AND there are two things to be principally obſerved here; viz. that the Lord's glory, always remain undiminiſhed, and wholly and perfectly maintained, and that our conſciences preſerve an undiſturbed calmneſs and tranquillity before his judgment. We ſee how often and how earneſtly the ſcripture exhorteth us, to pay unto God alone our tribute of praiſe, when we ſpeak of righteouſneſs. And the apoſtle teſtifieth, (Rom. iii. 25, 26.) that this was the Lord's principal purpoſe of giving us righteouſneſs through Chriſt, that he might declare his own righteouſneſs. And what kind of a declaration that ſhould be, he informeth us immediately after: that is that he might be juſt, and the juſtifier of him who believeth in Jeſus. You ſee that the righteouſneſs of God is not ſufficiently ſet out, unleſs he alone be accounted righteous, and communicate the grace or gift of righteouſneſs to them who do not deſerve it. By this means he will have every mouth to be ſtopped, and the whole world to be made ſubject to him. For while man hath any thing to ſay in his own defence, ſo long there is ſomething taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezekiel (Ezek. xx. 43, 44.) he teacheth how much we glorify his name by acknowleging of our wickedneſs. You ſhall remember (ſaith he) your ways and all your wicked doings wherewith ye have been defiled. And ye ſhall lothe yourſelves in your own ſight, for all the evils that ye have committed. And ye ſhall know that I am the Lord, when I ſhall do good to you for my names ſake, and not according to your moſt wicked ways. If theſe things are contained in the true knowlege of God, that we being bruiſed with the knowlege of our iniquities, ſhould conſider that he doth good to us though we are unworthy thereof: why then do we to our great hurt, attempt to ſteal away from the Lord any part of the praiſe of his free grace be it never ſo ſmall? As alſo Jeremiah when he ſaith, (Jer. ix. 23, 24.) Let not the wiſe man glory in his wiſdom, or the rich man in his riches, or the ſtrong man in his ſtrength, but let him that glorieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare that ſomething is taken from God's glory, if any man glory in himſelf? To this purpoſe doth Paul (1 Cor. i. 30.) apply thoſe words, when he teacheth that all the parts of our ſalvation are laid up in Chriſt, that we ſhould not glory but in the Lord. For his meaning is, that he riſeth up againſt God and obſcureth his glory, who thinketh that he hath any thing be it never ſo little of his own.

2. This is the truth, we never glory in him aright, unleſs we be utterly put from glorying in ourſelves. On the other ſide, this is to be holden as a ſound principle, that all men glory againſt God, who glory in themſelves. For Paul judgeth that only by this means the world is made ſubject to God, when all matter to glory upon is utterly taken from men. Therefore Iſaiah, (Iſa. xlv. 25.) when he declareth That, in the Lord ſhall all the ſeed of Iſrael be juſtified, and ſhall glory. As though he ſhould ſay, that the Lord juſtifieth the elect for this reaſon that they ſhould glory in him and in nothing elſe. And how we ought to boaſt of ourſelves in the Lord, he had taught in the verſe next before: that is, that we ſhould ſwear that our righteouſneſs and ſtrength are in the Lord. Obſerve that there is required not only a bare confeſſion, but alſo a confirmation with an oath, that a man may not think that he will be diſcharged by a feigned humility. And let no man here alledge for an excuſe that he doth not glory, when without arrogance he ſetteth forth his own righteouſneſs: for we cannot ſet any the leaſt value upon it without begetting ſome confidence in it, nor any confidence without glorying in it. Therefore let us always remember that in our diſputations concerning righteouſneſs, we muſt have regard to this end, that the praiſe thereof remain whole and perfect with the Lord. Becauſe to declare his righteouſneſs (as the apoſtle teſtifieth Rom. iii. 26.) he hath poured out his grace upon us, that he might be juſt, and the juſtifier of him which believeth in Jeſus.

What it is not to glory in ourſelves

Where-

Wherefore in another place, (Eph. i. 6.) when he had taught that the Lord gave us ſalvation, to the praiſe of the glory of his grace, afterward as it were repeating the ſame thing he addeth, (Eph. ii. 8, 9.) by grace ye are ſaved, through faith: and that not of yourſelves: it is the gift of God, Not of works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt. And when Peter ſays that we are called unto the hope of ſalvation that we ſhould declare the power of him that hath called us out of darkneſs into his marvellous light, without doubt his meaning is to make the praiſe of God alone to ſound in the ears of believers, that they might by the moſt profound ſilence depreſs all arrogancy of the fleſh. In ſhort man cannot without robbing God, challenge to himſelf one crumb of righteouſneſs: becauſe by ſo doing, as much is taken away from the glory of God's righteouſneſs, as we arrogate to ourſelves.

The opinion of righteouſneſs by our own works troubleth the conſcience and depriveth us of all tranquillity of mind.

3. Now if it be aſked by what means the conſcience may be quieted before God, we will find no other mean but the free righteouſneſs which is given us by the gift of God: let us alway think upon this ſaying of Solomon, (Prov. xx. 9.) who ſhall ſay, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my ſin? and every man will be overwhelmed with numberleſs impurities. Therefore let even the moſt perfect man look into his own conſcience and call his actions to account: and obſerve what will be the iſſue. Will he calmly reſt as if all things were in good order between God and him, will he not rather be vexed with terrible torments, when he feels as much as will condemn him abiding in himſelf, if he be judged according to his works? The conſcience if it look upon God, muſt of neceſſity either have aſſured peace with his judgment, or be ſurrounded with the terrors of hell. Therefore we will gain nothing in diſputing of righteouſneſs, unleſs we eſtabliſh ſuch a righteouſneſs, by the ſtability and firmneſs of which our ſouls may be ſupported in the judgment of God. When our ſouls ſhall have ſuch a confidence as may embolden them to appear before the face of God without fear and receive his judgment unſhaken, then, and not till then, let us know that we have found an unfeigned righteouſneſs. Therefore it is not without cauſe the apoſtle inſiſteth ſo much upon this point in whoſe words I had rather expreſs it than with mine own. If (ſaith he Rom. iv. 14.) they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promiſe is of none effect. He firſt infers that faith is diſannulled and made void, if the promiſe of righteouſneſs have reſpect to the deſervings of our works, or depends upon the keeping of the law. For every man could aſſuredly reſt in it: becauſe it could never come to paſs that any man might aſſuredly determine with himſelf that he had ſatisfied the law, and indeed no man doth fully ſatisfy it by works. To prove which, we need not ſeek far for teſtimonies to convince us, every man may be a witneſs to himſelf that will with a right eye behold himſelf. And hence it appears, in how deep and dark corners hypocriſy buries the minds of men, while they careleſly bear with themſelves that they ſtick not to ſet their own flatteries in oppoſition to the judgment of God, as though they would put a ſtop to his judicial proceedings. But believers who ſincerely examine themſelves, are grieved and tormented with a very different carefulneſs. Therefore there would enter into our minds a doubting, and at length deſpair when each man ſhould make account for himſelf with how great a burden of debt he is ſtill oppreſſed, and how far he is from the condition wherewith he is charged. Lo, how faith is by this means already depreſſed and extinguiſhed. For to waver, to vary, to be carried up and down, to doubt, to be held in ſuſpence, to ſtagger, and at length to deſpair, is not to truſt: but to ſtrengthen thy mind with conſtant certainty and perfect aſſurance, and to have whereupon to reſt and faſten thy foot.

To reſt upon the worth of our own works, is to make the promiſes of God ineffectual.

4. He addeth alſo another thing, that is, that the promiſe will thereby be made of no effect and void. For if the fulfilling thereof depend upon our deſerving, when ſhall we merit the bountifulneſs of God? And this ſecond point depends upon the former: For the promiſe ſhall not be fulfilled but to them who believe it. And if faith is fallen, there will remain no ſtrength in the promiſe. Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to eſtabliſh the promiſe. And it is abundantly well eſtabliſhed when it reſteth upon the mercy of God alone: becauſe his mercy and truth are with a perpetual knot joined together, that is to ſay, whatſoever God mercifully promiſeth, he alſo faithfully performeth. So David (Pſal. cxix. 76.) before that he required ſalvation by the word of God, firſt determined the cauſe thereof to be in his mercy. Let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindneſs be for my comfort, according ing to thy word unto thy ſervant. And rightfully: becauſe God is perſwaded by no other mean to make the promiſe, but of his own meer mercy. Therefore we muſt hereon ſtay, and faſten all our hope, and not look to our own works, to ſeek any help from them. And that you may not think I herein ſpeak any new thing: Auguſtine doth alſo teach (In Pſal. lxxxviii. tractatu priore.) that we ought to do ſo. Chriſt (ſaith he) ſhall reign for ever in his ſervants, God hath promiſed it, God hath ſaid it, and if that be not enough, God hath ſworn it. And ſeeing the promiſe is eſtabliſhed, not according to our deſervings, but according to his mercy, no man ought to ſpeak fearfully of that of which he cannot doubt. Bernard alſo ſaith: (In dedicat. templi. ſer. 5.) The diſciples of Chriſt ſay, who can be ſaved? But he anſwered, this is impoſſible with men, but it is not impoſſible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our only comfort, this is the whole ground of our hope, but being aſſured of the poſſibility, what ſay we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of love or hatred? (Eccel. ix. 1.) Who hath known the mind of the Lord? Or who hath been his counſellor? (1 Cor. ii. 16.) Here faith muſt of neceſſity help us, here muſt his truth ſuccour us, that what is hidden from us in the boſom of the Father, may be revealed by the Spirit, and by his Spirit teſtifying, it may perſuade our hearts that we are the ſons of God. And it may perſuade us by his calling and juſtifying us freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certain mean paſſage from the eternal predeſtination to the glory that is to come. Briefly let us conclude. The ſcripture declareth that the promiſes of God are not eſtabliſhed, unleſs they be taken hold of with an aſſured truſt and confidence of mind: and wherever there is any doubting or uncertainty, it pronounceth that they are void. Again it ſaid that they ſtagger and waver, who reſt upon their own works. Therefore we muſt either loſe righteouſneſs, or we muſt not conſider our own works, but faith only muſt take place, whoſe nature it is, to lift up her ears and ſhut her eyes, that is to ſay, to be heedfully bent on the promiſe only, and to turn away her thought from man's worth or deſerving. So that notable prophecy of Zechariah is fulfilled, (Zech. iii. 9, 10.) that when the wickedneſs of the land ſhall be done away, a man ſhall call his friend under his vine and under his fig tree, where the prophet declareth that believers do not enjoy true peace but after obtaining the forgiveneſs of ſins. For this is to be remembred, that when the prophets ſpeak of the kingdom of Chriſt, they make uſe of the outward bleſſings of God as figures of the ſpiritual things. Whence (Iſai. ix. 6. and Eph. ii. 14.) Chriſt is called both the king of peace, and our peace, becauſe he appeaſeth all the troubleſome motions of conſcience. If we aſk by what means he doth it, we muſt of neceſſity have recourſe to the ſacrifice by which God is appeaſed. For he will never ceaſe to tremble for fear, who will not conclude that God is appeaſed by the only ſatisfactory cleanſing wherein Chriſt hath ſuſtained his wrath. Finally peace is no where elſe to be ſought for, but in the terrors and ſufferings of Chriſt our redeemer.

5. But why do I uſe ſo dark a proof? Paul every where denieth (Rom. v. 1.) that there is peace or quiet joy left to conſciences, unleſs we believe that we are juſtified by faith. And he alſo declareth (Rom. v. 5.) whence that aſſurance cometh, namely when the love of God is ſhed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt: as if he had ſaid, our conſciences cannot be quieted, unleſs we be firmly perſuaded that we pleaſe God. Whereupon alſo in another place he crieth out in the perſon of all the godly, Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of God, which is in Chriſt? becauſe we ſhall tremble even at every little breath of wind, till we arrive in the haven: but we will fear no ill even in the darkneſs of death, ſo long as the Lord ſhall ſhew himſelf a ſhepherd unto us. (Pſal. xxiii. 4.) Therefore thoſe who ſay that we are juſtified by faith, becauſe being regenerate, we are juſt by living ſpiritually, never taſted the ſweetneſs of grace, to conſider that God will be merciful unto them. Whence alſo it followeth, that they no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turks and other prophane nations. For (as Paul witneſſeth) (Gal. iv. 6.) it is no true faith unleſs it teach and put us in mind of that moſt ſweet name of Father, yea unleſs it open our mouth freely to cry Abba Father. Which in another place he more plainly expreſſeth, where he ſaith that by Chriſt we have boldneſs and confidence by our faith in him. And truly

Upon theſe two promiſes that we ought to aſcribe all glory unto God, and ſeek the aſſurance of our own hearts, which we cannot do as long as we ſeek righteouſneſs in our own works, it followeth that to be juſtified by faith, is not as ſome imagine to be juſt by living according to that ſpirit which the faithful have received.

truly this cometh to paſs only by the gift of regeneration: which as it is always imperfect in the fleſh, ſo it containeth in itſelf many grounds of doubting. Wherefore we muſt of neceſſity apply to this remedy, that believers ſhould determine and conclude that they can by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, but becauſe being graffed into the body of Chriſt, they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching juſtification, faith is a thing meerly paſſive, bringing nothing of our own to the recovering of the favour of God, but receiving through Chriſt that which we want.

CHAP. XIV.

Four ſorts of men whoſe works are in this queſtion to be conſidered: and firſt ſuch as are not at all endued with any true knowlege of God.

THat the matter may be made more plain, let us ſearch, what may be the righteouſneſs of man in the whole courſe of his life: and let us make four degrees thereof. For men either having no knowlege of God, are drowned in idolatry: or being entred into the profeſſion of chriſtianity by the ſacraments, and denying God by the impurity of their lives, whom they confeſs with their mouth, theſe are Chriſt's no further than in name: or they are hypocrites who cover the wickedneſs of their hearts, with deceitful colours: or being regenerate by the Spirit of God, they endeavour after true holineſs. And when they are to be judged ſpecially and ſeverally according to their natural gift, from the crown of their head to the ſole of their foot, there will not be found one ſpark of goodneſs, unleſs we will accuſe the ſcripture of falſhood, when it ſetteth out all the ſons of Adam with theſe titles that they are of froward and ſtubborn heart, (Jer. xvii. 9.) that all the imaginations of their heart are evil from their infancy, (Gen. viii. 21.) that their thoughts are vain, that they have not the fear of God before their eyes, that none of them underſtandeth or ſeeketh God, (Pſal. liii. 2, 3. and xiv. 2.) inſhort that they are fleſh, (Gen. vi. 3.) by which word we are to underſtand all thoſe works which Paul narrateth, (Gal. v. 19, 20, 21.) Adultery, fornication, uncleanneſs, laſciviouſneſs, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, ſtrife, ſeditions, hereſies, envyings, murders, drunkenneſs, revellings and whatever filthineſs and abomination may be deviſed. This is the worth, and confidence whereof they muſt be proud. But if any among them excel with ſuch honeſty of manners as hath ſome ſhew of holineſs among men: yet becauſe we know that God regardeth not the outward appearance, we muſt ſearch the very fountain of works if we will have them to avail any thing to righteouſneſs. We muſt (I ſay) thorougly look into them, and obſerve from what affection of heart theſe works proceed. But though here lieth open a moſt large field to diſcourſe on, yet, as the matter may he declared in very few words, I will purſue brevity as much as poſſibly I can in teaching.

2. Firſt I deny not that whatever excellent gifts appear in unbelievers, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I ſo far differ from the common opinion, that I would affirm that there is no difference between the juſtice, temperance and equity of Titus and Trajan, and the rage, intemperance, and cruelty of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: between the filthy luſts of Tiberius, and in this behalf the continency of Veſpaſian: and (that we may not tarry too long upon ſome ſpecial virtues or vices) between the obſerving and the deſpiſing of equity and law. For there is ſo great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth even in the dead image thereof. For what will remain well ordered in the world, if we confound right and wrong together? For which cauſe the Lord hath not only engraven ſuch a difference between honeſt and diſhoneſt actions, in the minds of all men, but alſo doth often confirm it in the diſpenſations of his providence. For we ſee how he extendeth many of the bleſſings of this preſent life to them who follow virtue. Not becauſe that outward image of virtue deſerveth the leaſt benefit of his: but ſo it pleaſeth him to declare by this proof how much true righteouſneſs pleaſeth him, when he alloweth not, even an outward and feigned righteouſneſs to paſs without a reward. Whence follows what we juſt now confeſſed, that theſe virtues ſuch as they are, or rather images of virtues, are the gifts of God, as there is nothing praiſe worthy in them, which proceedeth not from him.

3. But

3. But nevertheless it is true which Augustine writeth, Lib. 4. cont. Julianum. that all they who are strangers from the true religion of the one God, however they may be reckoned worthy of admiration for the sake of virtue, are not only worthy of no reward, but rather deserve punishment, because by their pollution of heart, they bespot the pure good things of God. For though they are the instruments of God to preserve fellowship among men with justice, continency, temperance of mind, courage, and wisdom: yet they very ill execute these good works of God: because they are restrained from doing evil not by a sincere love of goodness, but only by ambition, a love of themselves, or by some other crooked affection. Therefore as they are corrupt by the very uncleanness of the heart, and by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among virtues, than those vices which are wont to deceive by their nearness and likeness of virtue. Finally, when we remember, that the end of that which is right, is that God may be always served: whatever tendeth to any other end, doth immediately and justly lose the name of right. Because they have no respect to the mark which the wisdom of God appointeth: though the actions they perform, seem good in the doing, yet by the wrong end they pursue it becomes sinful. He concludeth therefore that the Fabricii, Scipioes, and Catoes, in all those excellent actions of theirs, sinned in this manner, because wanting the light of faith, they did not apply them unto that end to which they ought to have directed them: and for this reason he concludes, that true righteousness was not in them: for as much as duties are not judged of by doing them, but by the end proposed.

4. Moreover if it be true which John saith: (1 John v. 12.) that there is no life without the Son of God: Those who have no part in Christ, what manner of men soever they be, whatever they do or go about, yet they run forward with their whole course into destruction, and the judgment of eternal death. After this reason, is that said of Augustine. Lib. ad Boni. in cap. 5. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the unrighteous, not by the law of works: but by the law of faith alone, without which, those actions which seem good are turned into sins. Wherefore the same Augustine saith very well in another place, Præf. in Psal. when he compareth the endeavours of such men, to running out of the way. For the faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the mark, and thereby is made so much the more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, that to run out of the road. Finally, it is certain that they are bad trees, because without the communication of Christ there is no sanctification; They may indeed bear fair fruit and beautiful to the eye, yea sweet to the taste, yet it will not be good fruit. Hereby we easily perceive that whatever man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not only of no value to righteousness, but rather most surely deserving condemnation. And why dispute we of this as a thing doubtful since it is already proved by the testimony of the apostle, (Heb. xi. 6.) that it is impossible for any man to please God without faith?

There is no more power in us to do good, till God in mercy renew us, than there is in a dead body to do any action of life.

5. But there will yet appear a plainer proof, if the grace of God be set directly in opposition to the natural state of man. For the scripture saith every where, that God finding nothing in man whereby he may be provoked to do him good, preventeth him with his own free goodness. What can a dead man do to attain life? But when he enlighteneth us with the knowlege of himself, he is said (John v. 25.) to raise us from death, and to make us new creatures. For we see that oftentimes, especially by the apostle Paul, the goodness of God is set forth unto us by this title, God (saith he, Eph. ii. 4, 5.) who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, &c. In another place, (Rom. xi. 35.) where under the figure of Abraham he speaketh of the general calling of the faithful, he saith: it is God that giveth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we are nothing, what (I pray you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly beateth down this arrogance, in the history of Job, (Job xli. 11.) in these words: who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine. Which sentence Paul expounding, applyeth it to this, that we should not think that we bring any thing to the Lord but mere shame of want and emptiness. Wherefore in (Eph. ii. 10.) to prove that we are called into the hope of ſalvation by his grace alone, not by works, he allegeth that we are his workmanſhip created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we ſhould walk in them. As if he had ſaid: which of us can boaſt that he hath with his righteouſneſs provoked God, ſince our firſt power to do good proceedeth from regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oil ſhall ſooner be wrong out of a ſtone, that a good work out of us. Truly it is ſurpriſing that any man after being convicted with ſo great ſhame, dare yet ſay that there remaineth any good thing with him. Therefore let us confeſs with this noble inſtrment of God, the apoſtle Paul (2 Tim. i. 9.) that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpoſe and grace: and with the ſame apoſtle, (Tit. iii. 4, 5, 7.) that the kindneſs and love of God our Saviour toward us hath appeared, becauſe he hath ſaved us, not by works of righteouſneſs which we have done, but according to his own mercy: that being juſtified by his grace, we might be made the heirs of eternal life. By this confeſſion we deſpoil man of all righteouſneſs even to the leaſt little particle thereof, till he be by mercy alone regenerate into hope of eternal life: becauſe if the righteouſneſs of works bring any thing toward the juſtifying of us, it is falſly ſaid (Rom. xi. 6.) that we are juſtified by grace. Truly the apoſtle had not forgotten himſelf, when he affirmed juſtification to be of free gift, who in another place argueth that grace is not grace, if works avail us any thing. And what other thing doth our Lord mean, when he ſaith, (Matth. ix. 23.) that he came not to call the righteous but ſinners to repentance. And if only ſinners are received, why ſeek we an entry by a falſe and ſuppoſed righteouſneſs of our own?

God unſought unto by us, ſeeketh us of mere love, and doth not only propoſe a redemption which we by our own works may obtain in Chriſt, but by effectual calling ingraft us into Chriſt by whoſe blood being ſo in-

6. But this ſame thought now and then recurreth to my mind, that there is ſome danger leſt I ſhould wrong the mercy of God, while I labour ſo carefully to prove this as though it were doubtful or dark. But becauſe our envy is ſuch, that unleſs it be altogether thruſt out of place, it never yeildeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to to tarry ſomewhat the longer upon it. Yet as the ſcripture is clear enough in this matter, I will in combating this error, rather uſe the words thereof than my own. Iſaiah, when he hath deſcribed the univerſal deſtruction of mankind, doth immediately after very fitly adjoin the order of reſtoring. (Iſa. lxiii. 5.) The Lord looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought ſalvation unto me, and my fury it upheld me. Where are our righteouſneſſes if it be true which the prophet ſaith; that there was no man that helped the Lord in recovering his ſalvation? So another prophet, (Hoſ. ii. 19.) bringeth in the Lord, diſcourſing of the reconciling of ſinners to himſelf, ſaith: I will eſpouſe thee unto me for ever, in righteouſneſs, in judgment, and in loving kindneſs, and in mercies. I will ſay to her that hath not obtained mercy, thou haſt obtained mercy. If ſuch covenant, which it is certain to be the firſt conjoining that we have with God, dependeth only upon the mercy of God, there is no foundation left for our own righteouſneſs. And I would fain learn of thoſe men who imagine that man meeteth God with ſome righteouſneſs of works, whether they think that there is any righteouſneſs at all, except that which is acceptable to God. If it be madneſs to think ſo, what acceptable thing to God can proceed from his enemies, whom he utterly abhorreth with all their actions? That all we, I ſay, are the deadly and profeſſed enemies of our God, the truth itſelf teſtifieth, (Rom. v. 10. and Coloſ. i. 2.) till being juſtified, we are received into friendſhip. If juſtification be the beginning of God's love, what righteouſneſs of works ſhall go before it? So John, (1 John iv. 10.) to ſilence that arrogant pride which is naturally in us, doth carefully put us in mind that we did not firſt love him. And the ſelf ſame thing the Lord had long before taught by the prophet: (Hoſ. xiv. 4.) I will love them ſaith he, with a free love, becauſe mine anger is turned away. Certainly his love is not provoked by works, if it hath of his own accord inclined itſelf unto us. But rude and ignorant people think it to be nothing elſe, but only that no man hath deſerved that Chriſt ſhould perform our redemption: yet that to the entring into the poſſeſſion of redemption, we are aſſiſted by our own works, but though we are redeemed of Chriſt, yet till we are by the calling of the Father graffed into the communion of him, we are both heirs of darkneſs and death, and enemies to God. For Paul teacheth (1 Cor. vi. 11.) that we are not cleanſed and waſhed from our impurity and filthineſs by the blood of Chriſt,

until the holy Ghoſt work that cleanſing in us. Which ſame thing Peter intending to teach, declareth (1 Pet. i. 2:) that the ſanctifying of the Spirit availeth unto obedience and the ſprinkling of the blood of Chriſt. If we are by the Spirit ſprinkled with the blood of Chriſt unto cleanſing, let us not think that before ſuch waſhing we are any other than a ſinner is without Chriſt. Let this therefore remain certain, that the beginning of our ſalvation is as it were a certain reſurrection from death to life: Becauſe when for Chriſt's ſake it is given to us to believe in him, then we firſt begin to paſs from death into life.

The ſecond and third ſorts of men mentioned Sect. 1. not having faith, cannot have ſuch a righteouſneſs as will ſanctify them.

7. Under this ſort are comprehended they who have in the diviſion above made, been marked as the ſecond and third ſort of men. For the impurity of their conſciences proves that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And again, as there is no regeneration in them, this proves their want of faith. Whereby it appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor juſtified in his ſight: foraſmuch as theſe good things are not attained to, but by faith. What can ſinners eſtranged from God bring forth, but that which is accurſed in his judgment? With this fooliſh confidence all wicked men are puffed up, and eſpecially hypocrites, becauſe though they know that their heart ſwarmeth with all kinds of corruptions, yet if they perform any works that have a ſhew of goodneſs, they think that God ſhould not deſpiſe them. Hence ariſeth that pernicious error, that being proved guilty of a wicked and miſchievous mind, yet they cannot be brought to confeſs themſelves void of righteouſneſs: and even when they acknowlege themſelves unrighteous, becauſe they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claim ſome righteouſneſs unto themſelves. This vanity the Lord excellently well confuteth by the prophet, (Hag. ii. 11, 12, 13.) aſk the prieſts ſaying: if a man carry ſanctified fleſh in the hem of his garments, and putteth to it bread or other meat, ſhall it be ſanctified? and the prieſts anſwered: No. And Haggai ſaid, If a defiled man in ſoul touch any of theſe things, ſhall it be defiled? The prieſts anſwered: it ſhall be defiled. Haggai ſaid, So is this people before my face, ſaith the Lord, and ſo is every work of their hands; and all things that they offer to me ſhall be defiled. I would to God that this ſaying might either get full credit with us, or be well ſettled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be in his whole life never ſo hainous a wicked doer, can endure to be perſuaded of that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The worſt man, ſo ſoon as he hath performed one or two doubtful deeds of the law, doubteth not that they are accounted to him for righteouſneſs. But the Lord declareth on the contrary, that there is no ſanctification gotten thereby, unleſs the heart be firſt well cleanſed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that all works whatſoever they be which proceed from ſinners, are defiled with the uncleanneſs of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteouſneſs be taken from theſe works which are by the Lord's own mouth condemned of filthineſs. And with how fit a ſimilitude doth he ſhew the ſame? For it might have been objected, that whatſoever the Lord had commanded, was inviolably holy. But he on the contrary ſide ſetteth againſt them, that it is no wonder, if thoſe things that are hallowed by the law of the Lord, are defiled with the filthineſs of naughty men: whereas an unclean hand profaneth a holy thing with touch in it.

The hearts of hypocrites not being purged, their works tho' in appearance fair, cannot be accepted graciouſly in the ſight of God.

8. The ſame matter he excellently well handleth in Iſaiah, (Iſa. i. 13.----16.) Offer not (ſaith he) ſacrifice in vain: incenſe is an abomination to me: my ſoul hateth your new moons and your appointed feaſts. They are become tedious to me, and I have been weary with bearing them: when you hold up your hands I will turn away mine eyes from you: when you ſhall multiply your prayers I will not hear: for your hands are full of blood. Be ye waſhed, be ye clean, put away the evil of your doings. What meaneth this that the Lord ſo lotheth the obeying of his own law? he here refuſeth nothing that floweth from the natural obſerving of the law, the beginning whereof he every where teacheth to be the unfeigned fear of his name. When that is not done, whatever things are offered to him are not only trifles, but ſtinking and abominable filthineſs. Now let the hypocrites go, and ſtill keeping their perverſeneſs wrapt up in their hearts, and endeavour to deſerve the favour of God with works. By this means, they will but more and more provoke him to wrath. For the ſacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord: but the prayer of the upright is his delight. (Pſal. xv. 8.) Therefore we hold, that as a thing not to be doubted, which ought to be known by him, who is even but meanly exerciſed in the ſcriptures, that even thoſe works that glitter moſt gloriouſly in men not yet truly ſanctified, are ſo far from righteouſneſs in the ſight of the Lord, that they are judged ſins. And therefore they ſpeak very properly who have taught (Aug. lib. de pœn. & Gre.) that favour with God is not procured to any perſon by works: but on the contrary that works do then pleaſe, and never till then, when the perſon hath firſt found grace in the ſight of God. And this order is religiouſly to be kept, to which the ſcripture leadeth us by the hand. Moſes writeth (Gen. iv. 4.) that the Lord had reſpect to Abel and to his works. See you not how he declareth that God is favourable to the men, before he had a reſpect to their works? Wherefore the cleanſing of the heart muſt go before the works which we do can be graciouſly received of God: becauſe this ſaying of Jeremiah is always in force, (Jer. v. 3.) O Lord! are not thine eyes upon the truth? And that it is faith only which purifieth the hearts of men, the holy Ghoſt hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: (Acts xv. 9.) whereby it is certain, that the firſt foundation is in true and lively faith.

From the fourth ſort of men, ſuch as are truly juſtified through Chriſt, there proceedeth not one good work in all points holy and perfect.
